

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

---

This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

Google<sup>TM</sup> books

<https://books.google.com>

~~N 3 A17~~

AP

4

A1614

Cornell University Library
BOUGHT WITH THE INCOME FROM THE SAGE ENDOWMENT FUND
THE GIFT OF
Henry W. Sage
1891

A 205473 11/9/1906

5901

NOV 8 '34

HOME USE RULES.

Books not needed for instruction or research are returnable within 4 weeks.

Volumes of periodicals and of pamphlets are held in the library as much as possible. For special purposes they are given out for a limited time.

Borrowers should not use their library privileges for the benefit of other persons.

Books not needed during recess periods should be returned to the library, or arrangements made for their return during borrower's absence, if wanted.

Books needed by more than one person are held on the reserve list.

Books of special value and gift books, when the giver wishes it, are not allowed to circulate.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY
3 1924 066 328 364

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY—JUNE

1906

VOLUME LXX

PUBLISHING OFFICE

20 TAVISTOCK STREET, COVENT GARDEN

1906

CORNELL UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

T

AP
4
A16++

~~13 A17~~

1.205 472

CONTENTS OF VOLUME LXX

ARTICLES

	PAGE
Authorship of the Tract On the Constitution of Athens, The	330
Braton Folk Song	12
Coleridge and the Wedgwood Pension	283, 306
Days and Hours	402
Gazettes in Rhyme	477
Greek at the Universities	527
Heretics on Style	610
Ibsen, Henrik	501
Jesuits, The late Father-General of the Marciana Library at Venice, The	451
Practical Lecturer, The: A Great English-woman	596
Reviews and Magazines	37
Science, The Warfare of	113
Sumptuary	178
"Ye Verdant Groves, Ye Sylvan Shades"	548

BOOKS, FORTHCOMING

Pages	19, 44, 66, 97, 122, 144, 163, 185, 210, 232, 265, 289, 314, 337, 386, 409, 433, 458, 484, 507, 533, 579, 601, 626
-------	--

BOOKS RECEIVED

Pages	21, 68, 101, 125, 147, 164, 188, 213, 233, 267, 291, 316, 340, 362, 387, 412, 435, 459, 486, 508, 534, 555, 581, 605, 630
-------	---

CORRESPONDENCE

Pages	20, 44, 67, 98, 123, 146, 163, 187, 211, 232, 266, 289, 315, 338, 362, 387, 409, 434, 458, 484, 507, 533, 554, 580, 602, 627
-------	--

DRAMA

A Close Time for the Peasants by Thomas Hardy	206
Archer v. Artemis and Another	359
"Captain Brassbound's Conversion" at the Royal Court Theatre	311
"Conseil Judiciaire, Un," at the New Royalty Theatre	142
"Electra" at the Court Theatre	63
En Revenants de la Revue	262
Hewlett's (M.), "Pastoral" at the Court Theatre	207
"His House in Perfect Order"	140
"Lady Inger of Ostraa" at the Scala Theatre	119
"La Rafale" at the New Royalty Theatre	64
"Le D��tour" at the New Royalty Theatre	182
"Le P��re Lebonnard" at the New Royalty Theatre	119
"Les Affaires sont les Affaires" at the New Royalty Theatre	93
"Measure for Measure," by the O.U.D.S.	207
Nero without Tears	118
Stage Society, The	119, 141, 600
Symons's Morality, Mr. Arthur	383

FICTION

Adams (Andy), "Cattle Brands"	577
"A Dr. amers Book," J. H. Pearce	335
"Adventures of Alicia," Katharine Tyrant	551
Albanesi (Madame), "A Young Man from the Country"	501
Alden (W. L.), "Cat Tales"	41
Alexander (Eleanor), "The Lady of the Well"	503
"All that was Possible," H. O. Sturgis	590
"Amethyst of Young Days, The," By Rosamund Langbridge	182
"Amelia and the Doctor," H. G. Hutchinson	530
"Ancient Landmarks, The," Elizabeth Cherry	140
"Angel of Pain, The," E. F. Benson	381
Anstey (F.), "Salted Almonds"	382
"Anthony Britten," Herbert MacIlwaine	510
"Arenia, The," Harold Spender	503
"Arrow of the North, The," R. H. Forster	93
"Bands of the Orion, The," Hon. Mrs. N. Grosvenor	550
"Bar Sinister, The," J. Morgan de Groot	599
Bartram (George), "Lads of the Fancy"	206
"Beauty Shop, The," Daniel Woodroff	93
"Bending of a Twig, The," D. F. T. Coke	205
"Benedick in Arcady, A," Halliwell Satchell	510
Bennett (A.), "Hugo"	92
Benson (G. R.), "Tracks in the Snow"	429
Benson (R. H.), "The History of Richard Rival, Solitary"	229
Benson (E. F.), "The Angel of Pain"	381
Betham-Edwards (Miss), "Martha Rose, Teacher"	117
"Beyond the Rocks," Eliaor Glyn	503
"Blanche Esmead," Ella Fuller Maitland	335
Bodkin (M. McD.), "A Madcap Marriage"	63
Boyd (M. S.), "The Misses Make-Believe"	230
Bradby (G. F.), "Dick"	205
"Bridal of Anstice, The," E. Godfrey	510
"Brownjohn's," Mabel Dearmer	206
Burchell (S. H.), "The Grip of Fear"	599
"Burglar's Club, The," Henry A. Herring	261
Byrde (M.), "The Interpreters"	93

FICTION—continued

Calthrop (D. C.), "King Peter"	550
Campbell (F.), "Dearlove"	405
Campbell (F.), "The Measure of Life"	261
Capes (B.), "Loaves and Fishes"	335
Carr (M. E.), "The Poison of Tongues"	261
Castle (A. and Egerton), "If Youth but Knew"	353
"Cattle Brands," Andy Adams	577
"Cat Tales," W. L. Alden	41
"Cavalieri Moderni," F. Zampini Salazar	42
Chambers (R. W.), "A Young Man in a Hurry"	230
Champion de Crespigny (Mrs. P.), "The Grey Domino"	504
Cleeve (Lucas), "The Dreamer"	16
Clouston (J. S.), "Count Bunker"	551
Cobb (T.), "Mrs. Erricker's Reputation"	117
Coke (D. F. T.), "The Bending of a Twig"	205
"Concerning Paul and Fiammetta," L. Allen	288
Cotes (Mrs. E.), "Set In Authority"	529
"Count at Harvard, The," R. S. Hall	454
"Count Bunker," J. Storer Clouston	551
Cox (Sir E. C.), "John Carruthers—Indian Policeman"	63
Cox (F. J.), "A Stranger Within the Gates"	623
"Cubs, The," Shan P. Bullock	577
"Curayl," Una L. Silberrad	287
Danby (F.), "The Sibyller's Lawyer"	383
"Daughter of Thor, A," Helen Maxwell	41
"Dazzling Reprobate, A," W. R. H. Trowbridge	622
"Dearlove," Frances Campbell	405
Dearmer (M.), "Brownjohn's"	206
Deledda (Grazia), "Nostalgia"	41
"Dick," G. F. Bradby	205
Dickinson (H. N.), "Things that are Caesar's"	481
"Divine Gift, The," R. M. Lewis	335
"Drakestone," Oliver Onions	181
"Dr. Fuchs und Seine Tertia," Fritz Pistorius	623
"Dreamer, The," Lucas Cleeve	16
Easton (M. G.), "The House by the Bridge"	310
Eggar (A.), "The Hatanee"	161
Ellis (Mrs. Havelock), "My Cornish Neighbours"	310
"Evasion, The," Eugenia Brooks Frothingham	551
Facchini (Cesare), "La Mia Carovana, avventure di Vangelo Famiglio filosofo"	359
"Face of Clay, The," Horace Annesley	382
Vachell	382
Farrer (R.), "The House of Shadows"	406
"Fenwick's Career," Mrs. Humphry Ward	422
"Fifth Queen, The," Ford Madox Hueffer	261
Fletcher (J. S.), "The Tarnishing Floor"	230
"Flower of France, The," Justin Huntly McCarthy	454
"Folly," Edith Rickert	287
Forbes (E. M.), "A Heart's Harmony"	40
"For Life and After," G. R. Sims	230
Foster (R. H.), "The Arrow of the North"	93
Fox (John, jun.), "A Mountain Europa"	117
Francis (M. E.), "Simple Annals"	405
Fressen (Gustav), "Hillgenet"	334
"From Paleolith to Motor-Car: or Heatham Tales," H. Lowerison	530
Frothingham (E. B.), "The Evasion"	551
Galsworthy (J.), "The Man of Property"	309
"Gambler, The," Katherine Cecil Thurston	181
"George's Whims," Philip Wainward	430
"Giant Circumstance," John Oxenham	286
Gissing (A.), "Master of Pinsmead"	261
Gissing (G.), "The House of Cobwebs and other Stories"	479
Glyn (Elmor), "Beyond the Rocks"	503
Godfrey (E.), "The Bridal of Anstice"	509
Gorst (Mrs. H.), "The Light"	430
Gray (Maxwell), "The Grip of Fear"	173
"Great Refusal, The," Maxwell Gray	173
"Grey Domino, The," Mrs. Philip Chant	01
Crespiigny	01
Griffin (E. A.), "Lady Sarah's Deed of Gift"	387
Griffiths (Major A.), "The House in Seton Gardens"	150
"Grip of Fear, The," S. H. Burchell	599
Groot (J. Morgan de), "The Bar Sinister"	599
Grosvenor (Hda. Mrs. N.), "The Bands of Orion"	550
Hall (R. S.), "The Count at Harvard"	454
Hamilton (Cosmo), "Nature's Vagabond and other Stories"	117
Harker (L. Allen), "Concerning Paul and Fiammetta"	288
"Harley Greenoak's Charge," Bertram Mitford	599
Harraden (Beatrice), "The Scholar's Daughter"	182
"Hatanee, The," Arthur Eggar	161
"Huntings," Vernon Lee	358
"Heifers, The," Marten Maartens	100
Healy (Carr.), "Mrs. The Story of an Unconventional Woman"	405
"Heart's Harmony, A," Ethel M. Forbes	40
"Heitere Bilder," Luise Koppen	623
"Henry Northcote," J. C. Smith	480
"Her Highness," Fred Wishaw	63
Herring (H. A.), "The Burglar's Club"	261
"Hillgenet," Gustav Fressen	334
"History of Richard Rival, Solitary, The," Robert Hugh Benson	229
"House by the Bridge, The," M. G. Easton	310
"House of Cobwebs and other Stories," George Gissing	479
"House of Shadows, The," R. Farrer	406

FICTION—continued

"House in Spring Gardens," Major Arthur Griffiths	550
Howard (Kebble), "The Smiths of Suchiton"	140
Hueffer (Ford Madox), "The Fifth Queen"	261
"Hugo," Arnold Bennett	92
Huneker (J.), "Visionaries"	116
Hutchinson (H. G.), "Amelia and the Doctor"	530
Hutten (Baroness von), "What Became of Pam"	479
"If Youth but Knew," A. and E. Castle	358
"Interpreters, The," Margaretta Byrde	93
"Jack Derringer," Basil Lubbock	359
Jephson (Edgar), "The Lady Noggs, Peeress"	182
"John Carruthers, Indian Policeman," Sir E. C. Cox	63
Jones (D. M.), "A Maid of Normandy"	480
Kenny (Louise), "The Red-Haired Woman: her Autobiography"	40
"King Peter," Dion Clayton Calthrop	550
Koppen (L.), "Heitere Bilder"	623
"La Belle Dame," Alice Methley	117
"Lads of the Fancy," George Bartram	206
"Lady Betty Across the Water," C. N. and A. M. Williamson	550
"Lady Noggs, Peeress, The," Edgar Jephson	182
"Lady of the Decoration, The"	480
"Lady of the Well, The," Eleanor Alexander	503
"Lady Sarah's Deed of Gift," E. A. Griffin	387
"La Mia Carovana, avventure di Vangelo Famiglio filosofo," Cesare Facchini	359
Langbridge (R.), "The Ambush of Young Days"	182
"Lapse of Vivien Eady," Charles Marriott	181
Lee (Vernon), "Huntings"	358
Lee-Hamilton (Eugene), "The Romance of the Fountain"	15
Lewis (R. M.), "The Divine Gift"	335
"Light, The," Mrs. Harold Gorst	430
"Loaves and Fishes," Bernard Capes	335
London (Jack), "Tales of the Fish Patrol"	287
Lowerison (H.), "From Paleolith to Motor-Car: or Heatham Tales"	530
Lubbock (B.), "Jack Derringer"	359
Maartens (Maarten), "The Healers"	100
McCarthy (Justin Huntly), "The Flower of France"	454
Macdonald (R.), "The Sea Maid"	205
"Madeup Marriage, A," M. McD. Bodkin	63
MacIlwaine (H.), "Anthony Britten"	510
MacKay (W.), "A Mender of Nets"	405
"Maid of Normandy, A," Dora M. Jones	480
Maitland (E. F.), "Blanche Esmead"	335
"Making of Michael, The," Mrs. Fred Reynolds	16
Mann (Mary E.), "Rose at Honeypot"	92
"Man of Property, The," John Galsworthy	309
"Mara, The Story of an Unconventional Woman," Chris Healy	405
Marriott (C.), "The Lapse of Vivien Eady"	181
Marshall (Archibald), "Richard Baldock"	430
"Martha Rose, Teacher," Miss Betham-Edwards	117
Marsh (C. F.), "Mr. Baxter, Sportsman"	410
"Master of Pinsmead, The," Algernon Gissing	261
Maxwell (H.), "A Daughter of Thor"	41
"Mayor of Troy, The," Q"	333
"Measure of Life, The," Frances Campbell	261
"Mender of Nets, A," William Mackay	405
Methley (A.), "La Belle Dame"	117
"Miss Desmond," Maria von Voist	49
"Misses Mike-Believe, The," Mary Stuart	210
Boyd	210
Mitford (Bertram), "Harley Greenoak's Charge"	599
"Mountain Europa, A," John Fox, jun.	117
"Mr. Baxter, Sportsman," C. F. Marsh	430
"Mrs. Erricker's Reputation," Thomas Cobb	117
"My Cornish Neighbours," Mrs. Havelock Ellis	310
"Nature's Vagabond and other Stories," Cosmo Hamilton	117
Neuman (B. Paul), "The Spoils of Victory"	576
"Nostalgia," Grazia Deledda	41
"Old Mr. Lovelace," Christian Tearle	480
Onions (Oliver), "The Drakestone"	181
Oxenham (J.), "Giant Circumstance"	286
"Paramor Papers, The," Florence Popham	237
"Pathway of the Pioneer, The," Dolt Wyllarde	310
Pearce (J. H.), "A Dreamer's Book"	335
Phillipotts (Eden), "The Portreeve"	119
Pistorius (Fritz), "Dr. Fuchs und Seine Tertia"	623
"Poison of Tongues, The," M. E. Glyn	201
Popham (F.), "The Parmor Papers"	237
"Portreeve, The," Eden Phillpotts	119
Pugh (Edwin), "The Spoilers"	92
"Red-Haired Woman: her Autobiography, The," Louise Kenny	40
L. L. L.	40
Reynolds (Mrs. F.), "The Making of Michael"	16
"Richard Baldock," Archibald Marshall	430
Rickert (E.), "Folly"	287
"Romance of the Fountain, The," Eugene Lee-Hamilton	15
"Rose at Honeypot," Mary E. Mann	92
Salazar (F. Z.), "Cavalieri Moderni"	12
"Salted Almonds," F. Anstey	382
Satchell (W.), "The Toll of the Bush"	16
"Scholar's Daughter, The," Beatrice Harraden	182
"Sea-Maid, The," Ronald Macdonald	235
Selgwick (A. D.), "The Shadow of Life"	474
"Set in Authority," Mrs. Edward Cotes	529
"Shadow of Life, The," A. D. Selgwick	474
"Sicilian Marriage, A," Douglas Sladen	16
Sigerson (D.), "The Story and Song of Black Roderick"	151
Silberrad (Una L.), "Curayl"	287

FICTION—continued		PAGE
"Simple Annals," M. E. Francis		405
Sims (G. R.), "For Life and After"		230
Sladen (Douglas), "A Sicilian Marriage"		16
"Smiths of Surbiton, The," Kebble Howard		140
Snaith (J. C.), "Henry Northcote"		480
Spender (H.), "The Arena"		503
"Sphinx's Lawyer, The," Frank Danby		383
"Spoilers, The," Edwin Pugh		92
"Spoils of Victory, The," B. Paul Neuman		576
"Story and Song of Black Roderick, The," Dora Sigerson		454
"Stranger Within the Gate, A," F. J. Cox		623
Sturgis, H. O., "All That was Possible"		590
Sudermann (H.), "The Undying Past"		576
Sutcliffe (Halliwell), "A Benedick in Arcady"		530
Syrett (Netta), "Women and Circumstance"		454
Tearle (Christian), "Old Mr. Lovelace"		480
"Things that are Caesar's," H. N. Dickinson		481
"Threshing Floor, The," J. S. Fletcher		230
Thurston (E. Temple), "Traffic"		334
Thurston (K. Cecil), "The Gambler"		181
"Toll of the Bush, The," William Satchell		16
"Tracks in the Snow," G. R. Benson		429
"Traffic," E. Temple Thurston		334
Trowbridge (W. R. H.), "A Dazzling Reprobate"		622
Turner (Reginald), "Uncle Peacable"		229
Tynan (Katharine), "Adventures of Alicia"		551
"Uncle Peacable," Reginald Turner		229
"Undying Past, The," Hermann Sudermann		576
Vachell (H. A.), "The Face of Clay"		382
"Visionaries," James Huneke		116
Van Vorst (Marie), "Miss Desmond"		40
Waltz (E. C.), "The Ancient Landmarks"		140
Ward (Mrs. Humphry), "Fenwick's Career"		422
Ward (Mrs. W.), "Out of Due Time"		382
"What Became of Pam," Baroness v. Hutten		479
Whithard (Philip), "George's Whims"		430
Williamson (C. N. and A. M.), "Lady Betty Across the Water"		550
Wishaw (Fred), "Her Highness"		63
"Women and Circumstance," Netta Syrett		454
Woodroffe (D.), "The Beauty Shop"		93
Wyllarde, Dolf., "The Pathway of the Pioneer"		310
"Young Man from the Country, A," Madame Albanesi		501
"Young Man in a Hurry, A," Robert W. Chambers		230

FINE ART

A Hardy Annual	288
Antiques, Slane	431
Art of the Plain, The	406
Arts and Crafts and Organisation, The	94
Baillie's Flower Show, Mr.	263
Blake, William, The Paintings of	600
Beardsley, Aubrey	95
Canossa	183
Coburn's, Mr. A. L., Photographs	143
Constable, Two New Books on	119
Engraving and Etching, Some Masterpieces of	288
Fantini and Zorn	577
Faure Collection of Manets, The	624
Flemish Art at the Guildhall	481
French Primitives, The	161
French Salons, The	456
Furse, The late Charles Wellington	311
Gainsborough Studies and Drawings	531
German Exhibitions, The	531
Grand Style, The	16
Historical Portraits at Oxford	432
International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers at the New Gallery, The	42, 230
John, Mr. Augustus	551
London, Beautiful	120
National Art Collections Fund, Report of the, for 1905	407
New English Art Club, The	623
Old Master at Burlington House, The	42, 64
Painter Etchers, The	200
Painters, Forgotten	407
Photographs, Exhibition of	408
Photography in Colours	506
Royal Academy, The	455, 504
Recent Acquisitions in the South Kensington Museum	384
Rising Generation, The	312
Round the Galleries	231, 552
Staatslotteries and others	384
Strong's at Long, The	482
Suffolk School and the Institute	360
Turner in and out of Time	143
Water Colours by Mr. D. S. MacColl	336
Water Colours in Pall Mall and Elsewhere	431

LITERARY CAUSERIES

Amateur and Specialist	14
An Early University Calendar	333
Around in Old Catalogues	115
A Short Way with an Unbeliever	575
Australian Verse Writer, An—Victor Daley	452
Bertrand de Born	478
Chaucer's Genius, The Development of	227
Chaucer's "Legende of Goode Women," New Light on	61
Defoe as Sociological Novelist	502
De Quincey and the "Grand Style"	159
Endings of Novels, The	138
Endings of Poems, The	180
Glamour and Vision	428
New Ideas for Old	285
Novelist, The Earliest Modern	91
Novel of Manners, The	260
Phantasies	308
Poe, Edgar Allan	39
Poem, The Growth of a	356
Poetry of Modern Paganism, The	621
Primitive Religion	380

LITERARY CAUSERIES—continued

Science in Fiction	548
Shakespeare in the Remainder Market	528
Sick-room Fiction	403
Snobbery in Art and Literature	597
Song of the Siren, The	203

LITERARY WEEK, THE

Pages	3, 27, 51, 83, 107, 131, 155, 171, 195, 221, 253, 275, 301, 323, 347, 371, 395, 419, 443, 467, 491, 517, 539, 563, 587, 611
-------	--

MUSIC

Bach Festival, The	361
Bach's Humour	457
Brahms, Opus I.	623
Choral Music	408, 432
Christmas Music	18
Concert Season, The	506
"Don Quixote"	143
Extempore Playing, On	264
From Across the Seas	65
Grieg's Piano Music	512
Grove's Dictionary, The New	483
Other Side, The	578
Overture, The	43
Oxford History of Music, The	121, 162, 184, 209, 312, 385
"Pied Piper of Hamelin, The"	336
Strauss's "Don Juan"	96
Wagner, A Sidelight upon	552

POETRY

"A Little Doctored Faust," Robert Ross	573
"A Lost Picture," Laurence Binyon	451
"An End in Itself," Jane Barlow	308
"A Song of Remembrance," Ethel Edwards	402
"At Nightfall," Henry Bryan Binns	30
"At Toml," A. Hugh Fisher	138
"Brother Body," Henry Bryan Binns	356
"Euthanasia," Angela Gordon	527
"From Inland," Ford Madox Hueffer	14
"Grey Grind," C. Fox Smith	331
"Heinrich Heine," Horace B. Samuel	160
"Holland Walk," Isabel Clarke	477
"In the Forest," Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	427
"In the Val d'Arno," Henry Bryan Binns	179
"Ronceval," C. Fox Smith	91
"Tears," Dorothy Frances Gurney	548
"The Closed Door," A. St. John Adcock	501
"The Downman in Exile," Charles Hart	63
"The Fighter," Wilfrid Wilson Gibson	259
"The Greater Love," Ethel Edwards	402
"The Lament of the Friendless Old Men," Cloulesley Breton	380
"The Landgrave," Robert Ross	285
"The Last Message," T. Sturge Moore	227
"The Owl," Laurence Alma Tadema	621
"The Task," Henry Bryan Binns	355
"To a Seer," Henry Bryan Binns	476
"Unveiled," A. St. John Adcock	115

REVIEWS

Abbott (E. A.), "Johannine Grammar"	448
Addison (J. de W.), "Art of the National Gallery"	617
"Aeneid of Virgil, The," with trans. J. Billson	199
"Ainger, Alfred, The Life and Letters of," Edith Sichel	469
Aldis (Jane), "Madame Geoffrin: Her Salon and her Times"	282
"Alkibiades: A Tale of the Great Athenian War," C. H. Bromley	158
"Alma-Tadema, Sir Lawrence," Percy Cross	617
"Angélique of Port Royal," 1591-1661, A. K. W.	36
"Angling, Cuts on," Capt. H. V. Hart-Davis	618
Anonymus Plays	280
"Ante-Room Ballads," by Centurion	59
"Arch texture, Character of Renaissance," C. H. Moore	523
"Architecture, Studies in," Reginald Blom- field	523
"Arcy, Duke of, Autobiography and Memoirs"	565
"Art, Fictitious and Symbolic Creature in," John Vinycomb	568
"Art (l') Histoire de depuis les premiers temps chrétiens jusqu'à nos jours"	545
Ashbee (C. R.), "Echoes from the City of the Sun"	329
Ashcroft (E. A.), "The World's Desires, or the Results of Monism"	594
"Athens, Primitive, as described by Thucydides," J. E. Harrison	526
"At Intervals," B. W. Henderson	329
Atlay (J. B.), "The Victorian Chancellors"	327
Austin (Alfred), "The Door of Humility"	349
"A Woman of Wit and Wisdom," A Memoir of Elizabeth Carter, A. E. C. Gaussen	495
Balbernie (K.), "Thoughts and Fancies of a Girl"	59
Barber (F.), "A Friend of Marie Antoinette (Lady Atkyns)"	401
Bardswell (F. A.), "Notes from Nature's Garden"	328
"Bath and District, More Famous Houses of," J. F. Meehan	449
Baril (Anita), "The Madonna of the Poets"	374
Bartolot (R. G.), "The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar"	176
"Baudelaire, Charles, The Poems of"	398
"Baudelaire, Poems in Prose from"	398

REVIEWS—continued

"Bazzi, Giovanni Antonio," R. H. Hobart	475
Cust	376
"Beaumont and Fletcher, The Works of"	545
Bell (H.), "Esto Perpetua"	445
Benion (A. C.), "From a Collage Window"	475
"Birds, British, Handbook of," Anthony Collett	475
"Birds, British, A Pocket Book of," E. F. M. Ehns	475
"Bird Watcher in the Shetlands, The," Edmund Selous	113
Birukoff (P.), "Leo Tolstoy, his Life and Work"	498
"Blackmore Country, The," F. J. Scott	553
Blomfield (R.), "Studies in Architecture"	523
Bodley (I. E. C.), "The Church in France"	615
Briggs (W.), "The Law of International Copy- right"	90
"Brittany, Rambles in," Francis Mitton	545
Broadley (A. M.), "The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar"	176
Bromley (C. H.), "Alkibiades: A Tale of the Great Athenian War"	158
Brooke (S. A.), "On Ten Plays of Shakes- peare"	57
Brown (P. Hume), "George Buchanan and his Times"	613
Brown (Sir Thomas), "Religio Medici and Urn Burial"	593
Brown (Sir Thomas), "Religio Medici and Other Essays"	593
"Brown and Digma," Ethel N. Naish	328
"Browning Elizabeth Barrett, in her Letters," Percy Lubbock	305
"Buchanan George, A Biography," D. Mac- millan	613
"Buchanan George," Robert Wallace	613
"Buchanan George, and his Times," P. Hume Brown	613
"Buck Whaley's Memoirs," Edited by Sir Edward Sullivan	519
"Buonarrotti, Michelangelo, Sonnets of," Trans. by S. Elizabeth Hall	9
Burke (J. B.), "Origin of Life"	500
"Burns, Robert, Selected Poems of," Introduc- tion by Andrew Lang	53
Burroughs (J.), "Ways of Nature"	353
Burton, Sir Richard, The Life of," Thomas Wright	277, 303
"Byron, The Poetical Works of," Ernest Hartley Coleridge	5
Calvert (A. F.), "Moorish Remains in Spain"	471
Cambridge Modern History, The," Vol. ix. "Napoleon"	447
Carmon Sylvia, "Suffering's Journey on the Earth"	88
Carpenter (E.), "Days with Walt Whitman"	547
Carter (J. B.), "The Religion of Numa"	134
"Casentino and Its Story, The," Ella Noyes	86
Centurion, "Ante-Room Ballads"	59
"Chamberlain, Joseph," Alexander Mackintosh	493
"Champagne Standard, The," Mrs. John Lane	136
"Charing Cross and its Immediate Neighbour- hood, The Story of," J. Holden Macmillan	135
"Christ, The Historic," J. A. Lacey	32
"Christ, Testimony of St. Paul to," Rev. R. J. Knowing	524
"Church in France, The," J. B. C. Bodley	615
"Churchill, Lord Randolph," Winston S. Churchill	5
Churchill, Winston, S., "Lord Randolph Churchill"	5
"Clarke, Lieut.-Gen. the Hon. Sir Andrew, Life of," Edited by Col. R. H. Vetch, C.B.	60
Climenson (E.), "Elizabeth Montague, the Queen of the Blue Stockings, Her Correspondence from 1720-1761"	495
Coleridge (E. H.), "The Poetical Works of Byron"	5
Coleridge (Lord), "Story of a Devonshire House"	54
Collett (A.), "Handbook of British Birds"	475
Collier (Hon. John), "The Art of Portrait Painting"	525
Colvin (Sir Auckland), "The Making of Modern Egypt"	279
"Coming of Love, The," Theodore Watts- Dunton	225
"Connaught, Religious Songs of," Edited by Douglas Hyde	567
Cook (T. A.), "Old Provence"	34
"Copyright, International, The law of," William Briggs	90
"Cosway, Richard, R.A.," George C. Williamson	226
"Cowper, William, The Poems of," Edited by J. C. Bailey	351
Crawford (F. Marion), "Gleanings from Venetian History"	525
Cust (R. H.), "Giovanni Antonio Bazzi"	475
Cuthell (E.), "Wilhelmina, Margravine of Bayreuth"	35
Davey (R.), "The Pageant of London"	542
"Dawn in Britain, The," Chas. M. Doughty	425
"Demosthenes Against Midias," W. W. Good- win	174
"Dissociation of a Personality, The," Morton Prince	449
"Dixon, Richard Watson, The last poems of"	329
"Door of Humility, The," Alfred Austin	349
Doughty (C. M.), "The Dawn in Britain"	425
Dozmer (Paul), "Livres de Mes Fils"	137
Downey (E.), "Charles Lever, his Life in his Letters"	325
Dudman (F. H.), "Gregory the Great"	137
Dunsany (Lord), "The Gods of Pegana"	259
"Echoes from the City of the Sun," C. R. Ashbee	329
"Economic Questions, Essays and Addresses on," Viscount Goschen	58
"Egypt, The Making of Modern," Sir Auck- land Colvin	279

REVIEWS—continued	PAGE
"Egypt, New." A. B. de Guerville . . .	279
Elms (B. F. M.) "A Pocket Book of British Birds." . . .	475
"England under the Tudors." A. D. Innes . . .	567
"Esto Perpetua." H. Belloc . . .	545
"Ethics and Moral Science." L. Lévy-Bruhl . . .	594
"European Nations, The Development of the." J. Holland Rose . . .	474
"Evolution, the Master-Key." C. W. Saleeby . . .	304
"Fables of Master Pierre Patelin, The." Englished by Richard Holbrook . . .	158
Fawcett (Mrs. H.) "Five Famous French Women." . . .	352
"Fiction, The Childhood of: A Study of Folk Tales and Primitive Thought." J. A. MacCulloch . . .	10
Finberg (A. J.) "English Water-Colour Painters." . . .	497
"Fontenoy and Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession, 1741-48." F. H. Skrine . . .	546
Foster (R. H.) "In Old Northumbria." . . .	59
"Fourth Party, The." Harold E. Gorst . . .	31
Fraser (J. G.) "Lectures on the Early History of Kingship." . . .	7
"French Stage, Queens of the." H. Noel Williams . . .	112
"French Stage, Later Queens of the." H. Noel Williams . . .	472
"French Women, Five Famous." Mrs. Henry Fawcett . . .	352
"From a College Window." A. C. Benson . . .	445
Gausson (A. C. C.) "A Woman of Wit and Wisdom. A Memoir of Elizabeth Carter." . . .	495
"Geoffrin, Madame: Her Salon and Her Times." Jane Aldis . . .	282
"Gild System, The Restoration of the." Arthur J. Pentty . . .	498
"Godfrey's Quest. A Fantastic Poem." Lady Lindsay . . .	329
"Gods of Paganism." Lord Dunsany . . .	259
Goodwin (W. W.) "Demosthenes Against Midias." . . .	174
Gorst (H. E.) "The Fourth Party." . . .	31
Goschen (Viscount). "Essays and Addresses on Economic Questions." . . .	58
"Greek, New Testament, A Grammar of." J. Hope Moulton . . .	448
Greenleaf (F.) "James Russell Lowell." . . .	201
Greg (W. W.) "Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama." . . .	377
"Gregory the Great." F. Homes Dudden . . .	137
Grey (Olivier). "Preludes and Symphonies." . . .	59
Grier (S. C.) "The Letters of Warren Hastings to his Wife." . . .	178
Guerville (A. B. de). "New Egypt." . . .	279
Hall (H. F.) "Napoleon's Notes on English History." . . .	203
Harrison (J. E.) "Primitive Athens as described by Thucydides." . . .	526
Hart Davis (H. V.) "Chats on Angling." . . .	618
Harwood (W. S.) "New Creations in Plant Life." . . .	379
"Heart of the Country, The." Ford Madox Hueffer . . .	473
"Heart of a Garden, The." Rosamund Marriott Watson . . .	177
Henderson (B. W.) "At Intervals." . . .	329
"Henrietta Maria, The Life of Queen." J. A. Taylor . . .	377
"Haywood John, The Dramatic Writings of." History, Cambridge Modern, The. Vol. ix.—"Napoleon." . . .	280
Hone (N. J.) "The Manor and Manorial Records." . . .	447
"Horse, Origin and Influence of the Thoroughbred." William Ridgeway . . .	226
Hueffer (P. M.) "The Heart of the Country." . . .	473
Hutton (R. H.) "Brief Literary Criticisms." . . .	223
"Indian Poetry." Romesh Dutt . . .	329
Inge (W. R.) "Studies of English Mystics." . . .	397
"Ingelend, Thomas, The Dramatic Writings of." "In Memoriam." Annotated by the Author . . .	280
Innes (A. D.) "England under the Tudors." . . .	567
"Ireland, Heroic Romances of." Trans. by A. H. Leahy . . .	569
"Japan, Kaempfer's History of." Trans. by J. G. Scheuchzer . . .	569
"Japan, Makers of." J. Morris . . .	569
"Johannine Grammar." E. A. Abbott . . .	448
"Johnson's Lives of the English Poets." Edited by G. Birkbeck Hill . . .	133
"Jonson, Ben, The Works of." Edited by H. C. Hart . . .	592
"Julian the Apostate." Gaetano Negri . . .	87
"Kant, The Philosophy of, and Other Lectures." Henry Sidgwick . . .	202
Kappa. "Let Youth but Know." . . .	31
"Kingship, Lectures on the Early History of." J. G. Fraser . . .	7
Knowing (Rev. R. G.) "Testimony of St. Paul to Christ." . . .	524
Lacey (T. A.) "The Historic Christ." . . .	32
"Lakes, Months at the." Rev. H. D. Rawnsley Lane (Mrs. John). "The Champagne Standard." . . .	595
Lang (Andrew). "Portraits and Jewels of Mary Stuart." . . .	136
Lang (Andrew). "Sir Walter Scott." . . .	543
"Lays of the Round Table." Ernest Rhys . . .	280
Lefranc (Abel). "Les Navigations de Pantagruel." . . .	329
"Leicester, Records of the Borough of, 1509-1603." Ed. by Mary Bateson . . .	258
"Let Youth but Know." By Kappa . . .	31
"Lever, Charles." Edmund Downey . . .	325
Lever, Charles, the Novels of . . .	325
Levett (L. R.) "Valerius Catullus." . . .	329
Lévy-Bruhl (L.) "Ethics and Moral Science." . . .	594
"Life, the Origin of." John Butler Burke . . .	500

REVIEWS—continued	PAGE
Lindsay (Lady). "Godfrey's Quest." A Fantastic Poem . . .	329
"Literary Criticisms, Brief." Richard Holt Hutton . . .	223
"Literary Rambles in the West of England." A. L. Salmon . . .	449
"Literature, Comparative, a short history of." Frédéric Lohé . . .	423
"Livre de mes fils." Paul Dumer . . .	137
Lohé (F.) "Comparative Literature." . . .	423
"London, The Pageant of." Richard Davey . . .	542
"Longinus on the Sublime." Translated by A. O. Prichard . . .	543
Lord (W. F.) "The Mirror of the Century." . . .	424
Lowell, James Russell. "Fertis Greenlet." . . .	201
Lubbock (P.) "Elizabeth Barrett Browning in her Letters." . . .	305
"Lyrist of the Restoration." John and Co. stance Masefield . . .	619
MacCulloch (J. A.) "The Childhood of Fiction." . . .	10
Mackintosh (A.) "Joseph Chamberlain." . . .	493
MacMichael (J. H.) "The Story of Charing Cross and its Immediate Neighbourhood." . . .	135
Macmillan (D.) "George Buchanan. A Biography." . . .	613
"Madonna of the Poets, the." Anit Bartle . . .	374
"Manor and Manorial Records, the." N. J. Hone . . .	226
"Marie Antoinette, A friend of." (Lady Akyns). Frederic Barbey . . .	401
Marriott Watson (R.) "The Heart of a Garden." . . .	177
"Mary Stuart. Portraits and Jewels of." A. Lang . . .	543
Masefield (J. and C.) "Lyrist of the Restoration." . . .	619
Masis (H.) "Comment Emile Zola composait ses Romans." . . .	373
Maxse (Col. F. I.) "Seymour Vandeleur." . . .	12
Meehan (J. F.) "More Famous Houses of Bath and District." . . .	449
Miltoun (F.) "Rambles in Brittany." . . .	545
Mifflin, Lloyd. Collected Sonnets of . . .	59
"Mirror of the Century, the." Walter Frewen Lord . . .	424
"Montagu Elizabeth." Emily Climeson . . .	495
Moore (C. H.) "Character of Renaissance Architecture." . . .	523
Moore, T. Sturge. Poems by . . .	399
"Moorish Remains in Spain." A. F. Calvert . . .	471
"Moral Ideas, Origin and Development of." Edward Westermarck . . .	521
Morris (J.) "Makers of Japan." . . .	569
Moulton (J. H.) "A Grammar of New Testament Greek." . . .	448
"Mystics, English, Studies of." W. R. Inge . . .	397
Naish (E. N.) "Browning and Dogma." . . .	328
"Napoleon's Notes on English History." H. F. Hall . . .	203
"National Gallery. The Art of the." J. de Wolf Addison . . .	617
"Nature in Eastern Norfolk." A. H. Patterson . . .	355
"Nature's Garden, Notes from." P. A. Bardswell . . .	328
"Nature, The Religion of." E. Kay Robinson . . .	570
"Nature, Ways of." John Burroughs . . .	355
Needham (R.) "Somerset House Past and Present." . . .	33
Negri (G.) "Julian the Apostate." . . .	87
"Nero." Stephen Phillips . . .	223
Neuman (B. P.) "Pro Patria and other Poems." . . .	59
Noguchi (Yone). "The Summer Cloud." . . .	282
Norgate (G. le G.) "The Life of Sir Walter Scott." . . .	256
"Northumbria, In Old." R. H. Foster . . .	59
Noyes (Ellis). "Casentino and its Story." . . .	86
"Numa. The Religion of." J. Benedict Carter . . .	134
"Odas and Elegies." Clinton Scollard . . .	59
"Old Testament in Greek, the." Edited by Allan England Brooke . . .	617
"Outdoor Pastimes of an American Hunter." Theodore Roosevelt . . .	89
"Pantagruel. Les Navigations de." Abel Lefranc . . .	258
"Pastoral Poetry and Pastoral Drama." W. W. Greg . . .	377
Patterson (A. N.) "Nature in Eastern Norfolk." . . .	355
Pentty (A. J.) "Restoration of the Gild System." . . .	498
"People at School, A." H. Fielding Hall . . .	450
Petronii "Cena Trimalchionis." Edited and translated by W. D. Lowe . . .	30
Petronius. "Cena Trimalchionis." Translated by M. J. Ryan . . .	30
Phillips (Stephen). "Nero." . . .	223
"Pitt, William." Charles Whibley . . .	85
"Plant Life, New Creations in." W. S. Harwood . . .	379
"Plato as an Introduction to Modern Criticism of Life." Emil Reich . . .	616
"Portrait Painting, The Art of." Hon. John Collier . . .	525
"Pottery, Greek, Etruscan and Roman, History of Ancient." H. B. Walters . . .	55
"Preludes and Symphonies." Oliver Grey . . .	59
Prince (M.) "Dissociation of a Personality." . . .	449
"Pro Patria and other Poems." B. Paul Neuman . . .	59
"Prosody, English, A History of, from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day." George Saintsbury. Vol. I . . .	522
"Providence, Old." T. A. Cook . . .	34
"Rabelais, Hours With." Edited by F. G. Stokes . . .	258
"Rae, Henrietta." Arthur Fish . . .	617
"Raleigh (Walter). "The English Voyages of the Sixteenth Century." . . .	111, 572
Rawnsley (Rev. H. D.) "Months at the Lakes." . . .	595
Rea (Hope). "Peter Paul Rubens." . . .	617
"Realist of the Aegean, A." Hugo Sharpley . . .	257
Reich (Emil). "Plato as an Introduction to Modern Criticism of Life." . . .	616
"Religio Medici and Urn Burial." Sir Thomas Browne . . .	593

REVIEWS—continued	PAGE
"Religio Medici and other Essays." Sir Thomas Brown . . .	593
Rhys (E. nest). "Lays of the Round Table." . . .	329
Ridgeway (W.) "Origin and Influence of the Thoroughbred Horse." . . .	8
Robertson (J. M.) "Did Shakespeare Write 'Titus Andronicus'?" . . .	57
Robinson (E. Kay). "The Religion of Nature." . . .	570
Roosevelt (Theodore). "Outdoor Pastimes of an American Hunter." . . .	89
Rosebery (Lord). "Wallace, Burns, R. L. Stevenson: Appreciations." . . .	110
Rose (J. H.) "The Development of the European Nations, 1870-1900." . . .	474
"Rubens, Peter Paul." Hope Rea . . .	617
"St. Alphonsus de Liguori, Life of." . . .	425
Saleeby (C. W.) "Evolution, the Master-Key." . . .	304
Salmon (A. L.) "Literary Rambles in the West of England." . . .	449
Saintsbury (G.) "English Prosody. A History of, from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day." Vol. I . . .	522
"Samoa, Letters from, 1891-1895." Mrs. M. I. Stevenson . . .	426
Scollard (C.) "Odes and Elegies." . . .	59
"Scott, Sir Walter, The Life of." G. Le Grys Norgate . . .	256
"Scott, Sir Walter." Andrew Lang . . .	280
Selous (E.) "The Bird Watcher in the Shetlands." . . .	113
"Seymour Vandeleur." Col. F. I. Maxse . . .	12
"Shadow and Glean." Lillian Street . . .	329
"Shakespeare, On Ten Plays of." Stopford A. Brooke . . .	57
Sichel (E.) "The Life and Letters of Alfred Angier." . . .	469
Sharpley (H.) "A Realist of the Aegean." . . .	257
"Sidgwick, Henry: A Memoir." A. S. and E. M. S. . . .	198
Sidgwick (H.) "The Philosophy of Kant, and other lectures." . . .	202
Skrine (F. H.) "Fontenoy and Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession, 1741-48." . . .	546
Smith (N. C.) "Wordsworth's Literary Criticism." . . .	29
Snell (F. J.) "The Blackmore Country." . . .	353
"Somerset House: Past and Present." R. Needham and A. Webster . . .	33
"South Africa, Times History of the War in, 1899-1902. Vol. iv." . . .	591
Standing (P. C.) "Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema." . . .	617
Stevenson (Mrs. M. I.) "Letters from Samoa, 1891-1895." . . .	426
"Story of a Devonshire House, The." Lord Coleridge . . .	54
Street (Lillian). "Shadow and Glean." . . .	329
"Suffering's Journey on the Earth." Carmen Sylva . . .	88
Sullivan (Sir Edward). "Buck Whaley's Memoirs." . . .	519
"Summer Cloud, The." Yone Noguchi . . .	282
Taylor (I. A.) "The Life of Queen Henrietta Maria." . . .	377
"Temple, Archbishop, Memoirs of." By Seven Friends . . .	157
"Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar, The." A. M. Broadley and R. G. Bartolot . . .	176
"Thoughts and Fancies of a Girl." Kitty Balbernie . . .	59
"Titus Andronicus, Did Shakespeare Write?" J. M. Robertson . . .	57
"Tolstoy, Leo, His Life and Work." Compiled by Paul Birukoff . . .	498
"Tudor Statesmen, Ten." Arthur D. Innes . . .	567
"Turner, J. M. W." W. L. Wyllie . . .	617
"Valerius Catullus." L. R. Levett . . .	329
"Vandeleur, Seymour." Col. F. I. Maxse . . .	12
"Venetian History, Gleanings from." F. Marion Crawford . . .	525
"Victorian Chancellors, The." J. B. Atlay . . .	327
"Vingt-huit Années au Congo. Lettres de Monseigneur Aougoud . . .	400
Vinycumb (John). "Fictitious and Symbolic Creatures in Art." . . .	568
"Voice of the South." Gilbert Watson . . .	378
"Voyages of the Sixteenth Century, English." Walter Raleigh . . .	111, 572
Wallace (R.) "George Buchanan." . . .	613
"Wallace, Burns. R. L. Stevenson: Appreciations." Earl of Rosebery . . .	110
Walters (H. B.) "History of Ancient Pottery, Greek, Etruscan, Roman." . . .	55
"Walt Whitman, Days with." Ed. Carpenter . . .	547
"Warren Hastings, The Letters of, to his Wife." Sydney C. Grier . . .	178
"Warwick School, History of, with Notices of the Collegiate Church, Guilds and Borough of Warwick." A. F. Leach . . .	592
"Water Colour Painters, English." A. J. Finberg . . .	497
Watson (G.) "The Voice of the South." . . .	378
Watts-Dunton (T.) "The Coming of Love." . . .	225
Webster (A.) "Somerset House, Past and Present." . . .	33
Westermarck (E.) "Origin and Development of Moral Ideas." . . .	521
Wever (Richard). "The Dramatic Writings of." . . .	280
Whibley (Chas.) "William Pitt." . . .	85
"Wilberforce, Bishop." R. G. Wilberforce . . .	570
"Wilhelmina, Margravine of Bayreuth." Edith E. Cuthell . . .	35
Williams (H. N.) "Later Queens of the French Stage." . . .	472
Williams (H. N.) "Queens of the French Stage." . . .	112
Williamson (G. C.) "Richard Cosway, R.A." . . .	226
"Wordsworth's Literary Criticism." Edited by Nowell C. Smith . . .	29

REVIEWS—continued		THE BOOKSHELF—continued		THE BOOKSHELF—continued
	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
"World's Desires, The, or the Results of Monism." E. A. Ashcroft	594	"Elementary Chemistry: Progressive lessons in experiment and theory." . . . .	102	"Lyrics by the Author of 'Erebus' " . . . .	270
Wright, Thomas. "The Life of Sir Richard Burton" . . . . .	277, 303	"Elementary Graphic Statics." W. H. Blythe. . . . .	102	"Manual of Carpentry and Joinery, A." J. W. Riley . . . . .	189
Wyllie (W. L.) "J. M. W. Turner." . . . .	617	"Elementary Physics, practical and theoretical." J. N. Brown . . . . .	102	"Mariile Novum" . . . . .	190
"Zola, Emile, Comment, composait ses Romans." Henri Massis . . . . .	373	"Elements of Quantitative Analysis." G. H. Bailey . . . . .	102	"Mark Matésvitch Aitokolsky." Edited by V. V. Stasov . . . . .	461
THE BOOKSHELF		"English Furniture." F. S. Robinson . . . . .	487	"Memoir of Archbishop Markham, 1719-1807." Sir Clements Markham . . . . .	317
"Admissions and Asides." A. St. John Adcock	317	"Etchings of Van Dyck." Frank Newbolt . . . . .	582	"Midsummer Eve." Gordon Bottomley . . . . .	126
"Art and Craft of the Author, The." C. E. Heish . . . . .	189	"Everyman's Library" . . . . .	165, 363	"Minutes of Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Bristol" . . . . .	70
"Art and Practice of Laundry Work, The." Margaret Cuthbert Rankin . . . . .	461	"Examples in Physics." C. E. Jackson . . . . .	102	"Modern Cosmogonies." Agnes M. Clarke . . . . .	556
"Art of the Theatre, The." Edward Gordon Craig . . . . .	126	"Extinction of the Ancient Hierarchy." G. E. Phillips . . . . .	190	"Mrs. Beeton's Book of Household Management" . . . . .	149
"Atlas of the World's Commerce." Edited by J. G. Bartholomew . . . . .	269, 389	"Fancy, The." John Hamilton Reynolds . . . . .	293	"Museums and Ruins of Rome, The." Walter Amelung and Heinrich Holtzinger . . . . .	294
"Ayres' Cricket Companion" . . . . .	22	"First Lessons in Botany." C. C. Cooper . . . . .	126	"New Drawing Course." J. Vaughan . . . . .	126
"Baptist Handbook, The" . . . . .	69	"Five Thousand Words Frequently Misspelt." W. Swan Sonnenschein . . . . .	510	"New Universal Library, The" . . . . .	364
"Bemrose's Monthly Diary" . . . . .	22	"Flemish School, The." Frederick Wedmore . . . . .	587	"Notable Pictures in Florence." Edith Harwood . . . . .	22
"Bibliofolia, Rivista dell' Arte Antica in Libri, Stampe, Manoscritti, Autografie Legature" . . . . .	558	"Florentine Palaces and their Stories." Janet Ross . . . . .	22	"Notes on the Life History of British Flowering Plants." Lord Avebury . . . . .	149
"Bibliography of the Works of Dante Gabriel Rossetti." William Michael Rossetti . . . . .	189	"Flowering Plants, their Structure and Habitat." Charlotte L. Laurie . . . . .	126	"Our Stellar Universe." T. E. Heath . . . . .	557
"Birdland Pictures." Oliver G. Pike . . . . .	461	"Folk Songs from Somerset" . . . . .	510	"Passing of the Preceptor, The." Duncan Fraser . . . . .	557
"Book of Verses, A." Arthur L. Salmon . . . . .	364	"Freehand for Teachers and Art Students." E. A. Branch . . . . .	126	"Peg Woffington." Charles Rea . . . . .	190
"Burma." R. Talbot Kelly . . . . .	45	"Giordano Bruno, In Memoriam of the 17th February, 1600." Alois Riehl (trans. Agnes Fay) . . . . .	165	"Place-names of Ross and Cromarty." W. J. Watson . . . . .	45
"Bygone Eton." R. A. Austen Leigh . . . . .	582	"Golden Book, The." Mrs. Francis Alexander. . . . .	436	"Poetical Tributes in Memory of the Late Sir Henry Irving" . . . . .	189
"Captain John Smith." A. G. Bradley . . . . .	70	"Grands Poètes Romantiques de la Pologne, Les." Gabriel Sarrazin . . . . .	70	"Readings on the Inferno of Dante." W. W. Vernon . . . . .	389
"Catalogue of Modern Etchings and Aquatints of the British and American Schools in the National Art Library, Victoria and Albert Museum" . . . . .	317	"Hampstead Central Public Library Catalogue" . . . . .	317	"Rembrandt, a Memorial 1606-1906" . . . . .	294, 461
"Catalogue of the Wigan Public Library" . . . . .	630	"Happy Motorist, The." Filsen Young . . . . .	389	"Respublica, A.D. 1553." Edited for the Early English Text Society by Leonard A. Maguon . . . . .	270
"Catholic Directory, The" . . . . .	69	"Henry Irving." Austin Brereton . . . . .	126	"Reynolds-Ratton: Diaries and Letters, 1753-1839." Edited by Mrs. Eustace Grog . . . . .	263
"Church Directory and Almanac" . . . . .	69	"Henry Irving Shakespeare, The" . . . . .	293	"Rom." Eustace Reynold Ball . . . . .	294
"Church Music" . . . . .	149, 557	"Incunabula Typographica, Pars II." . . . .	149	"Scientific Tenor in Religion, The" . . . . .	582
"Cornish Saints and Sinners." J. Henry Harris . . . . .	557	"Interludes." Horace Smith . . . . .	149	"Secret of Popularity, The." Emily Holt . . . . .	364
"Culte d'Apollon Pythien à Athènes, Le." G. Colin . . . . .	363	"Java: Facts and Fancies." Augusta de Wit . . . . .	22	"Sociology" and "Psychology" . . . . .	149
"Deeper Sources of the Beauty and Expression of Music, The." Joseph Goddard . . . . .	437	"Jewish Encyclopædia" . . . . .	461, 537	"Sundae Library, The" . . . . .	363
"Descriptive Catalogue of the Manuscripts in the Library of Pembroke (Clare—Queen's) College, Cambridge." Montague Rhodes James . . . . .	437	"John Heywood" and "Anonymous Plays." Early English Drama Society . . . . .	70	"Summary Catalogue of Western Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library, The." Falconer Madin . . . . .	364
"Drawings of John M. Swan" . . . . .	558	"John Wilhelm Rowntree: Essays and Addresses." Edited by Joshua Rowntree . . . . .	70	"System of the Stars, The." Agnes M. Clarke . . . . .	556
"Drawings of Rossetti" . . . . .	558	"Kakemono." Herbage Edwards . . . . .	510	"Verdi." Albert Visetti . . . . .	437
"Dutch School, The." Gustave Geffroy . . . . .	557	"Let's Diaries" . . . . .	22	"Wessex." Painted by Walter Tydale; described by C. W. Bebb . . . . .	461
"Edward Macdowell." Laurence Gilman . . . . .	22	"Life of Madam Guyon, The." Thomas C. Upham . . . . .	70	"Tradition o. Scotard, Fas." William Barry . . . . .	224
		"Lodovick Carliell, his life, and discussion of his Plays and The Deserving Favourite." C. H. Gray . . . . .	149	"Translations into Greek Verse and Prose." R. D. Archer-Hind . . . . .	69
				"Two Bird-Lovers in Mexico." C. W. Bebb . . . . .	149

S U P P L E M E N T S

EDUCATION

(JANUARY 20)

	PAGE
Responsibility . . . . .	75
Reviews: Greek and Latin . . . . .	75
„ French and German . . . . .	76
„ History . . . . .	77
„ Geography . . . . .	78
„ Mathematics . . . . .	78
„ Readers . . . . .	79
„ The Use of the Stereoscope in Education . . . . .	80

ILLUSTRATED

(FEBRUARY 17)

Four Centuries of English Bookbinding . . . . .	1
Colophons . . . . .	5

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

(MARCH 18)

...

...

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1757

JANUARY 6, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON. (University of London.)

A Course of Lectures on Phonetics, with special reference to English Speech Sounds, will be given by Dr. R. A. WILLIAMS during the Second and Third Terms on Mondays at 5 P.M., beginning January 15.

An inaugural lecture, open to the public without fee or ticket, will be given on January 15, on "The History of Phonetics as a Branch of Science."

Application for tickets, accompanied by drafts drawn in favour of Mr. ARTHUR J. SHORT, should be addressed to the undersigned.

Fee, One Guinea.

WALTER W. SETON, M.A., Secretary.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE, LONDON. (University of London.)

Mr. D. S. MACCOLL, M.A. (Lond.), B.A. (Oxon), will continue his Course of Lectures on Sculpture, Mediæval, Renaissance, and Modern, in the Second Term on Fridays at 4.30 P.M., beginning on January 12.

The first lecture will be open to the public without fee or ticket.

Applications for tickets. Fee, One Guinea.

WALTER W. SETON, M.A., Secretary.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

TO BOOKBUYERS and Librarians of Free Libraries.—The October Catalogue of valuable Second-Hand Works and New Remainders, offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

HEBREW SCROLL of the PENTATEUCH written in the year 4984 by one of the best Scribes in Jerusalem on 55 skins, over 100 feet long, mounted on rollers. A fine MS., £10 10s.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.
Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Now Ready.

"THE BUILDER" NEW YEAR'S NUMBER, Catherine Street, London, W.C., January 6, 1906, contains:—On the Roof, Milan Cathedral; The Riccardi Palace, Florence; Part of Façade, Siena Cathedral; Piccolomini Altar, Siena Cathedral (all the above drawn by Mr. A. C. Conrade); View of the New War Office (drawn by Mr. E. B. Lamb); Sculpture, New War Office; New Mairie, Versailles (from photographs); Views of Old London, Embankment district (from prints in the Crace Collection); Under the Temple Portico (by the Editor); Church of SS. Sergius and Bacchus, Constantinople, the Forerunner of St. Sophia (from measured drawings and sketches by Mr. A. E. Henderson, with plans, section and roof plan, perspective sections, photographic illustrations of detail, also various details and description in text); also the Commencement of a Series of Articles (Student's Column) on "Mathematical Methods and Data for Architects," with other interesting matter, both literary and artistic.—From Office as above (4d. by post 4½d.), or through any newsagent.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 10s. 6d.), 2s. 6d., cloth 4s., half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Estry, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Book-ellers' Row).

TOOKE (J. N.) History of Prices, 6 vols, or vols 5 and 6
Tour through Paris, coloured plates, folio, 1822
Tooke and Newmarch, History of Prices, vols 5, 6, 1857
Torch, 1837
Tour of Dr. Prosody, 1821
Town Talk, or Living Manners, 5 vols, 8vo, 1811-14, or odd vols
Treasure Trove, 1844
Trials for Adultery, 7 vols, 1780
Trials, any old volumes of Tristram Shandy, vols 1-2, 1759 or 1760
Tristram (W. O.) Coaching Days, 1888
Trollope (T. A.) History of Florence, 4 vols
Turberville (G.) The Noble Art of Venerie, 1575, 4to
Turner (J. M. W.) Any large books illustrated by him before 1850
Turner (W.) Herball, Collen, 1561, folio
Tusser (Thos.) A Hundred Points of Husbandry, 1557, 1570, 1571, 1586
Tyburn Chronicle, 4 vols (1768)
Tyndall (Prof.) Glaciers of the Alps, 1860
Hours of Exercise in the Alps, 1871
Ultra-Crepidarius, a satire, 1823
Uzanne (Oct.) Any of his works
Valentine M'Clutchy, 1847
Valentine Vox, in monthly parts or cloth, 1840, or any odd parts
Vale Press, any of the publications
Vallance (A.) The Art of William Morris, 4to, 1897
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Art Gallery.

SIMEON SOLOMON.—An Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings by the late Simeon Solomon now open at THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. Admission (including Catalogue) 1s.

TO ARUNDEL CHROMO COLLECTORS,
Large Collection for Sale. Complete List, giving sizes of every Arundel Chromo. Those for sale, priced, very moderate. 3 stamps.—F. Head, 44 Clarence Gardens, Regent's Park, London, N.W.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS

NOW READY.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL

BY

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.

With Portraits.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 36s. net.

PRE-RAPHAELITISM AND THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By W. HOLMAN HUNT, O.M., D.C.L. With 40 Photogravure Plates and other Illustrations, 2 vols., 8vo, 42s. net.

NEW EDITION, WITH NOTES BY THE AUTHOR.

IN MEMORIAM. By ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. Fcap. 8vo, 5s. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

The JANUARY Number contains:

AN UNPUBLISHED PORTRAIT OF THACKERAY. From a Crayon-Drawing from Life by E. GOODWYN LEWIS.

THE "YIDDISH" HAMLET. A Story. By ISRAEL ZANGWILL.

Third Instalment of

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL, FENWICK'S CAREER.

And numerous other Articles and Stories of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., Limited, London.

Typewriting

TYPEWRITING.—Novels, 9d. 1000, reduction for quantities and regular work. Translations. —Miss HANDLEY, Needham Market, Suffolk.

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. from 10d. per 1000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TO AUTHORS.—ISABEL H. CAINE (Certificated Cambridge) undertakes all descriptions of TYPING at 9d. per 1000 words; with Carbon Duplicate, 1s. Excellent references.—The Hollies, Durrington, Worthing.

Chatto & Windus's New Books.

THE STORY OF CHARING CROSS AND ITS IMMEDIATE NEIGHBOURHOOD.

By J. HOLDEN MACMICHAEL. With 3 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

[Jan. 11.]

LIFE IN MOROCCO.

By BUDGETT MEAKIN. With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

"No living Englishman can speak on the subject with equal authority. . . . Mr. Meakin's book is an interesting and authoritative one, both from the scientific and general point of view—useful to the sociologist and to the mere traveller—and it is brightly written throughout."—DAILY GRAPHIC.

"A beautiful book. . . . Those who have been to Morocco and have felt its spell will surely buy this volume; those who have not yet come under its glamour will feel an irresistible desire to take early advantage of the information regarding ways and means of getting there, which the author thoughtfully includes in his Preface."—DAILY MAIL.

"An instructive and entertaining book. . . . The author's sympathetic studies of Moorish life in all its aspects are exceptionally interesting. . . . The work contains much useful suggestion, and deserves to be widely read."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"A fascinating volume. It is a vivid series of pictures of Moorish life and character, manners and customs. It shows Morocco from the inside, and is full of quaint and curious glimpses of the condite phases of Berber life. . . . The chapters on the political situation are most valuable. The book is admirably illustrated."—STAR.

ARNOLD BENNETT'S NEW NOVEL,

HUGO: A Fantasia on Modern Themes,

Will be ready on January 18, crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS.

By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

[March 1.]

Literary Rambles in the West of England. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net. [March 8.]

A History of Our Own Times from 1897 to the Accession of King Edward VII. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 24s. *.* These two volumes form Vols. 6 and 7 of the complete work.

At the Dawn of a New Reign. By S. STEPNIAK. Third Impression. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

The Life of Laurence Sterne. By PERCY FITZGERALD. With Portrait. Third Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

Thunder and Lightning. By CAMILLE FLAMMARION. Translated by WALTER MOSTYN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

Mr. Swinburne's Tragedies. Collected Edition in Five Crown 8vo volumes, bound in buckram, uniform with the POETICAL WORKS. Price 6s. net each volume, or 30s. net for the five volumes. (Subscriptions accepted only for complete sets.) Vol. IV. (MARY STUART) is now ready.

Works of Fancy and Imagination. By Dr. GEORGE MACDONALD. 10 vols. 16mo, cloth gilt, in Case, 21s.; or separately, Grolier cloth, 2s. 6d. each; also a NEW ISSUE, in cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt top, 3s. net each.

Poetical Works of George MacDonald. 2 vols. crown 8vo, buckram, 12s.

Children of To-morrow: a Romance. By WILLIAM SHARP ("FIONA MACLEOD"). A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. [Shortly.]

Prayers Written at Vailima by Robert Louis STEVENSON. With a Preface by Mrs. STEVENSON. Half-cloth, 1s. net; leather, 2s. net.

Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s. each. THREE NEW VOLUMES BY ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

1. ESSAYS OF TRAVEL. [Third Impression.]
2. TALES AND FANTASIES. [Second Impression.]
3. ESSAYS IN THE ART OF WRITING. [Second Impression.]

New Six-Shilling Novels in the Press.

Caste and Creed. By Mrs. PENNY. Second Edition. [January 25.]

Nature's Vagabond, etc. By COSMO HAMILTON. [February 1.]

For Life—and After. By GEORGE R. SIMS. [February 8.]

In the Roaring Fifties. By EDWARD DYSON. [March 8.]

Mara: an Unconventional Woman. By CHRIS HEALY. [Shortly.]

The Cloister and the Hearth. By CHARLES READE. With 100 Illustrations by MATT. B. HEWERDINE in Photogravure and Half-tone. EDITION DE LUXE. In 4to, cloth, 6s. net.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

ELEVEN NEW VOLUMES.

(Sold separately.) Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each.

By LORD MACAULAY.

The History of England from the Accession of James II. to the Death of William III., preceded by a Sketch of the Period before the Restoration and also of the Reign of Charles II. In 5 vols.

By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

The Reign of Queen Anne, in 1 vol.

A History of the Four Georges and of William IV., in 2 vols.

A History of Our Own Times from the Accession of Queen Victoria to 1897, in 3 vols.

*.* These Eleven Volumes, as well as giving a sketch of Earlier British History, form a complete History of England from the Accession of James II. (1685) to the Diamond Jubilee (1897).

MAURICE.

By JOSEPH KEATING. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

WALES IN FICTION.

The Right Hon. D. LLOYD-GEORGE, President of the Board of Trade, has written the following interesting letter to Mr. JOSEPH KEATING with reference to "MAURICE":—

"Although I have not yet had the pleasure of meeting you, I cannot resist the desire to write expressing my deep appreciation of your novel. An old Welsh novelist had an ideal which he tersely described as being 'true to nature.' In my judgment, your book is the nearest approach to that ideal in its description of Welsh colliery environment that I have ever read. It would be a good thing for Wales and her people if more books like 'Maurice' were published. So many travesties of the Welsh people have appeared in the past, that it is a pleasure to me to welcome a book so true to life. The character and temperament of the people, and the conditions under which they live and work in the colliery districts of Glamorganshire, are depicted with rare literary skill, and with the vivid accuracy which personal knowledge and experience alone can give. I am glad to know that your work is meeting with the success which it deserves."—D. LLOYD-GEORGE.

LONDON; CHATTO AND WINDUS, 111 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . .	3	From Inland . . . .	14
Literature :		Literary Causerie :
" Writ in Water " . . . .	5	Amateur and Specialist . . . .	14
Lord Byron's Poetry . . . .	5	Fiction . . . .	15
The Divine Right in Kings . . . .	6	Fine Art :
The Origin and Influence of the		The Grand Style . . . .	16
Thoroughbred Horse . . . .	8	Music :
Michelangelo . . . .	9	Christmas Music . . . .	18
The Childhood of Fiction . . . .	10	Forthcoming Books . . . .	19
Old London by Pen and Pencil . . . .	11	Correspondence . . . .	20
Seymour Vandeleur . . . .	12	Books Received . . . .	21
Breton Folk-song . . . .	12	Bookshelf . . . .	22

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17s. 6d. a year.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE book of this week is undoubtedly Mr. Winston Churchill's biography of his father. Despite the pre-occupation of the morning newspapers with the impending General Election, nearly every daily journal of importance devoted many columns to it. Nor can one argue that this was because the book had any bearing upon the present contest. On the contrary, it is a curious fact that Lord Randolph Churchill's political life was quite complete; it is a finished chapter in history, and his deliverances are not quoted in the Fiscal controversy now going on, perhaps for the reason that he began by being a fair trader—fair trade, in one of his happy phrases, "going down like butter" at one time—and by solemnly recording his conviction in favour of free trade. The interest in Lord Randolph Churchill is, therefore, not political, but personal. In a sense, Mr. Winston Churchill may be congratulated on the luck of having had so interesting a father.

The attention which the book has received dissipates the common belief that a book, to be successful, should come out in an arbitrarily fixed publishing season. This is not the only instance which goes to show that what is of interest in itself is quite independent of times and seasons. A few years ago, a popular novelist deliberately chose to bring out one of his works of fiction in the dullest month of the year—namely, August. He shrewdly calculated that in the dearth of other literature, his book would receive more attention than could possibly be given it when the Editors' tables were groaning under the load of new publications; and the result showed that he was perfectly right in his surmise. The absence of rivalry had the effect of securing for this work an amount of attention greater than it would otherwise have received. Next to August, the weeks immediately following Christmas would generally be described as the least favourable for publishing, but here, again, events have proved that there is nothing in the theory. Provided that a book is likely to secure the ear of the general public, it is a matter of no great consequence what date be chosen for its publication.

English literature is not excessively rich in political biographies, as there has been a tendency to make this species of book the vehicle for a propaganda. When Lord Beaconsfield wrote his Life of Lord George Bentinck, his intent was avowedly political, and it would be an easy matter to give a list of political biographies written not so much for the purpose of interesting and entertaining the general reader as to vindicate a memory, or a set of opinions. Perhaps the most brilliant exception in our time is furnished by Mr. John Morley's "Life of Gladstone." Though Mr. Morley was one of the strongest of partisans, and was generally considered to have rather intolerant convictions on many of the great questions of the day, he was able, on this occasion, to enter upon his task with a freedom of thought and a width of insight that produced a book which was eminently just, with the result that even his political antagonists gained a picture of Gladstone's time, conceived on a large scale, and drawn with a hand at once free and accurate. Nearly every reviewer has made some comparison between Mr. Winston Churchill's book and Mr. John Morley's, not wholly to the advantage of the young writer; but such comparisons are scarcely fair.

The subject in each case was entirely different. Gladstone may be classed with Tennyson, as one of the stately figures of the nineteenth century, whose work was great and lasting, but whose characters were built on more or less conventional lines. The interest attaching to Lord Randolph Churchill's character is much more that of a singular and uncommon personality. At the beginning of his career, "Randy" was the spoilt child of Parliament: his counterpart is that of a University student who is always expected to say what no one else could say without incurring the displeasure of the officials, and to whom a certain amount of licence is allowed that is denied to more sedate characters. Lord Randolph's life was spent in kicking over the traces. The old conventions and traditions, the old rules and old ideas, of the Tory party were set aside or ignored by him, and he approached every question always with a freedom that is charming, and sometimes with an ignorance that is equally so. It is no small achievement of a son to have pictured such a father in a manner that is lively and accurate, without being exaggerated.

For some time past an extraordinary craze has been manifested on the part of some writers to make Anthologies, and in one way this may be said to be the very easiest kind of book-making. You have only to purchase a pair of scissors, and the cheapest editions of the standard poets, and snip a bit here and a bit there till the allotted number of scraps has been got together. Such is the popular view, and yet the fact that English literature is so extremely poor in anthologies is a standing contradiction of the common belief. The best of the kind that we have is, no doubt, the "Golden Treasury," and it is common knowledge that it owes its excellence to the circumstance that Mr. Palgrave had at his elbow, ready with advice and counsel, the exquisite taste and mature judgment of Tennyson. We have daily evidence that the average critic is incapacitated for work of this kind, because if he has a choice of two things to quote he invariably selects the worse.

These reflections have been inspired by the appearance on our table of another of the Love Anthologies, of which we have had so many of recent years. "Fair play," according to an old saying, "is a jewel," and it ought to be observed in the making of anthologies. But it is not always observed; for example, Mr. Hyatt scarcely seems to have done the fair thing when adopting "The Open Road" of Mr. E. V. Lucas for his model of "The Footpath Way"—a book amazingly similar. It is true that Mr. Lucas can hold no individual copyright in the pieces of which his volume is composed, but the arrangement of the whole idea was so very original, that he ought to have been allowed the exclusive use of it. Between "The Open Road" and "The Footpath Way," the similarity of construction is great, and if the announcement in the papers be true, Mr. Hyatt has in preparation an anthology of the Town which will compete with "The Friendly Town" of Mr. Lucas. We think he is carrying too far that sincerest form of flattery, which consists in imitation. There is no reason why he should not compile an anthology, but the thread on which his pearls are strung should be his own. The offence is much greater than that of those anthologists who, taking hints from one another, have produced Lyra this and Lyra that.

In last week's ACADEMY, a correspondent, Mr. H. P. Wright, unconsciously gave a curious illustration of the prevalent inability to distinguish between the second best and the best. His aim in writing was to show that Shelley was not the "ineffectual angel" described by Matthew Arnold—in other words, that he had at times produced the "immortal phrase"—and he instituted a comparison between Shelley and Wordsworth. The passage quoted from Wordsworth was that which some consider to be one of the most beautiful in English poetry—"Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns"—and he averred that any of the following passages was equal to it:

He hath awakened from the dream of life,
or
He is made one with Nature. There is heard
His voice in all her music, from the moan
Of thunder to the song of night's sweet bird ;
or
He is a portion of the loveliness
Which once he made more lovely.

Of course, the only result of this is to show that Mr. Wright is not very familiar with his Shelley, and still less so with the finest poetry. By the "immortal phrase," we mean passages of such unquestioned beauty as, for instance, may be found in Hawtrey's translation of a well-known passage in Homer :

So said she ; they long since in Earth's soft arms were reposing
There, in their own dear land, their fatherland, Lacedaemon ; or Shakespeare's "Vex not his ghost," or such lines as the following, in the "Border Ballads" :

Lang, lang, may the maidens sit,
Wi' their good kaims in their hair,
A' waiting for their ain dear loves !
For them they'll see nae mair.

That Shelley ever reached the height of these passages we have yet to learn. Certainly Mr. Wright may be advised to search once more through the pages of his favourite poet and see whether he can find a single instance.

In the Cornhill for the current month, the Right Hon. Sir Algernon West writes a very pleasant paper on "Mayfair and Thackeray," of which one or two passages, as, for instance, the following, seem to be worthy of quotation :

The very pavements of Mayfair have for centuries been trodden by distinguished men and beautiful women. Walter Scott, in "The Heart of Midlothian," portrays the travel-worn Jeanie Deans making intercession for her sister with John, Duke of Argyll, at No. 15, Bruton Street, and the Duke after the interview ushering her in her Scotch garb into the presence of Queen Caroline in Richmond Park, from whom she obtained the pardon she sought for her poor sister Effie. In later days No. 15 belonged to Lord Granville, whose political parties were none the less remarkable for the presence of the famous diarist, Charles Greville, whom Lady Granville talked of as "her lodger." It was subsequently sold to Lord Carnarvon, who was for some time Secretary of State for the Colonies in Lord Salisbury's Government.

And again the following is interesting :

It is no wonder that Thackeray, the greatest novelist of the age, laid many of his scenes in the midst of surroundings so attractive, a welcome guest himself at Bath House, where all the literary men would assemble to do homage to Lady Ashburton, who, Carlyle said, was "the greatest lady of rank I ever saw, with the soul of a princess and captainess, had there been any career possible for her but a fashionable one"; where came Carlyle and Froude, Tennyson and Browning, and Thackeray's great friend Brookfield, the preacher at St. John's Chapel (already destroyed by the omnivorous builder)—Brookfield, who, as Lord Stanley of Alderley said, quoted Milton and Shakespeare and described the devil as a perfect gentleman; and where the salon of the Miss Berrys in Curzon Street made glad the heart of Thackeray, who says :

"A very few years since I knew familiarly a lady who had been asked in marriage by Horace Walpole, who had been patted on the head by George I. This lady had knocked at Dr. Johnson's door; had been intimate with Fox, the beautiful Georgiana of Devonshire, and that brilliant Whig society of the reign of George III.; had known the Duchess of Queensberry, the patroness of Gay and Prior, the admired young beauty of the Court of Queen Anne."

There are several signs that the Army is beginning to take more seriously to the study of military history and professional matters. The Cavalry Journal, which is to appear this month for the first time as a quarterly, is a good but belated idea. France, Germany, and America, have had their cavalry journals for some time. The fact that it is to be produced under the supervision of Major-General Baden-Powell does not of course give it any official status, so that it will not in any way take the place of the Army Journal, which was proposed some time ago but never came to anything.

The historical section of the General Staff, which has been advocated for years, will probably not come into being—owing to objections from the Treasury—until the official history of the war in South Africa is completed, which should be before the end of 1907. It is however, good news that an officer of the General Staff has already started on a history of the war between Russia and Japan. This seems a more suitable subject for the official historian than another history of one of our own wars.

The new Argentina Theatre at Rome opened last week with a production of Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, and though there will be none to question the appropriateness of the play to the scene of its production, there have been many who felt that it would have been more fitting to have had a play by an Italian writer. The Argentina is a municipal theatre, and the opening performances have been an enormous success, Julius Caesar running for a week, followed by Maschere, Roberto Bracco's famous play, and Il Ventaglio, by Goldoni. Next week Oscar Wilde's A Woman of No Importance, translated by Giacinta Pezzana under the title of Una donna qualunque, will be given. The patrons of the latest municipal theatre cannot complain of lack of variety.

Messrs. Hodgson and Co. will begin the New Year with a three days' sale on January 9, 10 and 11. The sale includes the library of the late Mr. H. J. P. Dumas, and among the books to be offered are Dugdale's "Monasticum Anglicanum"; topographical and antiquarian books; Raynald's "Byrth of Mankynd," 1560; the 1676 Quarto of "Hamlet"; plays by Dryden, D'Urfrey, and Shadwell; a number of first editions of well-known modern authors; Murray's "New English Dictionary"; and a set of the Chiswick Press British Poets.

Mrs. William Sharp writes to us from 21 Woronzow Road, St. John's Wood, N.W. : I intend to write a memoir of my husband, and shall feel greatly indebted for the loan of any letters or other documents likely to be of service, whether of a personal nature, or relative to his work as William Sharp or Fiona Macleod. Owners may rest assured that every care will be taken with the letters, etc., and that they shall be returned in due time.

We are requested to announce that the endowment fund now being raised for the family of the late Professor G. B. Howes, F.R.S., will be closed shortly, and all intending contributors are asked to send their contributions without delay to the Treasurer, Mr. Frank Crisp, at 17 Throgmorton Avenue, London, E.C.

LITERATURE

"WRIT IN WATER"

Lord Randolph Churchill. By WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL.
2 vols. (Macmillan, 36s. net.)

To the majority of us the most interesting history is that which deals with our contemporaries, and it is difficult to know whether the attractiveness of the present biography should be ascribed to this fact or to the skill of the writer. Mr. Winston Churchill here displays many valuable qualifications for the important task entrusted to him. He deals with his father, not in the adoring attitude of one of a family recounting the exploits of its most illustrious member, but with the detachment of a philosopher and the penetration of a statesman. If his estimate be too favourable it is certainly not more so than we expect from a biographer. The theme he had to deal with was not in itself literary: Lord Randolph Churchill was not learned in the sense that Mr. Gladstone was, and Mr. John Morley is, learned. Neither at Eton nor at Oxford did he burn the midnight oil in study. He was not even widely read in general literature. The Bible, Gibbon, and Jorrock's supplied what may be called the essentials of his library:

In the strong, simple, homely words and phrases, sonorous sentences and veins of rough spontaneous mirth which characterise the style and language of his rhetoric and writing, the influence of these three varied fountains, quaintly and not incongruously intermingled, can be plainly seen.

Within the covers of these volumes there is nothing to show that he was interested in the scientific or literary history of his time. The atmosphere is from start to finish severely political. Lord Randolph was no writer. The few magazine articles he composed were merely political speeches in print, aiming to serve practical ends, and with no pretence to art or finish. Blenheim was no place for celebrities other than those who had won their titles to distinction at Westminster. But these circumstances, far from placing him at a disadvantage, only gave force and piquancy to the working of an exceptionally fresh and brilliant mind.

The effective career of Lord Randolph Churchill may be said to date from the fall of the last Beaconsfield Ministry. Mr. Gladstone, after his memorable Midlothian campaign, came into office with a huge majority. Liberalism was surging and swelling over the land, and Conservatism appeared to be swept aside for a generation at least. But the events of the next few years were to confound the prophets who said this. The Bradlaugh controversy among other things gave birth to the Fourth Party, and the efforts of Lord Randolph and Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, Mr. Balfour and Mr. Gorst were to show how a numerically feeble but active and vigilant band of adversaries could sow discord and the seeds of disruption in a majority that seemed overwhelming. At the same time they were bringing about a reorganisation of the Conservative forces. Sir Stafford Northcote, amiable but feeble—the Goat, as they nicknamed him—was as much the object of their hostility as was Mr. Gladstone himself. In this they had the connivance of Lord Beaconsfield, who explained that he left Northcote to lead the Commons on the assurance that Mr. Gladstone had definitely retired. We can see now that the Liberal leader had lost the vigour of his prime, and instead of the majority being a powerful weapon in his hand it was frittered away in a series of squabbles.

If there is anything enduring in the part played by Lord Randolph Churchill it must be sought in the dissolution of the old party formations and their reorganisation. For many years the Whig wing of the Liberal army had been alarmed at the Radical proposals of Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Chamberlain. Their secession, which had as its immediate excuse the introduction of Mr. Gladstone's Home Rule Bill, had been prepared for by a long series of events. The inventor of Tory democracy drove home the wedge. But he was not destined to fill any great part for such a length of time as would afford opportunity for lasting work. As Secretary for India he was but one of a Government of caretakers, and when he became leader of the House and Chancellor of the Exchequer he, in a sense, committed official suicide.

After reading the authoritative history of his resignation as set forth here by Mr. Winston Churchill two or three conclusions are inevitable. One of them is that Lord Randolph let himself be carried away by a too easy and early success. He committed the grave mistake of thinking himself indispensable, and had no idea that the Conservative party was being reconstructed on a solid and durable basis. Next, in insisting upon a retrenchment in the Service votes, he showed a lack of statesmanlike foresight. He utterly miscalculated the strength of the forces arrayed against him. Lord Salisbury and he had been gradually developing what our author alludes to as a "harsh antagonism," and the elder statesman, by accepting the proffered resignation, snuffed out a career. Further, the fates had been with him. Lord Randolph tried to rebuild his party by means of Tory democracy; Lord Salisbury actually did rebuild it by abiding in the ancient ways. So Lord Randolph, as his son pathetically admits, died and left behind him no enduring monument, no piece of legislation, no signal Act, no financial reform, nothing but a name and a tradition.

In a sense, the fame of Lord Randolph Churchill may be said, in the pathetic phrase of John Keats, to be "writ in water." We are, of course, not unmindful of the fact that his influence helped to re-fashion the Conservative party of his time, but how far it extended must be purely and simply a matter for speculation. We have no concrete facts on which to form an opinion. All the more responsibility, therefore, devolved upon Mr. Winston Churchill, who in this book has erected the only enduring monument of his father that is possible. We are glad that he has succeeded so well. Probably there are many readers who will turn the pages with some feeling of apprehension, as Mr. Winston Churchill's public career has been by no means free from mistakes and indiscretions. But here he has kept on the right lines, and a though the task set him was one of very great difficulty, the candid critic must admit that he has discharged it without giving offence. He is in the position of one who, having changed his politics, had for the purposes of a biography to return to that part of the political world which he had forsaken. No man changes sides without engendering certain jealousies and dissatisfactions—without, making many enemies; and we would especially dwell on the fact—we think every candid critic will confirm it—that he has been scrupulously fair to all the parties who figure in these pages. There is, as far as one can see, no covert attack, no bitterness. Mr. Morley himself did not show more candour in writing the life of Mr. Gladstone than Mr. Winston Churchill has shown in dealing with the career of his father.

LORD BYRON'S POETRY

The Poetical Works of Lord Byron. Edited, with a Memoir, by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. (Murray, 6s. net.)

THERE is little to say of this edition of Byron's poetry, except to praise its completeness and thoroughness. The introductory memoir by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge is all that could be desired; in every way this is a most satisfactory edition of Byron to have on the bookshelf, and we think it will continue for many a long day to deserve a place there. But the interest of Byron's poetry, we think, has become less literary, and more historical. Originally it produced a great but varying effect on the public mind. It owed its vogue, on first publication, less to its intrinsic merit than to the fact that it gave definite expression to certain vague aspirations and thoughts of the time. The spirit of revolution was abroad, not only in England, but on the Continent, and Lord Byron was destined by nature to be its prophet. Yet long after that had passed, his fame remained as a great tradition, and there were not wanting critics who followed the public bent so far that they found a strain of the highest poetry in his work. But the evanescence of many reputations is disclosed by the efflux of time, and Byron passed out of fashion until a few years ago, when a great attempt was made to revive his fame.

The question to-day is, whether there was any reality in that movement, or whether it was artificial. Is Byron now a living force, or is he only one of those authors whose works should be in every gentleman's library, but are seldom, if ever, taken down to read? As we have already hinted, so much, in this case, depends upon taste and opinion, that it is very difficult to apply a satisfactory test. We know that little of Byron's work touches the high-water mark of poetry; his verses will be searched in vain for a line such as that quoted by a correspondent, last week, from Wordsworth:

Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,

or for such poetry as:

Will no one tell me what she sings?
Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy far-off things,
And battles long ago;

And an explanation of this may be found if we examine Byron's attitude of mind. It has often seemed to us that this was expressed most naturally and spontaneously in one of his effusions where he is unlikely to have been posing, and therefore, in all probability, was at least sincere. The poem we refer to is the epistle to Becher:

Dear Becher, you tell me to mix with mankind;
I cannot deny such a precept is wise;
But retirement accords with the tone of my mind:
I will not descend to a world I despise.

Did the Senate or Camp my exertions require,
Ambition might prompt me, at once, to go forth;
When Infancy's years of probation expire,
Perchance I may strive to distinguish my birth.

The fire, in the cavern of Etna, conceal'd,
Still mantles unseen in its secret recess;
At length, in a volume terrific, reveal'd,
No torrent can quench it, no bounds can repress.

All this might be described, in the slang of to-day, as "side" in literature. The great writers never either despised, or affected to despise, the world in which they lived. It is of the very essence of their character that they mixed with it kindly, and that the best of them discerned weaknesses in themselves greater than any they could see in their neighbours. Yet it was the same boyish idea that formed the chief inspiration of the most ambitious of Lord Byron's poems. The very epithet "Byronic" has come to signify something of this kind, and, as the characteristics of a great personage may often be seen most vividly in a caricature, so in the Byronic hero of the third-rate lady novelist we most clearly discern the weakness of Lord Byron.

If we turn to the passages that used to be publicly recited with great effect two generations ago, we seem to feel that there is something inflated and almost tawdry about them. What we mean might be most clearly perceived by comparing the famous lines:

There was a sound of revelry by night,
And Belgium's Capital had gathered then
Her Beauty and her Chivalry—and bright
The lamps shone o'er fair women and brave men;
A thousand hearts beat happily; and when
Music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Soft eyes looked love to eyes which spake again
And all went merry as a marriage bell;
But hush! hark! a deep sound strikes like a rising knell!

with the account of the same battle given by Thackeray, in "Vanity Fair."

Byron is, in the language of card-players, always "bragging a little beyond his hand"; his sentences seem to be framed to express more than he actually felt. Thackeray possesses the genius of reserve, and, as much by what he leaves unsaid as by his homely yet pregnant phrases, he achieves what should be the true purpose of every writer—that is to say, he is not intent on showing his readers his glorious command of language, but on stirring and creating thoughts and images within them.

Byron was above all things an egoist, and it is the nature of the egoist not to hold fast to any chord of interest that binds him to his hearers, but to write down what is in his own mind, quite regardless as to whether he carries his audience with him or not. The essential quality of Scott is, that he is continually groping for, and finding, the sympathies and interests of his readers, and the result is that, especially when he is making his humbler characters speak, the appeal is direct and instantaneous. It was, as it were, by accident that Byron voiced the sentiments of the people of his own time: thoughts to which he gave utterance were simmering everywhere, and to that extent, he was a real poet and interpreter. But greatness depends, not on catching the emotions of the moment, but on understanding those strong yet simple feelings that are common to every time and every race. Byron's egoism prevented his understanding them; and it was here that he failed. If we examine his choicest passages—those that were the prime favourites of his early admirers—we feel that our interest is but languidly stirred.

There is a story told of a critic, famous in the middle of the nineteenth century, who was a great admirer of Wordsworth, and who thought nothing of Byron. One night he was in company with a friend who held opinions of an almost opposite nature, and who declaimed with great fervour the poem which was then considered the finest that Byron had composed:

The Isles of Greece, the Isles of Greece!
Where burning Sappho loved and sung,
Where grew the arts of War and Peace,
Where Delos rose, and Phoebus sprung!
Eternal summer gilds them yet,
But all, except their Sun, is set.
The Scian and the Teian muse,
The hero's harp, the Lover's lute,
Have found the fame your shores refuse:
Their place of birth alone is mute
To sounds which echo further west
Than your Sires' "Islands of the Blest."

His recitation was interrupted at the first line by the critic's impatient: "Why this vain reiteration?" The story has many times been told for the poet, and against the critic, but there is a suspicion now that the latter was right.

THE DIVINE RIGHT OF KINGS

Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L., LL.D. (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net.)

SINCE Dr. Frazer wrote "The Golden Bough" he has seen a great change come over the position of anthropology. Then Dr. Tylor had, indeed, long held his unique position, but, with that exception, professional anthropologists were men of bones and stones. Now Cambridge boasts a flourishing school of anthropology—Dr. Frazer's "Lectures" formed one of the courses—and the study of racial psychology, custom and institution is pursued no less earnestly than that of physical anthropology; indeed, their right to a place among the sciences is admitted by their inclusion among the subjects covered by the "International Catalogue of Scientific Literature."

Readers of "The Golden Bough" are familiar with the problem which Dr. Frazer there undertakes to explain—the rule of the grove at Nemi, whose priest, Virbius, had to defend his life against all comers, the challenge being thrown down by plucking from a certain tree the branch which gives its name to the book. In the work before us Dr. Frazer restates this problem in the light of new knowledge. Further research and reconsideration of his old authorities have shown him that Virbius was not only the priest of the grove, but also the husband of Diana, the goddess of the sanctuary; and the latter half of the book deals with Nemi and Roman kingship. But before he approaches this part of his subject, Dr. Frazer deals at length, first with certain general principles of savage belief and custom, of which the sacred character and magical functions of kings are a special case; and secondly, with the origin and development of chieftainship and individual authority among peoples in the lower stages of culture. The whole of the present work consists substantially of a series of extracts from the forthcoming edition of "The Golden Bough," and, as might be expected, there is much in the earlier portion which is familiar to readers of the two former editions.

The statement of the problem raised by the "Rex Nemorensis" of Nemi leads up to a more general discussion of sacred kingships, from which Dr. Frazer passes on to discuss the principles of magic. Magic, he holds, is, properly, an expression of the doctrine of sympathy, and he distinguishes two varieties: first, homœopathic magic, which he formerly termed mimetic; this aims at producing an effect by imitating it, as does the magician when he stabs the waxen image of his enemy, believing that he thereby inflicts a corresponding injury on him; secondly, we have contagious magic, based on the idea that anything which has been in contact with a man thereafter remains in a sympathetic relation with him, thus offering a means of causing him good or harm by appropriate processes; all students of folklore are familiar with examples of this, such as "salving the weapon and not the wound," in order to prevent the latter from festering. We then pass on to a definition of taboo, here defined as "negative magic." Positive magic, homœopathic and contagious, aims at producing positive results; it says, "Act, so that this may happen"; taboo, on the other hand, enjoins abstinence from certain acts, in order that the results may not happen.

Returning to the earliest form of the sacred king—the public magician of Africa and Australia—Dr. Frazer shows that one of his chief functions is the control of weather for the good of the tribe. The impotence of the means which they employed is no index to the immense importance in the history of the human race of the institution thus called into being. In the rise of the despot, free from the chains of superstition, Dr. Frazer sees the dawn of the freedom of thought and deed in modern society; for the savage lies bound, hand and foot, by the fetters of custom and superstition; and it is not until some great innovator arises, or until, in more modern times the European has led the way, that he discovers how unreal are the fears to which he and his forefathers have surrendered their liberty of action.

After a brief survey of human gods, our attention is recalled to the Grove of Nemi. We have already learnt in the first lecture that the grove was, according to one account, the scene of the loves of Numa and the nymph Egeria, no less than of Virbius, or his successors, and the tree-goddess Diana. This leads to a discussion of the marriage of plants and the frequent personification of one or both the hymeneal pair by human beings. Readers of "The Golden Bough" are already familiar with the ceremonies of May-Day, in which the King and Queen of the May represent deities of vegetation. Dr. Frazer now goes on to show that there has also been a practice of marrying human beings to water and fire gods, and explains as a distorted recollection of the former practice the widespread story of the type of Perseus and Andromeda. The marriage with tree gods has a more immediate bearing upon the main theme of the book; we have already seen that Dr. Frazer conjectures the priest to have been the husband of Diana; he now goes on to suggest that the union of Numa and Egeria was no more than a replica of this sacred marriage of the priest; and his argument is a fine piece of synthesis. Starting with the oak god, Jupiter, he shows that we have good ground for regarding Janus as another form of Jove; but Janus is etymologically equivalent to Dianus, the feminine of which is Diana, the goddess of the grove. Now Egeria was an oak nymph, as we learn from Plutarch; it is therefore no far-fetched hypothesis that she was identical with Diana in substance, if not in name. If this conjecture be correct, it follows that the King of Rome married the oak goddess. Another line of argument, tending to show that the Roman Kings claimed to be incarnations of Jupiter, the Italian counterpart of Zeus, whose name was borne by all Greek kings, reinforces this conclusion. Further weight is lent to the conjecture by facts in the history of the kings of Rome; the priest of the wood was liable at any moment to have to fight, not only for his position, but for his life; and we find that many of the kings died a violent death. The custom of the "Regifugium," the date of which was the close of the Saturnalia, is, Dr. Frazer suggests, connected with the same idea; it was a test of the manhood of the king and perhaps at the same time a means of winning a bride; for examples are quoted in which the hand of a princess is the prize of an athletic contest.

The custom of marrying a mortal man to a tree goddess finds a parallel in the marriage of a human maiden to the fire god. This, Dr. Frazer conjectures, was the explanation of the primitive position of the Vestal Virgins, who were daughters of the royal house. Legends of the birth of Romulus and Servius Tullius suggest that the King of Rome was the son not of his predecessor but of an alien father by a Vestal Virgin, with whom he allied himself as representative of the god; and Dr. Frazer lays stress on the fact that though several kings left sons or grandsons, not one of the latter succeeded, while in three cases the daughter's husband mounted the throne, and in a further case the right to the throne was gained through the mother. Then follow the further suggestions that the hand of the princess was gained by victory in a race; and that the kings of Rome were not patricians—men of the conquering race—but plebeians, in whose hands were left, not civil power, but religious rites, which they, as men of the soil, would better understand than the new-comers. On this hypothesis the abolition of the kingship was a precautionary measure, rendered necessary by the attempts of the legitimate rulers to oust their conquerors.

This summary is far from exhausting all the points raised by Dr. Frazer's discussion of the kingship in Italy, on which, as at once the most novel and most interesting feature of the present work, most stress is here laid. But it is time to offer some criticism on points of detail; in its main lines Dr. Frazer seems to have established his contention. But he conjectures that the Vestal Virgins, in the times of the kingship, were the daughters of the royal house, who remained at home while their brothers went forth to win for themselves brides and royal dignity; the contest for the hand of the princess was decided by a test of manly prowess; the king gave his daughter's hand as a prize to the victor in a foot-race. On the other hand Dr. Frazer argues that an old Latin king was himself son of a Vestal Virgin, though not, of course, of the same family as that into which he subsequently married; for it is not improbable that the well-known savage rule of exogamy still subsisted for the royal family, which, as so often happens, kept up a custom long extinct among the people. Now, as the legends which Dr. Frazer himself quotes as to the birth of Romulus and Servius Tullius bear witness, a king might be the son of a slave woman, who was indeed a Vestal but not of royal blood—a lineage absolutely contradictory of Dr. Frazer's hypothesis. Not only so, but it by no means follows that the race for the hand of the bride was a closed event; the examples adduced in the text suggest that any one, whether prince or peasant, might enter for the matrimonial stakes; and if this were the case, even granting that heredity might help the scions of royal houses, we are far from being able to assert that one of them would necessarily prove his superiority to all competitors. It seems probable therefore that the king did not, in all cases, claim through his mother, and that his father was not necessarily of royal blood.

That three kings succeeded their father-in-law is perhaps fairly strong evidence of a rule of succession by marriage, of which we have collateral evidence, indirect though it be, in the incident familiar in fairy tales of the strange prince who woos and wins a kingdom; this does not of course establish anything for Latium, but it suggests that the practice was fairly common. It is, however, singular that though Dr. Frazer can quote evidence of succession through marriage of the late king's widow, he cannot discover any exact parallel to the rule which he believes himself able to trace in Latium. On the whole, therefore, his case as to succession is hardly proved.

Turning to more general questions, we find that though Dr. Frazer quotes many instances of magician-chiefs in Africa and Australia, he barely mentions America. Not only so, but he passes over the war-chief, though he is, even in Australia, if Dr. Howitt's evidence goes for anything, as common as the magician-chief. Yet in the war-chief we have, no less undoubtedly than in the sacred chief, one of the sources of the kingly dignity. But as regards this it should be mentioned that Dr. Frazer does not claim universal validity for his conclusions in this matter. It would have been a laborious task to sift the evidence for the two kinds of chieftainship and give to the inquiry a statistical basis; but we are accustomed to expect much from Dr. Frazer's erudition and unwearied labours. Many other points in these lectures invite discussion, especially the question of the annual sacrifice of kings, but space fails us. The points here mentioned detract little from the charm of the work, and those who turn to these lectures for a foretaste of the new "Golden Bough" will find, as of old, skilful exposition of the argument, allied to elegance of diction and no little learning.

THE ORIGIN AND INFLUENCE OF THE THOROUGHBRED HORSE

The Origin and Influence of the Thoroughbred Horse. By WILLIAM RIDGEWAY, M.A., F.R.A., Hon. D.Litt. (Cambridge: University Press, 12s. 6d. net.)

WHAT is truth? said jesting Pilate. As far as we are aware the pregnant question has never yet been answered. So after reading Professor Ridgeway's fascinating and erudite work, it is with a feeling of disappointment that we are compelled to repeat the oft-asked question: "What is an Arab Horse?" It is a pity that it should be so, and possibly in our ignorance we have failed to perceive the light. Professor Ridgeway knows so much and attempts to convey his knowledge to people of lesser intelligence in so brilliant a style, that one becomes to a certain extent hypnotised by the wealth of argument and illustration which is poured out in an unceasing flow. It is only when the book is closed and the personality of the writer ceases to exercise its magnetic influence, that reflection forces upon one the unwelcome fact, that as regards the avowed purpose and purport of the work, complete ignorance still prevails.

In our youthful days many of us have puzzled not a little as to how the full-rigged ship could possibly have got into the bottle. So now we fain would know how the Arabian horses got into Arabia, and it will be interesting to see how far the researches of the Disney Professor go towards the solution of this problem. If any positive deduction can be made from the facts, real or supposititious, upon which Professor Ridgeway bases his arguments, it would appear that the Arabian horse derives from some equine race which had its habitat in Northern Africa. This prepotent race, we gather, passed into Western Asia and thence, after many wanderings, some members of the tribe reached Arabia. If this be so, then the Arab horse is not an Arabian at all, and one begins to wonder whether the origin of the Arabian horses can be the secret so carefully guarded by the Sphinx. To our way of thinking, it appears feasible that just as we in this country have improved the breed of horses, by judicious crossing, testing and feeding, until we have produced the British thoroughbred (which by the way is quite a misnomer), so in those early days the inhabitants of Arabia not improbably developed the horses then available into the breed which, from its excellence, became known as the Arab horse.

A passage of peculiar interest in the work under notice is that (p. 470) in which the author deals with the pre-orbital gland-pit which has been traced in the skulls of Hipparion, in those of E. sivalensis—an Indian fossil horse—as well as in the Indian domesticated horse, an Arab horse, and in such English thoroughbreds as have been subject to examination. Such masters of scientific research as Dr. Lydekker and Professor Ray Lankester have failed to detect traces of this gland-pit in ordinary English and Continental horses, and it also appears to be absent from the skulls of horses found in the drift and turbarry of Europe. Mr. Lydekker's suggestion that the "blood horse" is of Indian origin appears to be as feasible as any other, but Professor Ridgeway will "none of it," and proves to his own satisfaction at all events, that the Arabs got their "blood horses" from Northern Africa, and that "for ages these so-called Arab horses have been continually pouring into India." To the question of colour, regarded from an hereditary point of view, the Professor attaches an importance which appears to us to be somewhat exaggerated; but his arguments in this instance, as indeed in many others, are full of interest, and are put forward with such clearness that they are almost, if not quite, convincing. At all events the colour question supplies Professor Ridgeway with strong collateral evidence in support of his case. The historical and geographical arguments put forward by him appear to come under two heads—the negative and the positive. Under the former denomination comes evidence which tends to prove—and here, in our opinion, the Professor has made good his case—that no horses were owned or bred by the Arabs during the period preceding and including the early days of the Christian era. It is shown with equal clearness that in the tenth century before Christ, horses were exported from Egypt to Palestine and other parts of Asia Minor, and this fact alone supplies the strongest proof that the horses of Egypt were in demand on account of their superiority. Strabo, who may be taken as a fairly accurate historian, proves that down to his time, that is to say, towards the dawn of the Christian era, neither camels nor horses were bred between the Nile and the Red Sea. Whence, then, did the ancient Egyptians procure their horses? That is the question the solution of which would, practically speaking, solve a much disputed problem.

It is to this task that Professor Ridgeway has devoted his talents and his genius for research; and it may safely be said that unless future investigation, or unexpected discoveries supervene, his conclusions on the subject will be universally accepted as correct—that is, in so far as the source of supply of horses to Egypt is concerned. It is made clear to the dullest understanding that from a very early period, Libya was the home of a superior breed of horse, and history supplies evidence that the Libyan people, who possessed both horses and cattle, were in the habit of raiding the fertile valley of the Nile from time to time. These things being so, there is more than a probability that trade and intercourse sprang up between the raiders and the raided, and that in due course some of the Libyan horses, which must have been both feared and admired by the Egyptians, passed into their possession together with specimens of the chariots which, it has been clearly demonstrated, were constructed and used by the Libyans. An engraving of a chariot discovered in a tomb at Thebes is given on p. 225 of the work under notice. Egyptologists assign this discovery to the fourteenth century B.C., but it is not of Egyptian construction and there are reasons for supposing that it was imported from some northern country. Besides the Egyptians, the ancient Greeks imported horses freely from Northern Africa, and Homer, Livy and other writers refer to the horses and horsemen of those regions in terms of admiration and envy. Furthermore, in the fifth century B.C. Libya supplied Xerxes with cavalry. Trustworthy evidence establishes the fact that when there were no horses of any sort in Arabia, the Libyans possessed a breed of their own which was held in great esteem by all who came into touch with them, and also that large numbers of these North African bred horses were in the possession of the Egyptians.

Still following Professor Ridgeway's line of reasoning, we gather that, as indicated by pictorial fragments from ancient pottery and places of burial, the North African horses possessed the distinguishing physical traits and characteristics of the Arab horse. If that be true (there is no adequate reason for doubting it), and it can be shown that the Libyan or North African horse did actually find its way in considerable numbers into Arabia, then the Professor has proved that after all the term "Arab" horse, as applied to the horses of Arabia, is as great a misnomer as that of "thoroughbred" which is used to distinguish the existing breed of racehorses in England. Under the sway of Mahomet the Arabs swept into Egypt and conquered the tribes to the west of the Nile; like other great conquerors in more modern days, Mahomet knew the value of good horses to a country, and there is but little doubt that he and his followers did actually capture and take back with them to Arabia numbers of the best Libyan horses; but there is no proof that these animals were not crossed from time to time with horses procured from other sources.

Much of the interesting evidence accumulated by Professor Ridgeway is dealt with after the fashion of a special pleader, and is presented in a manner which is somewhat calculated to warp the judgment of the reader. Some failings notwithstanding, no one who takes an interest, scientific or otherwise, in the origin and descent of the horse, should fail to read the brilliant book on these subjects which has now been added to the excellent series of biological works issued by the Cambridge University Press.

MICHELANGELO

The Sonnets of Michelangelo Buonarroti. Translated into English Verse by S. ELIZABETH HALL. (Kegan Paul, 5s. net.)

THE world knows Michelangelo the painter and sculptor: comparatively few people know Michelangelo the poet; while perhaps a still smaller number are acquainted with him as an active practical man. In this version of his sonnets, and in the charming and well-translated Life by a younger contemporary of his which occupies the first half of the volume, he is presented in the two latter aspects.

Ascanio Condivi, the author of the Life, seems to have known Michelangelo well, and talked much with him in his old age. At the outset of the biography he remarks that the date of his hero's nativity alone is enough to show that the child then born would be of a "noble and lofty intellect," succeeding in everything and especially in art, since on that day Mercury and Venus were in the second house of Jupiter and wore a "friendly aspect." This statement is followed almost immediately by one which will be accepted much more readily nowadays as a tentative explanation of Michelangelo's special genius—namely, that the nurse who brought him up was the daughter of a sculptor and married to a sculptor. But we are not primarily concerned with finding out the astrological or physical causes of his fondness for art at an early age. We are more inclined to take personality and genius for granted, and to read his life in an objective spirit, finding in it an unusually interesting biographical study. For Michelangelo's reputation as sculptor and architect brought him into situations in which all his resource and ability were called forth, and the result was that he displayed capacity and energy of a practical order which might, if the course of his life had been undisturbed, have lain undeveloped and unsuspected. As it is, we are able to catch several glimpses of this side of his character. He was the only man capable of making a scaffolding for the painting of the Sistine chapel at Rome; he made a road over the marshy ground between Pietrasanta and the coast; and when the Medici were expelled from Florence he took charge of the fortifications of the city and invented a new kind of machinery for protecting the walls from the fire of the enemy.

If, in addition to being a great painter, a unique sculptor and architect, and one who at an emergency could turn his hand to carpentry, road-making and fortification, he had also been a great poet, we should no longer believe in human limitations. It is commonly said that he "took all art for his sphere," but the phrase is not only misleading as to the facts, it is also unjust to Michelangelo, since it would lead us to apply to his poems a standard of criticism by which he never dreamed of their being tested. It is certain that he did not take his verses at all seriously. He distributed them freely among his friends, but made no attempt to collect or publish them. The age in which he lived was full of petrarchism, and, not being a dullard, he was naturally a petrarchist with the rest. Vittoria Colonna, his Laura, was herself a sonnet-writer, and so were many of his male friends. His poems are those of a man whose life's work lay in other fields. We hear of him at the age of twenty-nine, at a time when family affairs compelled him to stay in comparative idleness in Florence, "reading the poets and orators of the vulgar tongue and making sonnets for his own pleasure"; though most of his poems were written towards the end of his life. Whatever may have been his real affection for the Marchioness of Pescara, his love-poems were not so much inspired by her as by his predecessors and contemporaries in the art of sonnetteering. They are platonic, sententious, literary, fantastic, often involved and obscure, but of great occasional beauty, and they please because they are more vigorous in expression than most works of the class.

Miss Hall's translation is made from the same edition of the original as is that of J. A. Symonds. It is a pity that she did not follow his example in printing each poem in Italian on the page facing her version. Many so-called translations are immediately discredited when they are placed side by side with their originals, but hers is not one of those productions. On the contrary, she seems to have placed fidelity to her author's sense above all other considerations. The greatest obstacle in the way of the translator of Italian sonnets is the difficulty of rhyming the first eight lines on two sounds only. This difficulty Miss Hall has not attempted to overcome; she has simply avoided it by rhyming each quatrain independently, so that the rhyme-order of the eight lines is a b b a c d d c. On the other hand, she keeps faithfully to the order of the rhymes in the tercets, where Symonds often changes it. It will thus be seen at once that Symonds set himself the more difficult task, so that to estimate the measure of success attained by each translator would be well-nigh impossible, besides being quite unprofitable. Symonds's translation is too well known for it to be necessary to praise it here. It remains for us to glance at one or two passages which show how Miss Hall, by making a more faithful or more graceful rendering than her predecessor, occasionally scores a point against him.

The second quatrain of sonnet iii, runs:

Io sono e fui già tuo buon servo antico;
A te son dato come i raggi al sole;
E del mio tempo non t'incresco o duole
E men ti piaccio se più m'affatico, which Symonds translates :

I am thy drudge and have been from my youth—
Thine like the rays which the sun's circle fill;
Yet of my dear time's waste thou think'st no ill;
The more I toil the less I move thy ruth.

Why should the "buon servo antico" be degraded to a "drudge"? The last half of the second line is a weak amplification of the simple thought of the Italian, while the Shakespearean phrase in the third is unnecessary. Miss Hall renders the same passage :

I am of old thy faithful servitor,
To thee belong as to the sun its rays;
But thou, unrecking of my wasted days,
Art more displeased as I toil the more, which is simpler and more adequate. A more remarkable case in which we must undoubtedly award the prize to Miss Hall is in the first quatrain of Sonnet xxiii., where Symonds has compressed four lines of Italian into three of English and inserted a line of his own, while Miss Hall gives a well-balanced and faithful translation. Surely, too, her line

In vision only may its glory be is a more satisfactory rendering of E 'l veder sol pur se ne gloria e loda, than Symonds's

Only to gaze exhausts our mortal might.

And the same must be said of her

Since spirit seeks what is to spirit kin, which is a translation of

Com' a sè simil vuol cosa immortale, compared with Symonds's

for the soul confers
On what she holds, her own divinity.

The style of this new translation is as unlike that of Symonds as both are unlike the original. It is often felicitous and apt in rendering those terse and semi-epigrammatic lines which frequently occur in these poems. We doubt whether it is possible to make a readable and at the same time faithful version of a series of sonnets, but Miss Hall must be complimented on having come very near to doing it. Many of her translations read like original poems. She understands the sonnet-form; and without borrowing very obviously from the diction of any particular age of English poetry, she has made up, by the synthetic method, a pleasant literary style which is well adapted to the expression of Michaelangelo's literary and not intensely original sentiments.

THE CHILDHOOD OF FICTION

The Childhood of Fiction: a Study of Folk Tales and Primitive Thought. By J. A. MACCULLOCH. (Murray, 12s. net.)

"A WORK of great interest might be compiled upon the origin of popular fiction and the transition of similar tales from age to age, and from country to country," observed Sir Walter Scott in a note to "The Lady of the Lake." But Mr. Macculloch at the beginning of his book, expresses a fear that to those who love folk-tales chiefly because of all forms of literature they are the most truly

Magic casements, opening on the foam
Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn, he may seem to have committed something of a sacrilege in endeavouring to trace the origin of these tales to some actual happening in bygone days. We hasten to reassure him. The most captious of critics is little likely to find fault with his purpose, though we admit that his theories do not always convince us. We may take as an instance his chapter on the The Dragon Sacrifice, in which he asks: "Had the monstrous dragons, serpents, tritons, hydras and chimæras dire" which figure in so many legends "any real existence at some far-off period?" and answers:

Besides being at the mercy of many species of animals, existing or extinct, early men may have encountered belated survivals of the "dragons of the prime"—Pterodactyls, Dinosaurs, Plesiosaurs, Ichthyosaurs. It needed little imagination, as time went on, to resolve these into the seven-headed dragons which bear so striking a resemblance to them. Their size, their ferocity, their ravages, must have made an indelible impression on the minds of early men. This, handed on from age to age, took the form of legend, with which was mingled other episodes borrowed from past or existing customs, and so the folk-lore would be created.

Mr. Macculloch will find it difficult, we imagine, to convince an intelligent schoolboy that man was a contemporary of the ichthyosaurs, dinosaurs, and plesiosaurs of the Oolitic period, or that he lived so shortly afterwards as to admit of his having chased "belated survivals" of these creatures, or having shot the pterodactyl in the close season! But we do not propose to deal at length with Mr. Macculloch's theories. A limited number of scholars may linger over them, accepting or rejecting as they list; for the majority of readers the charm of the book will lie in the folk-tales here collected. It were impossible in the limited space at our disposal to do justice to the stories themselves. Mr. Macculloch appears to have read all the literature dealing with his subject, and he has gathered tales from every country and every race where they are known to exist. As an instance of his thorough and scholarly work, we cannot do better than refer our readers to the chapter on the innumerable legends in which the Water of Life figures as the object of a quest. Here Mr. Macculloch, after citing a considerable number of examples in the text itself, adds, in a note, no less than sixteen variants—Celtic, Irish, Norse, Swedish, Lorraine, German, Bohemian, Wallachian, Russian, Transylvanian, Hungarian, Austrian, Polish, Sicilian, Lithuanian, and Tyrolean.

Our author's choice of a title is a happy one. Folk-tales represent fiction in its childhood: they are the unwritten literature of primeval man: the outcome of the universal desire to tell, and of the no less universal desire to listen to a story, which animated the savage to the full as much as it has animated the European peasants of all ages, and as it animates the Germans and Roumanians, Russians and Norwegians, Celts and Basques, who, in long winter evenings, still gather round a recognised adept in the art of story-telling and take keen delight in listening to the tales of old unhappy far-off days which appealed to uncivilised man hundreds of years ago. The efforts of the brothers Grimm in collecting the folk-tales which survived in Germany have resulted in the discovery and collection of a vast number of similar tales—Greek, Italian, French, Spanish, Celtic, Russian, Scandinavian, and others—and it is curious to notice how comparatively modern ideas and objects have been incorporated into these stories. Modern names, modern inventions, and modern social customs are found side by side with ogres and witches, and tales of enchanted princes and princesses: contain references to gunpowder and tobacco, whisky and railways, guns, and—we shall soon have to add—motor-cars and torpedo-boat destroyers. Mr. Macculloch accounts for this by the fact that, these tales being orally transmitted, successive generations would introduce things of their own age in order to heighten the interest of them, and they would become coloured by the thoughts and environment of the people who told them. He considers these introductions in no way incongruous, but a little reflection should have suggested to him that the result of this misdirected ingenuity has been that, in many cases, the original tale has been lost sight of or so altered as to be unrecognisable. Again, not infrequently a whole legend or myth has been introduced into another, and the two so interwoven that the story thus evolved bears little resemblance to either. Christianity, too, has spoilt many stories of polygamy, etc.; and in this way Mr. Macculloch has been deprived of a number of interesting parallels.

It must not be thought that folk-tales, or even the greater number of them, can be claimed solely by the countries to which we have referred. Dr. Nassau, Mr. Andrew Lang, Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, to mention only a few, have found among savages and barbaric races in every part of the world—Chinese, Malays, Dyaks, Indians of both American continents, Esquimaux, Mongols, Indian aborigines, Kaffirs, Aino, Bushmen, Negroes, Andamanese, Australians, Maories, and the Islanders of the Pacific—an equally rich variety of folk-tale literature. Comparing the literary and artistic ability of some of these people, Mr. Macculloch says:

Those who possess the most elaborate and imaginative tales are the Red Indians (e.g., Zunis) and Polynesians; in the case of the latter, however, the stories are religious myths rather than Märchen. Neither of these races is very artistic so far as direct copying of nature is concerned; the Polynesians are, however, excellent decorative artists. The Bushmen and Eskimo, true rivals of the Palaeolithic artists (of whose powers as story-weavers we know nothing) in holding the mirror up to nature, are also good weavers of tales, though none of these are so beautiful as the Polynesian and Red Indian stories. Chinese folk-tales are least romantic of all; in these, as in their art products, they are far surpassed by the Japanese. In Europe the most romantic and magical of all folk-tales are the Celtic.

In the folk-tales of modern savages we find the same blending of old and new, the same mixture of ancient customs with those in vogue to-day, which appears in the tales which survive in Europe; but the incongruity is less apparent, because some of the oldest customs are still familiar to the men who relate the tales. The most noticeable difference between the folk-lore of the savages and that of the European peasants is that whereas the latter are for the most part stories of some happening, real or imaginary, related merely to please the listener, the former are often invented with the definite aim to support a belief or custom which may be gradually dying out. Most savages believe, for instance, in descent from totem-animals and in shape-shifting, with the result that we get a number of tales similar to that given by Dr. Nassau, which illustrates two beliefs current in West Africa: (1) That every one has a sort of astral self which may be extracted from the body by witches, who eat it and thus cause the death of the man or woman from whose body it has been taken; (2) That the presence of an uninitiated witness when the witch-women meet to practise the "rite," as Mr. Macculloch calls it, will effectually baulk them. The story tells of a witch who refused to let her lover visit her on a certain night; whereupon he, suspecting a rival, concealed himself in her house. He waited for some time, and at last a number of women, among whom was the lady of his affections, entered the hut, carrying an astral body. It was laid down, and the witches proceeded to hack at it with their knives. Their efforts, however, were unavailing, and repeated sharpenings did not improve matters. Morning at length dawned and with its advent their power ended, and they were compelled to restore the astral body to its owner.

Mr. Macculloch has arranged the folk-tales in order of similarity, and thus we frequently find the same märchen or saga told among Europeans and among the most uncivilised of savages. Of course a considerable amount of diffusion has taken place, but it is impossible to support the theories of those who have contended that all folk-tales based on the same incident originated—no matter in what country they are found—in one particular centre. In Mr. Macculloch's own words: "Similar conditions of life, similar environments, similar stages of culture, similar mental and psychic states, will almost inevitably work out mental, artistic, and mechanical products in precisely the same way"; and there is no doubt that, in a vast majority of cases, the likeness between folk-tales of different countries is due merely to the similar conditions which ruled the lives of primeval man in every part of the globe. That they have come down through the ages so little altered in form is hardly matter for surprise. Were not the Vedic poems—practically unchanged—transmitted orally for thousands of years?

OLD LONDON BY PEN AND PENCIL

London Vanished and Vanishing. Painted and described by PHILIP NORMAN. (Black, 21s.)

AMONG those who write of London with exact knowledge Mr. Philip Norman has long held high place. His equipment is unusual: he is both artist and antiquary, and in these characters may be measured against himself without decisive award to either. His book on Signs and Inscriptions is important to every student, and his shorter contributions to London lore have been numerous. But it is with Mr. Norman's diligent water-colour records of old London that we are here concerned. Though topographically exact, they are full of painter's charm, and, as our readers ought to know, they form a special collection, with their own catalogue, in the South Kensington Museum. Just now, we understand, they are at Bethnal Green.

Seventy-five of these drawings are reproduced by the three-colour process in this volume, and the result is both attractive and important. The slight over-brilliance of the colour seems but a legitimate emphasis of the picturesque corners of London we have too lightly sacrificed. Sixty of the drawings represent buildings which might have been seen in recent years, or which have been demolished even while Mr. Norman's pen was wet. To all these scenes, and to others not depicted, Mr. Norman supplies a chatty text which, though it necessarily repeats much that is familiar, is always interesting, and is often valuable, to the student. Picture-books are so often "written up" to the pictures in a facile or perfunctory manner that it is a pleasure to insist that this one belongs to a higher category.

Whenever his wanderings bring him to a more or less vexed or well-ventilated subject, Mr. Norman gives those exacter statements and finer shades of authenticity which show the scholar of London. Thus the scribes who recently made a virtue of discarding the claim of No. 17 Fleet Street to have been the residence of Cardinal Wolsey, clung all the more limpet-wise to the tradition that the building had been the offices and council chamber of the Duchy of Cornwall. But Mr. Norman tells us that there is not a single document connecting this house, or any other in Fleet Street, with the Duchy or with its holder, Prince Henry of Wales, who, indeed, died only two years after the erection of the building. Mr. Norman shows that there had already been on the spot a tavern called the Prince's Arms, which may account for the Prince of Wales's feathers in the decoration. The initials "P. H." on the famous ceiling must undoubtedly refer to Prince Henry, but they may have been put there in mere compliment to the then living Prince—no unusual thing even in private houses. Still the popular idea is not excluded, because, as Mr. Norman shows, the Council of the Duchy of Cornwall had not, in the seventeenth century, any regular office, and dated its documents from various houses. One of these was in Salisbury Court, a circumstance which might, indeed, explain the whole Fleet Street tradition. What we do know is that the house was built in 1610 by John Bennett, who asked permission to "jettie over the gate towards the street." And jettied (juttied) the building is to this day. Another popular mistake about No. 17 is that at a later date it became Nando's Coffee House. Mr. Norman shows clearly that Nando's was on the site of the present "Rainbow."

Johnson's "Mitre" has often been erroneously described. Even so sound a scholar as Peter Cunningham, by a serious slip, identified it with the present "Mitre" in Mitre Court. Mr. Norman, of course, instructs his readers that Johnson's "Mitre" stood at 39 Fleet Street, and that its site is now covered by Hoare's banking-house. A propos Johnson, Mr. Norman quotes the well-known remark of Goldsmith to the Doctor, as they came to Temple Bar from the Abbey (where Johnson had uttered the same words): "Forsitan et nostrum nomen miscebitur istis." We have always thought it amusing that Johnson, who had complacently seen the portal of Fleet Street decorated with human heads, should have denounced as barbarians the Northumbrian villagers, because they erected whale-bones ("relics of mortality" he called them) as porticoes over their cottage gates.

Nowhere has the London of to-day been so visibly hurt as in Holborn, whence in very recent years have vanished Furnival's Inn, the picturesque end of Leather Lane, and the Old Bell and Black Bull inns. Mr. Norman might have lengthened this list by adding Ridler's Hotel, where ten years ago you caught sight of old brass candle-sticks on the hall-table at night. There was a waiter at Ridler's who was the double of the then Speaker (Viscount Peel)—and also a wonderful port-wine negus for those who knew.

We could wish that John Grey, as well as Dickens, might always be named in connection with Furnival's Inn. John Grey kept the ale and cider cellar under the Inn a hundred years or so ago. During forty years he had worked and saved in order that he might return to his native Yorkshire and purchase back the family estate. In this he succeeded. But when he had settled on his acres he fell unhappy. So sorely did he miss the chink of his pots, and the dull roar of Holborn, and the incursions of town gossip, that he rose up and re-sold the estate. Returning to London, he became the waiter in his old cellar, and died in harness.

Near Holborn is Nevill's Court, where you may still see the cottage-like gardens depicted by Mr. Norman in their small luxuriance, and also a venerable (but of course threatened) house which has belonged to the Moravian Society since 1744.

It is a lasting pleasure to turn these pages, and to recognise, not without remorse, many a fine old house, or purlieu, to which one might have bidden a more loyal farewell. Among such we number the "Vine," the island-tavern in the Mile End Road, which rose out of that thoroughfare as welcome to the eye as a ship on a wide sea; Mr. Norman has made two drawings of it. No. 23 Great Winchester Street was a splendid specimen of an old City mansion of the seventeenth century: it was destroyed in 1890. The old Quest House and the "Four Shoppes" under the church of St. Giles's, Cripplegate, have a welcome memorial, and this drawing includes the church-yard gate, dated 1660 and decorated with devices of mortality, which was removed—we cannot think with justification—a very few years ago.

We might linger on the old inns and mansions of Chelsea and Hammersmith: Turner's house in Cheyne Walk, Sandford Manor House, the Red Cow tavern, the Six Bells and its bowling-green, and the last thatched cottage in Paddington. Mr. Norman has drawn them all, and his pictures are, or may shortly prove to be, their best memorial.

SEYMOUR VANDELEUR

Seymour Vandeleur. By Col. F. I. MAXSE. (London: The National Review office, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE life of Brevet-Lt.-Col. Vandeleur has been recorded by Colonel Maxse as an "instance of the toll exacted by Empire and a reminder to us who sit at home that there still are men whose pride it is to render service to the State." The object is well served by the subject of the memoir, for the brilliant career of this young Guardsman is a model of that intelligent activity and enthusiasm which the ideal soldier or civilian should bring to bear in serving the Empire. Col. Maxse's method of presenting the story of Vandeleur is not to write a biography so much as to narrate the events in which he took part and to discuss the problems which absorbed him. This is a method fraught with danger, in the execution of which great self-control is needed. Col. Maxse has for the most part been successful, and if in his admirable chapters on Uganda and Nigeria he leads us a long way from his hero, we are contented by the excellence of his narrative and his easy presentation of facts which, in a less skilful hand, might easily be tedious: he becomes on more general subjects, such as education, so discursive as to call attention to the disadvantages of the method he has adopted. This, however, is a slight defect in a delightful book. The printing is exceptionally good, and the water-colour drawings by Nico Jungmann are well reproduced.

The individual in the story is naturally overshadowed by the events in which he took part, and it is not easy to know whether to be glad or not. The chapter on the Egyptian army at work, for instance, contains a good deal that is irrelevant, but we would not willingly miss the story of the 1896 expedition to Dongola and how it was settled. Other parts of the book are not so amusing, although they may be more instructive; Vandeleur's forecast of what was to happen at Fashoda shows that the Foreign Office had had trustworthy evidence of the aggression with which the French menaced us on the Upper Nile, but leaves us no explanation of why no attention was paid to the warning—with the result that the British fleets were mobilised and preparations made for war in all parts of the world owing to the action of a French major of Marines and a handful of blacks. The value of the incident from the biographical point of view is considerable, for it is an excellent illustration of Vandeleur's application to difficult problems. His success in this case was shown by his book "Campaigning on the Upper Nile and Niger," and by his warning to the Foreign Office.

As a leader of men Seymour Vandeleur established his reputation in Uganda, and without neglecting the more scientific part of his vocation for his geographical surveys, gained considerable honour. In South Africa his ability was equally tested, and as senior transport officer to the 6th division and in other difficult billets he worked well and hard. The irony of fate overtook him in the end, and instead of dying in action, or even, as so many Empire-builders do, of fever in some distant corner of the world, he was murdered by a train-wrecker near Waterval North who shot him at point blank range. That the promise of his short life was unfulfilled—Vandeleur was born so recently as 1869—is good reason for telling the story of his career. It is a powerful argument against the Little England doctrine; the school of the Empire is stern, but, with many men like Vandeleur on its honours list, it is a glorious school.

BRETON FOLK-SONG

MODERN means of travels are no doubt serviceable to modern ends. They enable one, where the world grows less picturesque, to spin through it more rapidly. But in order to find what things of antique beauty and interest survive upon this changing earth, it is well to seek them on foot, with staff and wallet, in the old way. At least, those pilgrims who hold to the traditions of their order,

Among which faithful troop am I, fancy that in their ancient habit of wayfaring they obtain certain advantages over the modern sight-seer. Brittany, for instance, is now become a place of common resort: but few travellers ever penetrate into the strange mediæval country concealed between the Bay of Biscay and the English Channel. It is a mysterious land traversed by neither high roads nor railways. Only by droves winding across rock-strewn moors, and lanes dipping below banks of undergrowth, does one light upon those little hamlets of Lower Brittany, which are still bathed in the atmosphere of the middle ages. No inn is found there. But in mediæval lands a pilgrim confides in the good offices of the Church. Knocking at the door of the presbytery, he engages the village priest in his enterprise, and he is at last conducted to some hospitable, old-fashioned farmhouse, where the evening is spent somewhat in the manner described in one of the songs of the country :

Now night has fallen, and every one gathers by the hearth to enjoy the warmth of the fire. The men strip the hemp, or mend the bee-hives, twist rope-threads, or plait the straw into hats.

Each girl at the spinning-wheel must refill her bobbin before the evening ends. The eldest daughter of the house reads the Life of the Saint for the day ; then she sings a new ballad.

Meanwhile, grandmother, turning her spinning-wheel in the corner, says that in bygone days, in her time, the barns were better fitted than they are now, and the harvests more abundant.

She complains that both the times and the men are changed, and that the customs of her youth are followed no longer. Mari smiles as she listens, and at her lover, the waggoner, casts a sweeter glance.

Grandmother is a dame of some sixty winters, and knows scarcely a word of French. Mari belongs to the young generation, which has been compelled to learn at school the language of the "Galliz," to the spread of which the old people attribute the decay of ancient manners. But in these remote country places there has really been little alteration, either in the mood of the peasantry or in their way of life. Their mind derives still a primitive culture from one of the richest funds of folk-lore in Europe, and in the features of their innumerable local saints there are still apparent the savage lineaments of their mysterious divinities of the pagan days.

All that the Bretons have lost is the body of historic myth and legend which they brought from England, and this they lost long ago. Four hundred years after their retreat to Armorica, they were driven from their new territory by the Normans, and dispersed over Europe. By a forlorn hope they, at last, succeeded in recovering their country, but they were then a broken race. In Higher Brittany they had forgotten their native language, in Lower Brittany, their historic traditions ; and for five centuries their land remained one of the most stagnant backwaters, in art and letters, in Europe. For instance, there is in genuine Breton ballad poetry, little trace of so-called "Celtic magic." This lack of romantic delight in natural scenery is one of the things which seem to stamp that ballad poetry as the work of a race of peasants sequestered from all the Oriental influences which spread through Europe in the track of the returning Crusaders. The Breton mind was, in fact, dormant in the middle ages, and it only began to acquire mediæval characteristics about the middle of the fifteenth century when the rest of Europe was sloughing them. Its ballad poetry, in short, unlike its folk-lore, is derivative in subject-matter. At its best it consists of such mediæval commonplaces as tales of fairies, witches, and demon-lovers, stories of lepers, and reminiscences of plagues and famines. In response to the popular interest in crimes there has also been produced much broad-sheet verse, but in this one does, now and then, light upon a passage of fine quality. How well, for example, the story of a wicked stepmother opens :

The curse of the earth and the sky ;
The curse of the stars and the moon ;
The curse of the falling dew ;
Be upon all step-mothers !

There you have the authentic note of the pagan soul of Brittany. A curious tinge of paganism is also found in the ballad : "The Young Girl and the Soul of her Mother" :

I

A young girl of the parish of Blau, wished to see her mother who was dead : to see her mother again, and speak to her, so greatly did she mourn her death.

She sought for the priest to tell him her wish. "Yes, my daughter, you shall speak to her, if you do as you are bidden. For three nights, after supper, you must go alone to the church, and take with you three aprons to place upon her grave while you pray."

II

When she saw a bluish light flaming on the right of the altar, she entered a confessional as the priest had bidden her, to see the souls of the dead making their procession.

They were divided into three groups—black, grey, and white. Among the black was her mother. God ! how great was her grief. When the souls of the dead had made their procession, her mother seized the apron : her mother seized the apron and tore it into nine pieces. . . .

IV

A sister of the young girl had married, and bore that night a child. The young girl was asked to name it, and promised quickly to come. As the child was being baptized she asked the priest to give it her mother's name. "Every time that I see it, it will remind me of my mother." On the child being baptized, suddenly it died. Suddenly it died, and the young girl passed the night beside it.

V

When the young girl had supped, she went again alone to the churchyard, and brought another apron to place upon the grave while she prayed.

When she saw a bluish light flaming on the right of the altar, she entered the confessional as the priest had bidden her, to see the souls of the dead making their procession.

They were divided into three groups—black, grey, and white. Among the white was her mother, and her grief was changed to joy. When the souls of the dead had made their procession, the soul of her mother seized the apron, and tore it into three pieces.

Then the mother came to her daughter, and spoke to her in this manner. "Fortunate are you, that I have not torn you also into pieces : that I have not torn you, all alive, into pieces, as I have my aprons. Day by day, you increased my agony by your tears and by your sorrow. You have held a child above the font, and have given it my name. You have given it my name ! You have given it my name ! And this it is that has saved me. I now go to behold God. And you, you must come also without delay."

Readers of the poems of Barnes may recollect that the Wessex poet in "A Mother's Dream," deals in light, tender fashion, with this strange superstition, so it is, probably, a widespread one. But what in the verses of Barnes becomes a delicate, plaintive fancy, remains in the Breton ballad, a gloomy, inhuman idea informed with the terrible force of a living belief. So superstitious a race as the Breton is naturally somewhat serious-minded. Even in its love-songs, such as "The Clerk's Secrets," there is often an undertone of tragedy :

Each night, each night, when I go to bed,
Instead of sleeping, I only weep :
Instead of sleeping I only weep,
When I think on her whom I love.

Each day, I go to the Forest of Love,
Hoping to see you coming to draw water ;
When I see you coming through the wood,
I leave my secrets on the leaves of the trees.

If you leave your secrets on the leaves of the trees,
You entrust them to a frail friend :
In the days when the rains come, and the wind, and the tempest,
All your confidences will be lost.

It were better, gentle clerk, to write them on my heart,
Where they will for ever remain deeply graven.

Here, at last, in the latest expression of the Breton mind, one finds a strain of veritable originality. In the folk-songs of no other country is there anything like the love-lyric of Lower Brittany. So intimate and tender in feeling, so veiled and delicate in manner are the best of these songs, that their peculiar quality is not seized at first glance. There is a strange pathos in the verses just cited. It is not a tale of a timid lad being wooed by the maid with whom he has fallen in love. The poem is concerned with the struggle between human love and divine in the soul of some novitiate priest. The situation turns upon the word "clerk." As in our ancient literature, the title was formerly given to any person of education, but in modern Brezonec it is used to designate a student for the priesthood. He is commonly a lad of humble origin, distinguished from his fellows by those intellectual gifts which have gained for him a place in the seminaries of a country where an ecclesiastical career remains the highest object of ambition among the peasantry. During his years of study, there are periods of intermission when he returns to his people. He resumes his homely way of life at that time when, as the Bretons say, the hearts of flowers, and youths and maids, are opening to the sun. It is the season of village festivals, at which the young clerk is respected by the men, admired by the women, and worshipped by the girls with whom he used to play. Can one wonder that the most touching love-songs of Lower Brittany are composed by her clerks ?

These adventures form also the subject-matter of many a Breton ballad. Human nature is sometimes shown to be stronger than the most solemn of resolutions; but commonly the revelation of "The Clerk's Secrets" has a tragic issue. The young priest remains true to his vows. Seeing his sweetheart for the last time, he exclaims: "To-morrow I am to say my first mass! Oh! do not come to it. If I see you I shall forget my duty to God." The forlorn girl promises not to go; but after a night of sorrow she is overcome by passion, and hides in the church. While her lover, pale and unstrung, is chanting the service, he is startled by a great cry. The heartbroken girl rushes out, and in the agony of death, flings herself down at his feet by the altar, and there he, too, falls dead. The ballad ends:

Their bodies are upon the funeral trestles,
May God grant pardon unto their souls!
Since they could not sleep in the same bed,
They rest together in the same grave.

And the peasants, listening around the winter fire to the familiar story, gravely say "Amen."

EDWARD WRIGHT.

FROM INLAND

I DREAMED that you and I were young
Once more, and by our old grey sea
Stood in the wind; but matins, sung
High in these wine-hills, wakened me.
I lay, half roused and seemed to hold
Once more beside our old, dear sea,
Your hand. I saw the primrose gold
Your hair had then and seemed to see
Your eyes, so child-like and so wise
Look down on me.

By the last fire we ever lit
You knelt and bending down your head,
—If you could compass it—you said,
Not ever would you live again
Your vanished life, never again
Pass through those shadowy vales of pain.

"And now I'm old and here I sit,"
You said and held your hands apart
To those old flames we've left behind
As far—as far as some dead wind.
And so I fetched from near my heart
Brave platitudes. For you were there
The firelight lit your brooding face
And flickered in your dream-gold hair,
—I could be brave for the short space
I had you near my chair.
As thus: "Since with the ebb of youth
Rises the flood of passionless
And calm enjoyment, out shines Truth
And fades the painful earnestness
Of all young thought, we two," I said,
"Have still the best to come." But you Bowed still your patient, silent head

. . . This view!

Steep vineyards rising parched and brown
This weary stream: this weary town:
White convents on each hilltop! . . .

Dear
What would I give to climb our down
Where fresh wind hisses in each stalk,
And from the high brown crest to see
Beyond our ancient sea-grey town
The sky-line of our foam-flecked sea.
Ah, by a sheltered hedge to rest
And looking out to sea to hear,
Ah dear, once more your pleasant talk,
And to go home as twilight falls
Along the old marsh walls. . . .

"The best to come!" The best! The best!
One says the wildest things at times,
Merely for comfort. But—"The best!"
Ah well . . . At night when the moon climbs,
High o'er these misty inland capes,
And hears the river lisp'ing rhymes,
And sees the roe-deer nibbling grapes,
Amid the evanescent gleams
Of falling dew-drops, shall come dreams
Gliding among the mists beneath,
Maybe a dream of you and me
Young once again by our old sea:

But, ah, we two must travel wide
And far and far ere we shall find
That recollected, ancient tide
We walked by once, or that dead wind
That fled so bravely to its death.

FORD MADOX HUEFFER.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AMATEUR AND SPECIALIST

A REVIEW in the ACADEMY (December 23, 1905) of my little book, "The Clyde Mystery," suggests a few reflections on specialists and amateurs. The courteous reviewer thinks it "a little surprising to find" the author of "The Clyde Mystery" in the rôle of an antiquary. It is "almost as startling as if the Bishop of Birmingham were to write on motor-cars." Now I was not so much as aware that there is any Bishop of Birmingham, but if there be, and if he cannot "write on motor-cars," he must be a prelate of very limited faculties. I would be the last to presume to dictate to the Church, but to lay a curse on motor cars does seem well within the functions of a General Council.

This is a digression: I was going on to say that as I have been "an antiquary" (an amateur) all my life, a pious and careful student of my career ought not to be surprised if I touch on a very obscure corner of things antiquarian. It is thirty years since the great war of the antiquaries round the discoveries of Dr. Schliemann at Hissarlik and Mycenæ. Simple as I stand, a part in the fray was mine: an anonymous part, played in the Saturday Review, and my side won! Dr. Schliemann's discoveries were certainly of genuine antiquity. But the celebrated Monsieur G. de Mortillet insinuated, with his usual breadth, that Dr. and Mrs. Schliemann sent their workmen away to dinner, and popped the Trojan treasure into a hole in a wall, during the absence of spectators. M. de Mortillet did not say this in so many words, but he made his meaning pretty clear. He had never seen the objects, they were relics of a period of life and art about which nobody then knew anything, but M. de Mortillet was a specialist, and, as such, was cocksure—and was entirely in the wrong.

Every specialist, fortunately, is not cocksure: when in doubt the specialist sometimes condescends to "sit on the fence," which, in obscure and dubious matters, is the only perch that recommends itself to science. Now the part of the amateur antiquary (and I profess to be quite the amateur) is to know that he does not know everything, and to keep his mind open. His part is, also, to know things which the specialist does not know, or does not mention. The specialist, in many cases, represents orthodox knowledge, and holds that what he does not know is not orthodox. Thus, with regard to the eccentric and anomalous objects found in the Clyde estuary, it is certain that, though scarcely anything analogous to them has been found in British soil, things closely analogous are found in European regions, and in Australia and America.

Not being a specialist, I was aware of this, and thought that the circumstance was of interest. Thus, small water-worn pieces of stone, perforated, and covered with archaic patterns, are found in the Clyde, and in Canada, on the sites of savage life. Again, on a few of the Clyde stones were marks identical with some of the "alphabetish" marks which Mr. Flinders Petrie, Mr. Evans, and others study in Egyptian, Ægean, Trojan and island sites in the Levant. Central Australia, like the Clyde, yields stones, small and large, perforated, and inscribed with the same sorts of markings. Portugal and Spain contribute many such "charm stones," perforated, and covered with archaic markings, and these, somehow, were ignored, while Russian and Italian oddities were freely discussed. Perhaps knowledge of things Iberian is not orthodox knowledge, and is therefore attractive to the amateur, a chartered libertine. All these parallels, of course, do not prove that the eccentric Clyde things are genuine, especially as the old Clyde folk were not living in the Stone Age, like the makers of the foreign things. But my additions to the facts in the case certainly seem to me to suggest that if there is a forger near Dumbarton, he knows a great deal that he could not have learned from the works of Scottish specialists, or from "The Proceedings of the Scottish Society of Antiquaries." The puzzle is to find this erudite man, and the puzzle will not be solved, I think. I cannot demonstrate a negative; it is the business of the other side to prove forgery. Thus, accepting the fact that the blue point shells are modern, are American, and are marked, then they are absolute forgeries, that is proved. But it does not follow that other inscribed shells, which "fell into dust immediately," on being exposed to the air, were forgeries. That forged objects may be, and have been, introduced into genuine antique sites, is certain, indeed the joke is notoriously common, and all the Clyde oddities are said to be examples of this nefarious process. It does not follow that all objects found on such sites are forged. As to the opinion of "any intellectual person, unversed in prehistoric lore," who reads the discussion, and is moved by "the balance of opinion," I fear that I do not value his verdict. Some most distinguished Scottish archaeologists are publicly sharing my perch on the fence; and I do not adduce private expressions from good sources.

The amateur would be converted to archaeological agnosticism, if, in a Catholic spirit, he based his belief on authority, and on great names. The late Mr. A. S. Murray, for example, never would believe that the objects found by Dr. Schliemann, at Mycenæ, and by other explorers on other ancient Greek sites, were older than the eighth century B.C. On the other hand, many celebrated specialists believe that they are of about 1500-1200 B.C.

Mr. Murray executed for the British Museum excavations in Cyprus, where he dug up quantities of this kind of relic, some of them now in the British Museum—weapons, vases, jewels, carvings in ivory, and so on. In his Report to the Museum (1900) he showed that the things were of the eighth to seventh century B.C.; or at least he showed reasons for that opinion. Mr. Evans replied on the other side (in the "Journal of the Anthropological Institute," vol. xxx.). Let "any intellectual person unversed in prehistoric lore" read these two copiously illustrated papers. On which doctrine will he stake his money?

Another case has occurred to me lately. I picked up an enigmatic little object; its nature is not essential to the question. Some experts of eminence think that it is certainly antique, and perhaps extremely antique. Another expert, also of great renown, declared, on inspection of a photograph of the thing, that it is "a wicked forgery," and a very poor forgery too, copied from a bad old engraving, which I have vainly tried to find. Now it cannot be a forgery, made "with intent to deceive," for certain absolute reasons. If it be modern, it was made with no intent to deceive, but merely as an innocent trinket, perhaps as a seal, though no device has been graven on the base, and, indeed, I had thought of having my initials graven thereon. At present, being devoid of any opinion as to the date and origin of the thing, I abstain. In short, one becomes "a doubting Thomas," so contradictory are the opinions of the most celebrated archaeologists on some very important points in prehistoric and historic relics. The amusement of the amateur is to find out, or at least bring into light, facts of which specialists of renown may be ignorant, and will certainly continue to be ignorant, if they are advanced by an amateur. Some day a specialist will find them out for himself, and if he be a foreigner they will become current coin. This process is always going on. You publish some discovery in English. Nobody takes any notice. Then a learned Dane or German publishes the facts, and they are gladly welcomed by British savants. We are a modest people!

ANDREW LANG.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Edgar Allan Poe," by A.]

FICTION

The Romance of the Fountain. By EUGENE LEE-HAMILTON. (Unwin, 6s.)

THIS is a tale not of Spain but of Spaniards, not of America, but of an extraordinary land across the Atlantic, whose inhabitants worship a flower of great size that kills men and women, as the sundew slays gnats. At the time of the story America had just been discovered by Columbus. It was in its first glory of promise. Tale after tale was spread, describing its buried secrets, and Don Luis Medrana, the alchemist, convinced himself that behind the sunset lay the fountain of eternal youth. The king, not the less willingly because he was himself growing old, assisted him with ships and men, and he sailed away from Spain to discover it, taking his daughter with him, and a villainous Diego Perez as chief captain. All this is very fine and extravagant and Spanish, and when the girl's lover, who is, of course, a descendant of Medranas' hereditary enemies, joins the expedition in disguise, we are quite prepared for delightful perils and escapes. Not a bit of it! Mr. Lee-Hamilton decides quite arbitrarily to give us a tragedy, fails in this, and gives us a melodrama instead. Diego sells Don Luis, the daughter, and the expedition, to the rulers of the Land of Bimini. The girl and her lover meet in a dungeon, as he is dying and she about to be sacrificed in the petals of the homicidal flower, and the alchemist dies from a poisoned arrow after drinking from what he believes to be the fountain of youth. The neglect of two or three rules explains the failure of Mr. Lee-Hamilton's story, the general effect of which could have been achieved far more consistently by the authoress of "The Mysteries of Udolpho." The essence of tragedy is the culminating sense of disaster, that grows like a wave whose ultimate crash we are continually expecting. When, as here, the author plays with his puppets with a smile on his face, and then suddenly throws them into the bottomless pit, he exasperates instead of stunning the mind of his reader. Although, when a writer labels his tale a romance, he disclaims too close an allegiance to reality, he owes it to his readers to make his impossibilities probable, and at least to sustain a consistent atmosphere, which is dissipated at once when a very terrible sorceress speaks of an arrow poison as if she were recommending a pill, and advises, "one drop of our undiluted and last-developed death juice." Where laughter comes in at the door, horror flies up the chimney. Again the whole use of conversations and descriptions, the purpose of a book indeed, is to give life to the people of the tale. The Three Musketeers, for example, are improbable, but, alive; while Don Luis, the villain, the lover, and the girl in this book, move like the cardboard rabbits in the emerald woods of a penny shooting-gallery.

The Making of Michael. By MRS. FRED REYNOLDS. (Allen, 6s.)

THIS book is full of aspiring thoughts and holy people, so we must be cross-grained not to delight in it; just as, years ago, it used to be cross-grained not to delight in stories about immaculate children who died young because—we could discover no other reason—they were too good to live. Michael, however, does not die. He is left standing very correctly by the "plain headstone" that marks the burial-place of his best friend: but in a nebulous way we gather that he has succeeded in life. By this time we have followed him through many stages, and have become perversely depressed by his extraordinary beauty, his flawless character, and his commanding genius. Of course a rara avis of this sort ought to succeed, and yet if we had not the author's word for it we should have expected him to come to grief directly he entered a world where imperfect human beings jostle each other in the struggle for life. For he has grown up, secluded like a nun, in a dream valley where shadows, irritatingly described as the Stranger, the Artist, the Musician, pass into and out of his life. On one occasion he says that he has been listening all these years to the laughter of the earth; but it is just the spirit of laughter that he and all his companions lack. They are beautiful poetic souls, but they are never entertaining; and the impression left by them is rather like the impression left by some of the German Romantics in their cloudy, solemn, half-told tales.

The Toll of the Bush. By WILLIAM SATCHELL. (Macmillan, 6s.)

THIS story, set, like Mr. Satchell's former tale "The Lone Lost Land," in the heart of the New Zealand Bush, owes its undeniable charm partly to the skill with which the author has utilised an unfamiliar and impressive background, and partly to qualities of sympathy and humour together with breadth and freshness of view. It contains, too, in the subsidiary incident of the love of Robert Hernshaw and Lena Andersen, one of those tender little idyls which sometimes linger in the memory long after the main theme of a book is forgotten. From a critical point of view, however, the value of the tale as a complete whole depends in great measure upon the reasonable probability of its plot and the credibility of the line of conduct pursued by the various characters involved. These matters would make a capital subject for discussion in a Literary Debating Society; but in spite of Mr. Satchell's evident pains to reconcile the trend of events with the idiosyncrasies of his people we cannot but think that the verdict would be against him time after time. Geoffrey Hernshaw comes out to New Zealand and falls in love with Eve Milward. Eve shows every sign of returning his affection; but a rival appears in the shape of a minister of the most uncompromising type, who is engaged in violently converting the natives. This man has reason to believe in Geoffrey's supposed complicity in a certain domestic tragedy in England. In spite of Geoffrey's assurance, and of irrefutable proof from another quarter, that the whole story is entirely unfounded, his passion tempts him not only to conceal the truth, but actually to repeat the story to Eve Milward herself. Now we can accept this villainy, crude as it seems, without winking; but we cannot believe that Geoffrey would have quietly submitted to his lady-love's sudden, disdainful request that he would "kindly let her pass" into the possession of a rival. Nor do we think that many Eves or daughters of Eve would have acted as she did. But, since she was a thoroughly nice girl, we can only rejoice that an old forgotten letter unravelled the coil, and that the bush did not claim these tardily reunited lovers also, in addition to the three righteous and unrighteous victims who pay toll to it.

A Sicilian Marriage. By DOUGLAS SLADEN. (White, 6s.)

It is a pity that Mr. Sladen was unable to make up his mind whether he would write a novelette or a guide-book. The novelette might have been interesting, the guide-book certainly would have been—to those who care for such fare. But he compromised, and the result is "A Sicilian Marriage." It is scarcely necessary to say more. Mr. Sladen himself starts out with the remark: "That life in Sicily is more melodramatic than it is in West Kensington is not to be denied." 'Tis a childish platitude; and so far as it affects his story, it might have been omitted. The incidents could just as easily have taken place in a London suburb, and it is only the continual excerpts, paraphrases and adaptations from histories, guide-books and travellers' tales that keep us in mind of the fact that we are in Sicily. The characters are like the incidents, stereotyped and familiar. The reconciliation between Lady Helen and Blanche is so ludicrous that one marvels that even Mr. Sladen should have cared to bring it about, and the character of the narrator is so shadowy that we are inclined to doubt whether Mr. Sladen ever bothered to decide whether it was a man or a woman who set out to tell the story. We think it time to protest against the letters which invariably accompany Mr. Sladen's books.

The Dreamer. By LUCAS CLEEVE. (Digby, Long, 6s.)

"THE Dreamer" is a mildly sordid, drab story of a failure. The hero, John Page, a man of social position in Virginia, but no means, makes a runaway match with Gray Moreton, the daughter of wealthy parents. The young pair accordingly settle in humble circumstances in a village, where Page is overseer of a mill, and where the inhabitants despise them for trying to maintain a tone which their small establishment seems to make incongruous. The wife dies, and Page, having refused to place his children in the care of his wife's family, at length marries (why is not very convincingly explained) a woman who has served him for some years as housekeeper, and looked lovingly after his offspring. Thus bound, he becomes fascinated by a married woman of society, realises the distastefulness of his lowly life, sends the children to their maternal grandmother, deserts his second wife, and hurries off to realise his dreams of greatness. "He was wide awake now; he had left his dreams behind him, done with them for ever. The new John Page never stopped once to look back." That is the end. The story is really that of John Page in the unpleasant circumstances of his second marriage, though a third of the book—practically one long parenthesis—is occupied with describing how he arrived at that condition. It is not a very inviting theme, but it is this first third of the book which spoils one's appetite. Lucas Cleeve fails to clothe the man with interest. As several characters remark several times, he has just "enough eddication to make a fool of him." While he is dreaming we feel continually that we should like to shake him; when he wakes up we know that a kicking is the only thing. Very occasionally we seem, in the course of reading, to see signs of a brightening of the horizon. There are one or two flashes of dry humour in the glimpses we get of the village people, but Lucas Cleeve appears to be afraid of lifting the heavy dull cloud that overshadows everything.

FINE ART

THE GRAND STYLE

The Discourses of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by ROGER FRY. (Seeley, 7s. 6d. net.)

FOR rather more than half a century English art criticism has been held in bondage by Ruskin and his followers. In recent years other writers have gained the popular ear, while the older art critics have suffered an eclipse. Thanks to that excellent forerunner of modern reprints, Bohn's Library, Sir Joshua Reynolds's Discourses have never been inaccessible to the reader, and they have, we believe, still continued to receive, together with Leslie's Handbook, the official patronage of the Academy. But even if Reynolds has continued to be read, he has certainly failed to make any impression at all comparable with that made by Ruskin. He has been put upon the shelf and condemned to the evil fate which many people conceive to belong to a classic, to be spoken about and not to be read or to be read without being understood.

Mr. Fry's edition is, therefore, by its very occurrence, an important artistic event. Its mere external form is important, for a book is much less out of date when its cover is designed in modern taste; and the addition of illustrations brings Reynolds into line with the latest young lady who writes a little life of a great painter. But there are far more important indications of a change in the trend of artistic taste in the interior of the book than in its mere externals. That a modern book should contain reproductions of the later Italian painters—Salvator, Roga, Tibaldi, Baroccio, and of the French painters, Le Sueur, Bourdon, is at once significant. That a book on art should appear without a single mention of Velasquez (except once in a note by the editor), and should refer disparagingly to Rembrandt, is a fact in itself of grave moment. Nor is the book reissued as a mere curiosity. Mr. Fry gives just so much commentary as may assist the modern reader to gather the main lines of Reynolds's thought; he treats the subject-matter as being on the whole of direct contemporary reference, and, without searching too deeply into the historical and psychological genesis of the book, allows it to speak for itself as if it had a message to convey which needed no interpretation. This is the most important feature of the book's reappearance. A critic has been found to edit it who can see the merit of Reynolds's theories and yet retain his appreciation of Whistler or Simone Martini, of Utamaro or (following Mr. Bertrand Russell) the austere beauty of pure mathematics, and who, instead of condemning Reynolds because he could not give so high a place to Van Eyck as modern taste would demand, endeavours so to stretch his author's theories as to allow them to include the modern favourites. Certainly the world appears to be coming round to an earlier position, and it will soon be left to the sacristans of the remotest foreign cathedrals to apologise to English tourists for the existence of any art later than that of the fourteenth century.

Reynold's Discourses are indeed a long way away from either the criticism of Ruskin or the modern revolt from that school. There is little in them of the glorification of the more scientific side of painting, little of that delight in the mere play of light and colour, of atmosphere and distance, with which for the modern world painting has mainly to deal. All these things Reynolds classes under the head of the merely ornamental kind of painting, and if he had been reproached with the omission he would have answered that they lay within the province of his friend the "Professor of Painting." His work lies nearer Ruskin's, but with a difference. As President of the newly-founded Academy it was his duty to pronounce an annual discourse for the encouragement and the edification of the students. His task it was to set forth the highest aims of pictorial art, and to point out to his listeners a road which led to far loftier heights than even those to which he could himself attain. He wished to separate and distinguish the styles of painting which he thought incompatible with one another and to encourage the youthful aspirant to aim at the highest of these. Being a child of a reflective age he was bound to give his reasons for his choice of one style as the greatest, to prove by those immutable laws of reason with which the eighteenth century was so familiar that one definite idea of painting was nobler than the rest. Being himself a painter and a student, his chief aim was to reconcile the study of nature with the creation of the most perfect form of art. Hence his fifteen Discourses deal not with the beauty of pigment, or the ultimate importance of values and tones, but, with long discussion and glorification, of the great historical and epic painting—of, in a word, the Grand Style.

As to the nature of the Grand Style the reader of the Discourses may easily find himself somewhat confused.

During fifteen years Reynolds's taste may easily have changed, and there is no great wonder if under the superficial unity of style and words there lie a hundred inconsistencies of thought. During these fifteen years Reynolds was steadily working on a plane which was confessedly lower than the level of his annual exhortation, and losing himself in various enthusiasms for painters whose work, once a year, he was bound to criticise coldly and prove to be in style irreconcilable with the noblest art. In the last Discourse enthusiasm for once gains the upper hand, and Michelangelo emerges as the one master of the Grand Style with none of the reserves which mark the earlier references to his name. But in the earlier and more reasoned Discourses the claim to the Grand Style is shared between the Roman, the Florentine and the Bolognese schools and, though Mr. Fry in one place gives to the last named all the credit, the criticism of individual painters in different places shows that no single school or painter held undisputed sway in Reynolds's mind.

The truth is that even for Reynolds the Grand Style was a pure ideal. It was partly, also, a tradition, but a tradition of a golden age which in reality far surpassed any actual performance. Reynolds was of too critical, too nicely balanced a mind to find the perfection of which he spoke in any single master until, gifted with some of the antique inspiration which foreshadows death, he poured all his enthusiastic fancies into his imaginary picture of Michelangelo's achievement.

Had he been constant throughout to Michelangelo, accepting his limitations, enforcing his accidental qualities as central virtues, and preaching a view of the world on the authority of the master, perhaps the discourses would be more logical and better reasoned. But as it is, he forms a general ideal and endeavours to fit it upon a general philosophy. The result is not successful. His notion of a "general nature" to which the Grand Style corresponds is not only confused and doubtful in itself, but it fails to prove the particular case. If the Grand Style is good merely because it is a reflection of generalised nature, of the ideal in the proper sense of the term, every generalisation is equally valuable. But Reynolds slips too easily from the true notion that the ideal is necessarily dignified to the fallacy that the dignified must be ideal. His effort to identify nature with "that which pleases" is an embarkation on a dangerous theory and does not save the situation, and if he escapes the fallacy of considering the full-bottomed wig of Rigaud to be more dignified than the peasant's dress of Ostade, he does not see that a Roman statesman in a toga is on his hypothesis no more dignified than a beggar of Velasquez in rags. To prove a theory of "higher types" demands more metaphysical thought than Reynolds was capable of, and though his instinct may have been right he fails not infrequently to distinguish the ideal of the Grand Style from the practice of the Grand Manner.

But the fact that the Grand Style is an ideal wider than any conception which Reynolds could form of it, only makes the Discourses more valuable in their effect. His aim to reconcile the Grand Style with a study of nature led him into metaphysical fallacies too numerous to discuss here, but the intention is good and it has one inestimable result. He is saved from the merely academic attitude which refuses to depart from one conventional view of the world and merely elaborates and over-elaborates the accidents and the exaggerations of a tradition. By insisting upon the ultimate basis of the Grand Style in nature he encourages artists to study from what they see, and to learn from other artists not so much a way of treating it as a way of understanding it. This is an aspect of the Discourses which scarcely receives full credit, and indeed it is overlaid with doctrines, such as that of improving nature, or that of avoiding "particular" detail, which may easily mislead the reader, as they did the author. It is not easy to say what effect these Discourses have had upon English art, but it is reasonable to hope that the real result of Reynolds's words has been to stimulate in painters a desire to find the ideal in nature, rather than to produce the pompous historical absurdities which take shelter under the name of the Grand Style.

For the present day, on the contrary, the insistence upon the mere dignity of the Grand Style as Reynolds understood it is not without its value. Even for him the appreciation of the great painters of the Renaissance was a matter of cultivation and training (Discourse xv.). In these days it is almost dead among those who most lay claim to cultivated taste. For a hundred who will pour indiscriminate praise upon some over-expressed abortion of the school of Botticelli, there will be found only one who can discern merit in a Raphael or a Titian. The lisping of an early period sounds pleasanter in modern ears than the touch of exuberance which belongs to maturity. Not only have we become so fond of the mannerists of an early period that we cannot look upon the mannerists of a later, but there are very many who are blind to the easy performance of an art which had a power so complete that it could express itself without mannerisms and exaggeration. They have become so afraid of rhetoric that to gain a hearing an artist must positively stammer. To such as these the study of Reynolds's words will prove beneficial; while the more discerning critics of the present day, those who have eyes only for the strictly pictorial qualities, will not be harmed by a restatement of the doctrine that the value of art depends to some extent on the selection of the subject as well as on the selection of the features by which it is represented.

These are the considerations which make the appearance of this book important. As a work of æsthetics the philosophy is too vapid to be of any value. It has no greater importance in the sphere of art criticism than Shaftesbury's "Characteristics" in the sphere of ethics. But in art, as in ethics, the value of a book does not depend entirely upon its metaphysical basis, and this book is near enough to us to speak directly to those who are not interested in or capable of discussing the more abstruse questions of art. Mr. Fry has not treated it as such. Those who come to this edition for a thoroughgoing analysis of the principles of art will not be satisfied; nor will those who ask for an elaborate investigation into the origin of the theories put forward in it. Mr. Fry has paid the book a greater compliment by letting it speak for itself, and in his introductions to the various discourses and above all in his little notes to the illustrations he has shown himself to be imbued with all the better side of Reynolds's catholic criticism, besides proving himself an independent critic, whose observations are pregnant, illuminating and just.

MUSIC

CHRISTMAS MUSIC

A DISCUSSION of the relative values of the work of those two contemporary giants—Bach and Handel—has occupied both English and German critics for a period of over two hundred years, and so long as its main theme was which should be the greater, it was doomed to an endlessly futile existence. In England, at any rate, it has unfortunately generally taken that form, and for the first hundred and fifty years after the death of Handel, critics were occupied in the construction of the most elaborate arguments in support of the popular opinion that Handel was the greatest musician that the world had ever seen or ever could see, and that Bach must consequently be less. One of the most notable exponents of these arguments was Dr. Charles Burney, with whom the only intimation that there can be another side to the question lies in the extreme care with which he develops his argument from his rather insecure premisses, which are in fact a knowledge of Handel and an ignorance of Bach. It was not till the nineteenth century was well advanced, and Sterndale Bennett and others had carried into England the good work of Bach-revival, inaugurated by Mendelssohn in Germany, that English critics had an opportunity of coming to a more just conclusion, and among the mid-victorians we find Hullah still summing up in favour of Handel, but with a musicianly appreciation of Bach which is very different from the attitude of the worthy Doctor of the eighteenth century. Nowadays Bach is known everywhere as the musician's musician, and his intimate and personal attitude in his great choral works is taking such hold upon others, who are not musicians, that we are sometimes in danger of doing an injustice to Handel. We have so recently arrived at the full enjoyment of the intricate method of "Kommt, ihr Töchter," the great double-chorus which begins the Mattheus "Passion," that we lose sight of the genius which the construction of so perspicuous a work as "I will sing unto the Lord" ("Israel in Egypt") demanded.

We shall do well then, for the time being at any rate, to set aside this comparison of achievements, and try to learn something from a comparison of the methods of these two musical heroes. The subject is such an immense one that I should not venture to embark upon it in so short a space, were it not that Christmas time suggested one very obvious example from which a comparison may be drawn, which is more or less typical of the choral work of both masters. There are probably comparatively few church-going Londoners who have not recently heard the scene in the Messiah which begins with the Pastoral Symphony followed by the recitatives telling the story of the shepherds, and the "Glory to God" chorus, or the similar scene which forms part ii. of Bach's "Christmas Oratorio." I chanced to hear both sung on Christmas Eve, so that a comparison of the two was forced upon me. To begin with, the two pastoral symphonies illustrate completely the difference of attitude of Handel and Bach towards instrumental music. Both are written in the flowing 12-8 rhythm proper to "pastorale" movements of the time, but otherwise they have nothing of form or texture in common. Handel's, as is well known, is a melody in C major for strings, it has a simple contrasting section in the key of the dominant and returns with an exact repetition to the first section, and is in all thirty-two bars in length. To give as complete an analysis of Bach's would fill more space than this paper may occupy, so intricate is its working out, so indescribable its contrasts of tone in the dainty duets between oboes and strings, which are its chief charm. It begins in G major and works through the related keys using the same material, and sustaining the artless melodic character of the music through an exhaustive artistic treatment. Handel's was the realistic or dramatic method. His aim was to find such a tune as simple people might really play for pleasure, and he found it and expressed it through the simple medium of the strings. Bach's method one may call the descriptive one. He had nothing to do with real shepherds, or what they might actually enjoy or play. He wished to build up in terms of his art a picture, or rather an impression, of a sweet and open countryside life, untroubled, pursuing the even tenour of its way unamazed amid simple beauty. Each achieved his end with consummate success, but a close examination of the two shows the futility of the attempts to judge between them. Handel's is almost pure genius; Bach's the fusion of genius with art.

In the vocal scene which follows, the same characteristics afford another example of the contrast. Handel gives the narration of events to the soprano soloist and hurries through the text to reach the dramatic climax of the angelic chorus. One must here notice that his recitative both in declamatory force and in the elaboration of the string accompaniment rises to a great dramatic height, and loses all trace of the perfunctoriness which so often spoils his work in this direction. When the chorus is reached, the utterances of "Glory to God" and "Peace on Earth" are simple and terse, but immensely effective; there is little or no contrapuntal skill involved, but the pictorial result is vivid. He withholds the basses from the first utterances for the sake of a greater climax to come, and the orchestral ending with its gradual diminuendo, its staccato chords and little fluttering shakes in the treble, is a childlike description of angel wings disappearing gradually behind clouds, which makes a very definite appeal to the love of scenic effect. Throughout, the dramatic action has been so all-important to him that he could not pause to ponder over the inner significance of what he had to relate. When all is over he does so to some extent in the aria, "Rejoice Greatly." Lovers of the "Messiah" coming fresh to the Christmas Oratorio wonder that Bach should so break the thread of the story. His recitative has none of the excitement of Handel's. It tells of the appearance of the Angel of the Lord and the fear of the shepherds, and he immediately digresses to a chorale which contemplates this wonderful revelation. Again, the news of the birth of the Saviour introduces an aria which bids the shepherds haste to meet him, and the sign that the Babe is to be found lying in a manger is followed by the well-known and lovely Slumber Song. By the time that is ended we have forgotten all about the shepherds and the angels, and a short recitative recalls us, that we may listen to the angelic chorus. This again is as different as possible from Handel's and differs much as do the two pastoral symphonies. The score is a wonderful piece of vocal and orchestral counterpoint, its details absolutely baffling the listener at a first hearing. It is an extraordinary illustration of the words, "And suddenly there was with the Angel a multitude of the Heavenly Host." It is multitudinous in effect, voice piled on voice, climax upon climax. From the musician's standpoint Handel's treatment of the words palls before it, so gorgeous is this outpouring of celestial song. Only in point of dramatic fitness, the end which Handel set himself, can his work hold its own against this. After the chorus the whole of part ii. of the Christmas Oratorio is magnificently summed up by a chorale, into the orchestral part of which the themes of the pastoral sympathy are interwoven.

How utterly different were the ends which these two sought one can only fully appreciate by a comparison of such points as these, where at first sight they appear to be upon common ground. Their widely differing methods were justified by the appropriateness of each to the end in view. Bach missed the opportunity of a grand dramatic situation to make us the richer by his "Slumber Beloved"; Handel, discarding all side issues, hastened to bring the announcement of the gospel of "Goodwill towards men" vividly before his hearers. In this comparison is found the germ of the two types of music which later, diverging more widely, have led to so much discussion and partisanship—the symphonic and dramatic, the "absolute" and 'programme.' Hence Bach is the father of the one, as Handel at any rate laid the foundations for the other. Both have a truly noble ancestry, and there is one point worth noting, that they are to some extent dependent upon one another. The Christmas Oratorio containing so graphic a chorus as "Glory to God" cannot be considered wholly contemplative, and no one could maintain that the best parts of the "Messiah" are wholly dramatic, but when dealing with facts or narrative Handel's vision was realistic as Bach's was idealistic; Handel saw Heaven open before him, Bach made a Heaven upon Earth.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THERE is, of course, a general slackness at present in the publishing world, but a few books of interest are announced. Messrs. Longmans have in the press a new edition of "Lay Down Your Arms!" Mr. T. Holmes's translation of the Baroness von Suttner's "Die Waffen nieder," to which we referred in our remarks on the Nobel Peace award in THE ACADEMY of December 16. The story, which in part embodies the experiences of the authoress herself, is a picture of the horrors of war as affecting both the soldiers themselves and those whom they leave behind them at home, and of the terrible depression into which the continent of Europe has been plunged by the conflicts of the Great Powers. Baroness Suttner's object is to awaken the attention of all thinking persons to the evils of this condition, and to the possibility of finding a remedy for it in the voluntary establishment of arbitration tribunals and in mutual disarmament.—The same publishers announce two volumes of interest to the specialist, by L. Oppenheim, LL.D., lecturer on International Law at the London School of Economics and Political Science (University of London). The first of these—to be ready this month—is "International Law: a Treatise," the second "War and Neutrality."—Messrs. Longmans also announce "Lectures on Early English History" (a series of lectures delivered by Bishop Stubbs when Professor of Modern History in the University of Oxford) and the first volume of Mr. James Mackinnon's "History of Modern Liberty."

To commemorate the approaching two-hundredth anniversary of Benjamin Franklin's birth, Messrs. Macmillan promise "The Writings of Benjamin Franklin" in ten octavo volumes, two of which are ready. The works have been collected and edited, with the inevitable introduction and notes, by Albert H. Smyth.—Messrs. Macmillan will also publish shortly "The History of American Art," by Samuel Isham, which forms the third of the series of books on American art which Professor Van Dyke is editing.—Students of Spanish history will welcome Dr. H. C. Lea's "The Inquisition of Spain," in four volumes, the first of which is promised, by the same publishers, early in the New Year.—Mr. Jesse Benedict Carter is publishing with Messrs. Macmillan an interesting work entitled "The Religion of Numa, and other Essays on the Religion of Ancient Rome." There are five essays, the first dealing with the period before the Tarquins: the second "The Reorganisation of Servius," with the period in which the Greek influence began to make itself felt in the life of Rome; the third, "The Coming of the Sibyl," with the first three centuries of the republic; the fourth, "The Decline of Faith," with the closing centuries of the republic; and the fifth with the early empire and "The Augustan Renaissance."

Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish this month the fifth volume of Mr. Swinburne's Tragedies (containing Loqrine, The Sisters, Marino Faliero, and Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards) thus completing their Library Edition.—Mr. Murray has an interesting book from the pen of Mr. Warrington Smyth in the press, the title of which will be "Mast and Sail in Europe and Asia," and another work promised by the same publisher in "Our Waterways," by Mr. Urquhart A. Forbes and Mr. W. H. R. Ashford.—Messrs. Chapman and Hall announce a book by Mr. Butler Burke dealing with his discovery of radiobes. The title is "The Origin of Life and its Physical Basis and Definition."—The second volume of Mr. Francis Bumpus's "Cathedrals of England and Wales" will be issued shortly by Mr. T. Werner Laurie. It deals with Canterbury, York, St. Paul's, Winchester, Norwich, Peterborough, Exeter and Wells. It will be remembered that it was Mr. Bumpus's original intention to complete his study in two volumes. The limits, however, proved too confined, and a third volume, closing with the recently founded cathedrals of Southwark and Birmingham, will follow.—Mr. T. Fisher Unwin has in the press a translation of Professor Strasburger's "Rambles on the Riviera."

Messrs. Jarrold have ready and will publish shortly a history of "The Norwich School of Painting." The book gives detailed accounts of the lives of over thirty Norwich painters from "Old Crowe" to Mr. A. W. Walker. Complete lists of their exhibits in Norwich and in London are given, and the book is well illustrated.—We are glad to hear that Messrs. Headley are about to issue a reprint of the Life of Thomas Elwood, the Quaker friend of Milton, and a constant visitor to the poet when, "inferior to the vilest now become," he fled before the plague to Chalfont St.

Giles.—A work of considerable local importance announced by Mr. Alexander Gardner of Paisley is a "History of the County of Renfrew from the Earliest Times" which has been prepared by Dr. W. M. Metcalfe.—Mr. John Lane has in the press an art book by Mr. A. F. Calvert, "Moorish Remains in Spain," which will be ready shortly, and Messrs. Putnam announce the English translation of M. Barine's "Louis XIV. et La Grande Mademoiselle."—It would seem that there is to be no end to the books about beautiful women of other days. Mr. Nash is about to publish "Famous Beauties of Two Reigns." Mrs. C. J. Ffoulkes is the writer.

Turning to novels, perhaps the most important announcement is Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton's long-delayed novel, "Carniola," which will be published soon by Messrs. Harper.—"The Portreeve" is the title of a new novel by Mr. Eden Phillpotts which Messrs. Methuen are bringing out. It deals, of course, with Dartmoor.—When three-volume novels were in vogue, Mrs. F. E. Penny, whose "Sanyasi" and "Dilys" we recall with delight, wrote one called "Caste and Creed." It has been rewritten, and Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish it in ordinary six-shilling form.—The same firm announce a new book by Mr. Arnold Bennett, entitled "Hugo." Mr. Bennett describes it as a "fantasia on modern themes."—"Rose at Honeypot" is the title of a novel by Mrs. Mary E. Mann which Messrs. Methuen will issue shortly.—Mr. Somerset Maugham is publishing with Messrs. Chapman and Hall a story of clerical life, in part cynical and in part humorous, called "The Bishop's Apron."

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ELECTRA OF EURIPIDES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with interest Professor Tyrrell's review of Dr. Gilbert Murray's version of the Electra. No one, perhaps, is better qualified than your reviewer to judge in how far Dr. Murray has succeeded, but I should like to add, if I am not trespassing on your space, a few quotations which strike me as being particularly good: e.g., Electra's cry as she thinks on her exiled brother:

Brother, brother, on some far shore
Hast thou a city, is there a door
That knows thy footfall, Wandering One?
Who left me, left me, when all our pain
Was bitter about us, a father slain,
And a girl that wept in her room alone.
Thou couldst break me this bondage sore,
Only thou, who art far away,
Loose our father, and wake once more. . .
Zeus, Zeus, dost hear me pray? . . .
The sleeping blood and the shame and the doom!
O feet that rest not, over the foam
Of distant seas, come home, come home!

In Electra's reproach to her mother too, Dr. Murray succeeds admirably in conveying all the pent-up hatred which has accumulated through the years spent with her peasant husband in weary drudgery in the lonely hut among the hills, brooding over Agamemnon's death:

Would God that He had made thee clean of soul!
Helen and thou—O, face and form were fair,
Meet for men's praise; but sisters twain ye were,
Both things of naught, a stain on Castor's star.
And Helen slew her honour, borne afar
In wilful ravishment: but thou didst slay
The highest man of the world. And now wilt say
'Twas wrought in justice for thy child laid low
At Aulis? . . . Ah, who knows thee as I know? . . .
None but I, thy child, could so
Watch thee in Hellas: none but I could know
Thy face of gladness when our enemies
Were strong, and the swift cloud upon thine eyes
If Troy seemed falling, all thy soul keen-set Praying that he might come no more! . . . And ye
It was so easy to be true. A king
Was thine, not feebler, not in anything
Below Aegisthus; one whom Hellas chose
For chief beyond all kings. Aye, and God knows,
How sweet a name in Greece, after the sin
Thy sister wrought, lay in thy ways to win.
Ill deeds make fair ones shine, and turn thereto
Men's eyes.—Enough: but say he wronged thee; slew
By craft thy child:—what wrong had I done, what
The babe Orestes? Why didst render not Back unto us, the children of the dead,

Our father's portion? Must thou heap thy bed
With gold of murdered men, to buy to thee
Thy strange man's arms? Justice! Why is not h
Who cast Orestes out, cast out again?
Not slain for me whom doubly he hath slain,
In living death, more bitter than of old
My sister's?

Orestes' cry after the murder of Clytemnestra gains, if anything, by Dr. Murray's translation:

O Dark of the Earth, O God
Thou to whom all is plain;
Look on my sin, my blood,
This horror of dead things twain:
Gathered as one they lie
Slain; and the slayer was I,
I, to pay for my pain!

And he has caught just the spirit of the original in his rendering of Orestes' words, half of remorse, half of sorrow, as he conjures up the vision of the murder:

Saw'st thou her raiment there,
Sister, there in the blood?
She drew it back as she stood,
She opened her bosom bare,
She bent her knees to the earth,
The knees that bent in my birth . . .
And I . . . Oh, her hair, her hair . . .

It is one of the best passages in a translation which will appeal almost as much to those who do not know Greek as to those who do.

When the vision of Castor and Polydeuces appears, and Castor addresses Orestes, Dr. Murray does not fail to do justice to Euripides:

Righteous is her doom this day,
But not thy deed. And Phoebus, Phoebus. . . Nay;
He is my lord; therefore I hold my peace.
Yet though in light he dwell, no light was this
He showed to thee, but darkness! Which do thou Endure, as man must, chafing not. And now
Fare forth where Zeus and Fate have laid thy life.
The maid Electra thou shalt give for wife
To Pylades; then turn thy head and flee
From Argos' land. 'Tis never more for thee
To tread this earth where thy dead mother lies.

Orestes is to go to the hill in Athens where Ares was tried by the gods for the murder of Halirrhothius, and:

There shalt thou stand arraigned of this blood;
And of those judges half shall lay on thee
Death, and half pardon; so shalt thou go free.
For Phoebus in that hour, who bade thee shed
Thy mother's blood, shall take on his own head
The stain thereof. And ever from that strife
The law shall hold, that when, for death or life
Of one pursued, men's voices equal stand,
Then Mercy conquereth. . . .
Up, gird thee now to the steep Isthmian way,
Seeking Athena's blessed rock; one day,
Thy doom of blood fulfilled and this long stress
Of penance past, thou shalt have happiness.

I have never considered the Electra "The meanest of Greek tragedies," but, though my contempt for Schlegel's childish strictures is as great as Professor Tyrrell's, I have hitherto regarded it as weak. Dr. Gilbert Murray has converted me.

DUNCAN MCCOMBIE.

LYRICAL BALLADS, FIRST EDITION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In his Causerie on Wordsworth and Barron Field, in the ACADEMY of December 23, Professor Knight writes, of Joseph Cottle and the "Lyrical Ballads" of 1798: "He parted with the book as soon as it was issued, and there is no existing copy of it that I have seen with his name on the imprint. All have Arch's name." This remark is likely to mislead students unlearned in the bibliography of Wordsworth's poems. In point of fact we hear of three copies of the "Lyrical Ballads" of 1798 with the Bristol title-page, which runs as follows:

Lyrical Ballads, with a few other Poems. Bristol: Printed by Biggs and Cottle for T. N. Longman, Paternoster-Row, London. 1798.

The first of these is the copy mentioned by the late Mr. R. H. Shepherd, in his "Bibliography of Coleridge," as having been lent by the owner to the publisher of the four-volume edition of Coleridge's Poems issued in 1877—the late Mr. Basil Montagu Pickering. This copy, which, according to the testimony of Mr. Shepherd, contained manuscript additions to "The Ancient Mariner" in the autograph of S.T.C., seems to have disappeared; at least, its whereabouts has eluded my search. The second copy with the Bristol title-page is that formerly belonging to Robert Southey, which now lies in the British Museum. Of this a tolerably full and accurate account will be found in the Bibliographical Note prefixed to the Centenary Edition of the "Lyrical Ballads" published by Duckworth and Co., 1898. The third copy is in my possession, and is fully described in my letter to the Athenaeum of January 14, 1899, headed "Lyrical Ballads, 1798."

There is one interesting feature common to Southey's copy and my own, which has never yet, I believe, been pointed out. The last stanza on page 19 (ll. 199, 200 of "The Ancyent Marinere") runs:

With never a whisper in the Sea
Oft [sic] darts the Spectre-ship;

In every copy with Arch's title-page that I have examined—and I have examined many—the "t" of "Oft" has been altered, evidently with a pen, to an "f." In no single copy save Southey's and my own is "Oft" to be found without this correction. The alteration was therefore, we may fairly infer, made not by Cottle, but by the London publishers, J. and A. Arch, of Gracechurch Street.

Cottle's account of the circumstances attending the publication of the "Lyrical Ballads" is clearly apocryphal. Here, as often elsewhere, his memory has betrayed him. The little book was never, in the strict sense of the word, published at Bristol at all. At the very most, a few presentation copies were sent out by Cottle, and of these, as we have seen, two if not three are still extant. Virtually the entire lot was sold to the house of Arch, and this long before any review of the book had appeared. "Possibly," writes Mr. Hutchinson (Centenary Ed. "L. B.," p. lv), "Cottle hoped that Longman would take the whole impression, as he seems to have done in the case of the second edition of 'Joan of Arc'; and may, with this in view, have obtained leave to place Longman's name, as London publisher, on the title-page. But Longman had found cause to repent his bargain over 'Joan,' and—says Coleridge, writing to Southey, December 24, 1799 ("Letters of S.T.C." p. 319)—was indisposed to similar negotiations. Anyhow, whether disappointed with Longman or not, Cottle sold practically the whole impression to Arch; and so promptly, that Wordsworth, who on September 15 wrote begging Cottle to transfer his interest in the book to Johnson of Saint Paul's Churchyard, was informed in reply that this could not be done, the first impression being already otherwise disposed of." The book, it should be observed, had appeared on or about the first of the month.

R. A. POTTS.

MODERN IRISH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Miss Barlow's suggestion is not quite clear, but as it is to benefit those ignorant of Irish, it looks as if she wishes Gaelic names and words to be written according to English orthography only when quoted in an English context. If so, it is singular she should be unaware that until recently such was the common practice. For instance, every one used to write the equivalent for James as Shamus, until one of our most brilliant humorists, Seumas MacManus, brought into fashion the pedantically correct Seumas; and even he has not yet ventured to "restore" his surname, which remains MacManus, instead of MacMaghnusa. On the other hand, if Miss Barlow wants to re-spell the entire Gaelic language, I must point out that the experiment has already been tried, with the Manx dialect, with results too discouraging to warrant its repetition. The fact is, those "aspirated" consonants, which so vex the Saxon, are ticklish things to meddle with. Miss Barlow says the th is "mute," but to my ear it is at least as forcible as the English h, and it has the additional peculiarity of sharpening adjacent consonants. Take, for example, the verb sgriobh, to write. Its past participle is sgriobhta, which is not called skreeva, but skreefa. Similarly, the name Dubhthach is not called Duvach, but Duffach, whence comes the surname Duffy. Obviously the th is not "mute" as long as it is capable of producing such effects and for my part I cannot see that any orthography could be framed, better adapted to express the idiosyncrasies of Gaelic than that which has grown up with it.

JAMES PLATT, JUN.

STUDIES IN POETRY AND CRITICISM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In Mr. Ongley's letter in your last week's issue, one cannot help noting that he is as full of Matthew Arnold as an egg is of meat. But joking apart, it is questionable in these days when old truths are becoming startlingly new and new truths discovered to be wonderfully old that Matthew Arnold can be taken as an authority on matters pertaining to life's emotion, and by emotion I mean poetry. Matthew Arnold was only M.A. after all, a lettered man but by reason of this a very much fettered man who sadly wanted much more of the emotion and spirit of life than of his rule of thumb and three-fourths conduct. He was not the stamp of a man who could rightly understand life. He was too staid, too comfortable, and altogether too mediocre in fire and intensity to grip much of that life which is hidden under the name "Jesus Christ."

Study poetry as we will, eat and drink of it as we may, the more earnest we become in the direction of self-preservation, the more we discover, not without some misgiving, that poetry in the domain of Art lacks the power that can sustain and keep sustained the soul-life in its every fickle mood. More and more the certain few and great in quality of mind are discovering those living ideas which are secreted within the Mystery which has been revealed by Paul and Eastern Occultism. Until Mr. Ongley understands the inner mysticism of this Mystery, until he discovers more of himself in himself and less of Matthew Arnold, the poets of the world will "slake" his doubtlessly fastidious thirst. Let him not take life seriously as regards the values of philosophies, creeds, and poetries, but, rather let him develop or overlap self in the mysticism which satisfactorily proves the truth of being "born again." The spirit reached, all else must be all but wayside straws, useful in a bohemian moment to clear the pipe that was laid aside apparently for ever—last night.

Polwarth, Edinburgh.

ROBERT MACGREGOR.

THE "CARFAX" SCHOOL

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not know that a difference of opinion between myself and your critic B. S. can be of much interest to your readers, but in an age when every one, even the artist, is allowed to write about art, I claim the same privilege for a dealer. In a wide experience I have never met a real artist who disliked or distrusted his own talent or eyesight, but many who disliked and distrusted their own period and environment. Nor have I ever met a critic suffering from this superfluous modesty. The capacity for ignoring one's period and environment forms part of the equipment of the artist. In this respect the landscape painter has a great advantage; without an effort he can dispense with the contemporary or the ephemeral: hence the superb æsthetic value of great landscape. Except to students of painting the pictures of Claude tell us nothing of the seventeenth century, those of Corot nothing of 1830 or Hernani; those of Turner nothing of the dismal England of 1840; and the art of Mr. Wilson Steer is, I am glad to say, unstained even by the politics of the Chantrey Bequest. The future generation will see in him the noble successor, not in name only, of Richard Wilson. With portraiture it is, alas! different. Portraiture strangled the English School. Period and environment thrust themselves on the artist. The thought of them irked Sir Joshua Reynolds and may cause some fretting to-day. At the completion of a portrait few artists remain on speaking terms with their clients. Photography has however removed some of the burden, and a great artist such as Whistler or Shannon, is able by the force of his genius to divorce even his sitters from contemporary life, and to obtain probate for them from posterity. In other modes of painting, religious or allegorical, I think we esteem artists in proportion to the success with which they have evaded anything contemporary. The ceiling of the Sistine tells us little of the Papal Court, and the Paradiso of Fra Angelico nothing about Cosimo de Medici. The Dutch genre school is of course an exception, and hence it is always a predominating influence with second-rate painters of every generation.

With regard to the charge of archaism brought against the "Carfax" School, I would point out that the same charge was brought against the Pre-Raphaelites, and with perfect justice. If they showed more emulation of a spirit than a manner, it was because they had not learnt the manner. The life and art of Rossetti, as of his pupil Burne-Jones, show a passionate anxiety to get away from a period and environment, and what Millais became when he succumbed to them, I leave B. S., himself a distinguished painter, to determine.

As Mr. Charles Shannon's technique has more relation to that of Giorgione than of Winterhalter, and his spirit more to that of Holbein than the intermediary Frank Holl, by all means let him be called archaistic. Better to err with Pope! The whole history of Art however is witness to a constant reversion to earlier conventions. Pasiteles and Menelaus started a Pre-Raphaelite revival in the Roman age. Egypt, China and Japan are rich in archaistic movements. A re-perusal of the written words of Cozens, Hogarth, Reynolds, and painters who were also critics, will, I think, convince B. S. that convention is only truth with a style. Truth, like other conventions, becomes exhausted and artists constantly return therefore to fresher principles. Tiepolo, ignoring his own century and its predecessor, reverted to that of Veronese, both in manner and spirit. Whistler is an example of my other contention; as an artist he was able to suppress the mountebank in himself, that very contemporary side of his character. Since 1851 English art has I fear been a convalescent invalid, and physicians are always prophesying her demise. She rallies wonderfully. What I regard as the remedy, B. S. diagnoses as the disease. Mr. Tonks, who adorns two professions, will perhaps decide better than we can, as he is a sufferer, it seems, from angina archaistica pictoris.

R. R.

(Manager of Carfax & Co., Ltd.)

SIMEON SOLOMON

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

[Our contributor writes: Your correspondent E. R. B. can obtain from Mr. Hollyer a full list of all the early drawings and pictures which were first photographed and published by him. Love dying from the Breath of Lust is certainly among them, and I think the Antinous.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Lord Randolph Churchill.* By Winston Spencer Churchill. 2 vols. Macmillan, 36s. net. (See p. 5.)
Seymour Vandeleur. The story of a British officer: being a memoir of Brevet-Lieutenant-Colonel Vandeleur, D.S.O., Scots Guards and Irish Guards, with a general description of his campaigns. By Colonel F. I. Maxse. With water-colour illustrations by Nico Jungman, and 9 maps. 10×7½. Pp. 288. The National Review Office, 12s. 6d. net. (See p. 12.)

The School of Suffering: a brief Memorial of Mary E. E. Moule. By her Father, Handley, Bishop of Durham. With a portrait. 7½ × 5. Pp. 125. S.P.C.K., 1s. 6d.

DRAMA.

Sauter, Edwin. The Faithless Favourite, a Mixed Tragedy, to which is appended a collection of detached trifles entitled Schediasm. 6½ × 4. Pp. 238. Saint Louis: Published by the Author at the Sign of the Leech.

EDUCATION.

Brereton, Cloudesley. The Teaching of Modern Languages: with special reference to big towns. 6¼ × 5½. Pp. 111.

[The subject-matter of this excellent little volume formed the substance of three lectures on the Teaching of Modern Languages delivered during the Lent Term of 1905 at the London School of Economics.]

FICTION.

Griffith, George. His Beautiful Client. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 238. White, 6s.
Sladen, Douglas. A Sicilian Marriage. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 308. White, 6s. (See p. 16.)

LITERATURE.

The Oxford English Dictionary. A new dictionary on historical principles, founded mainly on materials collected by the Philological Society. Edited by James A. H. Murray. Vol. viii.: Reign—Reserve. By W. A. Craigie. 13½ × 10½. Pp. 127. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 5s.

Archer-Hind, R. D. Translations into Greek Verse and Prose. 8 × 6. Pp. viii + 244. Cambridge University Press, 6s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Schoolmasters' Yearbook and Directory, 1906. (Fourth Annual Issue.) 7½ × 5. Pp. lxvi + 1018. Sonnenschein, 6s. net.

Hallard, Frank. Haeckel's Monism False. 8½ × 6. Pp. xiii + 605. Chas. H. Kelly, 5s. net.

[An examination of Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe," "The Wonders of Life," and "The Confession of Faith of a Man of Science," together with Mr. Joseph McCabe's "Haeckel's Critics Answered."] ]

Schofield, A. T. The Management of a Nerve Patient. 8 × 5½. Pp. 9 + 255. J. & A. Churchill, 5s. net.

The Catholic Directory: Ecclesiastical Register and Almanac for the year of our Lord 1906. Sixty-ninth annual publication. 7½ × 4½. Pp. xxviii + 638. Burns & Oates, 1s. 6d. net.

Fraser, Duncan. The Passing of the Precentor. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 116. Edinburgh: Published at John Knox's House by W. G. Hay.

To Modern Maidens. By a Modern Matron. 7½ × 5. Pp. 220. Edinburgh: Morton, 3s. 6d. net.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The Tragedies of Algernon Charles Swinburne. Vol. iv. Mary Stuart. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 268. Chatto & Windus, 6s. net.

Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis; Rape of Lucrece; Timon of Athens; Winter's Tale; Troilus and Cressida; Titus Andronicus; King Henry VI. (in three vols.); and King Henry VIII. Waistcoat Pocket Shakespeare, 2½ × 2. Treherne, 1s. net each.

Stoddard, Charles Warren. South Sea Idyls: Summer Cruising in the South Seas. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 319. Chatto & Windus, 6s. net.

Poems of Love. Edited by G. K. A. Bell. 6¼ × 4. Pp. xvi + 207. Routledge, 1s. net.

THEOLOGY.

"Sermons for the People." Second Series. Plain Sermons for the Christian Year. By various contributors. Vol. ii. Epiphany until Quinquagesima. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 213. S.P.C.K.

Carmichael, F. F. Sermons on Different Subjects. 7½ × 5. Pp. 124. Dublin: Hodges, Figgis & Co. 6d. net.

Elar, G. G. The Apocalypse, the Antichrist and the End. 7½ × 5. Pp. 379. Burns & Oates, 5s.

Hall, William. Via Crucis. 7½ × 5. Pp. 343. Routledge, 3s. 6d.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Moncrieff, A. R. Hope. The World of To-day. Vol. iv. 10¼ × 7½. Pp. 266. The Gresham Publishing Company.

[ "A survey of the lands and peoples of the globe as seen in travel and commerce." ]

De Guerville, A. B. New Egypt. 9¼ × 5½. Pp. xiv + 360. Heinemann, 16s. net.

THE BOOKSHELF

FROM Messrs. Dent we have received two books on Florence. Notable Pictures in Florence by Edith Harwood (4s. 6d. net) is a cheap and useful book for laymen visiting the churches and picture-galleries of Florence. The first few pages are taken up with a short and sensible sketch of the history of Italian painting. Then follow descriptions of pictures by upwards of eighty painters, from Cimabue to Canaletto. The painters are taken in alphabetical order, and the present site of each picture is noted. A short biographical notice of each painter is given, followed by a fairly detailed account of the "story" of the pictures, and a few critical remarks. The letterpress, like the numerous small reproductions in the text, is intended to help the visitor in identifying and recollecting the pictures. Although the book is designed mainly as an introduction to the study of the Italian renaissance in art, it describes also many works by foreign artists, such as Holbein, Rubens, Dürer, Van Dyke, Velasquez and Murillo. The interest of Florentine Palaces and their Stories by Janet Ross (6s. net) is chiefly historical. A section is devoted to each Palazzo, giving the history of the families with whom it is connected and narrating any important or striking events associated with it. The style is somewhat dry, but the book is none the less a delightful one to dip into here and there. The stories and anecdotes range from the most sombre and bloody tragedy to romance and buffoonery. Here may be read much of the political history of Florence, as, for instance, in the sections which deal with the Palazzo Pitti, the Palazzo del Podestà, and the Palazzo Vecchio; or the story of Ginevra Amieri, who after being married against her will, was accidentally buried alive, and escaped and married the man she loved; or how Guido de' Cavalcanti was fastened, by a nail driven through his tunic while he was absorbed in a game of chess, to a seat in the loggia of the Palazzo Rucellai. The value of the book is increased by some thirty excellently clear and detailed drawings of the buildings by Adelaide Marchi.

Java: Facts and Fancies, by Augusta de Wit (Chapman and Hall, 14s. net) is a book of impressionist sketches of the Dutch Colony. The author sees in Java "an enchanted garden"—something "unspeakably tender, ethereal and soft"—and gives us some pleasant sketches of its people and social customs, though her style reminds us of that of the lady who wrote of "syncopated donkeys who blinked like sphinxes in the sun." The following sentence is typical: "Under a sky filmy with diaphanous fleecy texture, in which a tinge of the hidden blue was felt rather than seen, the sea had a pearly sheen, with here and there changefully flickering white lights, and wind-ruffled streaks of a pale violet."

Living Masters of Music—Edward Macdowell. By Laurance Gilman (Lane, 2s. 6d.).—We, in England, are at present so fully occupied with attempts to establish our musical reputation in the eyes of the world, that we can spare little attention to similar efforts of our American cousins, and hence it comes that most of us have never heard a note of music by so considerable a composer as Edward Macdowell. This shows how extremely narrow and insular our outlook remains, and everything, however slight, which tends to widen it is welcome. This little volume ought to do something in that direction. In spite of some annoyances of style, a love of high-sounding but little-meaning words and phrases, Mr. Gilman manages to depict the character of his subject's work in such a way as to convey a distinct impression. We wish that he would refrain from quoting contemporary critics so often. Mr. Ernest Newman's views on programme music are always interesting when spoken by himself; when expounded by Mr. Gilman they are wearisome. On that subject some words of Macdowell's quoted are worth hearing. He said of his symphonic poem, "Lancelot and Elaine": "I would never have insisted that . . . [it] need mean 'Lancelot and Elaine' to every one. It did to me, however, and in the hope that my artistic enjoyment might be shared by others, I added the title." It is right that such a memoir should be written by a whole-hearted admirer. Whether Mr. Gilman's high estimate of this composer's work will be ultimately justified, we in our insular ignorance cannot pretend to say. The best we can say for this book, which is as attractively illustrated and brought out as its predecessors in the same series, is that it leaves us with a keen desire to hear Macdowell's music, and an assurance that therein we shall find much to appreciate and enjoy when we get our opportunity.

It seems only a few days since that the football season commenced, but already Mr. Ayres has produced his Cricket Companion for 1906. Mr. Clairre's "Week by Week" is particularly interesting, and as a whole the book is an accurate and trustworthy one which every devotee of cricket should have on his table or near at hand for reference. It says much for the enterprise of the Editor that he should, at this early date, have included a list of fixtures for 1906.

From Messrs. Charles Letts and Co. we have received a number of Diaries for 1906, with each of which an Insurance coupon is given. A good feature of the small pocket diaries is the tablet by means of which the book will always open at the page last in use.—Messrs. John Walker and Co. also send us several excellent diaries, and a word of praise is due to Messrs. Bemrose's Monthly Diary.

THE HISTORY OF "THE FOURTH PARTY."

READY ON MONDAY NEXT

With a reproduction of the Cartoon of "THE FOURTH PARTY" from "Vanity Fair" as Frontispiece, and a facsimile letter from the late Lord Salisbury to Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE FOURTH PARTY

By HAROLD E. GORST,

With a Preface by SIR JOHN GORST, M.P.

*.* In writing this book Mr. Gorst has had access to the extensive private correspondence of Sir Henry Drummond Wolff with the members of the Fourth Party, and he has throughout derived first hand information from his father, Sir John Eldon Gorst, M.P.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 Waterloo Place, S.W.

Newnes' Thin Paper Classics

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ ins. 4 ins. and ¾ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present. Cloth, 3s. net; limp lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. Two vols.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON. 2 vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.

SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS' POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS'S DIARY.

KEATS'S POEMS.

POE'S TALES.

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by George Chapman.

HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by George Chapman.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL TO STELLA.

BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

THE NOVELS OF LAURENCE STERNE.

MARLOWE'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

"The 'Thin Paper Classics' is keeping well ahead of everything else we know of in its own particular line. The selection of works for it has never yet descended in standard from the highest; and yet it is as various and comprehensive as any reasonable mind could wish."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Drawings of the Great Masters

These Volumes contain about 48 Illustrations on a large scale. Many of the reproductions are printed in tints and mounted on a paper to harmonise with them. The books are bound in delicately tinted paper boards with vellum backs. The beautiful binding design of the series has been made by Mr. GRANVILLE FELL, and is printed in three colours.

4to, 7s. 6d. net each.

ALBRECHT DURER. By Dr. Hans Singer.

HOLBEIN. By A. L. Baldry.

"It is sure of a welcome. The reproductions are printed with unusual care."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

"The books are not too thick or heavy, but just large enough to give an appropriate rendering of detail and a fair reproduction to large compositions, and the plain grey bindings are excellently designed . . . the reproductions of these, some of them tinted, are especially fine."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Modern Master Draughtsmen

Uniform with "Drawings of the Great Masters"

7s. 6d. net each.

DRAWINGS BY SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. Martin Wood.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By Malcolm Bell.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. Martin Wood.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. L. Baldry.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. Hans Singer.

"Carefully selected and well reproduced . . . full of value to the student and of delight to those who can appreciate their delicate beauty of form and remarkable force of expression."—STUDIO.

Master Etchers

Uniform with "Drawings of the Great Masters"

7s. 6d. net.

MERYON. By Hugh Stokes.

Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts

Written by competent experts and providing information of really practical value to Collectors and Students, without perplexing the reader with unimportant and unnecessary details. Very particular attention has been paid to the illustrations, which are both numerous and of the highest quality; these are photographic reproductions from existing specimens, and where colour is necessary no expense has been spared to give the best possible representation.

Medium 8vo, 7s. 6d. net each.

NOW READY.

OLD PEWTER. By Malcolm Bell.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. Pitcairn Knowles.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By Frederick Fenn and B. Wyllie.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. Kendrick.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By Percy Bate.

IN THE PRESS.

FRENCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By Henri Frantz.

SHEFFIELD PLATE. By B. Wyllie.

"Will appeal strongly to collectors."—STANDARD.

"The illustrations are numerous and beautiful."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"From beginning to end it is always companionable, sincere, and instructive; we can imagine no more useful and agreeable volume."—BYSTANDER.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, LONDON, W.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated] [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.
Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.
Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.
OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.
SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.
Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—
The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

Every Day is Publishers' Day in the
WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.
TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

FROM MR. MELROSE'S LIST.

A SPUR TO SMITE. By G. B. LANCASTER.

TER, Author of "Sons o' Men." Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
THE EVENING STANDARD AND ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Mr. Lancaster writes of life in town and bush, amid the beauties of New Zealand and on the sun-baked shores of Samoa, with a living and breathing eloquence. . . . 'A Spur to Smite' is a book of great power and promise—it rises high out of the ruck of modern fiction. Mr. Lancaster has the right stuff in him."

Mr. W. L. COURTNEY in the DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Represents a further and more mature stage in Mr. Lancaster's literary career. He has learned many things in the interval—a sustained and continuous interest of plot, the value of a given design, careful analysis of character, and other things which ought to form part of the furniture of the novelist's mind. The strength, the force, the acuity remain, for still the taste on the palate is like some of those rough Colonial wines which savour of the young soil on which the grapes are grown. The book preserves its characteristic quality of literary work done by some eager, feverish writer, quite unhampered by the conditions of the past."

A HEART'S HARMONY: A Novel. By

ETHEL M. FORBES. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

"The great charm about this well-written love-story is the drawing of the character of the heroine—one of those delightfully breezy and original girls it is always a pleasure to read about—still more to meet. She creates her own atmosphere wherever she goes, and we find her personality the ever-dominating force. . . . The author has provided a book that is well worth reading."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"Hester is one of those characters that inevitably triumph over all difficulties, gifted with an unflinching sense of humour, cheerful determination, and able to find a refuge and sympathy in matters that less practical bodies would invariably reject in ignorance. It is a story in which nothing evil in thought or speech, nothing sordid or mean, is allowed to appear. The very simplicity and sincerity are points which enhance the interest of a book that may be read with confidence by all who care for an excellent piece of characterisation."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

SHAKESPERE'S MASTER-PAS-

SAGES. With specially Designed Title-page, 2s. net. A Guide in miniature, with a Treasury of One Hundred Specimens, selected by JOHN HOGGEN.

"Happily conceived and admirably carried out."—EVENING NEWS.
"An attractive and well-chosen selection—it is probable that the work could not have been better done."—GUARDIAN.

A GIRL'S GARDEN. By MARGARET M.

RANKIN. Beautifully illustrated. 2s. net.

"An altogether encouraging volume for any girl who has as much as a patch of ground to call her own. Countless are the hints it gives, constantly found lacking even in those detailed volumes which profess to tell the beginner everything. It will prove a revelation to girls of small means and little room for elaborate gardening arrangements."—BOOKMAN.

LATEST WORKS IN THEOLOGY.

THE INFANCY AND YOUTH OF

JESUS. By the Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A., Author of "The Crown of Science," "The Temptation of Jesus," etc.
Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

"A volume of real merit and value. . . . Mr. Stewart has a graphic and picturesque style, and in a series of some twenty chapters he has invested the incidents of the early life of our Lord with a new interest."—RECORD.

THE SHRINE OF FAITH. Our Lord's

Human Experience. By the Rev. T. H. WRIGHT, Author of "The Finger of God." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"The volume is fragrant with the moral beauty of the life it studies."

OUTLOOK (U.S.A.).

PROGRESS AND PERFECTING.

Studies in Christian Discipleship. By the Rev. W. W. SIDNEY, Author of "The Silent Christ." Cloth boards, 1s. 6d. net.

"A robust and thoughtful exposition, with continuous practical applications."

BAPTIST TIMES AND FREEMAN.

"Instructs, warns, and establishes faith with the large wisdom of the Scripture which controls and inspires the book."—SUNDAY SCHOOL CHRONICLE.

THE POWER OF PLAY IN CHILD

CULTURE. By G. HAMILTON ARCHIBALD. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"Full of suggestion and practical hints."—SCOTSMAN.

"An interesting contribution to the study of child-psychology, and written in such a popular form that it should find its place on the bookshelf of every mother."

THE NEW AGE.

A NEW BOOK FOR BOYS.

THE BLACK FIFTEEN, and other

School Stories. By W. E. CUL. With many Illustrations.
Cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

MR. MELROSE'S NEW SIXPENNY EDITIONS.

HENRY DRUMMOND. By CUTHBERT
LENNOX. (Making 6th Edition.)

JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW GUINEA. By CUTHBERT LENNOX. (Making 5th Edition.)

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE. By A.
MORRIS STEWART, M.A. (Making 5th Edition.)

THE CONFESSIONS OF ST. AU- GUSTINE.

LONDON: ANDREW MELROSE, 16 PILGRIM ST., E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1758

JANUARY 13, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next (January 16), at 5 o'clock, Professor EDWARD HARPER PARKER, M.A., first of Three Lectures on "Impressions of Travel in China and the Far East." Half a Guinea the Course.

Thursday, January 18, at 5 o'clock, the Rev. Canon HENRY CHARLES BEECHING, M.A., D.Litt., first of Two Lectures on "Shakespeare." Half a Guinea.

Saturday, January 20, at 3 o'clock, J. E. C. BODLEY, Esq., first of Two Lectures on "The Church in France." Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

The University of Sheffield proposes to appoint a PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION.

For particulars as to duties, salary, etc., apply to W. M. GIBBONS, Registrar.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

TO BOOKBUYERS and Librarians of Free Libraries.—The January Catalogue of valuable Second-Hand Works and New Remainders, offered at prices greatly reduced, is now ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186 Strand, London, W.C.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 10s. 6d.), 2s. 6d., cloth 4s.; half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Estry, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

KERNER & OLIVER'S NATURAL HISTORY OF PLANTS, 16 Plates in Colour, 1000 Original Woodcuts, 6 vols., royal 8vo, cloth, as new. Blackie, 1896. Published 54s. net, for 32s. 6d.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

OLD AND NEW EDINBURGH, Six Divisions, cloth, gilt, as issued, only 15s.—Write to Lloyd and Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

BARGAINS for BOOKBUYERS

OWING TO RETIRAL FROM BUSINESS
25% REALISING DISCOUNT
WILL BE ALLOWED OFF THE UNDERMENTIONED
PRICES FOR CASH WITH ORDER OR ON RECEIPT OF BOOKS.

Extra discount allowed to the trade.

Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th edition, 25 vols., half morocco, with polished walnut revolving stand, and reader's desk.....	14	0	0
A Beckett's Comic Rome, 1st edition, cloth.....	1	10	0
Alison's Europe, 1789 to 1815, 20 vols., half calf....	2	5	0
Alpine Journal, vols. i.-ii., cloth.....	1	10	0
Dickens's Works, Authentic Edition, 21 vols., half-polished calf, new.....	7	15	0
Brockedon's Passes of the Alps, 2 vols., cloth.....	0	14	6
Dictionary of Architecture, issued by the Architectural Publication Society, 5 vols., half morocco.....	12	10	0
Forbes's Norway and its Glaciers, half calf.....	1	10	0
Meynell's Modern School of Art, 4 vols., cloth.....	1	12	6
Whymper's Scrambles Amongst the Alps, cloth.....	2	2	0
Bowman and Crowther's Churches of the Middle Ages, 2 vols., half calf.....	3	3	0
Hugo's Bawick Colletor, 2 vols., cloth.....	0	18	0
Burke's Works, Nimmo's Library Edition, 12 vols., buckram.....	4	4	0
Froude's England, Library Edition, 12 vols., half morocco, 1856-70.....	6	6	0

CATALOGUES POST FREE.

W. F. CLAY, 18 TEVIOT PLACE, EDINBURGH.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Book-ellers' Row).

VANITY of Human Wishes, 1749
Vaughan (W.) Golden Fleece. 4to, 1626
Vaughan, Poems, 1646
Velocipedes, Steam Carriages, etc., any Caricatures relating to, before 1850
Verdant Green, first edition 1853
Verses and Translations, by C. S. C., 1862
Verses to a Beautiful Quaker, 4to, 1806
Vicar of Wakefield, 2 vols, Salt-bury, 1766, or either vol
With coloured plates, 1817 or 1823
Views by Buck or Kip. Full Sets: Odd Volumes; or Portions —or separate plates, if of interest
Views of Sydney, before 1820
Views of the South Seas, 1808
Villon (F.) Poems, 1878
Villon Society, Arabian Nights, 9 vols, 8vo, 1882
Bandello, 6 vols 4to, 1890
Boccaccio, 3 vols, 8vo, 1886
Viollet-le-Duc (M.) Dictionnaire Mobilier Français, 6 vols, 8vo, 1868-75
Virginia: Acts of Assembly, 1662-1715, 1727
Von Sybel, History of French Revolution, vols (? size) 1867
Voragine (J.) Legenda Aurea. In English: The Golden Legend, folio, 1512
Voyage of the Beagle, 4 vols, 1839
Voyage of the Rattlesnake, 2 vols, 1852
Voyage to New South Wales, 1793
Wyner (R. T.) Notitia Venetica, 1841
Walpole (H.) Memoirs of George II., 3 vols, 1846

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,
Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from
FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Distinctive System of Assurance.

LOW PREMIUMS. LOW EXPENSES.

Scottish Provident Institution

LONDON: 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

WEST END: 17 PALL MALL, S.W. 2

HEAD OFFICE: 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

Art

SIMEON SOLOMON.—An Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings by the late Simeon Solomon now open at THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. Admission (including Catalogue) 1s.

TO ARUNDEL CHROMO COLLECTORS, Large Collection for Sale. Complete List, giving sizes of every Arundel Chromo. Those for sale, priced, very moderate. 3 stamps.—P. Head, 44 Clarence Gardens, Regent's Park, London, N.W.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

ADVERTISER wishes to consult a Publisher's Reader (fiction) in his private capacity. Business basis.—Write "DESIROUS," c/o W. H. Smith & Son, Temple Railway Station, London, W.C.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. rod. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. rod. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

NOW READY.

With Portraits.

In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 36s. net.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL

BY

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL.

MACMILLAN & CO., Limited, London.

OUR NEIGHBOURS SERIES

A Series of Handy Books dealing with the Intellectual Life of the various Peoples, their Social Divisions and Distinctions, their Manners and Customs, Wealth and Poverty, their Armies and Systems of National Defence, their Industrial Life, Rural Life, Home Life, Religious Life, Amusements, and Local Governments. Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net each, by post, 3s. 9d.

Edited by WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

DUTCH LIFE. By P. M. HOUGH, M.A.

SWISS LIFE. By A. T. STORY.

RUSSIAN LIFE. By FRANCIS H. F. PALMER.

GERMAN LIFE. By WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

FRENCH LIFE. By Miss HANNAH LYNCH.

SPANISH LIFE. By L. HIGGIN.

ITALIAN LIFE. By LUIGI VILLARI.

DANISH LIFE. By J. BROCHNER.

AUSTRIAN LIFE. By FRANCIS H.E. PALMER.

TURKISH LIFE. By L. M. J. GARNETT.

BELGIAN LIFE. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.

SWEDISH LIFE. By O. G. VON HEIDENSTAM.

GREEK LIFE. By W. MILLER.

SPECTATOR.—"Pleasant pictures of life and manners, always entertaining or instructive or both."

OUR EMPIRE

This new Series is intended to supplement the highly successful series entitled "Our Neighbours," dealing in a similar manner with the British Colonies and dependencies. The volumes are under the competent editorship of WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON. Special attention has been paid to the Illustrations, which are numerous and carefully chosen, and descriptive of every phase and factor of Colonial life. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net each; by post, 3s. 9d.

INDIAN LIFE. By HERBERT COMPTON.

CANADIAN LIFE. By H. J. MORGAN.

AUSTRALIAN LIFE. By E. C. BULEY.

NEWNES' THIN PAPER CLASSICS

These charming and portable Volumes are small enough for the pocket (6½ in. by 4 in., and ½ in. thick), yet large enough for the bookshelf. Printed in large type on a thin but thoroughly opaque paper, with Photogravure Frontispiece and Title-page to each volume, printed on Japanese vellum, and in a dainty binding, they make an ideal present. Cloth, 3s. net; Limp Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net per volume.

EVELYN'S DIARY.

LAMB'S WORKS.

THE VISION OF DANTE.

PEACOCK'S NOVELS.

BOSWELL'S LIFE OF DR. JOHNSON.

2 vols.

HAWTHORNE'S NEW ENGLAND ROMANCES.

TENNYSON'S POEMS.

POEMS OF WORDSWORTH.

THE SHORTER WORKS OF WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

LETTERS OF HORACE WALPOLE.

THE INGOLDSBY LEGENDS.

MRS. BROWNING'S POEMS. 2 vols.

SHAKESPEARE. 3 vols.

MILTON'S POEMS.

BURNS'S POEMS.

DON QUIXOTE.

BACON'S WORKS.

SHELLEY'S POEMS.

PEPYS'S DIARY.

KEATS'S POEMS.

CAPTAIN COOK'S VOYAGES.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

ROSSETTI'S EARLY ITALIAN POETS.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THE POEMS OF SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE.

POE'S TALES.

HOMER'S ILIAD. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

HOMER'S ODYSSEY AND SHORTER POEMS. Translated by GEORGE CHAPMAN.

SWIFT'S JOURNAL to STELLA.

BEN JONSON'S PLAYS AND POEMS.

HERRICK'S POEMS.

MISCELLANEOUS WORKS OF OLIVER GOLDSMITH.

THE NOVELS OF

LAURENCE STERNE.

SPENSER'S FAERIE QUEENE. 2 vols.

MARLOWE'S PLAYS & POEMS.

Pall Mall Gazette.—"The 'Thin Paper Classics' is keeping well ahead of everything else we know in its own particular line. The selection of works for it has never yet descended in standard from the highest; and yet it is as various and comprehensive as any reasonable mind could wish."

NEWNES' LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES

A Series of Popular Manuals on Scientific Subjects, written by Specialists, and profusely Illustrated

Size 6 in. by 4 in., cloth, 1s. each. Postage, 2d. extra

THE STARS.

PRIMITIVE MAN.

THE PLANTS.

THE EARTH IN PAST AGES.

THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

A PIECE OF COAL.

ELECTRICITY.

EXTINCT CIVILISATIONS OF THE EAST.

THE CHEMICAL ELEMENTS.

FOREST AND STREAM.

THE WEATHER.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

GERM LIFE: BACTERIA.

THE POTTER.

THE BRITISH COINAGE.

LIFE IN THE SEAS.

PHOTOGRAPHY.

RELIGIONS.

THE COTTON PLANT.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISCOVERY.

THE MIND.

THE BRITISH RACE.

ECLIPSES.

ICE IN THE PRESENT AND PAST.

WANDERINGS OF ATOMS.

LIFE'S MECHANISM.

THE ALPHABET.

BIRD LIFE.

THOUGHT AND FEELING.

ART IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

WILD FLOWERS.

BOOKS.

KING ALFRED.

FISH LIFE.

ARCHITECTURE.

EUCLID.

MUSIC.

ANIMAL LIFE.

LOST ENGLAND.

THE EMPIRE.

ALCHEMY.

THE ARMY.

RAPID TRANSIT.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

EXTINCT CIVILISATIONS OF THE WEST.

ALPINE CLIMBING.

A GRAIN OF WHEAT.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

BRITISH TRADE AND INDUSTRY.

REPTILE LIFE.

British Medical Journal.—"One of the most perfect popular introductions to science extant."

Speaker.—"Full of clear and valuable information, yet never uninteresting through over-compression."

Spectator.—"A series of which we have had occasion more than once to speak with praise."

Bookman.—"Told plainly and pleasantly for a popular audience."

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 3 to 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	27	Literary Causerie:
Literature:		Edgar Allan Poe . . . . .	39
Wordsworth's Point of View . . . . .	29	Fiction . . . . .	40
Elegantiae Arbitrator . . . . .	30	Fine Art:
The Fourth Party . . . . .	31	The Old Masters at Burlington
Kappa or Kipps . . . . .	31	House . . . . .	42
A Perilous Hypothesis . . . . .	32	The International Society of Heroic Palace-Building . . . . .	33	Sculptors, Painters and
The Land of Romance . . . . .	34	Gravers at the New Gallery . . . . .	42
The Sister of Frederic the Great . . . . .	35	Music:
The Nuns of Port Royal . . . . .	36	The Overture . . . . .	43
The Practical Lecturer . . . . .	37	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	44
At Night-Fall . . . . .	39	Correspondence . . . . .	44
Bookshelf . . . . .	45

This number contains the Index to Vol. LXIX

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

AT the present moment the literature occupying the first place in public attention is that of election addresses. In the turmoil of politics, people are more intent on considering the matter than the manner of these documents, but in point of fact they offer to those who stand apart from the controversies of the hour an interesting field for the study of direct and nervous English. One reason for this may be found in the conditions under which they are written. As a rule, when an author sits down to the task of composition, he spends all his ability in thinking of the "inevitable" word and endeavours to impart some kind of flourish to his sentences. But the politician is too much concerned with the effect that he wishes to produce to linger over epithets and phrases, except in so far as to weigh their import. The art of drawing up a good election address bears a considerable resemblance to the no less delicate art of drawing up a telling advertisement. The two sides fence for positions as keenly as if they were actual duellists. Naturally, each Party feels itself strong on a particular question, and the candidate spends his energy in directing attention to the strong point, and in covering up any weaknesses. On the other hand he is aware that the opposite Party is in very much the same position; each tries to get at a weak place in his opponent's deliverance, and to slur over the strong features of the position.

One result of all this is that the candidate is much more likely to give expression to his own characteristics in an election address than in almost any other form of composition. Good examples will be found in those written respectively by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, the Prime Minister, and Mr. A. J. Balfour, Leader of the Opposition, but we doubt if either of them has got as much vigour into his sentences as the rivals did in the celebrated election of 1880. That began with the historic letter of Lord Beaconsfield to the Duke of Marlborough, one of the most striking examples in history of effective and trenchant statement, but two at least of the counter-utterances did not fall very far short, if at all, of its excellence. These were the election addresses of Mr. Gladstone and the Marquess of Hartington. These three documents, taken together, put the issues before the electors from the different points of view in a manner that would be difficult to better.

In the present election there seems to be, as far as we can judge, a tendency to over-wordiness. Perhaps it may be only an impression, but it seems to us that the election addresses on both sides are considerably longer than those we remember to have emanated from the leaders on previous occasions of a similar character. One exception to the general rule is so striking as to deserve approbation.

This is the election address written by Sir Charles Dilke. Without inconvenience it can be quoted in full.

GENTLEMEN,—I solicit with confidence the renewal of your trust.
Believe me, your devoted servant,
CHARLES W. DILKE.

A careful study of all the election addresses would no doubt disclose some curious slips in English, if one were to apply a pedantic mind to them much in the same way as a certain trade journal criticises the clothes of members of Parliament.

It would also be possible to glean a rich harvest of mixed metaphors from the speechifying that is going on. Your politician has ever been addicted to this fine product of civilisation, and from the House of Commons we can gather numerous instances of slips of speech on the part of its members. Nor have those who have produced these curious figures of speech been at all times insignificant. On the contrary, interest may be felt in the mixed metaphors of Cabinet and ex-Cabinet ministers, though the annals of Parliament can scarcely yield any as rich and fruity as some of those before us at the moment. At Peterborough, for example, an ardent politician declared that the marrow of the Education Act was founded on a granite foundation and had spoken in a voice not to be drowned in sectarian clamour. A still more delicious one comes from Sunderland, where an enthusiastic Free Trader announced that "Mr. Chamberlain's red herring is coming home to roost."

In the Aldwych Series there has just been published "A Little Book of Graces," which can scarcely fail to draw attention to this minor form of composition. We are afraid that the beautiful habit of what our Scotch neighbours call "asking a blessing" is not so common as it was in the days when Bewick drew his tail-pieces. There is a venerable chestnut which at least illustrates the universal habit of saying grace: Two canny Scots in the far North were drinking in a little public house, and had filled up the thirteenth mutchkin, when one stopped the other drinking by exclaiming: "Wait a minute, Sandy, we have no' asked a blessing on't." Those who know Bewick's charming tail-pieces may remember one in which a gaunt Northumbrian hind, evidently a bachelor, is seated at the kitchen table, with his hands outstretched over a bowl of porridge, on which he is asking a blessing with closed eyes, while all the time the domestic cat is liberally helping itself to his supper. No one sat down to a meal without "asking a blessing on it," and there must be some curious and quaint graces that were once well known in country districts, but which have never found their way into print. A variety there was bound to be, because of the differences of custom; in one house the head of the family invariably said grace, while in another the task was allotted to the youngest, and as there is no set formula some of the expressions were curious. The collection before us, however, does not preserve any of these pleasing graces, nor has it any of the old Latin graces that used to be said in every household of pretension, not even the best and shortest of them—"Benedictus Benedicat."

The collector apparently has been rather afraid of irreverence, although he does include that celebrated grace of Robert Burns:

Some hae meat, and canna eat,
And some wad eat that want it;
But we hae meat, and we can eat,
And sae the Lord be thankit.

He makes partial amends for some of his omissions by giving one or two of the quaint blessings invoked by Robert

Herrick, of which the prettiest is, perhaps, the "Grace for a Child":

Here a little child I stand,
Heaving up my either hand;
Cold as paddocks though they be,
Here I lift them up to Thee
For a Benison to fall
On our Meat and on us all.
Amen.

This may be compared with one that is quoted from R. L. Stevenson:

It is very nice to think
The world is full of meat and drink,
With little children saying grace
In every Christian kind of place.

For a plain good grace, without religious sentiment, the best that ever was written is unquestionably that in Macbeth: "Now good digestion wait on appetite, and health on both."

A great number of the graces err on the side of being too unctuous, and, bating hunger, we do not quite see the reason why graces after meat should be so much longer than those used before it.

Professor Joseph Wright, in a speech at the opening of a Carnegie Library at Shipley, gave a somewhat pathetic account of the difficulties he has experienced in bringing out his English Dialect Dictionary. It took him twelve years to compile, and at the end of that time he found that all the big publishers fought shy of undertaking the work of bringing it out. The only one who would listen to the proposals at all asked for a guarantee against loss. In these circumstances, Professor Wright, whose life shows him to be not easily dismayed by difficulties, undertook the publication himself, and issued the work in thirty monthly parts, which have regularly appeared. He says he has saved £750 a year in doing so, but does not quite explain how. He was obliged to do the work in the evenings, because, regarding the Dialect Dictionary as something of a hobby and a pleasure, he did not wish it to interfere with his ordinary work. The Professor is to be congratulated not only on an achievement unique in the annals of literature, but on the determination and firmness with which he carried out his plans.

The nation has lost the Rokeby Velasquez, and, though the Honorary Secretaries of the National Art-Collections Fund are urbane enough to say that their endeavours "have met with a very generous measure of support," their disappointment must be acute. We can only hope that the failure to secure this picture for the nation is a warning that will be duly taken to heart by the people whom it concerns. There can be no question that Professor Holmes, in his article in the ACADEMY of December 16 last, put his finger on the weak spot. The Trustees are handicapped by want of means, no less than by the constitution of their body; considering the circumstances in which they work, they do surprisingly little to deserve the censure that is too often rashly passed upon them. From the nature of the case, private generosity must play a large part in the acquisition of art-treasures for the nation; and it is the lack of sufficient public spirit among wealthy men, not any fault on the part of the Trustees, that has lost us the Rokeby Velasquez. Those who are interested in the subject, and who wish to see both the urgency of the need for reform and some very sound and practical suggestions for improvement, cannot do better than turn to the editorial article in the January Burlington Magazine. The writer of this very able piece of work compares the England of to-day with the Papal Italy that blindly threw away its best capital, and points out how important it is—even on purely commercial grounds—that the present state of things should not continue. There was a good article, too, in the Daily Chronicle of December 21, 1905.

The Royal Academy has paid itself a deserving honour in most of its recent elections. Mr. Solomon J. Solomon becomes a full Academician, Mr. Josef Israels and Mr. Augustus Saint Gaudens honorary foreign Academicians, Mr. Edward Stott and Mr. F. W. Pomeroy become Associates. More interesting, and (may we say?) more surprising than any of these selections, is the appointment of two Associate Engravers. There has been no election of Associate Engravers for some thirty years, and it is an open secret that the conduct of the Royal Academy, both in the election of Associate Engravers and in the omission to elect them, has not been above reproach. For all shortcomings in this matter they have amply atoned by the decision of last Monday.

Mr. Frank Short is known as a more than worthy successor of Turner's original collaborators on the Liber Studiorum; he has translated Watts, Girtin and others into black and white as only a reproducer who was himself a fine artist could; and besides raising the practice of reproductive work to a level which it has too seldom reached since the great days, he has done many—but too few—original mezzotints and etchings of the highest sincerity and beauty. As director of the School of Etching and Engraving at South Kensington he has done sterling service to his art, and his inveterate habit of keeping himself in the background has not robbed his pupils of the benefit of his own thoroughness and fine taste. Mr. William Strang, who has of late years practised painting and Holbeinesque portraiture in chalks more than etching, is a very un-Academic artist, and his election shows a determination on the part of the Royal Academy to consider merit alone. Macabre, grim, often brutal, he is a masterful and a masterly artist, with a mind and an imagination on a larger scale than most, and a determination to express himself as he pleases, which removes from his work all traces of the finicking that is now too common.

The Geological Society of London will this year award its medals and funds as follows: Wollaston Medal to Dr. Henry Woodward, F.R.S.; Murchison Medal to Mr. C. T. Clough, M.A.; Lyell Medal to Prof. Frank Dawson Adams, M.A.Sc. of Montreal; Prestwich Medal to William Whitaker, F.R.S.; Wollaston Fund to Dr. F. L. Kitchin, M.A.; Murchison Fund to Herbert Lapworth, B.Sc.; Lyell Fund to W. G. Fearnside and R. H. Solly, M.A.; Barlow-Jameson Fund to H. C. Beasley.

The Staa's Forbes collection of drawings in chalk and charcoal by Jean Francois Millet numbers over one hundred works and includes the elaborate studies for his best-known pictures and etchings such as The Gleaners, Going to Labour, The Diggers, The Sower, The Wheelbarrow, etc. It is shortly to be dispersed, and has been placed in the hands of Messrs. Ernest Brown and Phillips, who will exhibit it in the Leicester Galleries, from Monday next, January 15, onwards. It has been arranged to include in the exhibition the famous pastel of The Angelus. The collection is not entirely composed of studies for Millet's well-known pictures, as has been stated in some quarters, but it contains several important finished chalk-drawings of subjects which he never painted in oils.

The Observer, the oldest and most historic of the Sunday papers, is taking advantage of the General Election, to issue at a Penny. It is not, however, intended in any way to alter the style of the paper. A specially interesting feature of the Observer is its fac-simile extracts from its files of a hundred years ago, which are given in a detail not attempted elsewhere.

The usual Education Supplement to THE ACADEMY will be published with next week's issue.

LITERATURE

WORDSWORTH'S POINT OF VIEW

Wordsworth's Literary Criticism. Edited, with an introduction, by NOWELL C. SMITH; Poems and Extracts. Chosen by WILLIAM WORDSWORTH. (Henry Frowde, 2s. 6d. net each.)

HAVE Wordsworth's essays in criticism now merely an historical interest? Well, there is the fact that modern poetry has been but little affected by the order of ideas which he tried to establish. This order of ideas, moreover, is connected closely with a theory of poetic diction condemned by Coleridge as false and impracticable. Mr. Nowell C. Smith remarks, in a preface to his excellent edition of Wordsworth's critical writings, that his author, being untrained "in philosophical severity of reasoning . . . was warped and affected in his judgment by the idea that in such a ballad as 'We are Seven,' he had given as it were the formula for poetic composition." This is but a trenchant re-statement of the substance of Coleridge's brilliant attack, the success of which has seldom been openly questioned.

Still, we are inclined to hold that Wordsworth's point of view is, within its limits, a valid one. Its validity is not, at least, impaired by Coleridge's arguments, as these are irrelevant to the point really at issue between the two poets. Their difference in regard to the theory of poetic diction is only part of a more profound difference in regard to the question of the function of poetry. The poet of the romantic school seeks for a means of escape from the facts of life: the poet of nature seeks for a means of reconciliation with them. Wordsworth finely contrasts these two adverse aims in the famous poem on a picture of Peele Castle:

Ah! then, if mine had been the Painter's hand,
To express what then I saw; and add the gleam,
The light that never was, on sea or land,
The consecration, and the Poet's dream;

I would have planted thee, thou hoary Pile
Amid a world how different from this!
Beside a sea that could not cease to smile:
On tranquil land, beneath a sky of bliss. . . .

So once it would have been,—'tis so no more;
I have submitted to a new control:
A power is gone, which nothing can restore;
A deep distress hath humanised my Soul. . . .

Farewell, farewell the heart that lives alone,
Housed in a dream, at distance from the Kind!
Such happiness, wherever it be known,
Is to be pitied; for 'tis surely blind.

But welcome fortitude, and patient cheer,
And frequent sights of what is to be borne!
Such sights, or worse, as are before me here.—
Not without hope we suffer and we mourn.

Subtlety, elaboration, and a strange picturesqueness are qualities proper to a style which is the vehicle of eerie emotions, wild illusions, and enchanted reveries; the qualities proper to a style which is the vehicle of sane, strong feeling and truth, are sincerity, plainness, and simplicity. Poetry is peculiarly the language of passion, and prose peculiarly the language of reason; but there is a mean between them, a restrained poetic diction with somewhat of the ease and directness of common discourse, in which passion is expressed in terms of reason, and this was the diction which Wordsworth adopted and developed. His theory of style was not altogether a new one. That "a selection of the language really used by men" was the right base of poetic diction, and that there was "no essential difference between the language of prose and that of metrical composition," these were the poetic principles of the eighteenth century; and the little book of extracts, mainly from the verse of that period, chosen by Wordsworth and now for the first time published, shows that he did not dismiss all the poetry of the age of prose as false in style. His originality in the matter of diction was due to the earnestness and thoroughness with which he reduced to practice the theories of his predecessors. From the French ideas of clarity and restraint, the application of which had been narrowed by Dryden and Pope, he arrived at a doctrine of simplicity, which, as a French critic remarks, Malherbe, scant as was his respect for the claims of the imagination, would have regarded as rigorous to excess. Wordsworth, as he said himself, cut himself off from a large portion of phrases and figures of speech which had long been regarded as the common inheritance of poets, and relied on depth of feeling, truth of description, and splendour of thought, to give to his verse force and nobility. As a critic, he was not wanting in boldness: he did not, like the romantic school, restrict his attack to the poets of the eighteenth century, but remarked, justly enough:

If my conclusions are admitted, and carried as far as they must be if admitted at all, our judgements concerning the works of the greatest poets, ancient and modern, will be far different from what they are at present, both when we praise and when we censure.

Some of his conclusions were, indeed, carried far into the criticism of our poetic literature by Matthew Arnold, especially in the lectures "On Translating Homer," when it was seen that only the best Greek poetry contained, in a fine form, those qualities of clarity, simplicity and directness desiderated by Wordsworth.

Perhaps the most valuable part of Wordsworth's critical writings, however, is that in which he discusses the methods and function of poetry. Here he is even more original than in his theory of poetic diction. He was the supreme poet, we think, of the eighteenth-century enlightenment; his poetry is really "the breath and finer spirit" of the knowledge of the age of reason and sentiment. To him, poetry was the history of feelings, while feelings were knowledge in its final and permanent form. He observed:

If the labours of men of science should ever create any material revolution, direct or indirect, in our condition, and in the impressions we habitually receive, the poet . . . will be ready to follow the steps of the man of science, not only in those general effects, but he will be at his side, carrying sensation into the midst of the objects of the science itself.

The most important idea of his age which Wordsworth translated into terms of poetry, was the idea that man was largely the creature of his natural surroundings. It was this idea which enabled him to combine the two separate schools of eighteenth-century verse into a new and magnificent form of poetry. The school of Pope had delineated the manners and passions of man; the school of Thomson had painted the various aspects of nature; Wordsworth portrayed man and nature in their connection with each other, and, in characteristic manner, traced the play of natural forces indirectly in their effect upon the human spirit. He carried sensation into the midst of the objects of science, by studying those objects in the actual feelings which they elicited or affected.

The poet [he said in the preface to the "Lyrical Ballads"] considers man and nature as essentially adapted to each other, and the mind of man as naturally the mirror of the fairest and most interesting properties of nature. . . . Humble and rustic life was generally chosen, because in that condition the essential passions of the heart find a better soil in which they can attain their maturity, are less under restraint, and speak a plainer and more emphatic language; . . . and, lastly, because in that condition the passions of men are incorporated with the beautiful and permanent forms of nature.

In the life of the peasant, in short, the subject was simplified. The peasant, living in immediate dependence upon the moods of air, earth and sky, showed best in what way the soul of man was actually moulded by natural influences. And what has Wordsworth to say on the matter? Well, it must be admitted that the poet, himself leading a sheltered existence, was rather inclined to dwell, in his lyrical passages, merely upon the fairer side of country-life. But, on the other hand, in his sketches of rustic character, he goes deeper into the heart of things than either Crabbe or Mr. Thomas Hardy. There, in strength of character, in depth of feeling, and in passive fortitude in adversity, he traces the results of the harsh but wholesome discipline of nature. It might be said of almost all the humble and heroic figures in his poems, that everything which they attempt, in so far as the object is external, fails, and in so far as it is spiritual, succeeds.

The savage joys of revolt, the rapture and intoxication of the senses, the ecstasy of an imagination vainly enfranchised from the restraints of natural law; these are the springs of emotion on which the poets of the romantic school depend. To Wordsworth it was left to connect the soul of man again with the living forces of nature by which its wilder desires are corrected, and its vision of the world steadied and enlarged. He is the physician of our iron age. He did not forget in the delights of the palace of art, "the burden and the mystery" of life. In the mind itself he sought for the causes of human weakness, and in the rigour and beauty of nature he discovered a means of strength and a source of perennial joy.

ELEGANTIAE ARBITER

Petronii "Cena Trimalchionis." Edited, with critical and explanatory notes, and translated into English prose by W. D. LOWE, M.A. (Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, 7s. 6d. net.)

No reader of the classics is likely to forget his first introduction to the extraordinary work of Petronius Arbiter. There he meets for the first time Latin prose fiction—a novel containing within it the earliest specimens of the Short Story in Latin. It goes without saying that this, like all literary inventions, had its origin in Hellas, where the short story appears in that prince of story-tellers, Herodotus. With what delight one recalls those short tales, all embodying a single incident and told with the simplicity of Mandeville or Defoe—the story of Candaules who showed his wife naked to Gyges, of Arion and the Dolphin, of Rhampsinitus and the Clever Thief, of Polycrates and the Ring! Then come the novelists with their strong tinge of Orientalism, Heliodorus and Lucian hailing from Syria, Achilles Tatius and Severus from Alexandria, Parthenius and Chrysostomus from Bithynia, Longus from Caria. It was Parthenius who introduced the Romans to the novelette in the form of the Milesian Tales of Aristides and others—a genre which led to a new Latin style sometimes called the Elocutio Novella, of which the pioneers were Fronto and Apuleius. The Elocutio Novella reached its apogee in the exquisite Pervigilium Veneris, which is beautifully described in Mr. Mackail's charming "Latin Literature":

The refrain itself,

Cras amet qui nunquam amavit quique amavit cras amet, has its internal recurrence, the folding back of the musical phrase upon itself; and as it comes over and over again it seems to set the whole poem swinging to its own music. In one of the most remarkable of his lyrics (like this poem a song of spring) Tennyson has come as near perhaps as it is possible to do in words towards explaining the actual process through which poetry comes into existence:

*The fairy fancies range, and lightly stirr'd
Ring little bells of change from word to word.*

We know very little about the Milesian Tales, and should know almost nothing but for the Story of the Ephesian Matron which is told by one of the characters in the novel of Petronius. The charming story of Cupid and Psyche related by Apuleius in The Golden Ass is probably of Oriental origin. It is not to be found in the Greek version of The Ass ascribed by some to Lucian.

By far the best part of the novel of Petronius is the Banquet of Trimalchio, where we have a precious sketch, unique in Latin Literature, of society under the Roman decadence. Trimalchio himself is a perfect specimen of a very wealthy parvenu, who mistakes vulgar ostentation for hospitality, and who, though grossly ignorant, poses as a savant and scholar. Here is a specimen of his learning, when he tells the story of the Trojan War, in which he has got everything mixed:

Diomedes and Ganymede were two brothers, whose sister was Helen. Agamemnon carried her off and surreptitiously substituted a hind in her place, for Diana. So, as Homer tells us, the Trojans and Parentines [followers of Paris] fought together, but Agamemnon conquered and married his daughter Iphigenia to Achilles, which drove Ajax mad.

Trimalchio never has to buy anything. There is nothing which does not grow on some of his estates throughout the world, many of which he has never seen. He asks: "What is a poor man?" and when a slave drops a valuable silver dish on the floor he chides him for picking it up and desires that it shall be thrown out with the rest of the sweepings of the hall.

If the Banquet is the most interesting part of the novel, by far the best part of it is the conversation which takes place between the guests during the temporary absence of their host. Here we have a perfect specimen of the sermo vulgaris, which largely reproduces the archaism of the comic drama, more markedly than even the most familiar letters in the correspondence of Cicero. We find irregularities of gender, vinus, fatus, caelus, librum; of verbal inflexion, mirat, vinciturum for victurum, vagat, pudeatur, olunt; old forms such as lacte for lac, cornum for cornu, vasus for vas, frumisci for frui; and late uses such as querella, "a quarrel," latrocinium, "larceny," ambitiosus, "abundant." The style is as full of proverbs as Herodas, and the fatuous banalité of the company is finely maintained.

Our readers will now understand what a treat awaits them in Mr. Lowe's scholarly edition and translation of a work not hitherto edited in England. Till the revised edition of Bücheler the text was in a state of chaos; the edition of Friedländer has thrown a flood of light on text and exegesis; the present text is carefully based on these two, and the lover of criticism will find much to interest and instruct him both in the critical and the explanatory notes. For instance, for multaciam § 30, a hardly possible form of multifariam, Mr. Lowe suggests multa ab acia, comparing ab acia et acu mihi omnia exposuit, "he told me everything as pat as needle and thread" (§ 76). Quae tangomenas faciamus § 34 is not yet emended or explained, but tangomenas (? lagenas) is probably a jocular form of tactos coined on the analogy of the Greek pres. part. pass.; compare facteon as a verbal from facio in one of Cicero's familiar letters. In § 43 Friedländer courageously defends the text olim oliorum, which he explains as "long long ago," "longago of longagoes," oliorum being a gen. plur. of a coined compar. of olim; he compares numos numorum, "heaps and heaps of money," in § 37. Surely the meaning of dii pedes lanatos habent (§ 44) is settled by the passage quoted from Macrobius, and must mean "the gods have their legs bandaged up," so that they cannot move. Very many ingenious conjectures and explanations and interesting forms of expression might be quoted, but it is time to come to the translation, in estimating which we will compare the extremely clever version of Professor Peck, of the Columbia University, New York (New York, 1898). We will take our extracts chiefly from the conversation during the absence of the host, for there the marked prevalence of slang brings out all the ingenuity of the translator who is ambitious to produce a characteristic rendering. Broadly speaking, the American has the advantage in having a larger store of slang to fall back on, but sometimes the Englishman "wipes his eye," and keeps nearer to the Latin. We will begin with Mr. Lowe's description of Fortunata, Trimalchio's wife:

She measures her money by the bushel. And to think what she was a little while ago! Why, if you will pardon my saying so, you would have been very sorry to take a piece of bread from her hand. But now, goodness only knows why and how, she has got a first-class berth and is Trimalchio's factotum [surely we should read tapanta not topanta]. In fact, if in the very middle of the day she tells him it is night he believes her. Why, he does not know how rich he is, he is so wealthy [sapientus = ἰσχυρός]. But this vixen looks after everything, even where you would not expect it. She is temperate and moderate and gives good advice, but she has a sharp tongue and is a regular magpie on a dinner-couch. Whom she likes she likes, and whom she dislikes she dislikes.

Now hear the New York Professor:

She has money to burn now, but a little while ago what do you suppose she was? Your honour will excuse me for saying so, but really in those days you would not have taken a piece of bread from her hand. And now without any why or wherefore, she's at the top notch; and is all the world to Trimalchio—in fact, if she should say it was night at noonday, he'd believe her. As for Trimalchio himself, he's so rich that he doesn't know how much money he's got; but this jade has an eye to everything, even the things that you wouldn't think about yourself. She doesn't drink, she's as straight as a string—in fact a real smart woman; but she has an awfully sharp tongue, a regular magpie on a perch. If she likes any one, she likes him way down to the ground, and if she doesn't like him she just hates him!

The later version is certainly the more spirited, but is it quite as accurate? Is pica pulvinaris "a magpie on a perch"? And "factotum" is better than "all the world." "She has money to burn" draws on an argot unknown to us. In § 39 Mr. Lowe's "Such is fame" for sic notus Vlixes? is better than Professor Peck's "Did you take me for that sort of a hairpin?" Calda potio vestiarius est in § 41 appears in L. as "a warm drink is the best clothier," in P. as "a hot drink is my wardrobe." Perhaps, rather "is as good as a great coat." We do not understand "loaded for bear" for plane matus sum in § 41. Both Bücheler and Friedländer now connect staminatas ("stiff drinks, resiners") with stamen not σίδυρος. Animam ebullit is, perhaps, better rendered "slipped his wind" than "kicked the bucket (P.) or "breathed his last" (L.). "Caught a Tartar" (L.) is preferable to "had a hard row to hoe" (P.) for malam parram pilavit; but P. gives the right meaning of involavit in the same § in "he waltzed into a good deal more than had been really left him," which L. renders "out of which he made a good deal more than had been left him." The Editor as well as the Professor reads in § 43 oricularios "blabbing" or "eavesdropping" from oricula = auricula. To us it seems that Bücheler's oraculorios is demanded by the context: "he took for gospel all his slaves told him, and that ruined him: credulity is fatal, especially for a business man." Omnis minervae homo is rendered by L. "all is grist to his mill" and by P. "ready to play Jack to any woman's Jill"—between which it is hard to choose. If in § 44 pilare means ut pilam tractare, as it is explained in the note, L.'s "how plainly he gave it to them" is no translation, neither is P.'s "he made things hum"; si coleos [testiculos] haberemus is good in "if we had any spunk" (P.), but poor in "if only we weren't so spiritless" (L.); on the other hand L. has the advantage in "he does nothing by halves" over P.'s "he's not a changeable person" for non est miscix (§ 45). Sometimes P. goes too far from the letter as in miluo volanti poterat unguis resecare "he would steal the pennies off a dead man's eyes" while L. renders literally "he could cut a hawk's talon in full flight"—he could rob the robber hawk, which the context shows to be the meaning. Est et alter (§ 46) seems to refer to another tutor, as P. takes it, not another son, as L.

Mr. Lowe rightly identifies the author of the Satyricon with the elegantiae arbiter of Nero's court, whose death Tacitus describes (Ann. xvi. 18, 19), but of course dismisses the absurd hypothesis that the whole treatise was composed and dictated in a single day by a man bleeding to death.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE FOURTH PARTY

The Fourth Party. By HAROLD E. GORST. (Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. HAROLD GORST has followed up Mr. Winston Churchill's biography of his father with the history of the little Fourth Party, which consisted of Lord Randolph Churchill, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Gorst, and Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. The volume appears to us to have been inspired chiefly by filial piety, as the author sets himself, from the beginning, the task of vindicating the claims of his father, whom he evidently considers to have been more or less of a neglected genius. No doubt Sir John Gorst is a very able man, and he rendered conspicuous service (or, rather, sound service that was not conspicuous) to the Conservative Party in the years of opposition that came between 1868 and 1874. He was a great organiser, and the credit of the victory won by Lord Beaconsfield in 1874 is attributed to him by his son. But when the leaves and fishes came to be distributed, Mr. Gorst was left out in the cold, a neglect for which Lord Beaconsfield apologised with the explanation that most politicians were so pushing and so clamorous for place, that a modest man was apt, in the distribution of Government offices, to be overlooked. In 1880, therefore, Sir John Gorst, or Mr. Gorst as he was then, felt himself at liberty to play the part of a free lance; and, as he had been a lawyer and was thoroughly versed in Parliamentary procedure, he became a very useful ally. He and Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, it may be noted, were both much older than Lord Randolph Churchill and Mr. Balfour. It seems to have been the fate of Mr. Gorst to meet with ingratitude. When Lord Randolph Churchill and Lord Salisbury became reconciled and the Fourth Party ceased to exist, Mr. Gorst was not consulted, and a coldness grew up between him and his youthful leader; in fact, the brotherhood did not hold together at all—Sir Henry Drummond Wolff and Lord Randolph did indeed remain friends until the end of the chapter, but Mr. Balfour went into the regular ranks of the Party, whither he was followed by Sir John Gorst. The last-mentioned contributes a preface to his son's book, and it contains the following somewhat cryptic utterance:

From that epoch Tory democracy, which was the ideal on which Mr. Disraeli's domestic policy was based, has been by the party leaders discredited and abandoned. The few members of the party who still cling to the principles of Mr. Disraeli are suspected of being Radicals or Socialists.

We are probably not far wrong in interpreting this to mean that Sir John Gorst has been accused, now and then, of Radicalism and Socialism. He goes on to say:

I have no intention of breaking silence upon the present occasion, but I cannot be indifferent to the desire, however impossible to realise, that these events should be correctly recorded, so that the impartial historian of the future may be in a position to form a correct judgment upon them. I have, therefore, placed all my recollections of the past, and such documents as I possess, at the disposal of the author of this book. I have taken all the pains I can to make my testimony truthful and accurate. But the author is alone responsible for the use he has made of it, the conclusions of fact he has drawn from it, and the opinions formed thereupon; for, indeed, neither oral testimony given long after the events, nor even contemporary documents, are such infallible guides as historians are accustomed to assume.

It would have been better, perhaps, if he had been more outspoken, and told us once and for all what this mystery about the Conservative Party is. The net result of this book is to show that the Fourth Party was, as far as its principles went, Democratic rather than Conservative, and we are left to draw the moral that Lord Randolph Churchill, except for the fact of his having belonged to the house of Marlborough, would have followed Mr. Gladstone instead of Lord Beaconsfield. Perhaps, had he lived, he might have occupied the place which Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman holds to-day. The book possesses a certain amount of interest, and can be quite easily read from beginning to end; yet it will not bear comparison with Mr. Winston Churchill's life of his father. The author is a little slipshod in style, using colloquialisms, and even slang, in a way that would not have been regarded as permissible by a more careful stylist. There is also a good deal of repetition, both in phrase and incident, so that a very thorough revision is urgently required before a second edition is published.

KAPPA OR KIPPS

Let Youth but know, a Plea for Reason in Education. By KAPPA. (Methuen, 3s. 6d. net.)

THERE is certainly something amiss with the system of the public school, so specialist after specialist is telling us. According to Kappa, the latest pedagogical bone-setter and faith-healer, it is the diet that is all wrong. The curriculum or general bill of fare is monotonous, unpalatable, and gritty. The stones of the Latin grammar are substituted for the bread of classical culture. The rations of the more succulent subjects, such as science and history, the real mind-forming products, are altogether insufficient, if they appear on the supply-list at all. On the other hand, the autobiographer of Kipps, who has taken upon himself to act as physician in ordinary to the body politic, blames the educational cuisine. The broth is all right, even if it is Spartan. The mischief is that the cooks are mere scullions, devoid of all imagination. They blindly copy out-of-date recipes, and serve up the most abominable hodge-podge of réchauffés, when they do not set their pupils down to something absolutely raw and indigestible. The rôtisseur who knows how to make education into a series of savoury dishes is still unborn. A pretty quarrel, truly, with both parties more or less in the right, but we think that Kappa has the best of Kipps. Obviously it is easier to provide first-rate materials than first-rate cooks. We have to train the latter; the former are already to hand. We think that those who are able to follow Kappa's advice will be the first to break the vicious circle of the present system which begets the masters who in turn reproduce the system. Kipps has to show us how to create a new race, out of wedlock so to say, who shall overthrow the traditions of the present caste.

At the outset Kappa naïvely admits he has not read the literature of his subject, a curious confession in one whose chief plea for historical teaching is grounded on the proposition that we cannot legislate on any matter unless we know its past history. It is true that he tries to justify his original case by subpoenaing such well-known writers as Fitch and Spencer, whose selected evidence he prints in appendices. But taken all in all he strikes us as more of a preacher than a practitioner. We fancy his book will rather trouble the waters than do any real good to the paralytic majority who are too set fast in the grip of routine to be able to reach the healing flood. At most one can hope Virtutem videant intabescantque relicta.

On the other hand, the author's ignorance of the book-work of his subject makes his treatment of its problems unusually fresh and stimulating. We admire unreservedly its fervent and almost dithyrambic appeal for the reinstatement of wonder in the schools, wonder of man at the miracle of the universe, and at the equally marvellous miracle of himself. Inevitably we recall Descartes, whom Huxley described as the father of the modern scientific spirit. He alone among the philosophers placed wonder among the master passions of mankind, and it is largely, we believe, to his influence that must be attributed the cult and reverence for intellectual things which is so marked in French education and so pointedly absent from English. Wonder, as Kappa rightly says, leads to enjoyment, though we doubt whether the phrase he cites out of the Scottish catechism of the duty of man being to enjoy God for ever has the sense he attributes to it. In his appreciation of the value of history in education Kappa recalls Montaigne, but he rates it even higher than the great Pyrrhonist, who merely looked on it to form the judgment, while Kappa regards it as the mother stuff for forming, not merely critical but ethical ideas. We applaud his tilt at grammar and his effective exposure of the antediluvian claims of the divine rights of Classics. It is amusing to note how this expiring superstition produces the most unbalanced judgment as regards the value of other subjects, even in those who are but moderate supporters of the ancien régime. The following quotation from a critic of Kappa's will explain:

I have just been looking through a paragraph of Kappa's letter and thinking how it would translate first into French, then into Greek. Now it goes into French practically word for word. It could be done into French almost by a machine, certainly by an unintelligent French-speaking clerk, who did not know what the sentences really meant.

Prodigious! Does this preposterous person realise that his word for word Stratford-atte-Bowe French is so far from the real French of Paris as to be practically unintelligible to an ordinary Frenchman who does not know English? Perhaps he may faintly comprehend the difficulties of writing real French when we state in the examination for the French licence, French students of 18-20 are expected to spend six hours in turning into French a passage taken from English poetry and a piece of prose not longer than one of Kappa's ordinary paragraphs.

It has been stated that Kappa is but an alias of the author of the Schoolmaster and of the Upton Letters. We should be loth to believe in what, if it were true, would be little better than a literary "long firm." We cannot think that the writer of the present book would be guilty of such unmitigated self-advertisement as his encomiums on the Upton Letters, were he their author, would involve.

A PERILOUS HYPOTHESIS

The Historic Christ. By T. A. LACEY. (Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.)

ALTHOUGH Mr. Lacey, in his dedication, declares himself the disciple of the great French critic whose identity is thinly veiled under the initials "A. L.," he says at the same time that he is not wont to swear by the words of any master, and his book is a proof of the justice of that claim. Nobody could accuse the author of a blind following of the Abbé Loisy; indeed, his point of view really differs more widely from that of M. Loisy than he probably thinks. None the less is every fair-minded man grateful to Mr. Lacey for his defence of M. Loisy against a grotesque misrepresentation that proceeded from an unexpected quarter at the very moment when the circumstances made such an attack peculiarly unchivalrous.

The book before us develops the argument of Mr. Lacey's pamphlet, "Harnack and Loisy," which was published, with a preface by Lord Halifax, about a year ago. Its main hypothesis is entirely original; indeed, so far as we know, it has not been even hinted at hitherto. That fact is no sort of reason for rejecting it; on the contrary, one would welcome any new hypothesis that seemed to help in solving the problem of the relations between the Synoptic Gospels, St. Paul's epistles and the Johannine writings. But, unfortunately, this hypothesis seems to us only to complicate the problem still further. Mr. Lacey is, however, to be congratulated on his frank acceptance of the critical method and its established results; on all the points of date, authenticity and the like, as to which serious critics are practically unanimous he accepts their conclusions. This attitude in one of the ablest and most prominent men of the Anglo-Catholic party is a welcome sign of the times; and we regard the book as marking the beginning of a new epoch in the Church of England.

Briefly, Mr. Lacey's hypothesis is that St. Paul's epistles (he leaves out of account those which critics generally regard as doubtful) and the Fourth Gospel represent primitive tradition; and that St. Mark's Gospel was written because the primitive Gospel as preached by St. Paul "was found in practice to make for an imperfect apprehension of the real manhood of Jesus Christ," in other words, to have a tendency towards Monophysitism. The hypothesis, at first sight, is more daring and ingenious than convincing, and further reflection does not diminish its difficulties; for, as a matter of history, it was the Fourth Gospel that led to the various forms of Docetism and Monophysitism (quite naturally, since it was accepted as historical fact), whereas St. Paul's teaching was afterwards made the basis of Arianism, also quite naturally. And could there be a book which shows less evidence of any polemical or theological preoccupation on the part of its author than St. Mark's Gospel? Mr. Lacey thinks that we "can hardly suppose" Papias to have been right in saying that Mark's preoccupation was "neither to omit nor to falsify anything that he had heard." Why not? That is precisely what one would infer from the Gospel itself. It reads like a collection of reminiscences put together without much method and little or no idea of selection; such a collection as one would naturally expect to have been made when the generation that had known Christ in the flesh had almost died out. The influence of Pauline theology is to be traced in certain passages of Mark and the other Synoptics, but the fact that their narratives are so little coloured by it is the strongest testimony to their historical trustworthiness. That fact is for Mr. Lacey a proof that, to put it bluntly, they cooked their history and, by deliberate omissions, gave a misleading account of the earthly life of Jesus! His hypothesis requires us to believe that the writers of the first and third Gospels had the same theological preoccupation as Mark; that the united efforts of the Synoptics succeeded in eliminating the Monophysite tendency and restoring the balance so that by the end of the century the author of the Fourth Gospel was able safely to return to the primitive tradition and at last give a true account of the earthly life of Jesus—with the result (which he does not mention) that Monophysitism revived in a more extreme form than ever. It seems to us that the hypothesis meets no real difficulties, creates new ones, and is, indeed, wholly gratuitous.

There is no difficulty in supposing that St. Paul understood the real character and personality of Jesus better than those who had been His immediate contemporaries; on the contrary, such a hypothesis is quite in accordance with experience. There is nothing in St. Paul's teaching inconsistent with the Life described in Mark; on the other hand, if the phenomenal life of Jesus was what it is described as being in the Fourth Gospel, St. Paul's method is incomprehensible. Mr. Lacey seems to hold that what St. Paul taught about Jesus was what He had taught about Himself; but St. Paul does not say so, and in that case it is remarkable that, as Mr. Lacey recognises, St. Paul does not base his teaching on actual sayings of Jesus, to which he scarcely ever refers, and ignores every fact except the Last Supper, the Crucifixion and the Resurrection, of which the Pauline Gospel, in the author's words, is the "spiritual interpretation." Surely our author is perverse when he insists that St. Paul got his theology from the elder apostles but learned little or nothing from them of the facts of our Lord's earthly life. We have no right to assume that St. Paul was ignorant of the facts of the life of Jesus; and, if it is true that Mark is based on a Petrine tradition, St. Peter, at any rate, cannot have considered those facts unimportant. How far the elder apostles came to agree with the Pauline theology we cannot tell: we do not fully know the cause of the famous dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch; but there are abundant hints of a more serious disagreement than that on the question of Jewish ceremonial observances. And Mr. Lacey's view of the purpose of Mark's Gospel is hardly consistent with his other view, that the teaching of Peter and Paul was from the first identical. For Mark is the only place where we can look for the Petrine tradition. It is not to be sought in the so-called epistles of St. Peter; for, with all respect to Mr. Lacey, we really cannot accept the paradox that the first epistle, though written by Silvanus, a known companion of Paul, "is none the less St. Peter's own."

It is impossible not to think that, however unconsciously, Mr. Lacey has been led to formulate his hypothesis by an apologetic preoccupation. Facing, as he does, the conclusions of criticism, he sees that it is impossible to harmonise the Johannine narrative with that of the Synoptics; he further sees that, if the Synoptics represent the primitive tradition, it cannot be held that Jesus directly claimed divinity and there is no historical evidence that He was directly conscious of it. The old dilemma: "Either God or an impostor" ceases to occupy the foreground. He, therefore, takes what seems to us the desperate and perilous course of sacrificing the historical authority of the Synoptics in order to establish that of the Fourth Gospel. Should his hypothesis gain acceptance, the Synoptics would indeed be hopelessly discredited; they would be worthless as history and have no symbolical value; but it may well be doubted whether the other result would be attained. If we could accept the hypothesis, we should be obliged to conclude that there is no historical tradition at all except St. Paul's witness to the Last Supper, the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

We have not the space to deal with the author's treatment of the Johannine writings, which is far from convincing and contains one or two positive statements which err on the side of rashness. No reader of the book can fail to see that the author is a man of remarkably subtle and fertile mind. Unfortunately he allows his ingenuity to run away with him to a point where it becomes perversity. The obvious is not always untrue; but Mr. Lacey really seems inclined to think so; the more far-fetched a hypothesis the more he likes it. It is hardly possible, for instance, to take seriously his discovery of a reference to the doctrine of the Logos in Romans x. 6-9, where St. Paul speaks of the "word of faith, which we preach."

We must in conclusion express our dissent from the author's opinion that one may affirm by faith "a thing which seems to be disproved by history." This is an opinion frequently but most erroneously attributed to M. Loisy, from whose conception of the nature and province of faith it is entirely alien. We can rightly affirm by faith only things which can neither be proved nor disproved by history, because they are outside the region of phenomena. The Resurrection could be "true for faith," though the empty tomb and even the appearances of our Lord were disproved by history, because a resurrection to eternal life is outside the region of phenomena. But the empty tomb cannot be affirmed by faith; it depends on historical evidence. Of course, phenomenal occurrences have led to faith and are sometimes presupposed by it. We could affirm by faith nothing about Jesus if in fact He never lived. But we affirm by faith, not the fact of His having lived in this world, which is established by history, but the spiritual interpretation of it.

Here, again, Mr. Lacey's position seems to us both desperate and perilous; when the defenders of an alleged phenomenal occurrence fall back on affirming it by faith (on the principle that, when one knows nothing, one may believe everything), they are in the last ditch. Surely the better course is to face the question whether the alleged occurrence is really essential to faith after all. Need we, for instance, even on the hypothesis that Jesus never directly claimed to be divine and was not directly conscious of divinity, abandon our faith in His divinity? In our opinion there is no such necessity.

HEROIC PALACE-BUILDING

Somerset House, Past and Present. By RAYMOND NEEDHAM and ALEXANDER WEBSTER. (Unwin, 21s.)

At a time when the London Council is hesitating between the thrift of its pocket and the Hall of its dream, when the improvement of Trafalgar Square is left to the dubious sufficiency of private subscriptions, and when the approaches to Buckingham Palace are growing in grandeur only to suggest what Paris would have achieved, it is refreshing to turn to the Protector Somerset's methods of carrying out a London enterprise.

On becoming Protector of the realm in March 1574, Somerset realised that Chester House, by Temple Bar, which had for some years been his home, was below the dignity of his office and the pomp of a Court. He resolved to build a palace which should rival Wolsey's at Hampton. His power was supreme, and it is interesting to see how he used it. The site could present no difficulty. It must be the best in all London; and he annexed it. More than a century later, when Henrietta Maria was resuming her rudely interrupted occupancy of Somerset House, the poet Cowley enriched his congratulatory strains with praise of that ideal spot where "two cities make one glorious bow."

Others, however, had appreciated the noble view of Westminster, the City, and of the sunlit Surrey hills. Three bishops, those of Lichfield, Worcester, and Llandaff, already had houses on the spot. We do not suppose that Somerset liked disturbing them, but they had to go. Our authors feel sure they must have been compensated. The Strand Bridge was unfortunately in the way, and the Protector smashed it. So was the Strand Inn of Chancery, and he flung it as rubbish to the void. The Church of St. Mary-le-Strand, which stood on part of the site, received more tender treatment; it was razed to the ground, but it had the honour of supplying stones for the new Palace. The Duke was really put to it to find stone. That which came from St. Mary's was a mere bigatelle. One day he made a trip to Clerkenwell, where, in the most gentlemanly way, he blew up the church of St. John of Jerusalem with gunpowder. But his masons were soon crying for more stone. Rather perturbed, the Protector hastily set his crow-bars to work on the cloisters of St. Paul's Cathedral, and on the Charnel House attached to the same edifice. This called for a little nerve, because the Cloisters contained the great series of paintings of the Dance of Death, and the destruction of the Charnel House necessitated the carting away of tons of revered human remains. Though the citizens were very sulky about it, real trouble was warded off. This only came when the Protector, made desperate by the continued stone famine, sent his workmen to fetch him St. Margaret's Church from Westminster. There the people so far forgot themselves as to defend the house of God with bludgeons. The workmen scuttled back to the Strand, and could not be induced to return even when the troubled Duke offered to spare St. Margaret's and help himself from the Abbey.

Our authors, it is but fair to say, show that Somerset had, in all probability, full legal rights over the buildings with which he fed the ravenous maw of Somerset House. And, as regards Westminster Abbey, we read that "it is in the highest degree improbable that the Protector, with whom personal popularity was of the highest consideration, should have projected destructive measures against a fabric which it was the universal desire to preserve." Yet there are people who think it necessary to write comic histories of England.

The Protector had his reward. His palace in the Strand was declared at the time to be a "faire and goodlie house," and its place in our architectural history is important. Whether its beauty sprang from the brain of John Thorpe, or John of Padua, or Sir John Thynne of Longleat, the designer of Old Somerset House was a man of genius. He came on the scene when Gothic was dead, yet not forgotten, and when the classic revival was rumoured, yet not born. He produced a building strikingly new, one of the earliest and best examples of Renaissance architecture in England.

During rather more than two hundred years old Somerset House saw history and made it. Its record, empurpled and squalid, is set forth with considerable charm and much patient scholarship in the volume before us. It would be interesting to marshal the pageant of persons and events; to stand in the old courtyard amid the waving torches and heart-bursting shouts which there greeted Elizabeth soon after the Armada; to join the wits and masqueraders who made Somerset House so pleasant for James the First's queen; to watch the sale of Charles the First's pictures; to see Cromwell's lying-in-state; to observe, with Pepys, the railleries and miraculous leisure of Charles II. and his young queen when they called on the queen mother in the Strand; and, finally, to trace the decay of the palace into a barrack, and a nest of Court favourites, down to the day when its last housekeeper, Mrs. Charlotte Lennox, the novelist and the friend of Johnson, left it to solitude and demolition. We are glad that the authors quote Michael Moser's description of the decayed grandeur, the faded adornments and ruined furniture, of this period. It was a strange picture, and in after years it reminded its chronicler of "those dilapidated castles, the haunts of spectres and residence of magicians and murderers, which have since the period to which I allude made such a figure in romance."

The task which Sir William Chambers undertook in 1775, when he accepted the commission for New Somerset House, was one of great complexity. As Mr. Reginald Blomfield has pointed out, he had to provide sets of offices and residences on a scale hitherto unknown in England. In this, and in all matters of workmanship, he succeeded well. "No building in London," say Messrs. Needham and Webster, "has been executed with greater ability than Somerset House, and if in some points it fails in freedom and vitality of design, it is nevertheless an almost perfect example of the master-builder's craft." We could wish that our authors had given a somewhat fuller sketch of Chambers, to whose biography they devote hardly more than a page. The burlesque of his "Dissertation on Oriental Gardening," which Horace Walpole and Mason perpetrated, is but dimly referred to under the phrase, "a torrent of satire and abusive criticism." The fact that Dr. Johnson contributed a short introduction to his "Chinese Architecture" might have been mentioned. Nor would some reference to the story of Goldsmith rushing from Sir William's whist-table in Berners Street, in the crisis of a rubber, to relieve a street singer, have been out of place. There is an echo in Horace Walpole's Letters of an absurdly false report that Chambers had absconded from the Somerset House works, the fact being that he had gone to Flanders on a visit of pleasure, and was directing his assistants from abroad. By the way, it was in Norton Street, Marylebone, not "North" Street, that the architect of Somerset House died on March 8, 1796. We lay down this book with admiration of its thoroughness, and a clear perception that it is a notable addition to the literature of London. The illustrations are excellent.

THE LAND OF ROMANCE

Old Provence. By THEODORE ANDREA COOK, M.A., F.S.A.
2 vols. (Rivingtons, 16s. net.)

THE art of travel is becoming one of the lost embellishments of life. There are now thousands of sight-seers in quest of a change of air, and only a few wanderers in search also of a change of ideas. The adventures of the soul in a world of alien influences, are the great events in travel, and it is just these adventures that those who "see all sights from pole to pole, and glance, and nod, and bustle by," generally miss. We go everywhere and learn nothing. And yet how much there is to learn, and how delightful and easy it all is to acquire! One has but to open one's mind in a foreign land to the sweet impressions of things, and a stream of new and subtle frames of thought and ways of feeling flows in upon us, and recreates us. Travel seems, indeed, to be a finer instrument of culture than literature, especially if it be undertaken among certain races in Southern Europe, in whose surroundings and traditions of life there survives much of the great civilisations of the past. The Italians are one of these races, and the Provençaux, as Mr. T. A. Cook remarks, are another.

In the wild and exquisite places informed with the Provençal genius, one escapes from the throng. Vulgar luxury and taste have built for themselves garish retreats in the cities of pleasure that disfigure the shores of the Mediterranean, and have thus sequestered themselves from the land of living romance. This is what Provence is. In Greece, there remains only the empty, broken shrine of the dead soul of the ancient world. In Italy, the spirit of the Renaissance still lives on feebly in the lives of some of the people. But in Provence, the genius of romance has renewed itself by its power over the hearts and imaginations of men. This is the constructive idea of Mr. Cook's admirably executed book. The forces which animate the new school of Provençal poetry are the same as those which made the old school of that poetry the source from which all the modern literatures of Europe are derived; and as a lover and student of the genius of Provence, Mr. Cook has carefully traced its roots in the past, in order to bring out more clearly the historic continuity of its life, from which it obtains its present strength and fame.

And how far back into the ancient civilisations of the Mediterranean do those roots extend and draw nourishment! By some freak of heredity, it is only among the descendants of the Phocæans, who settled in Provence two thousand five hundred years ago, that there survives the incomparable beauty of feature which distinguished the ancient Greeks. In Greece itself it is not now found. Moreover, in the land of Gretia between the Durance and the sea, where the Ionic settlers finally established themselves, and in neighbouring towns, such as Nîmes, there are many examples of late but exquisite Greek architecture, including the finest temple outside Hellenic territories. In one of the ancient theatres Greek plays are still performed, once a year, before ten thousand spectators, while the bullfights in the vast amphitheatres built by the Romans attract audiences almost as large as those that witnessed the gladiatorial combats of ancient days.

Indeed, the Provençaux, as Mr. Cook says, live in an atmosphere of antiquity transmitted by Gretia from Greece and Rome. They are a people with strange powers of memory. The most curious chapter in the first volume of Mr. Cook's work is that in which he traces the metamorphosis of Marius, his wife and his Syrian sorceress, into the patron saints of Provence. The great Roman general well deserved this remarkable honour, for by the terrible battle near St. Remy, at which four hundred thousand invaders were massacred, he rescued Provence from barbarism. Mr. Cook also adds a fresh interest to the story, by showing that the beautiful monument, which stands by the arch of triumph at St. Remy, was really erected by Julius Cæsar in commemoration of his uncle's victory. Thus have the great deeds of the past been recorded in Provence on brute stone and in living legend.

It was, no doubt, owing to their noble traditions of ancient civilisation that the races of Southern France were the first to emerge from the barbaric stage of feudalism, and to spread the ideals of chivalry throughout Europe, by means of a poetic literature, modern in form and feeling, besides giving to Simon de Montfort that idea for calling the three estates together in Parliament which he introduced, with such important results, into England. The second volume of Mr. Cook's work, in which he depicts the intense and picturesque life of Provence in the middle ages, is naturally more interesting in matter than the first. But his method is the same. In order to portray concretely the spirit of each period, he describes the history and physiognomy of the one town in which it is most clearly reflected. And what an array of gems he has strung on to the thread of his narrative! There is first St. Remy, a rounded picture of classic life, with its gay, scented gardens lying under the bare crags of the Alpilles, and the golden tint of its triumphal arch showing against the brilliant southern sky. But the perfect, mediæval towns are the captain jewels in the carcanet. Les Baux, for instance, perched like the eagle's eyrie it was, on high, wild, rocky country, and Carcassonne that dominates, with its two circles of towered and embattled curtains, the road between France and Spain; these glow in the distance with the fine, miniature beauty of detail of the fortified towns which the earliest school of painters set in the blue backgrounds of their pictures. Then there is Aigues-Mortes, the city of dead waters, built by the Crusaders of St. Louis, in which no note of modernity disturbs the mediæval atmosphere; Arles with its beautiful girls and its ancient church in which the Emperor Barbarossa was crowned; and Beaucaire and its castle fragrant with memories of that consummate flower of mediæval literature, Nicolette of the white feet. Yes, old Provence is the land of romance, and of the tale of its beauty and interest Mr. Cook is the most delightful of narrators.

THE SISTER OF FREDERIC THE GREAT

Wilhelmina Margravine of Baireuth. By EDITH E. CUTHELL. Two volumes. (Chapman & Hall, 21s. net.)

THE sister of Frederic the Great left behind her not only a considerable mass of correspondence, but also, according to the habit of her age, a Memoir, which, she had never been able to finish to her liking. After her death the manuscripts fell into the hands of publishers, and various editions with different claims to authenticity excited for the time considerable interest and controversy. Wilhelmina, it appeared, had used her pen freely, some thought unscrupulously, and the critics were quick to convict her of disloyalty as a friend and of inaccuracy as a writer. Nevertheless, Carlyle, with his keen eye for worth, finds it "a human book . . . a veracious book, done with heart, and from eyesight and insight." To Sainte-Beuve it revealed talents no less remarkable than those of her famous brother. Miss Cuthell, although her method is at times too crude and colloquial to be altogether pleasing, has given us a picturesque and readable account of a woman who is invariably interesting.

On her mother's side Wilhelmina was a granddaughter of George I. of England and of Sophia Dorothea, the prisoner of Ahlden. Her father's mother was more pleasantly distinguished as the friend of Leibnitz and Bayle, who did her best to kindle something of the brilliancy of Parisian salons in Charlottenburg. The parents of Frederic and Wilhelmina had done little to deserve two such children, and the relationship was from the first strangely incongruous. Frederic William, the father, with many solid claims to respect, treated his children with a grotesque brutality which suggested insanity; Sophia Dorothea, the mother, was a stern and ambitious woman, who, like her husband, was too much dominated by her own wishes to have much independent affection for her children. Wilhelmina was a precocious child, but, save for one circumstance, an unhappy one. The happiness of her childhood, as to a great extent of her whole life, depended upon her brother Frederic, who was born three years after her: they had two bodies and one soul, he wrote in later years. They were "inseparable in the nursery": at six years old Wilhelmina had impressed the eye of a painter with one attitude that was to be characteristic of her future life; she lays her hand on Frederic's arm to restrain him from some infantine campaign on which he is bent with his big drum. But in the nursery Wilhelmina had to suffer from the tyranny of nurses and the erudition of scholars. The Queen was already ambitious for her daughter, and, not content with the simple teaching of governesses, procured a tutor who could instruct in "six modern languages without counting Slav and Basque dialects and Oriental tongues including Chinese." With this gentleman Wilhelmina absorbed "universal history" with such thoroughness that it took her four years of steady toil to reach the eighth century starting from "before the Deluge." She was so good a linguist that, as Sainte-Beuve says, she might have written her Memoirs in English or German had she not chosen to write them in French; but, unfortunately, she was taught neither Greek nor Latin, and with her deep interest in the classics only knew them through translations. All this learning, however, so far as the Queen was concerned, was but an instrument to fit Wilhelmina for marriage. Her marriage engrossed her thoughts while she was still strumming her scales and learning her declensions, for thus early the Queen had chosen Frederic Prince of Wales as the most desirable suitor for her daughter. To further the match she condescended to intrigues and secret negotiations in which Wilhelmina soon became an accomplice, for, although both mother and daughter ignored the wider issues that were at stake, the King considered the English marriage from its political aspect only. The part that this intrigue played in Wilhelmina's early life seems curiously out of proportion to its intrinsic importance, or perhaps we may complain that Miss Cuthell has followed the complications too laboriously. After six years of scheming and diplomacy the negotiations were broken off by the King in a sudden fit of rage: and, before Wilhelmina knew what was to become of her, the Crown Prince's plot to escape to France was discovered. It was natural that Wilhelmina should be suspected of complicity, and after a violent scene with her father she was sent to prison and bidden to reflect on the merits of her two suitors, the Duke of Weissenfels and the Hereditary Prince of Baireuth. Her mother was still of opinion that "a prison is better than a bad marriage," but Wilhelmina, when her brother's pardon was promised on condition of her consent, was weak enough to give in. She agreed to marry the Prince of Baireuth, and received two letters from her parents, in one of which her "faithful father" promised that he would never forsake her, and in the other her mother exclaimed: "I swear you an eternal hatred, and will never forgive you." In spite of the fervour of this statement the Queen proved herself fairly consistent.

So far the brutal and cumbersome machinery of the Court had effectually obscured the finer shades of Wilhelmina's character. Her love of her brother was the most individual trait in her nature, except for a habit she had, when ill in bed or locked up in prison, of reading and writing and composing music. But now that she was married she could expand more freely, although the atmosphere was still sufficiently harsh. The little Court of Baireuth was humble compared with that of Berlin, and Her Royal Highness seemed both to herself and others too grand a lady for such simplicity. The Margrave, her father-in-law, moreover, was as economical as her own father, and less respectable. He might have been induced to die, thought Frederic, "if only he was sure that they distilled brandy in Heaven." But Wilhelmina was happy in her husband, who to some extent shared her cultivated tastes. A daughter, their only child, was born to them and named Frederica after her uncle. The Margrave died in 1735, and with her accession began the few happy years of Wilhelmina's life. As Margravine she had some scope for her energies, although in many ways they were still pitifully circumscribed. Her husband consulted her in the affairs of the government and she began to meditate plans for transforming Baireuth into a centre, or at least a reflection, of intellectual brilliancy. She corresponded with her brother about Italian actors and musicians, and the rustic taste of Baireuth was trained by the performance of French plays and operas. Her intellectual tastes were revived and stimulated; she read philosophy and expounded her views upon the theory of atoms and the existence of God. She began to build extravagantly, in the classical style. This, it is clear, was the real Wilhelmina: the woman of brilliant and volatile intellect, eager for knowledge and experience and craving above all the stimulus of companionship. She stayed once at Rheinsberg when Frederic was King, and the days passed in music, acting, and the conversation that she loved. There she met Voltaire, and began an intimacy which lasted her lifetime. But the King left this brilliant company for the opening campaign of the war of the Austrian succession and henceforward the Margravine's life was never free from anxiety. "My great joy," she had written, "has always been study, music and above all the delight of society." All her life, with one or two brief exceptions, she was only to know this joy through translations. The music and the society of Baireuth she found "detestable." Nor was she to enjoy her studies and the companionship of her husband for long. Wilhelmina's beauty faded as her health became increasingly frail, and her husband was drawn into an intimacy with her greatest friend, Dorothea von Marwitz. Wilhelmina, in spite of her sarcastic tongue, was distinguished by a certain proud loyalty where her friends were concerned, and for a long time would see no ill. The effect of her disappointment when she could no longer ignore it was to concentrate her affections still more exclusively upon her brother. He inspired the most profound feeling in a nature too fastidious to be passionate. She threw herself into the intellectual reform of Baireuth, founded a University and anticipated the present opera-house. Baireuth was sufficiently gay to attract Frenchmen from their metropolis; Voltaire, with whom the Margravine corresponded, paid her the high compliment of coming himself. But all this activity was carried on in defiance of the failing health which obliged her to winter in the South. To Wilhelmina the journey was an intellectual pilgrimage to be performed in a spirit of due reverence, but the account so faithfully recorded by Miss Cuthell is not more interesting than such itineraries generally are. Wilhelmina at the age of forty-five preserved an insatiable appetite for the sights of the world.

The last years of her life were years of physical and mental suffering. She tried to negotiate a peace for her brother, and failed. She had to hear of his defeats and to read of his desire to kill himself. "Mediæval barbarism" she thought was to engulf the little spot of light and reason which she had tended with so much care. Her daughter's marriage proved a failure. But her mind, as she wrote in her last letter to her brother, "is always with me," and she might have added, always occupied with others. She died in October 1758, aged forty-nine, and "Vanity of Vanities" was by her own choice the text of her funeral sermon. Miss Cuthell's book is full of interesting materials for any one who cares to preach it.

THE NUNS OF PORT ROYAL

Angélique of Port Royal, 1591-1661. By A. K. H. (Skeffington, 10s. net.)

AMONG the books which still remain to be written is a history of the Counter Reformation, or, if the term be preferred, the Catholic Revival. We are not unaware that the bookshelves of Europe are already well packed with rhetoric and learning concerning this very subject. It is not difficult to learn how the popes endeavoured to moralise Rome, or how the house of Habsburg won back Austria and Bohemia to the fold. The amount of writing which the conscientious historian would be constrained to master is indeed enormous—and constitutes not the least of the reasons why he does not appear. Yet he might honourably lighten his task by leaving the politics and the wars aside. They are of no vital importance in a history which should be one of thought, and of morality. One part of the field has been very well cleared—and it is the history of Port Royal to which A. K. H. has now contributed a biography of La Mère Angélique. The author deserves our thanks for having treated his (or her) theme in the proper spirit—namely as a study of the doubts, painful inward and spiritual wrestlings and ecstatic triumphs of the pathetic society of holy women and of men both learned and holy, who dwelt in and about that Cistercian house. We have travelled very far from the eighteenth-century point of view of Chamfort. He thought it amusing to see Racine, the "author of Phèdre," speak of the "grands desseins de Dieu sur la Mère Agnes." To us it is not amusing, but a proof of the narrowness of those self-satisfied persons, the philosophers, that Chamfort should have been moved to derision by the "Abrégé de l'histoire de Port Royal." It may be that the pendulum has, after its manner, swung too far, and that we are unduly tolerant of spiritual strivings, which were apt to cross the border of mere "religious fidgets." Nevertheless the Port Royal nuns and the "Messieurs" who came to live as hermits under their shadow were not insignificant people. A movement which attracted Pascal and had the lifelong support of such men as the Abbé de Saint Cyran, Arnould, Lancelot, Nicole, Le Maître, and Saci, has its great place in the history of religion.

A. K. H. does not undertake to deal with the whole story of Port Royal, but only with the life of La Mère Angélique. He even turns to show how theological disputes affected her as a monastic reformer with reluctance, and with an apologetic explanation that Port Royal cannot be made intelligible without some understanding of Jansenius, and of the famous dispute concerning the propositions, which were or were not fairly to be deduced from his "Augustinus." He is right. The twenty volumes of that monument of industry, and Saint Augustine himself, and the forty volumes of Arnould, constituted the cannon-shot fastened to the ankle of Port Royal—to quote the lively image of Sainte-Beuve. And they do more. They show in the first place, as A. K. H. appears to be aware, why the Jesuits and the Pope were right to be afraid of Port Royal, and why Joseph de Maistre had some excuse for being moved by it to fury. The plain truth about the whole movement known by the name is that the Messieurs and the nuns formed a kind of co-operative and magnified Douce Deans. They were orthodox, but with an orthodoxy defined by themselves, and they would argue the question with the Pope. It was the function of the ladies to set an example of all that was correct in monasticism, and to meet the authority of the Church, when it was exercised against Port Royal, with meek contumacy. The Pope may have made himself ridiculous when he called on women who professed a pious ignorance to say that certain propositions were in the "Augustinus" which they had not read. He was, for all that, not at all ridiculous when he told them they had no right to think for themselves. They should have gone over to the Reformation if they desired to enjoy that freedom. Racine has left an inimitable picture of the comic scene which took place when the Archbishop of Paris came to Port Royal for the signature of the nuns. They professed prostrate obedience on their knees, and with eyes suffused with tears asked him the most exasperating questions as to what he meant; till the archbishop was provoked into using language unbecoming a cleric and a gentleman. An anticleric may fairly be moved to laughter by seeing a great ecclesiastical authority suffering from what Renan calls the familiar device of rebellious clerics. He was driven to severity by pious rebellion—and then called a persecutor.

The scene took place after the death of La Mère Angélique, but the nuns were what she had made them. A. K. H. has, whether intentionally or not we do not feel sure, made it quite clear why there could be no secure place for Jacqueline Arnould, La Mère Angélique, in the Church of the Counter Reformation. Placed in a religious house as Abbess at the age of seven by a most scandalous intrigue on the part of her pious father, she, if we may be permitted the frivolity of the expression, "played the game"; and she played it from pride. She might have had her vows quashed, but her position in such a family as the Arnoulds would have been intolerable after an open rebellion. One cannot but sympathise with the poor girl who was committed to a monastic life as a mere child, and then meanly trapped and bullied by her father into signing a renewal of her vows at the age of fifteen. It is a genuine satisfaction to read how, when she had finally accepted the fate provided for her by her family, she resolved to be an Abbess indeed, and to begin by enforcing the rule of Saint Benedict against her father. Antoine Arnould was a pious "cotqueen," and enjoyed regulating the little colony of women at Port Royal. It was the equivalent, he thought, for the money he gave the house, and he thought that the daughter of whom he had made "a spouse of Christ," was to continue to be his obedient child. When the door was shut in his face on the famous "journée du Guichet" he stormed as grossly as the Archbishop at a later date. The story is not always so pleasing. A. K. H. (again we have to say that we do not know whether with intention or not) has brought out the little miseries of monastic life very clearly, its hysterias, its delusions, and the frightful stimulus to conscious, and unconscious, hypocrisy supplied by its incessant dwelling on the need for manifestations of piety. La Mère Angélique, at the end of her life, thought it necessary to warn a correspondent that "the direction of nuns demands infinite precaution, for they are not always as sincere as they ought to be, and as they appear to be." We are frequently reminded of the contemptuous outburst of Santa Teresa "estas son pequeñeces de mugeres"—these are the sillinesses of women—when, we hasten to add, they are forced into, or have thrown themselves into, an unnatural life. If anybody by any chance wishes to know whether Diderot had an excuse for La Religieuse, he need not go beyond the page of A. K. H., read with a little criticism and knowledge. From the same source, and indeed from many others, he may learn what a very dangerous business this of the "direction of nuns," as practised in the Church of the Counter Reformation was—for the director and the nun. M. de Saint Cyran with his harrowings of the female soul, and the exalted women who never could have enough of his holy severities, do not always move us to admiration. They would even provoke us to the flippancy of Chamfort—if we did not remember how much anguish of women who might have been honest wives and mothers it all implies. And the spectacle is the more painful when one reflects that on Saint Cyran's own principles it was all useless. He held and taught a rigid predestinarian doctrine. When Conrad of Marburg tormented Saint Elizabeth he had at least the excuse of believing that heaven could be won by practising austerities.

THE PRACTICAL LECTURER

[We have been requested to publish the following as a model for University Lecturers:]

A GREAT ENGLISHWOMAN

I WISH to-day to direct your attention to a little poem of considerable charm and beauty, but more interesting to us as presenting in clear outline and with a firm and delicate touch the character of a great and typical Englishwoman. This poem of Mr. Lear's has long since made its appeal to the English people on the ground of its humour, and I hope to show you that underlying the humour is that basis of reality which gives their greatness to the humorous creations of Shakespeare. You will, perhaps, have already guessed that I refer to the Pobble's Aunt Jobiska.

As I see you have not copies of it, I think I must trouble you to take it down at dictation:

The Pobble who has no toes
Had once as many as we
When they said, "Some day you may lose them all";
He replied—"Fish fiddle-de-dee!"
And his Aunt Jobiska made him drink
Lavender water tinged with pink
For she said, "The World in general knows—"

I wish I had not to remind you that late comers disturb a lecture.

—There's nothing so good for a Pobble's toes.

The Pobble who has no toes
Swam across the Bristol Channel;
But before he set out he wrapped his nose
In a piece of scarlet flannel.
For his Aunt Jobiska said, "No harm
Can come to his toes if his nose is warm;
And it's perfectly known that a Pobble's toes
Are safe—provided he minds his nose."

The Pobble swam fast and well
And when boats or ships came near him,
He tinkledy-binkledy-winkled a bell,
So that all the world could hear him.
And all the Sailors and Admirals cried,
When they saw him nearing the farther side—
"He has gone to fish, for his Aunt Jobiska's
Runcible Cat with crimson whiskers!"

What? Am I reading too fast? Oh, then, I'll go slower,

But before he touched the shore,

Is that slow enough?

The shore of the Bristol Channel,
A sea-green Porpoise carried away
His wrapper of scarlet flannel.
And when he came to observe his feet,
Formerly garnished with toes so neat,
His face at once became forlorn
On perceiving that all his toes were gone!

And nobody ever knew
From that dark day to the present,
Whoso had taken the Pobble's toes,
In a manner so far from pleasant.
Whether the shrimps or crayfish gray,
Or crafty mermaids stole them away—
Nobody knew; and nobody knows
How the Pobble was robbed of his twice five toes!

The Pobble who has no toes
Was placed in a friendly Bark,
And they rowed him back, and carried him up
To his Aunt Jobiska's Park.
And she made him a feast at his earnest wish
Of eggs and buttercups fried with fish;—
And she said: "It's a fact the whole world knows,
That Pobbles are happier without their toes."

There is, however, an initial difficulty which we must face. It may be asked—and the question must be answered—whether Aunt Jobiska was English at all. Indeed, the suggestion has been made that the name Jobiska is Polish, and that Pobble itself is a British abbreviation of Pobiedonostsev. It is unfortunate that the University at present has no readership in Polish, and I cannot resist the temptation to suggest to the Studies Syndicate that if this language were added to the Previous Examination as a compulsory subject, something might be effected to improve its position in the University. But I hope to show you that it is possible in spite of the names to recognise a strongly marked English character in this remarkable woman.

It will be best to begin by considering the date and place and environment of our heroine. Reference is made in the sixth stanza to "his Aunt Jobiska's Park," which, it is clear, must be near the scene of the Pobble's great swim. We have the evidence of stanza iii. to the fact that Aunt Jobiska was a character well known to "Sailors and Admirals" in charge of "boats" and "ships"—in other words, she was not only a familiar figure in the highest strata of society, but a great personage among the humble fishermen of the neighbourhood. The language implies a naval station and a certain fishing industry, and these on the Bristol Channel, as we see in stanza ii. This at once helps us to fix the place, in spite of some indefiniteness in the text. We are not clearly told whether the Pobble swam from Wales to England or vice versa, but a reference to the map, always bearing in mind the conditions we have already discovered, will make it clear to us that he swam out from Avonmouth. Cardiff was as yet a place of no importance. The distance from Avonmouth to Prat Pill on the other coast is five and a half miles; from Cardiff to St. Thomas Head nine and a half; and even from Lavenock Point to St. Thomas's Head, eight miles. Further down the Channel the swim would have been the act of a maniac; and that the Pobble was a maniac, I must firmly deny, in spite of his undoubted peculiarities.

We may take it, then, as established that Aunt Jobiska's park was at or near Avonmouth. There remains the date, and I think we cannot go far wrong if we attribute the Pobble's bold venture to a desire to emulate Lord Byron. "This morning," wrote the poet, "I swam from Sestos to Abydos." That morning was May 3, 1810. Another indication of date lies in the fact that, while Aunt Jobiska has that enthusiasm for amateur medicine, which clings to great English ladies who have no children of their own, her remedies show no hint of homœopathy or electropathy.

Her strong, purposeful philanthropy made itself felt among the fisher-folk's families with preparations of simples and herbs—"eggs and buttercups fried with fish"—

His Aunt Jobiska made him drink
Lavender water tinged with pink,
For she said, "The World in general knows
There's nothing so good for a Pobble's toes."

Such gentle nostrums and a harmless enthusiasm for scarlet flannel together offer a wonderful revelation of character.

So far we conclude that Aunt Jobiska had a park near Avonmouth about the year 1810 or a little later. This fits in well with England's naval energy at that date, and it further helps us to understand a trait in her character, which has not, I think, been noticed. She is a spiritual child of the French Revolution. Despite the friendship of Admirals, she is an enthusiast for humanity—witness her philanthropy, and remark her passion for Red—the colour of revolution. "Lavender Water tinged with pink," "scarlet flannel"—yes! and even her cat knew her revolutionary sympathies and went with "crimson whiskers"—which implies considerable republican ardour, as faint heart never dyed cat's whiskers.

This naturally leads me to a side of her character which I would fain pass over, but truth forbids. It is quite clear that a streak of eccentricity runs in the family. Assuming that the name Jobiska does not imply Polish blood—and we have no evidence of Polish immigration—we deduce an eccentric parent, and from him (or her) we derive the Pobble, who is thus nephew by birth and not by marriage. The grandparent, the aunt and the nephew all show signs of eccentricity, yet not inconsistent with charm and character. Few of us in attempting to swim the Bristol Channel would think of carrying a bell, any more than we would dye our cat's whiskers crimson. And it will be observed that sailors and admirals, rich and poor, at once recognise the family oddness, and attribute the Pobble's swim to a whim of his Aunt.

He has gone to fish, for his Aunt Jobiska's
Runcible Cat with crimson whiskers.

I may conclude this line of observation by remarking that few aunts—not so eccentric—would suggest a nose-cap of scarlet flannel to a nephew swimming the channel, and few normal nephews would accept the suggestion.

I pass on to a more pleasant topic. The Aunt is, if I may use the expression, something of a philosophe—an esprit fort. She invariably refers everything to general principles: "The world in general knows"; "it's perfectly known." These general principles are her foundation; her structures rise from them naturally, if with a gracefulness all her own. I half suspect that, when in verse i. we read:

When they said, "Some day you may lose them all";

(the reference is to the Pobble's toes), we should understand a kindly and gentle warning from an Aunt who read his character, and, understanding his weakness, wished to safeguard him at once with good advice and scarlet flannel. But my crowning evidence is in the last stanza. His great loss has befallen the Pobble—

His face at once became forlorn
On perceiving that all his toes were gone—

(the defective rhyme of itself suggests emotion)—he abandons his swim, allows himself to be taken on board a boat, rowed and then carried to his Aunt's ever-open door. Then, in the moment of his deepest humiliation and anguish, the woman rises to her true greatness. Her general principles dilate—she soars to a higher altitude than she has yet attained—and in words that at once dazzle by their sheer genius and make the heart throb by their wise affection, she cries:

It's a fact the whole world knows
That Pobbles are happier without their toes.

AT NIGHT-FALL

Now let the thoughts of time go by—
Needs of the body and the mind ;—
The busy sun is lost behind
The hills, and all the meadows lie
Under the eternal sky.

Now banish fancy, thought and care ;
Into their woods bid them begone ;
Their busy day is out and done ;
For silence now must thou prepare
Breathing the immortal air.

Thy cares go, giving thee release,
Into the silence of the night,
While star and star across the height
Measure the spaces of thy peace
When thy cares go by and cease.

But when thy heart is free from stain,
Washed as in waters infinite
From every care that clouded it,
With the morning thou wilt fain
Take the thoughts of time again.

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

EDGAR ALLAN POE

A BEAUTIFUL edition of Edgar Allan Poe's works which has been published by T. W. Crowell and Co., of New York, naturally induces one to re-consider the claims of this writer. Of the literary men produced by America, Poe is, in a sense, the most literary, and it is not going too far to say that he has exercised more influence than any other transatlantic man of letters; though, curiously enough, this has been exemplified more in his prose than in his verse. The short story of to-day owes more to him than to any other writer: Bret Harte, who was the greatest master of this particular kind of writing in his time, learned a great deal of his craft from Edgar Allan Poe, and it has always struck me as strange that a novelist so unlike in his general manner to the American as R. L. Stevenson should have had, nevertheless, a profound admiration for him; an admiration which, on the whole, was well grounded, true though it be that those who followed Poe could not imitate his excellences. The ingenious detective story of modern days is almost a direct outcome of the "Tales of Mystery and Imagination," nor have any of the followers outdone their original; but a careful consideration of Poe will demonstrate that the short story differs, not only in degree but in kind, from the long novel. Ingenuity is almost sufficient in itself for the briefer form of narration, whereas many qualities that Poe did not possess, such as very wide interests in life, and a lively sympathy with human hopes and fears, a profound understanding of human nature and its working, are necessary to him who would compose a long romance. The essence of its merit must be that it paints a little world in miniature, full of diverse and contrasting characters, alive with their thoughts, emotions, and interests; and not only so, but every individual in it must look at the working of the rest from his own point of view. This will, no doubt, appear to be a saying true to the point of triteness, but those who have any intimate knowledge of modern fiction will be aware how greatly it is neglected—how frequently the writers of to-day forget that, to the cabman who drives him, the most interesting character in fact or fiction is only a fare. And this goes through life: the average individual looks upon other individuals solely as regards their connection with himself.

The gift of understanding humanity did not belong to Poe. He was, in the widest sense of the word, self-centred, and this is more apparent in his poems than in his short stories. Of course, one reads these poems now almost exclusively on account of their verbal melody. They come as near being a mere arrangement of words as the most zealous devotee of art for art's sake can desire. In the letter to B— prefixed to the poems, Poe, referring to his antithesis, Dr. Johnson, says:

Think of all that is airy and fairy-like, and then of all that is hideous and unwieldy; think of his huge bulk, the Elephant! and then—and then think of the "Tempest"—the "Midsummer Night's Dream"—Prospero—Oberon—and Titania! . . .

And he goes on to give a definition of poetry as he conceives it:

A poem, in my opinion, is opposed to a work of science by having, for its immediate object, pleasure, not truth; to romance, by having for its object an indefinite instead of a definite pleasure, being a poem only so far as this object is attained; romance presenting perceptible images with definite, poetry with indefinite sensations, to which end music is an essential, since the comprehension of sweet sound is our most indefinite conception. Music, when combined with a pleasurable idea, is poetry; music without the idea is simply music; the idea without the music is prose from its very definitiveness.

It is interesting to take a poem like "The Haunted Palace" and consider it in the light of this definition.

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace—
Radiant palace—reared its head.
In the monarch Thought's dominion—
It stood there!
Never seraph spread a pinion
Over fabric half so fair!

Banners yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow,
(This—all this—was in the olden Time long ago,)
And every gentle air that dallied,
In that sweet day,
Along the ramparts plumed and pallid,
A winged odor went away.

There is thought of a kind here, and it is so simple and obvious that it seems to have been taken merely as something round which to wind these musical sentences and phrases. It seems as though Poe were turning over in his mind the pathos of his own history, to which he is never deaf. This comes out in the last two stanzas:

But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate.
(Ah, let us mourn!—for never morrow Shall dawn upon him desolate!)
And round about his home the glory
That blushed and bloomed,
Is but a dim-remembered story
Of the old time entombed.

And travellers, now, within that valley,
Through the red-litten windows see
Vast forms, that move fantastically
To a discordant melody,
While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door
A hideous throng rush out forever
And laugh—but smile no more.

If regret and sorrow are true materials for verse, there is abundance of them here; and the note is one that goes through all his works, and is indeed almost the only one he possesses. It undoubtedly finds its most perfect expression in "Annabel Lee," that wail of sorrow which sings of itself:

But our love it was stronger by far than the love
Of those who were older than we—
Of many far wiser than we—
And neither the angels in heaven above,
Nor the demons down under the sea,
Can ever dissever my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee:

For the moon never beams, without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee;
And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee:
And so, all the night-tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling—my darling—my life and my bride,
In the sepulchre there by the sea—
In her tomb by the sounding sea.

The vagueness which he actually sought for in verse, extends to his descriptions. We do feel in a certain way that he was impressed by his surroundings. Often in "Annabel Lee" the aspect of the sea is suggested by means so fine that they are almost imperceptible, and perhaps no one has rendered so well that period of the year when the "rotten woodland drips" as he has done in "Ulalume":

The skies they were ashen and sober;
The leaves they were crisped and sere—
The leaves they were withering and sere;
It was night in the lonesome October
Of my most immemorial year;
It was hard by the dim lake of Auber,
In the misty mid region of Weir—
It was down by the dank tarn of Auber,
In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir.

In all this the word-music is by far the most obvious characteristic, and a certain weariness that comes through too much reading of Poe may probably be attributed to this fact. In the best of our reading we seem to discover new meanings at each fresh perusal; and sometimes we might almost say that the mere words cease to allure us as soon as we go for consolation to poetry, and few will dispute Matthew Arnold's dictum that one of the highest functions of poetry is to console. When Carlyle, after the burning of his manuscript of "The French Revolution," longed for some simple words of poetry, he was expressing the need of the troubled and weary heart for comfort, to which poetry is one response. No doubt it is as true on the other side that moral maxims in the form of rhyme, though they may be very excellent guides to conduct and enshrine much wisdom, are not in themselves poetry. But thought and expression in poetry of the very highest order are so closely wedded that they are not two but one. Whenever the balance is unequal the result is at least comparative failure. Browning packed with thought is as undesirable as Poe with nothing but fine embroidery round one slender idea. A.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Geoffrey Chaucer" by Alfred W. Pollard.]

FICTION

Miss Desmond. By MARIE VAN VORST. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THE rich, selfish, "smart" married woman, her lover, and her apparently corrupt, but really innocent child, have done duty so often in fiction that it takes no little strength of characterisation to make them live again. A split infinitive on the twelfth page, a sentence of most slovenly construction on the eleventh, the Swiss hotel, the rich Americans, the idle aristocratic Englishman, all promised an entertainment of little distinction or originality. But these forebodings were not justified. The beautiful and natural temperament of Virginia Desmond and the touching character of her worldly little niece, Molly Strutchers, both gain in importance as the story develops, and both impart charm to it. Virginia is the American Puritan who comes straight from her garden and her secluded home into the mephitic atmosphere of her sister's world. The sister is not there at first, but the daughter and the lover are, and they suggest the atmosphere to Virginia's horrified soul. The lover, with his lurid past and complicated affections, reminds us of Ouida's heroes, and at the crisis of his fate we think he is what Tinkler called Peter Pan. He did not want to marry Molly, he was not bound to do so, but the eyes of Molly's mother were "the embodiment of will and magnetism." Rather than resist them he became her son-in-law. This seems to us an insufficient reason for a marriage that came hard on Virginia. Bedford's affections and relationships are a good deal tangled throughout the story. He loves Molly's mother till he sees Virginia: soon after he sees Virginia he marries Molly because her mother tells him he must. After his marriage he is, of course, Virginia's nephew. Therefore we ought to have looked at the Table of Kindred in the Prayer Book before we went down the terrace steps at the end of the story. But Virginia is a charming woman, and if her shadowy Englishman could make her happy we will leave her with him in her garden, the white chrysanthemums falling from her hands.

The Red-haired Woman: her Autobiography. By LOUISE KENNY. (Murray, 6s.)

WE believe and hope that Miss Louise Kenny is a young writer and this her first book. That she is inexperienced, sentences such as the following amply testify: "But the small man of the house, her only son, aged five, aimed a half-rotten turnip, which smashed on the side of the emergency-man's head, so that he was the horriblest-looking object even the two policemen on patrol duty had ever seen, who presently stopped what they took to be a runaway." Ourselves Irish, we took up "The Red-haired Woman" with anxious expectations. Its early scenes—laid in the hot, throbbing days of threatenings, blunderbusses, and emergency-men—lured us on with a promise of stirring events to come. But dreary pages rewarded us: no ray of Irish humour, wit, life, or love. We find no trace of the rebellious, warm-blooded, tantalising Ireland we all know and love for her very heat and inconsistency, and we are bored by the interminable speeches of dull, commonplace folk. Miss Kenny calls her novel an autobiography, and the Red-haired Woman, in pursuance of the idea, gives us the detailed history of her venerable grandmother, respected father, lovely mother, honourable uncle (Chief of the O'Currys), and so on—four hundred odd pages of them: some disagreeable, all uninteresting, and she herself as uninteresting as they. She is too much engaged in striking attitudes—pointing the finger of scorn at the withered cheek of the hoary villain and thumping her breast until, she tells us, it resounds as hollowly as a drum thumped by a lad in the forefront of a battle. We doubt whether Miss Peggy O'Curry, the Red-haired Woman in question, was really Irish. True, she had "the wickedest pair of great, sparkling, sea-green eyes," and made astonishingly short work of at least four lovers, one of whom wrote love-letters by the pound avoirdupois. But neither her method nor her conversation is Irish, and she, in common with all the characters, is unconvincing. There are signs of promise in the early chapters of the book, but we advise Miss Kenny, if she proposes to write another novel, to study nature a little more, and to breathe life into the people she presents. She has introduced many Irish words, but she has not caught the Irish trick of speech, and she has exaggerated; with the result that she merely irritates when she might have amused.

A Heart's Harmony. By ETHEL M. FORBES. (Melrose, 6s.)

IN this quiet story of a girl's life there is nothing new, but there is much that is pleasant, true and wholesome. Hester Campbell is the daughter of a learned Scots minister, who does all the usual absent-minded things expected from his kind, even to keeping the wedding-party waiting till ten o' the clock. Here also is the familiar faithful old Scots servant, happily less tyrannical and dour than many of her predecessors; and the clever young doctor who is lost in admiration of Hester's profound knowledge of human nature. Hester possesses the merry heart that goes all the way, a cheerful sense of duty, and the enthusiasm of the new discoverer of old truths. Her opinions and fancies, strengthened by numberless quotations, fill half the volume; they are neither novel nor striking, but they are all on the side of charity and kindness and show a sunny outlook on life and an amiable toleration for the ideas and follies of less thoughtful persons. Yet Hester is no prig, though we had doubts at the one critical moment of the story in which she receives the doctor's father, who has come to pass judgment upon her, with a shower of moral fireworks. It was all right, and ever after we firmly believed in Hester's personal charm. The chapter concerning Hester's childhood, and her work among the poor of Edinburgh supply some amusing, as well as touching experiences. No story could run upon simpler lines than "A Heart's Harmony," but out of rather scanty materials Miss Forbes has made a very readable book.

Mr. Lion of London, and some Affairs of the Heart. By J. J. BELL. (Hodder & Stoughton, 5s.)

THE immense success achieved by "Wee Macgregor" has fired its author to essay greater things. From a series of incidents in the career of one entertaining little personality Mr. Bell has turned to a series of tales quite unconnected, each one standing alone, depending solely upon itself. And so it comes about that his "Wee Macgregor" method of a touch here and a touch there, all going to make up a charming and delightful whole, avails him here very little. For in the short story (perhaps the most difficult form of literary art), there is less scope for these things. One must strike the reader in a vital part, and strike him quickly and hard. The truth is that all through this book the author has relied not on the story but on the telling of it. He has set about his task lightheartedly, with no anxiety as to form or substance, fancying, one would think, that a flicker of sentiment or a thread of comedy is enough to work on: then, with all speed, put pen to paper, and the story will tell itself. And so, perhaps, it will. But the result will be purely artificial, lacking the touch of human nature that alone can give warmth and life, and compel sympathy. A striking example of what we mean is the story called "An Unsuccessful Merchant." The beginning is prettily conceived, and admirably told. The end is frankly farcical, and worse still, the author's charm of wording forsakes him utterly. The result is intolerable. Again, "Son John"—which at first bids fair to be the best story in the book—is ruined by a shameless page of explanation towards the end. The title-story, "Mr. Lion of London," we have heard in various forms before, and the present version by no means justifies the re-telling. One or two of the tales are on a higher level. "Peter Batt—Bookworm," and "Old Wadd's Love Affair," are both charmingly told, and strike a different note from the rest: while "The Pining of Mildred" is a pleasant little comedy. But the book as a whole is disappointing.

A Daughter of Thor. By HELEN MAXWELL. (Brown, Langham, 6s.)

THIS story suffers considerably from its very faulty construction. The interest is undecided in direction, and disproportionately arranged. The first part of the book is devoted to a pleasant girl called Delia, with one chapter from her diary, which is an interruption in that form, and could have been incorporated in two pages of narrative, or less. When the heroine appears, she is interesting, but if the author had not been equally interested in Delia, we should have had a better character-study of the half-pagan "daughter of Thor." The story has many good points; it is healthy and not too introspective, and we really want to know what happens to the people in it, an unusual frame of mind in reading a modern novel. There is more in Helen Maxwell than she has the knowledge to express, as yet; she has feeling for character and its effects, and should one day improve on her "Daughter of Thor."

Cat Tales. By W. L. ALDEN. Illustrated by LOUIS WAIN. (Digby, Long, 6s.)

THOSE who like cats will not care for this hard-hearted book. The joke is always against the cat, who is made ridiculous in various ways; and there is a tale of two cats fighting, set on by their masters, one combatant in armour and the other with explosives under its paws, which is a catalogue of sheer cruelty. This is all done in the name of Humour; one could more easily forgive it if she had accepted the sacrifice and answered the invocation. The "stately, kindly, lordly friend" does not once appear in the book, and when, as in the first story, mutual affection between cat and owner is touched upon, it is usually as a cue for ridicule. It is possible to smile here and there in the perusal, and the book might please a youth in the most callous stage of boyhood. Lest it should move him to try experiments on the neighbouring cats, however, it should be carefully kept from him. The two more serious stories, "Saint's Rest" and "Monty's Friend," are not displeasing, but there is no cat-character in them; their feline heroes are nebulous abstractions. Mr. Louis Wain's illustrations are successful so far as his cats are concerned, and he has not shrunk from making humorous capital from dead cats where the text demands it.

Nostalgia. By GRAZIA DELEDDA. Translated from the Italian by HELEN HESTER COLVILL. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

WE have dipped casually into the novel from time to time in the pages of the Fortnightly, and it is now possible to read it as it appears in the form of a novel. We have done so with more interest than pleasure. The book might be called a study in discontent. Indeed the name Nostalgia only gives the esoteric grace of mystery to that homely feeling, and endows it with the distinction that belongs to a decadent disease. The chief character—patient we might almost say, for the book is somewhat akin to a treatise—is Regina, and there is no scene or chapter in which she does not appear. We are brought to see everything through her eyes. She is introduced coming from her home in the country where she has spent her girlhood, with a husband whom she has just married, to Rome. She has always dreamed of Rome, and longed to live there. Her sorrow begins with the realisation of her first dream. Her husband, Antonio, has told her that his family is not so well-bred as her own, is in fact quite bourgeois; and that they will be obliged to live with that family for at least a year, until he can afford to rent an apartment of his own. But she has not understood what this entails, and having learned by experience she makes no effort to resist circumstances or to change them, but quietly succumbs to the influence of misery, which grows more and more intolerable, as her nerves become less able to bear the strain of continual noise and vulgar familiarity. We are told that all the time she loves her husband as he loves her, but no signs of her love are apparent either in her moods or treatment of him. At last Antonio is able to rent a tiny apartment on a fourth floor. For a week after the removal Regina is slightly cheered; but for no longer. The disease again attacks her. She can stand it no longer. She dreams perpetually of the home in the country which she has left, and on the eve of her departure for a month's holiday to that home she writes a letter to her husband pointing out how much she loves him and how utterly impossible it is for her to live with him until he is in the position to offer her a more commodious flat. So she intends to stay at home for a year or two until he is in that position. It is a clever letter and necessarily a very long one. She has only stayed, however, a few days at home when she finds she cannot live without Antonio, who does not in the least understand her long explanation and sends no reply. Alone in Rome he comes to an arrangement with a rich old woman whose secretary he is, and makes money enough thereby to get a larger flat. There is a reconciliation, and with the birth of their child peace comes. But Regina suspects the nature of the arrangement, and in a last long scene with Antonio her suspicion proves correct. Up to this point we have been shown a subtle study of a subtly morbid character; the last scene presupposes a woman of strength and determination, and is for that reason unconvincing in spite of points of cleverness. There seems nothing to justify the assumption that Regina will change in any way, even though she realises at the crucial moment that a woman must "fulfil her cycle" and has seen the vision of her own mother laying a hand in forgiveness on the head of her father, the spend-thrift.

Cavalieri Moderni. By FANNY ZAMPINI SALAZAR. (Rome: Enrico Voghera.)

ON the title-page of this novel there is a quotation from Giuseppe Mazzini, to the effect that all who write do so for the sake of writing, and not for the sake of teaching, whereas the literary career ought to be a moral priesthood. From this we must gather that Signorina Zampini Salazar does not approve of a book without a direct moral purpose, of a study which is not an explicit criticism, of a novel which does not include a lay sermon. However, this may be, the quotation is very apt at the beginning of this, her latest work; for we have seldom read a novel of so high a standard in which less attempt was made to disguise the doctrinal and pamphleteering side of the book. It is a sociological and political novel, which aims chiefly at showing the necessity of introducing a law of divorce and the institution of affiliation orders. The protagonists fall into three classes. They are either men and women of genuine religious faith and high morality, who come into conflict with unjust or defective laws on the one hand and the immovability of Rome on the other; or they are decadent, ambitious or immoral people, who profit by those very conditions which are hindrances in the way of the righteous; or, last, they are unreasoning conservatives or men too weak to join their efforts to those of the men whose attitude they at heart approve. Of course, to say that this is a novel with a purpose is not to pass a criticism on it. But a word must be said as to the author's method. The treatment of those characters which show the injustice that exists and must exist in the present state of Italian law, is excellent: the story interests, and the study of human nature is convincing: we feel that we are face to face with reality, and the facts of the story speak more than volumes of theoretic pleading. But the treatment of the hero, Gino Mariani, forms a most unfortunate exception. The author could have made a fascinating study of this young enthusiast, who thinks that by means of personal devotion, great scientific and political knowledge and patriotic altruism he may play no small part in remedying the ills of society. What she has made of him is a mouthpiece, through which to proclaim her theories: and in reading many of his speeches we could easily imagine we were reading an article in a review with the title Per il divorzio. In spite of this defect, Cavalieri Moderni must be pronounced a most interesting study of present-day Roman life, and we look forward to reading the novels which, we are told in the preface, are to follow this.

FINE ART

THE OLD MASTERS AT BURLINGTON HOUSE

WITH a few exceptions, one Hals, four Van Dycks, two Jordaens, this year's exhibition is entirely composed of English painters, and it is a subject for congratulation that we are not conscious of any falling off in interest. Of late years we have had too much of foreign schools, especially early Flemish and Italian, and many of us are glad of a respite. The "experts" who have threatened to overwhelm genuine criticism with matters of secondary interest, attributions, identifications, classifications, etc., will have little scope for their activities. "Those who frequent museums and burrow in crypts; collecting—comparing—compiling—classifying—contradicting—establishing, with due weight, unimportant reputations—disputations and dictatorial, concerning the birthplace of inferior persons," here at last there is no place for the exertions of such as these.

Of course, as must be expected, our greatest masters, Reynolds, Gainsborough and Turner, who are at their ease in the best company, stand supreme, but there are several English painters, not generally considered of the first rank, who bear comparison remarkably well. At first glance the large portrait group by William Dobson might well be ascribed to the hand of his master, Van Dyck. It must have been one of the last works from his brush, as the portrait of himself looks like that of a man fully thirty-six, his age when he died. One wonders, did he burn the candle at both ends like his master? Van Dyck was never greater than in his portraits of beautiful men, for one feels underneath all the trappings and costumes which he rendered so superbly, not only the lovable gentlemen, but the lovable nervous animal, the living breathing creature. The portraits of women give this sensation less invariably. Here Dobson has caught his master's gift with wonderful success. The portrait of the Duke of Richmond and Lennox by Van Dyck, lent by the Earl of Darnley, is less compelling in its mastery than that other in a white shirt, as Paris, belonging to the Marquis of Bristol, which is not here.

How many of these promising English painters died young—Caldecott at forty, Bonington at twenty-six, Pinwell at thirty-three, Houghton at thirty-nine, Cecil Lawson at thirty-one, Walker at thirty-five! And of those who lived longer, how few continued, like Reynolds and Turner, to grow in achievement to the last! Not Millais certainly, nor Rossetti, nor Phil Morris, nor Simeon Solomon, nor even, as will surely be recognised, Burne-Jones or Watts.

William Collins is not generally placed in the first rank, but how near he was to greatness can be seen in his picture of The Harvest Shower. Constable's influence is evident in the younger man's work, but there is a sweetness and delicacy of sentiment that is all Collins. The sky is a wonderful piece of subtle observation and simple mastery. Turner's versatility is again stupendously evident. We have the early sea-piece, hard, black, just a little brutal, in the Pilot-boat, Dutch in influence, realistic in intention. Then in the later middle period the "classical composition," Temple of Jupiter, which I am glad to have seen because it more than justifies Ruskin in his classification of it "under the general head of nonsense pictures." Turner was feeling his way to his great epics in this hard, niggling, tedious, vulgar abortion. But what a man! Fancy fighting through leagues of this sort of stuff with its infinite labour and patience to achieve at last the dreams of Venice and the Bay of Baiae. Finally, there is the amazing Adonis departing for the Chase, his unique emulation of Titian. Considering that his drawing of the nude was always shaky, the Amorini and the Venus are passable in that respect and the dogs are worthy of Rubens. As for the colour it is Titian himself with the addition of Turner's eye for reflected lights. Sir Walter Armstrong states in his Life that this picture was painted from 1806-10, but not exhibited at the Royal Academy till 1849, two years before Turner's death. This is certainly curious, and I should suspect that Turner took it up at intervals, as the quality is mature. The Old Masters cannot be dealt with in a single article and I shall therefore return to the subject later.

B. S.

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF SCULPTORS, PAINTERS AND GRAVERS AT THE NEW GALLERY

THE sixth exhibition of this society is more representative of considerable foreign artists than heretofore. Not only have we an admirable collection of the older impressionists, Manet, Monet, Sisley, Pissarro, but for the first time there are adequate examples of Besnard, Carrière, Cézanne, and others. The rest of the exhibition is largely made up of Scottish and American artists.

There is a curious lack of colour and individuality about most of the American work that I have seen. Occasionally it is full of scholarship and intelligence, as in the Mother and Child of M. de Forest Brush, and the Sheep Pasture by Mr. H. W. Ranger; but unless an American is entirely Europeanised, he is apt to lose personality. The name of Mr. James Morrice is new to me, but, if he is an American, he is Gallicised completely. His two Marines are of the highest rank and are equal to the best work of Manet. Indeed I attributed one of them to Manet; that with the boats and pier has just the slight but sure touch of that painter.

Perhaps the members of the Glasgow school obtained recognition too soon. In any case, now that the chief members have fallen into line with orthodox methods, they are less interesting than in the wild and outrageous periods of Alexander Roche, Brown Macdougall and other exhilarating personalities. Mr. Hornel continues, however, to get an effect of romance and decorative beauty with his queer tin-like technique.

Of the Dutch artists among the younger men the most gifted that are to be seen here are Mr. Cossaar and Mr. Bruckman, both of whom showed their remarkable powers in recent London exhibitions. Mr. Cossaar's From Blackfriars Bridge is less powerful than most of his work. The Landscape in Normandy of Mr. Bruckman, on the other hand, is perfect in its way, low in tone and approaching to monochrome, but with great subtlety in a limited range of colours. Lowness of tone also characterises Mr. Charles Shannon's The Millpond, in which the nude figures are grandly modelled. Mr. Ricketts combines Daumier, Blake and Watts in rather sophisticated compositions.

Mr. Nicholson's sense for colour, which might have been suspected in his famous wood-cuts, is brought to perfection in The Jewelled Bandalore and the Portrait of Mrs. Curle. The chord of lilac, scarlet and black in the latter picture has been very happily struck.

But when we come to the great Impressionists, especially Manet and Sisley, it is like taking a deep breath of ozone. After this nearly all the English, Scotch and Dutch work feels stuffy, museumy, unhappy. It reeks of turpentine. Le Linge of Manet makes one laugh with sympathy: it is so happy and sunny and simple. Le Verger and L'Inondation of Sisley, La Plage of Bondin, the Crystal Palace of Pissarro—there is nothing professional or boring about these pictures. These are "things seen" with clear eyes and noted with steady hands, and they soar right away from the rest of the Exhibition.

B. S.

MUSIC

THE OVERTURE

NEXT to the Symphony, the Overture holds the most important place amongst the definite forms into which modern orchestral music is cast, and the Concert Overture is a form in which even more activity is displayed, and certainly more success achieved at the present day, than in its greater and more exacting sister form—the Symphony. The structural principles of the latter are binding and exact, and though they have shown themselves capable of great expansion in the past, and still hold out a prospect of wider possibilities for the future, they impose a discipline upon the composer, which but few present-day geniuses are strong enough to bear. The Overture, however, is less restricted, and has maintained its identity through countless changes of form and treatment, until it has arrived at its present position as a sort of connecting-link between abstract and illustrative music, claiming descent from classical times and justified by classical precedent, and yet sufficiently elastic to be suitable for the expression of ideas as completely non-musical as are the retreat from Moscow and life in London.

The reason for this peculiar position of the Overture is to be found, as in the case of the Concerto, which I discussed not long since in the ACADEMY, in its history. Its name has become almost as misleading as that of the Concerto, and yet in the derivation of the name is to be found its particular function which preserved to it this elasticity. The Overture proper is an opening to a larger work, and hence is in its very essence not self-contained. The elementary attempts of Monteverdi and Cavalli to write overtures to their operas were attempts to prepare the minds of their audience for the moods and sensations, which the scenes of the opera following were intended to call forth; they were musical scene-painting or illustration. Later, when the formal side of musical art occupied the attention of musicians, this primary consideration of relevancy, that is, of its relation to subject-matter not in itself musical, was for the time being lost sight of. The crude illustrative movements of these early writers, slight and musically ill developed as they were, offered no satisfactory precedent to men such as Handel, Lulli and Alessandro Scarlatti. These all consequently adopted a very different attitude with regard to the overtures to their operas and oratorios, aiming only at composing a group of solid and musicianly movements with little or no regard to what was to follow. Such a procedure was bound to bring about stereotyped and conventional results, and two arrangements of these groups, known generally as the French and Italian, were the outcome of it. The French Overture, the arrangement of Lulli adopted by Handel, consisted in a sombre "Grave" or "Largo" movement, followed by a fugue, the latter sometimes consistently worked out, but often treated very loosely, a Minuet or Gigue often closing the Overture. This curious mixture of solemnity, intellectuality and frivolity was applied by Handel to opera and oratorio alike, so that such titles as "Arminius," "Julius Cæsar," "Jephtha," "Messiah," might, as far as the overtures are concerned, be changed without any special incongruity. "Messiah" has no Minuet, but neither has "Julius Cæsar;" it is known that Handel intended his "Messiah" to have one, but perhaps he was deterred by a sense of fitness. The Italian Overture, of which A. Scarlatti was the first most notable exponent, grouped its three movements thus: an Allegro, developed seriously and at length, a slow movement, and a lively conclusion. This became the type for Italian opera writers in general. Regarded as an overture, it was quite as irrelevant as the French form, but its very irrelevancy proved a blessing to the art. Such overtures were found to be just as interesting when performed without their succeeding operas, and so were the parent of the Symphony of Haydn's time, and all that that has led to need not here be set forth. It is well known.

Since both these forms lost sight of the first principle of the Overture—appropriateness to some other subject-matter—they did not permanently advance its cause. One other composer of this time—J. S. Bach—attempted to deal with the problem in a thoroughly characteristic manner. As prologues to his great church cantatas, the two "Passions," the "Christmas Oratorio," etc., he adopted a form of choral overture which contemplated the subject to be dealt with. He could not do otherwise. His personal reverence was too strong to allow him to use irrelevant dance measures, his orchestral technique not sufficiently developed worthily to speak the prologue to such high matters. As with his methods in other directions, however, this was too completely the outcome of Bach's own individuality to give the law to his immediate successors, and it was rather in connection with opera than with oratorio that the orchestral Overture was to receive development.

Mozart's influence upon the Overture was again rather formal than otherwise, but with him the one-movement form, or one movement preceded by an introduction closely linked with it, became the rule. Thus the overture to Don Giovanni is the prototype of the familiar form used by Beethoven, Weber and Mendelssohn. A single movement in a free Sonata form was in the hands of those masters sufficiently pliable to depict with complete success the heroism of Coriolanus, the romance of Leonora, or the fairy mystery of Oberon or A Midsummer Night's Dream. With the romantic period of musical art we see the Overture gradually weaned from its mother the Opera. The first step is the overture written to a spoken play, as with Egmont and Coriolanus, where the illustration of the emotions of the play could not be effected by the reproduction of the musical qualities of the work illustrated. Weber could in the Overture illustrate Oberon with themes connected with the fairy plot which follows, but Mendelssohn in A Midsummer Night's Dream had to treat the abstract idea musically. Hence readily follows the plan of writing an Overture upon the ideas or emotions aroused by a great historical character, a well-known story, a beautiful scene in nature, quite apart from the stage, and we have Eine-Faust-Ouverture, and Fingal's Cave. The Concert Overture, having become established as an independent musical form, dependent only upon a non-musical idea, it became superfluous as a prelude to opera or oratorio. Wagner discarded it in his music-dramas, using instead, in Parsifal, the slighter, less self-important form of prelude. Now that its powers of suggestion are so developed, the Overture as a prelude to a larger work is very apt to become tautologous, and its presence, like the opening ritornello of the Concerto is felt to be conventional. It is noteworthy in this connection that Sir Edward Elgar, whose genius is particularly happy in the Overture form, has in his oratorio The Apostles returned to Bach's method, and substituted the choral Prologue for the Overture.

Thus the Overture holds a unique position in our art. The Symphony is, and must ever remain, at its best, the greatest monument of pure and independent music. From this the Overture is as much separated as it is from dramatic music. Its best specimens, moreover, stand aloof from the vagaries of unqualified programme music, while it partakes sufficiently of its spirit to give it the individuality, without which it would be but a poor substitute for the Symphony. It is an eclectic amongst musical forms, and it is therefore worth while to direct attention towards it at a time when the great need is, that composers should collect together the best from the vast mass of experience, which the eventful nineteenth century has placed at their disposal, and with discrimination should sum up the efforts of their predecessors.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Cambridge University Press is about to issue Professor W. W. Goodwin's edition of "Demosthenes against Midias," a companion volume to "Demosthenes on the Crown" published in 1901. The oration has a special interest for scholars as the only existing argument in a case of προβολή; and in an Appendix which follows the text and notes, Professor Goodwin illustrates the peculiar character of the προβολή by treating it in connection with the εἰσαγγελία and with other special forms of public suits in which the authority of the State appears in various ways contrary to the general principal of Attic law, by which the prosecutor in a public suit was not the government (as in English law) but an individual citizen. The Press are also adding two new volumes to their Pitt Press Series. One contains Burke's Speeches on American Taxation and on Conciliation with the Colonies, edited by Mr. Arthur Innes. The other is an edition by Mr. J. C. Nicol, Head Master of Portsmouth Grammar School, of Cicero's speech Pro Sexto Roscio Amerino.

The Cambridge University Press will also publish shortly an important new work by Dr. J. L. E. Dreyer, Director of the Armagh Observatory, on the "History of the Planetary Systems from Thales to Kepler." Dr. Dreyer in this book attempts to trace the history of man's conception of the universe from the earliest historical ages to the completion of the Copernican system by Kepler in the seventeenth century, showing the gradual emancipation from primitive ideas during the rise of Greek philosophy and science, the relapse during the ages following the destruction of the seats of Greek culture, and the rapid advance of knowledge after the revival of learning at the end of the Middle Ages.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. are about to publish the first volume of a work which should prove of considerable interest to anthropologists. This is "The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas," by Dr. Edward Westermarck, Lecturer on Sociology in the University of Finland at Helsingfors, and teacher of that subject at London University. The book is the outcome of many years' work, for the inductive method employed has entailed reference to an enormous number of authorities. Moreover, Dr. Westermarck has drawn from the life as well. He has sojourned several times in the less known parts of Morocco, and in support of his arguments he cites many curious customs and beliefs which he observed to be prevalent among his Moorish neighbours. It is hoped that the second volume will be ready for publication before the close of the year.

On February 1 Mr. Murray will publish "The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar"—Thomas Masterman Hardy, Charles Bullen, and Henry Digby—by A. M. Broadley and R. G. Bartelot. The book will contain the correspondence between Hardy and his Dorset relatives, 1798-1839, which, it was erroneously supposed, had been destroyed, but was discovered at Dorchester last year. The letters throw new light on the public and private life of Nelson, and give a striking picture of the condition of the Dorset country throughout the war. The book will be fully illustrated, and will contain, as an appendix, a complete muster roll of the Victory on October 21, 1805.

The Oxford University Press announce for early publication "Scenes from Old Playbooks," arranged as an introduction to Shakespeare by Mr. Percy Simpson. This book is an attempt to solve in practical form some of the difficulties involved in a first reading of Shakespeare, and it has been edited solely with an eye to young readers. The only notes are stage notes, and these have been lavishly supplied; Mr. Simpson thinks that their helpfulness in a school edition seems as yet to be imperfectly recognised. A glossary is, of course, provided.

It may be of interest to golfers and to St. Andreans and those who know St. Andrews, to hear that at Easter a novel may be looked for entitled "Stymied!" the story of a short summer sojourn at St. Andrews. The author is Mr. Murray-Maitland.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE IMMORTAL PHRASE To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It seems to me that there is only one difficulty in justifying preference of Shelley over Wordsworth, and that is, material is so plentiful one scarcely knows where to begin. Most admirers of Shelley have battered upon anthologies, and to quote wholesale from "Adonais," "The Lark," and "The Cloud," would convey no illumination. I will select from "The Revolt of Islam":

"where the irresistible storm had cloven
That fearful darkness, the blue sky was seen.
Fretted with many a fair cloud interwoven
Most delicately."

Again:

"as the war became more fierce
Between the whirlwinds and the rack on high,
That spot grew more serene: blue light did pierce
The woof of those white clouds,"

"while through the sky
The pallid semicircle of the moon
Passed on."

Follows the magnificent description of the fight between the Eagle and Serpent.

I proceed, and ask, "Could Wordsworth have struck forth such an opening line as:

"In Argolis beside the echoing sea."

More masterly descriptive work:

"O'er the still sea and jagged islets darted
The light of moonrise: in the northern heaven
Among the clouds near the horizon driven,
The mountains lay beneath one planet pale."

Description of a ravaged village :

"the wide sky,
Flooded with lightning, was ribbed overhead
By the black rafters."

Martin should have gone to "The Revolt of Islam" for subjects. Many other magnificent specimens of lofty and picturesque description remain. Note particularly the lovely and original vision of the diver rising swiftly through the emerald water :

"like a spark sent up out of a burning oven."

We come to the well-known gem from "Prometheus Unbound." Here we may throw away our Wordsworth, and confidently challenge Homer, Milton, Pindar.

"I see cars drawn by rainbow-winged steeds
Which trample the dim winds ; in each there stands
A wild-eyed charioteer, urging their flight ;
Some look behind, as fiends pursued them there,
And yet I see no shapes but the keen stars ;
Others, with burning eyes, lean forth, and drink
With eager lips the wind of their own speed,
As if the thing they loved fled on before,
And now, even now, they clasped it."

Shelley's marvellous power of description lay in his mastery of the knack of "dotting" monosyllabic periods with sonorous polysyllables. I think, leaving descriptive excellence out of question, there is but one poet who has equalled the above in stately harmony—Marlowe (Faustus apostrophising Helen).

In the rare faculty of sublime invocation Shelley is supreme. I will not quote in full the much-quoted appeal to the Genius of the West Wind :

"If I were a dead leaf thou mightest bear," but will pass on to the veiled invoking of the dormant English love of freedom in :

"England still sleeps ; was she not called of old ;
Spain calls her now, as with its thrilling thunder
Vesuvius wakens Etna," etc.

There may, of course, be many good judges, able to perceive greater force and splendour in Wordsworth's efforts. I confess that I cannot, and I would even suggest that Arnold, that intelligent and glorified schoolmaster, throws the onus of Shelley's supposed ineffectualness, not upon the span of the luminous wings, but upon the unassailable void.

D. GULLIVER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I must protest in the name of many lovers of poetry against the statement contained in your note in the current ACADEMY.

One would imagine after reading it that Shelley never wrote any great poetry, for if I understand its meaning at all great poetry must contain many immortal phrases. It is quite useless to argue on matters of opinion, and equally fruitless to compare passages from different authors, hence I do not consider the question of the relative merit of Wordsworth and Shelley.

But if immortal phrases are required I think that they are to be found in plenty in the words of the latter. Your correspondent was scarcely fortunate in his selections, and I would submit the following as my own selections from two sources only :

"The One remains, the many change and pass
Heaven's Light for ever shines, Earth's shadows fly ;
Life, like a dome of many-coloured glass
Stains the white radiance of Eternity
Until Death trample it to fragments."

"He has outsoared the shadow of our night
Envy and calumny, and hate and pain
Nor that unrest which men miscall delight,
Can touch him not, nor torture him again."

Or that one line from the poem on Leonardo's Medusa :

"The tempestuous loveliness of terror."

Every lover of Shelley could give many more instances. Possibly Wordsworth's arresting passages, matchless as they often are, are the more remarkable through being too often but oases in a dreary desert. To decide upon the relative merits of the best of each poet's work, seems to me as hopeless as to decide whether the rose or the violet be the loveliest of flowers.

E. R. B.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The question of the "immortal phrase," which usually determines the question of genius in a poet, seems to me the exception which proves the rule in its bearing on Shelley. Mr. Wright's unfortunate examples, as commented on in current ACADEMY, suggest only the facile wordy femininity of much of Shelley's poetry. If one could imagine the evolution of a true poet from an ancestry of sentimental verse-mongers, say, such as L. E. L., Hon. Mrs. Norton and even Mrs. Hemans, the inspired outcome might have been a Shelley. It is very true that he "seldom reaches (the immortal phrase) absolutely" but the "purer ether" of poetic thought seems to bear one through his elongated rhapsodies in unarrested dream. There are some notable passages in the "Prometheus Unbound" and elsewhere, such as that in which occurs "the last glare of day's red ago-y" ; but seldom is he distinguished by phrases of human pathos like those of Wordsworth. Where they do occur, they seem to lack, somehow, the grand manner. It is unnecessary to quote, as students of Shelley must of necessity know them ; but I should like to ask where is truer lyrical poetry to be found than in the "The Sensitive Plant," "Ode to the West Wind," "Hymn of Pan," and in the majority of his lesser poems? There is a danger of fining down our great poets, in this hypercritical age, to a pitiable minimum.

January 6.

EASTWOOD KIDSON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I suppose it is very unorthodox of me, but I prefer Shelley's "Lost Echo sits amid the voiceless mountains" to any of those passages of "unquestioned beauty" to which you refer.

Those lines, too, which Mr. H. P. Wright quotes, seem at least equal in beauty with those you give.

In matters of this sort you can fix no standard. To each of us the lines which more particularly appeal to him are the best. Why should we seek to parcel poetry into brands superior and inferior—as though forsooth, the thoughts of men (the poorest thoughts, even) were to be treated like shop-wares?

J. B. W.

STUDIES IN POETRY AND CRITICISM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Macgregor, in commenting on my letter, has travelled somewhat far afield. In quoting Matthew Arnold I seem to have unwittingly displayed the proverbial red rag ; but my object was merely to show that the idea put forth by Mr. Churton Collins was no new one. Why Mr. Macgregor should have bombarded me with his "Inner Mysticism of the Mystery" and his "Occultism," I am unable to conceive.

In these days when we are all more than "three-fourths" full of culture, the Apostle of Culture needs no defence of mine ; but I would like to point out that Arnold defended himself in his lifetime for the use of the phrase "Conduct is three-fourths of life." He explained that he merely meant to indicate a proportion less than the whole, Life being made up of other things as well as conduct.

In conclusion, let me recommend to Mr. Macgregor, a further and more careful study of Arnold's writings.

January 6.

E. A. ONGLEY.

THE BOOKSHELF

Place-Names of Ross and Cromarty. By W. J. Watson. (Inverness: The Northern Counties Printing and Publishing Company, 20s. 6d.) This is a book of the first importance in its class. Mr. Watson is a Gaelic-speaking Celt, and he has limited the area of inquiry to a comparatively small region in which Gaelic is still a really living language. He has traversed all parts of the county except Lewis, inquiring, consulting, verifying and deducing from his knowledge and experience the results here set down. But though his investigations have primarily and professedly been limited to Ross and Cromarty, the results obtained are applicable to the whole of Scotland, with the exception perhaps of the districts on the east coast south of the Forth. Mr. Watson's method has been to take each parish in the county, and the name of every place in the parish, to explain its etymology and to show how the conformation or characteristics support the place-name. Besides, he has added an index of the three thousand names dealt with in the book. But the part of the volume in which the non-Gaelic reader will find most to interest and instruct him is the introduction of nearly ninety pages in which Mr. Watson sets forth his general deductions from his researches. The disentanglement of the Pictish, Gaelic, and Norse elements in place-names has been luminously achieved ; the enormous influence of the Celtic Church is insisted upon, as it had before been shown in Mr. Mackinlay's book on the pre-Reformation Church in relation to place-names ; and the coming of English influence is shown from historical data. Finally, a section of the Introduction is devoted to a short analysis of the principal terms connected with natural features, artificial structures, old occupations, plants, animals, etc., found in the names of Ross. It is not possible to speak too highly of a book which is the result of protracted labours by an enthusiast who is also a scholar.

Burma, Painted and Described. By R. Talbot Kelly. (Black, 20s. net.) —Mr. Kelly doubtless wished to repeat the success of his work on Egypt, and has probably accomplished his desire. For colour-books are judged by standards of their own. To win applause with them, a man need neither paint nor write particularly well. His must be a special art, that provides a kaleidoscope of bright colours, and a patter of talk, such as conjurers use to carry off their sleight of hand. Mr. Kelly does this excellently. We learn from his book that Burma is a fascinating country, and he an energetic and amusing man. This thesis is expounded by means of a great deal of frank impressionism, a patchwork of information, and a number of paintings, the result of a seven months' visit to the country. Mr. Kelly's English is the language of ordinary table-talk. He does not pretend to a feeling for words, but writes brightly, in a commonplace manner that does not distract the mind from his pictures. These, too, are without individuality, but very successfully fill the place of a series of coloured photographs. In short, his is a perfect example of the colour-book of commerce, the merriest and most entertaining of peep-shows, but without relation to art or literature.

ARE YOU READING

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER?

The Ideal Weekly Magazine Review for lovers of good literature. A large number of Book Reviews, brilliant Articles and clever Stories appear every week. Also a page of

LITERARY PROBLEMS

with Prizes for their solution. These latter are of unique interest, and furnish an intellectual stimulus to a large circle; as many as 2000 entries having been recorded at one time for one section only of this feature of the paper. Every issue also contains four or five cartoons by including one specially drawn for this issue.

"F. C. G.,"

Please send a post-card for a Free Specimen copy.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of

THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

Chatto & Windus's January Books.

Now Ready. With 3 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.
The Story of Charing Cross and its Immediate NEIGHBOURHOOD. By J. HOLDEN MACMICHAEL.
In the "Story of Charing Cross" the author deals with an historic district of London which is, for literary purposes, comparatively virgin soil. Apart from its high topographical interest, the "Story of Charing Cross" presents a faithful picture, drawn from contemporary sources, of the life of our forefathers, whether on pain or pleasure bent, especially as they "dreed their weird" in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.

On January 18. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Hugo: A Fantasia on Modern Themes. By ARNOLD BENNETT. Author of "Anna of the Five Towns," etc.
In this book Mr. Arnold Bennett produces a successor to "The Grand Babylon Hotel." He again takes a vast and highly complicated organism, and makes it the theatre of his plot. But Hugo's "Universal Stores" are even vaster and more complicated than the famous hotel in the Strand. Hugo's Stores begin with a great Safe Deposit below the Street; then come four stories of Stores, then five stories of expensive flats, and then, on top of all, the Dome, where Hugo lives, and a roof-restaurant and garden, one of London's most fashionable resorts. The plot, which contains several original situations, and which is frankly designed to keep the reader in a continuous state of excitement, moves up and down the Hugo building—now in the drapery departments at a New Year's sale, now in the Safe Deposit, now in one of the big flats, now in the Dome, now in the roof-garden. The picturesque and thrilling activity of the whole organism is thus displayed from end to end.

On January 25. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
Caste and Creed. By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The San-yasi," "Diys," etc.

The scene of "Caste and Creed" which is brilliant and picturesque in its representations of Native Life, is laid in the South of India. The heroine is a girl who is half of the East and half of the West, who is brought up as a child in India under more or less Hindu influence, and as a girl in England under Christian influence. On her return to India she becomes the interesting centre of a conflict of faiths and religious ideals, and of consequent plots, in which a Brahmin who is highly educated in Western ways takes a prominent part. The book is crowded with incident, and is specially notable for its glimpses of the social life of the Brahmins, of which but little is known by ordinary English people. Altogether, the story will be a strange revelation for most readers.

Life in Morocco. By BUDGETT MEAKIN. With 24 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.
"No living Englishman can speak on the subject with equal authority. . . Mr. Meakin's book is an interesting and authoritative one, both from the scientific and general point of view—useful to the sociologist and to the mere traveller—and it is brightly written throughout."
DAILY GRAPHIC.

Thunder and Lightning. By CAMILLE FLAMMARION.
Translated by WALTER MOSLYN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

Mr. Swinburne's Tragedies. Collected Edition in Five Crown 8vo volumes, bound in buckram, uniform with the POETICAL WORKS. Price 6s. net each volume, or 30s. net for the five volumes. (Subscriptions accepted only for complete sets.) Vol. V., COMPLETING THE SERIES, will be ready on Jan. 25.

New Six-Shilling Novels in the Press.

Maurice. By JOSEPH KEATING. [Ready.
Nature's Vagabond, etc. By COSMO HAMILTON. [Feb. 1.
For Life—and After. By GEORGE R. SIMS. [Feb. 8.
Love and Lordship. By FLORENCE WARDEN. [March 1.
In the Roaring Fifties. By EDWARD DYSON. [March 8.
Mara: an Unconventional Woman. By CHRIS HEALY. [March 15.

Children of To-morrow: a Romance. By the late WILLIAM SHARP ("FIONA MACLEOD"). A New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

The Pocket George MacDonald. A Choice of Passages made by ALFRED H. HYATT. (Uniform with "THE POCKET R. L. S.") 16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net. [Shortly.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S HISTORIES.

The Reign of Queen Anne. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each.

A History of the Four Georges and of William THE FOURTH. 4 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each.

A History of Our Own Times from the Accession of Queen Victoria to the General Election of 1880. LIBRARY EDITION, in 4 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. each.—Also a POPULAR EDITION, in 4 vols., crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. each.—And the JUBILEE EDITION, with an Appendix of Events to the End of 1886, in 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. each.

A History of Our Own Times, Vol. V., from 1880 to the Diamond Jubilee. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.; crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

A History of Our Own Times, Vols. VI. and VII., from the Diamond Jubilee, 1897, to the Accession of King Edward VII., 2 vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 24s.

A Short History of Our Own Times. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.—Also a POPULAR EDITION, post 8vo, cloth limp, 2s. 6d.; and the CHEAP EDITION, medium 8vo, 6d.

Reminiscences. With a Portrait. 2 vols., demy 8vo, cl., 24s.

The Story of an Irishman. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

11 New Vols. (Sold separately.) Cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, 3s. net each. By LORD MACAULAY.

The History of England from the Accession of James II. to the Death of William III., preceded by a Sketch of the Period before the Restoration and also of the Reign of Charles II. In 5 vols. By JUSTIN MCCARTHY.

The Reign of Queen Anne, in 1 vol.

A History of the Four Georges and of William IV., in 2 vols.

A History of Our Own Times from the Accession of Queen Victoria to 1897, in 3 vols.

* * * These Eleven Volumes, as well as giving a sketch of Earlier British History, form a complete History of England from the Accession of James II. (1685) to the Diamond Jubilee (1897).

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams.

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations
21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net.
507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,

and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRURY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.

ROYAL EXCHANGE Incorporated] ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents
Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Every Day is Publishers' Day in the

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.

TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PEN

The first throughout favourite the World

In odd corners, out of the way places, wherever and whenever you want to write, use a WATERMAN'S IDEAL, the best, surest, quickest way of accomplishing your purpose. It frees you entirely from the Hotel, the Post Office or the Waiting-room Pen.

From 10/6. In Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, etc. Illustrated Booklet Free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12 Golden Lane, London, E.C. NEW YORK: 173 Broadway.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

NOT A PARTY QUESTION.

There are no two opinions as to the merits of Joseph Gillott's Pens—the best made—that is the verdict of all users. For those who like a broad-pointed pen the "JG" is strongly recommended. Its smooth, quick, easy running qualities have made it extremely popular.

In Sixpenny and Gross Boxes of all Stationers, etc. Testing Sample Card of Pens free for penny stamp, postage. Sample Box of 30, assorted, 7 stamps, from JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS (Dept. 3), 37 Gracechurch Street, London, E.C.

IS YOUR PENCIL A KOH-I-NOOR OR ONLY AN IMITATION?

There are no better pencils made than L. & C. Hardtmuth's Koh-i-Noor Pencils. Many Manufacturers have tried to equal this wonderful pencil—all have failed. The merit lies in the lead, in the selected wood, and in the workmanship. Using a Koh-i-Noor is like drawing silk over paper—so smooth.

Koh-i-Noor Pencils are one price everywhere—4d each or 3s 6d. for one dozen. Of Stationers, Photographic Dealers, and Artists' Colourmen. Dainty Booklet on Pencils post free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12 Golden Lane, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1759

JANUARY 20, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

MANCHESTER EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

PUPIL TEACHERS' COLLEGE.

APPOINTMENT OF PRINCIPAL.

In consequence of the appointment of Mr. W. E. Urwick, M.A. Oxon, on the inspectorate of the Secondary Branch of the Board of Education, the Education Committee of the City of Manchester invite applications for the Principalship of the Pupil Teachers' College from persons of academic standing and of sound experience in the principles and methods of teaching.

The salary offered is £650 per annum.

The person appointed should be prepared to assume the duties of the office not later than April 23, 1906.

Particulars of the duties and conditions of appointment may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications, on the special forms provided for the purpose, must be returned not later than Wednesday, January 31. Canvassing will disqualify candidates.

J. H. REYNOLDS,
Director of Higher Education.

Municipal School of Technology,
Sackville Street, Manchester.

January 16, 1906.

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

The University of Sheffield proposes to appoint a PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION.

For particulars as to duties, salary, etc., apply to
W. M. GIBBONS,
Registrar.

COUNTRY PARSON (Salop), ex-Schoolmaster with 15 years' experience, has vacancy for one or two Boys aged 12-16, or Man reading Smalls. — Present Address: JEFFREY, Pittville, Cheltenham.

THE DOWNS SCHOOL, SEAFORD, SUSSEX. Head Mistress—Miss LUCY ROBINSON, M.A. (late Second Mistress St. Felix School, Southwold). References: The Principal of Bedford College, London; The Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, etc.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BERTRAM DOBELL SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,

77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 10s. 6d.), 2s. 6d., cloth 4s.; half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Easby, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

STUDIO EXTRA NOS.: Modern Etching and Engraving, Royal Academy Reynolds to Millais, Masters of Landscape Painting, Cox, Cotman, and Dewint, 5s. each, post 6d.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

OLD AND NEW EDINBURGH, Six Divisions, cloth, as issued, only 15s.—Write to Lloyd and Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WALPOLE (H.) Memoirs of George III., 4 vols, 1845 Letters, 9 vols, 1857-9
Memoirs of, by B. Warburton, 2 vols
Wakefield, Adventures in New Zealand
Views in New Zealand, plain or coloured
Walker (A.) Beauty in Woman, 1846
Walton (I.) Complete Angler, 1653 or 1655, or 1661, or 1668, or 1676, or a copy of either edition imperfect
Angler, any edition before 1700, perfect or imperfect
Lives, 1670
Walton and Cotton's Angler, 2 vols, Pickering, 1836
Warburton (R. E. E.) Hunting Songs, 8vo, Chester, 1834
Ward's Mexico, 2 vols, 1829
Warner (R.) Hampshire Collections, 5 vols, 4to, 1795
Warwickshire Hunt (The), by "Venator," 1837
Water Babies (The) 1863
Watson's History of Halifax, 4to, 1775
Waverley, first edition, 3 vols, 1814, or odd
Weever's Funeral Monuments, 1631
Wellington, the Wars of Wentworth (W. C.) New South Wales
"We pity the Plumage, but forget the Dying Bird," by the Hermit of Marlow, 1812
Wheeler's History of India, 5 vols, 8vo, 1867-81
Wesley's Hymns and Poems, 1739
West (A.) 24 Views in New South Wales
Westall's Plates (with or without text) to Public Schools, roy 4to, 1816
Westminster Drollery, 1671

Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

A PRACTICAL BOOKBINDER, useful and handy man, wishes for Post in a Library. Several years' experience in a gentleman's library. —23 Haverfield Gardens, Kew.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,
Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.
Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Art

ROYAL ACADEMY OF ARTS.

Notice is hereby given that the President and Council will proceed to ELECT, on TUESDAY, JANUARY 30, Two COUSINS ANNUITANTS.

Applicants for the Annuity which is of the value of not more than £80, must be deserving artists, painters in oil and water-colours, sculptors, architects, or engravers in need of aid through unavoidable failure of professional employment or other causes.

Forms of application can be obtained by letter, addressed to the Secretary, Royal Academy of Arts, Piccadilly, W. They must be filled in and returned on or before Saturday, January 27.

By order,
FRED. A. EATON, Secretary.

SIMEON SOLOMON.—An Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings by the late Simeon Solomon now open at THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. Admission including Catalogue) 1s.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourne Road, Bushey, Herts.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels, 9d. 1000, reduction for quantities and regular work. Translations.—Miss HANDLEY, Needham Market, Suffolk.

DR. WEYMOUTH'S NEW TESTAMENT, WITH NOTES.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late
R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by
E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

"By far the best of its kind."—PRINCIPAL SALMOND.
"Reverent, scholarly."—DR. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.
NEW YORK: BAKER & TAYLOR.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

NOW READY

PRICE 8s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. 1 and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO*PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play; certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. 1 and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 500 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams.

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. 1 and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 15/- each.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations
21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English
Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net.
507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,*and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.F., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	51	Fiction . . . . .	63
Literature:		The Drama:
The Sun of Scotland . . . . .	53	"Electra" at the Court . . . . .	63
The Golden Age . . . . .	54	Theatre . . . . .	64
Another Petronius in English . . . . .	55	"La Rafale" at the New Royalty . . . . .	64
Some Old Pottery . . . . .	55	Theatre . . . . .	64
Shakespearean Criticism . . . . .	57	Fine Art:
Lord Goschen's Essays . . . . .	58	The Old Masters—II . . . . .	64
Songs of Innocence . . . . .	59	Music:
Sir Andrew Clarke . . . . .	60	From Across the Seas . . . . .	65
Literary Causerie:		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	66
New Light on Chancer's "Legend of Goode Women" . . . . .	61	Correspondence . . . . .	67
The Downman in Exile . . . . .	63	Books Received . . . . .	68
		Bookshelf . . . . .	6

This number contains an Education Supplement.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE middle of a General Election is not a good time for any reading other than political, and this holds particularly true of the present contest, because to both sides the results have been so surprising as to afford an endless theme for conversation. With the political issue we have nothing to do here, but one aspect of the election has a distinctly literary interest. This, we need scarcely say, is the light that the election cast on modern journalism. If we compare the votes with the writings, it becomes evident at once that the leader-writer has completely lost such influence as at one time he exerted. If any inference is to be drawn from the fact, it is that people have got into the habit of buying papers for reasons quite apart from the character of the opinions that may be expressed in them. Perhaps it is not going too far to say that the political leader of to-day is not read at all by either side.

If we look back, there are plenty of instances to show that this was not always the case. At one period of its history, it was said that the Times had in itself influence enough to overthrow a ministry. Another instance of a paper that was a great political power in the land was the Standard, under Mr. W. H. Mudford, a man, by the bye, who made scarcely any pretence of being able to write himself, though there never was a better judge of the kind of writing that served his purpose. One of Mr. Mudford's characteristics was independence, and there are some who remember to this day the general astonishment when one morning the Standard came out with a leader wherein the late Mr. Gladstone was actually praised. Previous to this, the efforts of the leader-writer on this Conservative paper had consisted mainly of daily attacks on the Liberal chief. Mr. Mudford, although no opponent of hard hitting when he thought it necessary, introduced a spirit of fair play that was not long in winning the confidence of his readers. It would be easy to point to many living journalists who in their day exercised a very great authority in the world of politics. The most striking examples were the first editors of the Pall Mall Gazette. First there was Mr. Greenwood, and both in the newspaper wherein he began to incorporate his idea of what an evening journal should be, and in that he created when circumstances led to his resignation of the editorship of the Pall Mall Gazette, his opinion carried weight from the fact of his own personality being so much felt. It was known that he never expressed an opinion without arriving at it deliberately, and his personal honour, integrity, and sincerity were so much beyond question that friends and foes were alike compelled to listen to him. If we were asked to name on the Liberal side of journalism of our time the man who possessed the most influence as a journalist, it would scarcely be possible to avoid mentioning Mr. John Morley, who succeeded Mr. Greenwood. Here again we have not only ability, but sterling honesty and justice, so that Mr.

John Morley is in every way qualified to be named as an equal of those giants to whom allusion has been made.

Of a very different kind, but still as great in its way, is the journalistic power of Mr. W. T. Stead, though, as he is strenuously active at the present moment, it would perhaps be not quite in the best taste to discuss him in detail. We have selected those to whom mention has been made for the particular reason that, quite apart from the question of financial success, they raised the whole tone of journalism and used it as a means of impressing their honest convictions on the public. They have been succeeded by men who are possibly just as clever, but in an entirely different way. The genius of the modern journalist seems to find expression less in rhetoric and the moulding of opinion than in the collection, arrangement, and presentation of news. An evening newspaper under Mr. Greenwood's supervision became like a very literary monthly magazine published nightly. It was a production to please the elect, but those who cater for the million cannot afford to be so fastidious.

Professor F. B. Gummere, in his article upon Originality in Literature in the new number of the Quarterly Review, delivers himself of the opinion that modern progress tends to bring poetry towards extinction, and that its last citadel will be the lyric. He arrives at this conclusion after a devious route, which passes on its way "masterful cells," "imitative cells," and other curious verbal products of science. He is something of a pessimist, and writes as though he lived in a very uninspiring time. People, it seems, "stand silent about the tomb where our forbears once wept and chanted the dirge." The writer was once at the funeral of a very eminent man, when, as Sir Thomas Browne has it, the last valediction was said, and two men scarcely less eminent calmly lighted, one his pipe, and the other a cigar, and smoked silently. This was not conventional, but our Professor would argue badly if he asserted that there was any lack of feeling.

The writer goes on to say that the great death-scenes of literature have also passed from verse into prose, but is this really the case? As far as our memory goes, there are as many death-scenes narrated in old prose as in old verse, and from considerable experience of the sonneteer of to-day we are inclined to pray the Professor not to make him more lugubrious. We can assure him that sadness from every conceivable standpoint pours in upon any unfortunate editor who is in the habit of accepting poetry, and death is as common a topic as spring, autumn or the months. Triumph of thought over emotion is not natural. Those that we are accustomed to call the dumb creatures know nothing of sorrow. It is an emotion that only comes with the development of thought, and experience shows that the most intellectual people usually feel more poignantly the sadness and tragedy of the world than any others.

It may be asked what all this has to do with originality in literature, and, sooth to say, we might almost answer: nothing. The Professor's ideas are better on some very simple truths, such as the statement that man is an imitative animal; that one man's success in a certain thing is a good reason for another trying the same thing, and the man of originality himself makes a convention which becomes a rule for those who follow after. But the convention, as a matter of fact, is only the case that holds the wine, not the wine itself. Shakespeare packed his drama into five acts just as all the nameless crowd of his contemporaries were doing. He studied and followed the conventions so as to have an egress and entrance beyond the conventional curtains. It did not seem to occur to him to make new bottles: he was content to pour new wine into the old.

The death of Sir Mountstuart Grant-Duff will recall to many people's minds a most curious and interesting personality. For more than a generation he was a notable figure in the most cultivated and literary circles of good society. To the general public he was known chiefly for his "Notes from a Diary," which ran into more volumes than we can recollect, the last being dated 1905. These books would have been much more entertaining if the diarist had allowed himself a freer hand, especially about the fifteen years he spent as a member of the House of Commons. It was actually his ambition "to leave behind me one of the most good-natured books of its kind ever printed, and I apprehend that for a politician to write truthfully of the political struggles in which he has been engaged, without paying to some of the combatants 'the genuine tribute of undissembled horror,' would be a hopeless enterprise." Hence it is that he gives us more botany than the plain man can endure; and as a whole the Recollections compare unfavourably in point of interest with Augustus Hare's delightful volumes.

Grant-Duff belonged to all sorts of breakfast, dinner, and supper clubs, and his breakfasts were as famous as Sam Rogers's. Good talk he certainly loved, and he was eminently the cause of it in others. He was, perhaps, too various a man to make a great place. The son of the historian of the Mahrattas, he possessed considerable knowledge of India, where, indeed, he was once Governor of Madras, and he wrote an excellent Memoir of Sir Henry Maine. He also wrote a Memoir of Lord de Tabley, the poet, and a study of Renan, whom he knew intimately and had entertained when he was a tenant of York House, Twickenham. Politically, Sir Mountstuart belonged to a type of member which is often said to be now extinct, though it remains to be seen what the present General Election may do to revive it. It is an eminently literary, genuinely cultivated, perhaps rather pedantic and pragmatical type. During the long period when he represented the Elgin Burghs, Sir Mountstuart used to address his constituency at the end of every Session in a speech which surveyed the world and its politics from China to Peru, and these he afterwards republished under the title of "Elgin Speeches." He was a bad speaker, however, and his orations, which are full of epigram, read much better than they sounded when he delivered them. It seems astounding now that he hardly ever addressed his constituents without classical quotations, and he was a man who could quote very well.

In that matter of quotations he belonged to a bygone age. Time was when the politician who failed to introduce an effective quotation into an important speech was relegated to the limbo of the commonplace. The classics are less studied to-day, and the twentieth-century debate is little likely to be graced by a fine passage such as that quoted by Burke in the speech on Conciliation with America which Fox advised members of the House of Commons to "read by day and meditate upon by night."

In his speeches, Burke could never compare in the matter of quotation with, say, Pitt, or Canning, or Gladstone; but on this occasion he surpassed himself. Dwelling on the effect of a just treatment of the Principality of Wales he said: "From that moment as by a charm, the tumult subsided; peace, order, and civilisation followed in the train of liberty. When the day-star of the English constitution had arisen in their hearts, all was harmony within and without.

Simul alba nautis
Stella refulsit,
Defluit saxis agitatus humor,
Concidunt venti fugiuntque nubes,
Et minax (quod sic voluere) ponto
Unda recumbit."

Perhaps the art of classical quotation died with Mr. Gladstone's speech on the Affirmation Bill when as Mr. Morley says "with reverential stillness" the House sat listening to this "born master of moving cadence and high sustained modulation and to the rise and long roll of the hexameter—to the plangent lines that have come down across the night of time to us from great Rome." The lines were those from Lucretius:

Omnis enim per se divom natura necesse est
Immortali aevo summa cum pace fruatur,
Semota a nostris rebus sejunctaque longe.
Nam privata dolore omni, privata periculis,
Ipsa suis pollens opibus, nihil indiga nostri,
Nec bene promeritis capitur nec tangitur ira.

—quoted in reference to the theories of those who held that:

Whatever there may be beyond this short span of life, you know and you can know nothing of it, and it is a fruitless undertaking to attempt to establish relations with it.

The King's message on the proposed union between Great Britain and Ireland drew from Pitt, in a speech delivered in January 1799, another good quotation—one of the most apposite we remember:

Non ego nec Teucris Italos parere jubebo,
Nec nova regna peto; paribus se legibus ambae
Invictae gentes aeterna in foedera mittant.

Nothing could have summed up better Pitt's opinion on this vexed question. It was Pitt, again, who was responsible for the very felicitous quotation in reference to the execution of Louis XVI.

Excidat ille dies aevo, neu postera credant
Saecula, nos certe taceamus, et obruta multa
Nocte tegi nostrae patiamur crimina gentis.

To-day (January 20) is the centenary of the birth of an American author, once well known, though not now very well-remembered, Nathaniel Parker Willis. To us, indeed, his name is chiefly memorable from the fact that he was the first American writer to treat our celebrated persons to a dose of transatlantic personal journalism. Armed with introductions from his Legation, he obtained admission to many good houses, notably to Lady Blessington's. His impressions were afterwards recorded in "Pencilings by the way." The English impression of the taste of his impressions was set forth in vigorous style in the review of his book which Lockhart wrote for the Quarterly; and he came into violent collision with more than one eminent English author of the period. To Bulwer-Lytton, who took exception to his "personal note," he apologised in language of fulsome humility. Walter Savage Landor had an epistolary altercation with him because he borrowed one of the poet's manuscripts, promising to secure the publication of an American edition, and failed either to execute his promise or to respond without great delay to urgent requests for the return of the copy. Seeing that Landor was a man who always had to deal with publishers through middlemen in order to avoid deadly quarrels with them, the violence of his language in conducting his dispute with this stranger from the United States can be imagined.

In an interesting letter to the Times, Mr. E. A. Webb, Churchwarden of St. Bartholomew the Great, claims to have discovered the exact locality in which Benjamin Franklin worked for Palmer, the letter-founder and printer, during his sojourn in England. It was nothing else than the Lady Chapel of the Priory, which, "after the suppression in 1539 being converted by Lord Rich into a dwelling-house, and occupied in 1616 by Sir Percival Hart, and in 1653 by Thomas Roycroft, the printer of the great London Polyglot Bible, and in 1725 by S. Palmer, the author of the 'General History of Printing,' was the printing-house where Benjamin Franklin passed his year of service to the printing trade in Bartholomew Close." From 1833 onwards it was used as a large fringe factory, until its purchase by the Restoration Committee in 1885.

Bishop Potter of New York, who is now in Egypt, has written to the New York Times offering £150 for the restoration of a stone escutcheon, which, he understands, has been removed by some American relic-hunter from over the entrance door of the farmhouse in Northamptonshire which was the home of Washington's ancestors. The Bishop argues that the escutcheon should be replaced in its former position as an international monument.

We had some notes, a little while ago, on the methods which some authors have adopted for the advertisement of their books. A correspondent sends us an example of this sort of thing which is the better worth quoting because we have never seen it quoted in this connection before. It is taken from a Life of Madame de Krudner whose novel "Valérie" appeared shortly after Madame de Staël's "Delphine." "You know quite well," the author wrote to a friend, "that neither talent nor genius, nor the excellence of one's intentions are sufficient to ensure a success; everything demands some charlatanism." And the biographer proceeds to tell us how she translated her doctrine into action:

During several days [he writes] she made the round of the fashionable shops, incognito, asking sometimes for shawls, sometimes for hats, feathers, wreaths, or ribbons, all "a la Valérie." When they saw this beautiful and elegant stranger step out of her carriage with an air of assurance, and ask for fancy articles which she invented on the spur of the moment, the shopkeepers were seized with a polite desire to satisfy her by any means in their power. Moreover, the lady would soon pretend to recognise the article she had asked for. And if the unfortunate shop-girls, taken aback by such unusual demands, looked puzzled, Mme. de Krudner would smile graciously and pity them for their ignorance of the new novel, thus turning them all into eager readers of "Valérie." Then, laden with purchases, she would drive off to another shop, pretending to search for that which only existed in her imagination. Thanks to these manoeuvres she succeeded in exciting such ardent competition in honour of her heroine, that, for at least a week, the shops sold everything "a la Valérie." Her own friends, the innocent accomplices in her stratagem, also visited shops on her recommendation, thus carrying the fame of her book through the Faubourg Saint-Germain and the Chaussée d'Antin.

We have received from Mr. J. A. Stargardt of Berlin the catalogue of the collection of autographs formed by the late Alexander Meyer Cohn, which is to be sold by auction in Berlin from the 5th to the 10th of February. It contains not a few interesting letters and documents of English and American men of letters. There is a letter of Burns to John McMurdo, sending a ballad: "Kings give coronets; alas, I can only bestow a ballad—Still, however, I proudly claim one superiority even over Monarchs: my presents, as far as I am a Poet, are the presents of genius." "I should probably have gone to England for the Coronation," writes Byron to Hoppner in 1820, "but for my wife—I don't wish to walk in such company under present circumstances." Crabbe writes from Trowbridge (1829): "The men who are hungry and thirsty, threaten, and no wonder, their Rival the machines, with utter destruction," and there are letters, too, from Carlyle, Coleridge, Locke, Macaulay, Pope, Prior, Ruskin, Scott, and Washington Irving.

The second production of the Seventh Season of the Stage Society will take place on January 28 and 29, 1906, at the Scala Theatre. The programme will consist of Lady Inger of Ostrat, by Henrik Ibsen, with the following cast: Miss Edyth Olive will play Lady Inger; Mr. Henry Ainley, Nils Lykke; and Mr. Harcourt Williams, Nils Stensson. The play will be produced by Mr. Herbert Jarman.

The Private View of the Eleventh Annual Exhibition of The Royal Society of Miniature Painters will take place to-day (Saturday, 20th inst.), at the Modern Gallery, 61 New Bond Street, W. The Exhibition will be open to the public from January 22 to February 24.

LITERATURE

THE SUN OF SCOTLAND

Selected Poems of Robert Burns. With an introduction by ANDREW LANG. (Kegan Paul, 1s. 6d. net.)

BEFORE these words are in print, Scotland will once more have celebrated the day when "a blast o' Janwar win' blew hansel in on Robin," and à propos of which this little book of selections has been issued. To our mind the chief point of interest in it is the excellent introduction supplied by Mr. Andrew Lang. While appreciative, it is at the same time sane, quiet, and marked by the critic's good sense and sound judgment. There are a few points, however, which are almost certain to lead to a little friendly argument. Some time ago we directed attention to an acute piece of criticism from the pen of the late Canon Ainger, who maintained that the best passages in Robert Burns were written in the purest English. Mr. Andrew Lang probably did not notice this remark; at any rate, he maintains the opinion that "his Scotch poems are, by universal consent, as well as in his own opinion, infinitely his best poems," and this he follows up with a sneer at the model of Burns, "the divine Shenstone." Now it seems to us that this opinion is very much open to question. It is a curious fact that the peasant, either in England or in Scotland, when moved by strong feeling of any kind, has a tendency to express it, not in dialect but in pure and beautiful English. The cause, in the instance of Burns, is not far to seek. Whilst colloquial Scotch was the every-day, commonplace language of his friends and associates, and the homely patois of his family, we must never forget the influence of the "big ha' bible" and the habit of closing the day with a reading from it as described in "The Cotter's Saturday Night."

The chearfu' Supper done, wi' serious face,
They, round the ingle, form a circle wide;
The Sire turns o'er, wi' patriarchal grace,
The big ha'-Bible, ance his Father's pride;
His bonnet rev'rently is laid aside,
His lyart haffets wearing thin an' bare;
Those strains that once did sweet in Zion glide,
He wales a portion with judicious care,
"And let us worship God!" he says, with solemn air.

Now, if we examine the choicest passages in the works of Burns, we find none of those obscure dialect words which, according to Mr. Andrew Lang, puzzle the reader. Even in "Tam O' Shanter," a piece famed for the exquisite force and vividness of the native Doric, we find many of the finest lines to be set down in English that might have proceeded from Wordsworth himself.

But pleasures are like poppies spread,
You seize the flow'r, its bloom is shed;
Or like the snow-falls in the river,
A moment white—then melts for ever;
Or like the borealis race,
That flit ere you can point their place;
Or like the rainbow's lovely form
Evanishing amid the storm.

There is only, it may be observed, a single word—and that not a dialect word—here that would not be understood by a London schoolboy. Again, if we take what are generally considered to be the most tender lines ever written by the poet, the same observation holds good.

Had we never lov'd sae kindly,
Had we never lov'd sae blindly,
Never met—or never parted,
We had ne'er been broken-hearted.

In passing it may be permissible to say that the writer has ever looked upon the first line of this poem as a fine example of the instinctive good taste of Burns for the appropriate word: "Ae fond kiss, and then we sever." The English word "sever," naturally as it occurs in this context, is one that on first thoughts we would not have expected Burns to employ. However, to proceed with our argument, we find that as the poet draws to his culmination, when his emotion is worked up to its highest pitch, his language becomes ever purer and more beautiful. At first, when he is in a despondent mood, describing the humdrum tedium and despair of life, the homely dialect is delightful.

There, lanely, by the ingle-cheek,
I sat and ey'd the spewing reek,
That fill'd, wi' hoast-provoking smeeke,
The auld, clay biggin;
An' heard the restless rattons squeak
About the rigin.

The softness, the harmony and dignity of the last verse are expressed in language that Shakespeare could not have bettered.

"And wear thou this,"—she solemn said,
And bound the Holly round my head:
The polish'd leaves, and berries red,
Did rustling play;
And, like a passing thought, she fled
In light away.

It is, however, remarkable that in "The Jolly Beggars," while all the lesser characters use broad Scotch, some of it most idiomatic, to display their contempt for everything that is respectable and conventional, the supreme expression of the wanderers for all that genteel society holds most dear is set forth in words that might have come from the pen of Swift, if Swift had been as much a poet as Burns was. To illustrate the Scottish idiom, we cannot do better than quote the first verse of the fiddler's song:

Let me ryke up to dight that tear,
An' go wi' me to be my dear,
An' then your every care and fear
May whistle owre the lave o't;

and the conclusion of the poem will make our other point clear:

Life is all a variorum,
We regard not how it goes;
Let them cant about decorum
Who have characters to lose.
Here's to budgets, bags, and wallets!
Here's to all the wandering train!
Here's our ragged brats and caillets!
One and all cry out, Amen!
A fig for those by law protected!
Liberty's a glorious feast!
Courts for cowards were erected,
Churches built to please the priest.

In view of these passages, which are but samples of many others that could be produced, we think that the traditional belief that Burns was most excellent in his Scottish poems deserves reconsideration. All the same, it may be frankly admitted that he showed an occasional tendency to become stilted when he wrote English, especially when he used it for ordinary purposes and occasionally when he tried his highest flight, as "To Mary in Heaven." There is an excellent criticism of this poem conveyed incidentally in Mr. Holman Hunt's history of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood.

During the intercourse of this journey we were much engaged in discussions on the character of English poetry of all periods. Palgrave was a man of solid culture, and was engaged at the time on his unrivalled forthcoming selection The Golden Treasury. While Burns was under review, his poem To Mary in Heaven was excluded from the selection, Tennyson agreeing that the refrain of "Hear'st thou the groans that rend this breast?" had the ring of hysterical insincerity and bombast in it, a rare fault in that simple poet.

While admitting that Tennyson was right, as he generally was, we refuse to believe that the comparative failure here was one of language. It would be difficult, for instance, to suggest how the third verse could be improved by a Scotch paraphrase.

Ayr, gurgling kiss'd his pebbled shore,
O'erhung with wild-woods, thick'ning green;
The fragrant birch, and hawthorn hoar,
Twin'd am'rous round the raptur'd scene:
The flowers sprang wanton to be prest,
The birds sang love on ev'ry spray,
Till too, too soon, the glowing west
Proclaim'd the speed of winged day.

Another opinion expressed by Mr. Andrew Lang is one exclusively of temperament. It is conveyed in the following sentence:

Once I ventured to say—Principal Shairp had said it before—that I wished we knew no more of Burns's life than of Shakespeare's. It was a vain thing to wish; we cannot keep his poetry, with its frequent confessions, and be ignorant of his life. But I meant no more than natural desire to be spared sermons, scandal, tattle about a poet. care no more to grope after the last gossip about Jean Armour, than to listen to the last "chatter about Harriet."

As far as disliking a scandal about a dead poet goes, we are in the most complete agreement with Mr. Andrew Lang; but, on the other hand, there is much to be said in favour of Carlyle's view, that it is better to see a man exactly as he really is than to behold him cloaked and posed as if awaiting a visit from the sculptor. In our opinion it tends to give a deeper insight into human nature. We see in Burns a man who was described with the utmost exactitude by himself in "A Bard's Epitaph":

The poor Inhabitant below
Was quick to learn and wise to know,
And keenly felt the friendly glow,
And softer flame,
But thoughtless follies laid him low,
And stain'd his name!

We see in Burns one who had all the finest instincts and impulses that human nature could be endowed with. If they had been accompanied by mental force he would probably have been a great saint but a very poor poet. It was because of his very weakness and lack of that "prudent, cautious self-control" which he found by bitter experience to be "wisdom's root" he fell into so many thoughtless follies; but even in doing so he was, like Sir Walter Scott under very different circumstances, "making himself." In a word, he was drinking life to the very lees, and the pathos, remorse, pity, and sadness combined with the mad gaiety of it led him to understand the whole gamut of human emotion. His example is not one to set up for imitation; and yet, looking back and comparing the fruit with the plant, we find that they are one and indivisible. It was his keen sympathy combined with experience that made him capable of fulfilling his own ambition—to become a singer of "the loves, the ways of simple swains"; or, if Mr. Andrew Lang's more grandiose phrase be preferred, even as Homer was the sun of Hellas, so was Robert Burns the sun of Scotland.

THE COLERIDGES

The Story of a Devonshire House. By LORD COLERIDGE, K.C.
(Unwin, 15s. net)

DR. JOWETT used to say that it was impossible to remember how all the Coleridges were related to each other, as they were as numerous as the Herods. Since then, much has been written concerning this brilliant group of Devonshire men, but, as is seen in Lord Coleridge's annals of his house, much of interest remained to be recorded. The story opens in a delightful way. In the year 1734, a poor lad sat weeping in misery by the roadside near Crediton. The son of a ruined weaver of that town, he had been forced to leave home, at the age of fifteen, and find what means of livelihood he could. Moved by his tears, a passer-by stopped to speak with him, and, on learning his helpless condition, obtained for him a place as usher in a neighbouring school. The boy proved to be an admirable scholar, and in 1760 he settled at Ottery St. Mary's as vicar and schoolmaster of the parish. Like Parson Adams, whom in nature he resembled, he was never a rich man, for he had a large family to bring up; but he at least gave to his eight sons, before he died, a remarkably solid education. All his boys, save perhaps S. T. C., were men of strong, high character. The most heroic spirit among them was the soldier, John Coleridge, who died in India at the age of thirty-three. By stinting himself for the education and advancement in life of his younger relatives, he so raised the position of his house that the Coleridges soon became distinguished in literature, scholarship, law and divinity. They were, at first, as S. T. C. said, "uncontaminated with one drop of gentility," but by the marriage of James Coleridge with an heiress in 1788, the main branch of the family acquired a strain of gentle blood as well as no inconsiderable fortune.

Like Francis Coleridge, who fell in the storming of Seringapatam, S. T. C. was destined by his brother John to serve in the Indian Army. The actual career of "Silas Tomkyn Comberbach" was no matter of pride to his self-reliant, independent brothers. At Ottery St. Mary's even his poetry was disesteemed: Colonel Coleridge wrote to his son, J. T. Coleridge: "Your Uncle Samuel is (I hear) to lecture at ye New Institute London on Poetry and Modern Poets. If he wants any abuse, I can help him out." But, on meeting his uncle, J. T. Coleridge was won by his genius in conversation:

He spent two days in Richmond, and so delightful and astonishing a man I have never met with. Every subject he was master of, and discussed in the most splendid eloquence without ever pausing for a word. Whether poetry, religion, language, politics, or metaphysics were on the "tapis," he was equally at home and equally clear. It was curious to see the ladies loitering most attentively, and being really uncommonly entertained with a long discussion of two hours on the deepest metaphysics. At the end of the time I got one of them, a beautiful woman and a superior singer, to sing some Italian arie to him. His very frame shook with pleasure, a settled smile and a sort of tittering sound indicated his feelings. He prayed that she might finish those strains in Heaven, and sitting down by Mrs. May, recited some extempore verses on the singer.

The Coleridges seemed to have been good writers of letters. Even the gallant midshipman, Bernard F. Coleridge, who at the age of eleven, assisted in blockading the French fleet at Brest in 1804, gives in his letters some vivid glimpses of life in the English navy of Nelson's age. Trafalgar seems to have been won by men who lived on beef ten years in corn, biscuits full of maggots, and "water of the colour of a pear-tree with plenty of weavils in it." J. T. Coleridge's correspondence contains some delightful pictures of continental life in 1814. The most interesting, perhaps, is his sketch of the brilliant literary circle at Geneva, over which Mme. de Staël presided, and of which her daughter Albertine, a girl of seventeen years of age, "with fine eyes, auburn hair, great ambition, all her mother's brilliancy and more than her accomplishments," was the supreme ornament.

J. T. Coleridge's letters occupy a considerable space in his grandson's work, and add much to its interest. He was a man who played in the life of his time no small part, both as the intimate friend of Keble and Arnold, and as a judge; although his legal career was afterwards overshadowed by that of his son, the late Lord Coleridge. The Lord Chief Justice and S. T. C. were, indeed, the most famous members of their family; but, as their lives have already been written fully by other hands, the author of "The Story of a Devonshire House," has rightly devoted himself to the pious labour of collecting memorials of other gracious and notable figures who bore the illustrious name.

ANOTHER PETRONIUS IN ENGLISH

Petronius: Cena Trimalchionis. Translated with Introduction, Notes, etc., by MICHAEL J. RYAN. (Walter Scott Publishing Co., 3s. 6d.)

WE regret that this little book did not come into our hands early enough to be considered in connection with Mr. Lowe's edition. It would be tiresome to go into details so soon after our former notice, but we may say at once that this is a very good book, introduction, notes and translation being all well done. It is addressed to less advanced scholars than those to whom Mr. Lowe appeals. The text is Bücheler's tempered with Friedländer. The editor does not deal with critical considerations in connection with the explanatory notes, but gives a list of variant readings. Sometimes the translation, which is good and spirited, passes over a sentence or two for no apparent reason, as in § 43, noveram hominem olim oliorum: et adhuc salax erat . . . reliquisse. Nor is olim oliorum explained in the notes, though surely it demands notice, if oliorum is, as Friedländer thinks, a coined comparative of olim, the phrase meaning "long ago of longagoes," that is "long long ago." Pilare is not explained either in the phrase singulos pilavit (§ 44), nor in parram pilavit (§ 43). Mr. Lowe takes it to mean "plucked" ("deprived of hair") in both places. If this is so, quomodo singulos pilabat (§ 44) might be translated "how he had them bald-headed," an Americanism which ought not to have been missed by Professor Peck, who renders "he used to make things hum." Mr. Ryan translates "he used to knock out his adversaries." Compare Lowell: "Pious Editor's Creed,"

I scent which pays the best, and then go into it baldheaded.

Malam parram pilavit hardly finds an equivalent in "he made a bad hand of his business," and omnis minervae homo is not "a jack of all trades," as the context shows. Occidit de lucerna equites (§ 45) does not mean "he killed the horsemen by lamplight," but, as Mr. Lowe has it, "the fellows killed at his show were about the size of knights engraved on lamp-shades." To the same purpose Professor Peck renders "his mounted fighters were as much like the real thing as a lot of dissolving views." In the bits of verse scattered through the piece Professor Peck is distinctly the most successful of the three.

We have dwelt chiefly on the less satisfactory parts of Mr. Ryan's work, but we should be sorry to convey a bad impression of the book, which is very good on the whole. It is a curious coincidence that the two first English editions of the Cena Trimalchionis should have appeared in the same week.

R. Y. TYRRELL.

SOME OLD POTTERY

History of Ancient Pottery, Greek, Etruscan and Roman. By H. B. WALTERS, M.A., F.S.A. Based upon the work of Samuel Birch. 2 vols. Illustrated. (Murray, 63s.)

THIS is a difficult book to estimate justly. Such a work was much needed: and this has great merits, and will probably be read and valued widely. But it has bad defects, both of plan and of workmanship; and its title and mode of appearance challenge notice of these latter, unavoidably.

When Samuel Birch published his "History of Ancient Pottery" in 1857, its two volumes, though by no means so stout as these, managed to contain pretty well all that was worth knowing then, about ancient pottery between the Tigris and the Atlantic, and as a general introduction to ceramic art it has never been replaced. But of course its contents have been superseded, line by line, as further investigation came; and the second edition, published in 1873, has long been out of print.

Under these circumstances several courses are open. Probably no single student could undertake nowadays the gigantic task of "re-editing Birch"; but a syndicate of five or six might cover the ground between them; and a strong editor might give unity and proportion to the whole. Or the work of Birch might be left, a classic and a monument, on one side; and the new generation might begin, on modern lines, a series of monographs of this and that school of pottery. And in either of these enterprises, Mr. Walters's previous work on the vase catalogues of the British Museum would have qualified him for an important share. But in the book before us he has adopted a middle course, which combines the disadvantages of both. He describes it as "based upon the work of Samuel Birch," and explains in his preface that so far as circumstances permitted he has retained Birch's arrangement of chapters and subjects.

He has modified the arrangement of Birch, however, in two important particulars. He is careful to explain in his preface that he limits himself to the pottery of the Greek world, and to the prolongations of Greek ceramic tradition in Italy, and in certain provinces of the Roman Empire. He adds, moreover, on his title-page the qualifying words "Greek, Etruscan, and Roman;" and it would have saved some misconception if these words had appeared on the covers also; for there is all the difference in the world between a History of Ancient Pottery, and a history of the pottery of these three ancient peoples, remarkable as their achievements were.

But while Mr. Walters limits himself thus on one side, he more than compensates, so far as bulk is concerned, by devoting quite half of his book to the special study of the decorative aspect of certain fabrics of Hellenic pottery, and nearly two hundred pages to a description of the mythology and daily life of the Greeks, as illustrated by the pictures on their vases. It is not surprising, therefore, that in spite of his self-imposed restrictions, his book runs to nearly eleven hundred pages in all.

Those parts of the book which deal with Hellenic fabrics are compiled with great learning and industry, and with real mastery of the subject. There are slips here and there, but Mr. Walters "knows his vases," and gives copious references to the literature, as well as a good general bibliography to begin with. But good wine needs no bush; and if these parts of his treatise had been published separately as a History of Greek Painted Vases, they would probably have done more for Mr. Walters's reputation, as well as for the instruction and convenience of those to whom they chiefly appeal.

The Introductory Chapter is notable for an excellent retrospect of the history of the study of Greek vases and vase-paintings: and for an analysis of the causes which suggested the principal theories about them. By the way, is the date of the completion of Tischbein 1803, as stated on p. 17, or 1795, as on p. xxxii.?

The review, again, on pp. 46 ff. of the Sites and Circumstances of Discovery of Greek Vases is learned and comprehensive, but it is a pity that finds of all periods are jumbled together, and that more copious use is not made of outline maps like those on pp. 63, 66, 70, but giving the distribution of each group of fabrics separately. Meanwhile, is it not somewhat misleading to mark Knossos and Idrias in similar type, as on p. 63, and to include these, while omitting Ægina and Miletus?

To the list of vase-collections on p. 27 ff. should be added the museums at Constantinople, Bari, Syracuse and Alexandria. Sèvres deserves special mention of Brogniart's Catalogue of 1845—a wonderful piece of work for that period—and its early Melian vases; Ghent has a fine series of terra sigillata, and a large number of moulds, and Cassel contains much material used in Boehlau's Aus Ionischen Nekropolen.

Let us hope that there are no other collections in the world, which, like that at Deepdene, must be stigmatised as "inaccessible to students."

In its original encyclopædic content a chapter like that of Birch on "The Uses of Clay" was appropriate enough; but in these volumes the forty pages devoted to a rather perfunctory review of sun-dried bricks, roof-tiles, braziers, or even lamps and figurines—still more to enamelled wares and what Mr. Walters calls "porcelain"—lead up to almost nothing. The section on glazed wares is particularly thin: there is confusion between faience and glass on p. 128, and a curious lapse of judgment on p. 127 describes a piece of characteristic Mycenaean modelling as "so purely Hellenic." Nor is it easy to see why a scarab of Psammetichus I. should date the Polledrara tomb, p. 127, to the end of the sixth century. Here is a puzzle for logicians, and historians too—"the strong Phœnician element in Sardinia is sufficient to indicate that these fabrics are all of Egyptian importation" (p. 128).

In the chapter on "Uses and Shapes" Mr. Walters is more at home, though to distinguish between κἀναβος and κἀναβος (i. 152) seems unnecessary; but that which deals with the technical aspect of pottery is very uneven. There is great learning and much evidence of first-hand study of certain kinds of problems, but strange lapses occur, which a very moderate acquaintance with actual potter's practice would have precluded. On pp. 203, 220, in translations of German and French analyses, "clay-earth" and "chalk" should be alumina and lime. In ii 435 the red glaze of terra sigillata is ascribed to "a kind of varnish, the elements of which are not absolutely certain, but it would appear that the substance added to produce the effect was of an essentially alkaloid nature." The italics are ours. Hartwig's theory about feather brushes is adopted very confidently; but does one hold a feather brush as if it were a dagger, as on the Ruvo vase in Fig. 72? Surely that scene depicts engravers, not painters.

The same lack of general grounding comes out again in the section on ornament in vol. ii. Mr. Walters follows Riegl mostly, and of course deals learnedly with the details of the lotos-and-palmette régime of the sixth and fifth centuries. But he takes the Corinthian "ground ornaments" as indications of landscape; his classification compels him to separate absolutely the maeander from the recurring spiral; he thinks the guilloche has a Mycenaean origin; and, neglecting its Egyptian antecedents, regards what he calls the "tongue pattern" (the German Stab-ornament) as ancestral to the "egg-pattern" and the "egg-and-dart" (p. 219). He adopts (p. 224) Houssay's ridiculous theory about Vallisneria spiralis, and fathers upon this herb the palmette also. Speaking of the antithesis of "procession" and "heraldic group" on p. 206, he says:

Both are essentially Oriental (i.e., Assyrian) in origin, the prototype of the latter being the familiar motive of the two animals and the sacred tree, which is so frequently found on Mycenaean gems, and is best exemplified in the famous Lion Gate of Mycenæ. Yet this typically Mycenaean and Oriental motive was not the one adopted by its natural inheritors the Ionians, and it is in Dorian Corinth that we find its reflection on the painted vases.

This is a cluster of puzzles. Was it from Mycenæ or from Assyria that the Ionians failed to inherit? Did Mycenæ receive it from Assyria, or Assyria from Mycenæ? and whence did "Dorian" Corinth get it, after all?

But it is in Part iv., on "Italian Pottery," that the limitations already indicated on the title-page become most distressingly apparent. "Greek, Etruscan, and Roman," should have been the sub-title here also: for "Italian pottery" is explained on p. 279; "that is, Etruscan and Roman as distinct from Greek"; and the tell-tale apology follows:

It is hardly possible to treat the subject of working in clay in Etruria with such fulness as can be done in the case of Greece and Rome, owing to the greater dearth of literature.

But surely it is the pots, not the books, which matter to a historian of pottery: and these are copious enough, and by no means comfortably divisible into "Etruscan" and "Roman" fabrics. The "literature," however (in the shape of Pottier's "Catalogue des Vases du Louvre" mostly), is copious enough to inspire (on pp. 280-2) a very thin summary of current theories about the origin of the Etruscans, which has little or nothing to do with their pottery, and it follows from this that the whole of the civilisation of Northern and Central Italy is due to this race, which would obviously have left its impress on each district as it passed through it; and secondly, that it was this same race which was afterwards known by the name of Etruscan.

Yet while the "Villanova culture" is attributed to these Etruscan immigrants, it is also interpreted (pp. 282-5) as closely dependent on the "Terramare culture," and the Terramare culture is attributed by Mr. Walters to Umbrian "aborigines." An adjacent passage is worth italicising and quoting in full:

The earliest civilisation of which traces have survived in Italy is, as we have already seen, that of the Terramare, so called from the remains discovered in that district, covering the basin of the Eridanus or Po, but chiefly between Piacenza and Bologna. We have further seen that the aboriginal people to whom these remains belong are probably to be identified with the Umbrians, but it is perhaps safer to style them Italiotes (pp. 282-3).

Most people are under the impression that the Italiotes were the inhabitants of the Greek colonies in the South: but perhaps Mr. Walters wishes for a designation for his Terramare "district," which shall include the Scoglio del Tonno.

To the Terramare pottery, that from Thapsus is regarded as "analogous" (p. 273), but there is no further mention here of Sicily, except a vague reference to "Mycenæan and Proto-Corinthian" vases in i. 86; and Sardinia (except as to Tharros) is not mentioned at all. Yet it is through the marked community of culture between Sardinia, Sicily, and such South Italian sites as Matera, that it has become possible to interpret, at all, the more fragmentary evidence from Remedello, Novilara, and the like. For it is not the case, as Mr. Walters says (p. 284) that in the Villanova stage "we now for the first time meet with tombs": the Museo Preistorico in Rome, and still more the museum of Syracuse, are eloquent as to that—not to mention the known burial-places of the Terramare folk. It is also inaccurate to describe (p. 284) the practice of inhumation in Italy as a "new system" attributable to Greek influence.

Nor is the description even of "Etruscan" culture adequate. Bologna, and also Este (p. 285), are assigned bodily to the "Etruscans"; but there is no account at all of the pot-fabrics of the latter site. Moreover, in spite of the thesis about Villanova, already cited, Etruscan pottery is taken (p. 303) to depend mainly on foreign models, and the first fabric to be treated systematically is the "Polledrara Ware" (p. 297). The published account of the excavations at Narce is simply summarised on p. 289, without allusion to the sequel: but perhaps Mr. Walters is prepared to defend its accuracy: and he is equally tender (in i. 64-5) to the memory of General di Cesnola.

The painted fabrics of early Sicily—Castelluccio and the sites near Girgenti and Palermo—are not included at all; and those of Apulia are treated only briefly. Note that the denial (p. 325) of the dependence of the "Peucetian" style on Mycenæan tradition is already antiquated by the series in the museum of Taranto.

There is, in fact, a very obvious reason why Mr. Walters should have diverged as he has done from the ampler plan laid down by Birch. In proportion as his subject leads him away from departments in which the British Museum is strong, and on which his own best work has been expended hitherto, his grip on his materials becomes looser, and his background of general knowledge less trustworthy; with the result that here and there in his book whole sections have been admitted which are regrettably imperfect, and some which are quite unworthy of the company in which they appear.

A book of this length is, of course, not written in a day; and it is difficult even to keep it up to date till it goes to the printer. But on p. 54, for example, Mr. Walters only knows by hearsay of finds at Dimini, though specimens of this pottery had reached the Fitzwilliam Museum already in 1901 or 1902, and the Ashmolean Museum, we believe, soon after. And it is a little late in the day to note, as on p. 53, that "fragments of painted pottery were seen by early travellers at Delphi" (with references to 1841 and 1835). On p. 67, also, certain vases "are said to be in the Louvre": in these days of ententes this might surely have been verified.

After much (perhaps over-captious) criticism of the consequences of what we venture to think an ill-judged design, may we pay a concluding tribute to the great beauty and accuracy of the illustrations, and especially of the coloured plates? We desiderate "... ἔγραφε, . . . ἐποίησε" in the corner of every one.

SHAKESPEAREAN CRITICISM

Did Shakespeare write Titus Andronicus? A Study in Elizabethan Literature. By JOHN M. ROBERTSON. (Watts, 5s. net.)

On Ten Plays of Shakespeare. By STOPFORD A. BROOKE. (Constable, 7s. 6d. net.)

MR. ROBERTSON makes in this volume an incisive attack on those critics who assert that a work is by Shakespeare because it has been held to be his in the past. He comes against them armed with sound logic and much learning, entering a solemn protest against their method, or rather lack of method. His argument is clear and convincing, and we heartily welcome this contribution to the work of defining clearly what is Shakespearean and what is not. After a thorough examination of Titus by means of all the usual technical tests, it is concluded that the play was an old one, many times re-cast, and that Greene and Peele are chiefly responsible for it in the form in which it has come down to us. The extraordinary thing is that there should exist students like Professor Collins and Mr. Baildon who need convincing on the point at issue. Considering that, of all Elizabethan plays, Titus Andronicus contains the most complicated series of inhuman and grossly repulsive orgies of lust and blood, it seems almost incomprehensible that any one should feel tempted to ascribe it to the hand which wrote—we will not say Cymbeline or As You Like It—but Romeo and Juliet or "The Rape of Lucrece." Mr. Robertson has conducted a mass of original research and studied an amount of technical criticism which would overwhelm any but the most undaunted specialist. His work is of that dry and thankless order which it is laborious to follow closely, but the conclusions of which we are thankful to accept.

Entirely different are Mr. Stopford Brooke's essays, or lectures, which belong to the kind of criticism which aims at doing our thinking for us. We are far from wishing to object to æsthetic criticism as a whole, or to rate it lower than the analytical method. On the contrary, we conceive that the formation of critical opinions based on wide reading and arrived at after mature reflection is the more vital process, and is likely to lead to results which, though they may be less precise and less easy to tabulate, are no less valuable from a literary standpoint. It is, indeed, impossible to compare the two, setting their values one against the other, for their aims are quite unlike. They supplement and do not interfere with each other. One seeks to ascertain the exact chronology of the plays, the technical advance or evolution of metre and style, and the traces of collaboration and re-handling: the other aims at understanding the psychology and rightly appreciating the dramatic and poetical qualities of the works. The second makes use of the results reached by the first, but can only employ its method to a slight and modified extent. Taking, therefore, Mr. Stopford Brooke's method and aims for granted, it remains to be seen what he has said in these pages which is illuminating or new, which will add to our pleasure in reading the plays or increase our understanding of them, which will alter or improve our point of view. To the reader who has thought much about Shakespeare and is not new to Shakespearean criticism the book is disappointing in its meagreness. It gives a summary of each play, often paraphrasing the speeches, commenting and explaining in the course of the narrative; the chief personages receive a few pages of characterisation, and the general effect of the play is lightly touched upon. The studies are lamentably slight, the average space allotted to each play being about thirty pages. The author, while not going beyond what has been said by his predecessors, writes almost as if he had had none. Difficult and disputed passages he barely indicates, and seldom sets forth two sides to a question with any adequacy. While hardly finding space to touch upon questions of multiple authorship, interpolations, differing versions or re-handling of the text, he yet devotes a few lines in more than one place to remarking that "Bacon could not possibly have written this passage." As a Shakespearean he has no faults, or only negative faults; he is generally sound, often felicitous, and a just admirer of genius; but the educated man will find little interest in reading this book beyond the mere curiosity to see whether or no he agrees with the author on each point. He will not feel that he is sitting at the feet of a master. The essays are good within their limits; but precisely because they keep within those limits their proper place is not "all of a row" in a volume to themselves: they should figure as introductions to school editions of the separate plays. As it is, they will be found most useful to young people suffering from impotency of observation and paucity of ideas, unimaginative schoolmasters who are at a loss how to teach Shakespeare, and ladies living in the suburbs whose social duties will not leave them time to attend Extension Lectures.

A good example of Mr. Stopford Brooke's treatment, and one which will perhaps make our meaning clear, is his characterisation of Banquo. He sees in Banquo merely the white-souled hero of tradition, introduced chiefly as a foil to set Macbeth's darker nature in clear relief. He sees what many previous writers have seen, the difference in the attitudes of Banquo and Macbeth from those of the Witches, he sees Banquo's loyalty, his bravery, his love of natural beauty, his clarity of intellect. But he fails to notice one of the most important and perhaps the most interesting of the facts in Banquo's story, namely that before his death he is no longer the innocent man that he was in the first Act. The first hint of the change that comes over him is contained in the passage where he prays that the cursed thoughts which nature gives way to in repose may be restrained in him. And though, at the announcement of the murder of Duncan, his attitude is one of loyalty and honesty, he evidently drew back in the days following from carrying out what his words at the time implied:

let us meet
And question this most bloody piece of work,
To know it further. Fears and scruples shake us:
In the great hand of God I stand, and thence Against the undivul'd pretence I fight
Of treasonous malice.

We find him next as Macbeth's chief counsellor and the principal guest invited to the supper. Obviously he has not said anything to any one about the prophecies of the Witches, or about the suspicions which he must have entertained as to the real author or instigator of the murder. His speech beginning: "Thou hast it now," shows clearly his state of mind. The ambition aroused in him by the last part of the Witches' prophecy, concerning his descendants, has so far got the better of his conscience that he is content to see the first part fulfilled, without inquiring too closely into the means whereby the fulfilment was brought about. This development of Banquo's character, showing how a temptation similar to that which so easily gained a hold on Macbeth eventually overcame so fine a nature as his, and illustrating, as Professor Bradley aptly remarks, the incalculability of evil, is entirely overlooked by Mr. Stopford Brooke. And it is insufficiencies of this kind which render his studies ineffective except as elementary introductions to the plays. Still, in passing, any judgment on these essays, it must always be remembered that they were delivered as lectures. Therefore, in the first place, we cannot expect the author to say everything in a limited space; and, secondly, these pages are necessarily lacking in that added charm and interest whereby Mr. Stopford Brooke's personality as a lecturer always holds the attention of his audience.

LORD GOSCHEN'S ESSAYS

Essays and Addresses on Economic Questions, 1865-1893. With Introductory Notes. By the Rt. Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN. (Arnold, 15s. net.)

THESE essays and addresses are republished without any omissions of substance, but in every case the writer has prefixed an introductory note, "with the object of bringing the light of the present day to bear upon these studies of the past." Lord Goschen is one of those whose writings carry conviction with them; and, while the public is greatly to be congratulated upon the appearance of this volume, we cannot forbear from offering to the author our tribute of respect on this account—that, with one noteworthy exception, his opinions of forty years ago were absolutely sound, as his prognostications appear to have been absolutely justified.

Whether Lord Goschen will be recognised by future generations as a great Chancellor of the Exchequer we have some doubt. As a banker and man of finance his pre-eminence has scarcely been questioned, but in politics he was, perhaps, not "showy" enough to attain a high place in the estimate of the historian, and he was always too balanced and accurate for noisy popular esteem; but the Exchequer is an office where the moral influence, so to speak, of the head of the department lives after him, and, if succeeding Chancellors have followed sound principles of finance, it is not too much to say that Lord Goschen has, in our generation, done more than any living man to make it possible for them to do so.

In this volume it is the great banker, the great man of business with a wide understanding of the world's forces, who speaks to us, and, now that the personal element has so largely departed from the banking world in the unceasing acquisition of old private banks by the joint stock company, his words provoke a more considerable interest than they might have done twenty years ago.

Two Essays on the Bank rate, "Seven per cent." and "Two per cent.," possess great historical value. They deal with the period when joint stock enterprise was sowing its wild oats, and we have no conception nowadays, though our Stock Exchange is spasmodic and mercurial enough, of the horrible tension in the business world between 1864 and May 10, 1866, when Overend and Gurney closed their doors with a liability of nineteen millions. At the time many projects of economic imposture were suggested, notably by M. Pereire of the Crédit Mobilier, for relieving the tension, which was attributed not to scarcity of gold but to scarcity of notes.

On such a subject Lord Goschen wrote with admirable lucidity and force. Every reason but the right one was given for the over-trading and speculation which had led to the crisis. The Bank Charter Act was, it is true, suspended, but for three months the rate of interest was 10 per cent., and the reserves which, in May 1866, amounted to thirteen millions, were raised at the close of the year to twenty-eight millions—and, "while capital like any other commodities is encouraged to migrate from the cheapest to the dearest market," it is, of course, plain that the further issue of notes with a Bank-rate artificially low could only have hastened their conversion into gold and its immediate export to some market where the rate was higher.

The financial troubles of 1866 were due to the growing diffusion of English capital for foreign purposes under the joint stock system and, "ceteris paribus, the rate of interest cannot fall below a point at which companies trading with foreign countries are willing to take it." After exaggerated confidence, exaggerated despondency characterised 1867 with its Bank rate of 2 per cent. But, save to the most solvent borrowers, money was never really cheap; it was not competing for hire, it merely refused to be hired on any terms whatever.

The crisis of 1866 had struck a blow at credit under which "our whole system reeled and staggered;" the result was seen in "2 per cent.," due to the limited reserves of a limited class being all concentrated "on a given spot and entrusted to an agency most scrupulously cautious." Thus Lord Goschen refers to the banking fraternity of 1868. He expresses some concern whether the joint stock banks will be equally prudent. There is, we think, no reason to doubt it—indeed, in some ways they are more cautious than the old private banks, and the country farmer, who could formerly procure an overdraft of £500 or £1000 after five minutes' chat in the bank parlour, to-day sues in vain for a fifth of this accommodation from the Manager's office, though his credit may be unquestioned. The personal relation has been destroyed; but it must be, we think, on the whole a factor for solvency—and to-day "security not price" is the Banker's rule, even more inflexible than in 1868.

An interesting address on the "Prospects of Trade" in 1885 is included in the volume, in which emphasis is laid on the greater diffusion of capital, and the enormous increase in the number of those who, under the joint stock system, participate in the business profits of the nation. In 1885 the paid up capital of our registered companies was five hundred and ninety-one millions: in 1903 it had grown to the stupendous sum of one thousand eight hundred and fifty millions, and it is clear that this larger capital is distributed among a proportionately larger number of shareholders—surely a striking proof not only of national prosperity but of the wider distribution of wealth.

The address contains interesting reference to the expansion of our Colonial Trade, but it would have been more instructive if Lord Goschen had dissected the increase of these exports, a great part of which must, we think, have represented Colonial Loans raised in this country and carried to the borrower in the form of British "Exports;" and, if there be any correctness in the assertion that during the period referred to Australia was borrowing from us at the rate of eight or nine millions annually, an increase of exports from fourteen millions to twenty-seven millions is surely not very striking.

As regards our position compared with prosperous foreign nations, Lord Goschen, rightly we think, attributes our supremacy to our start in trade, "an immense advantage, but which naturally dwindles as other countries progress."

We are afraid that the article on "Laissez faire" would irritate both Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Balfour, yet it must command the attention of every man who reflects that "every additional transfer of duties to the State saps the belief of the community in the value of natural liberty," and that originality of mind and individuality of character are the only sources of "any real progress and of most of the qualities which make the human race much superior to any herd of animals."

It is curious how "laissez-nous faire, laissez-nous passer", the impatient cry of the fiery revolutionary Physiocrats, is to-day attributed to "hard impassive theorists and cold-blooded economists;" certain it is, however, that the frame of mind which the catchword represents is out of favour.

Greater sensitiveness of the national conscience, calling for State remedies for moral evils and for more securities for the enforcement of the claims of humanity: growing discontent with the distribution of wealth and profits: the increasing demand for regulations, due to the difficulties of our complex and overcrowded social system—the necessity for the Executive to interfere more and more in the performance of functions for the discharge of which the ubiquity of its agents give it special facilities and the convenience of the public a special call—such are the four reasons given by Lord Goschen for the abandonment of the principle of "Laissez faire," but he laments it less in 1905 than he did in 1883, when he addressed the Edinburgh Philosophical Society upon the same text. Twenty years ago it is clear that he was apprehensive of some serious attack upon private ownership in the name of the State—a fear which he admits, not without satisfaction, has proved groundless. But alas! his expectation that a devolution of powers from the Civil Service to Local Authorities would operate to check the collectivist instinct has proved equally groundless, for the zeal of the state official is reflected as in a gigantic magnifying mirror in the salaried clerk of the strong local bodies brought into being since 1888.

In such a matter as Municipal Trading the only test for the man in the street is: "What does it cost?" He vaguely laments the loss of the individual, but he notes his destruction on all hands; the Joint Stock Company, the Joint Stock Bank, the group of Insurance offices merged in a huge combine, the Borough Council's tram-car, the newspaper syndicate, each is eloquent of a collectivist movement; but nothing stirs him until his pocket is reached, and that which the united conscience of the nation demands, whether it be Factory Acts, or Municipal Gas, or control of the Liquor Traffic, has to be paid for. The question to which Lord Goschen invites an answer is whether "the interference with freedom of action and contract has husbanded industrial resources by restraining the waste of them," or not. As Mill says:

There is in almost all forms of Government agency one thing which is compulsory, the provision of pecuniary means. These are derived from Taxation and the objection necessarily attaching to compulsory contributions is almost always aggravated by the expensive precautions and onerous restrictions which are indispensable to prevent an evasion of a compulsory tax.

The really interesting point in regard to our departure from the principle of "Laissez faire" is that, rightly or wrongly, one party to the present fiscal controversy undoubtedly holds that the action of the State, while effecting social improvement, has injuriously affected British trade, and upon this assumption bases a claim for Tariff protection.

We confidently recommend this volume to every student of economics and political science.

SONGS OF INNOCENCE

Odes and Elegies. By CLINTON SCOLLARD. (New York: Brown- ing, $1.35 net.)

Collected Sonnets of Lloyd Mifflin. Revised by the Author. (Frowde, 10s. 6d. net.)

Preludes and Symphonies. By OLIVER GREY. (Routledge, 3s. 6d.)

In Old Northumbria. By R. H. FORSTER. (Long, 3s. 6d. net.)

Thoughts and Fancies of a Girl. By KITTY BALBERNIE. (Cassell, 2s.)

Ante-room Ballads. By "CENTURION." (Routledge, 2s. 6d. net.)

Pro Patria and other Poems. By B. PAUL NEUMAN. (Brown, Langham, 3s. 6d.)

WHEN the first careless enjoyment is over, there are few pleasures which poetry can give equal to that of tracing the experience and observation of the poet in the worlds of men and nature and literature. So richly do some poets reward us, in this kind, that we distrust the biographies which affect to show us the existence out of which the poetry arose: the difference between the biography and the poetry is as great as between a tree in June and the same tree in January. Others have so refined their experience, or apparently disregarded it, that we see in their lives (as they are written) no greater resemblance to their work than there is in a box of paints to a finished picture. In short, except to a patient philosophic mind, the biography is apt to seem but an impertinent comment on the poetry. The two are often in irreconcilable contrast, and though at their best—as in Byron's case—they may be harmonised into an incomparable portrait of a man, yet we often wish back again the first intuitions which came when our minds had free play among the poems. How splendid it was to wanton thus with Shelley and Keats! Hence, perhaps, a great part of the unique pleasure which contemporaries can give—we see and admire, but seldom know "how change the moons." We gain a more or less definite vision of the poet's landscapes, his reading, his preferences and so on; we rejoice partly at the beauty and partly at our own recognition of it. And unless we are able to convince ourselves, in some degree, that our poet is either a pure singer whose course is indistinguishable in mist, or a man whose emotions and experience we can be fairly sure of, he writes, for us, in vain. He writes the "songs of innocence" of the ordinary verse-writer—songs which may have charms, but leave us uncertain whether the writer has ever done anything but read. We have several such before us to-day.

Mr. Clinton Scollard is a conspicuous example. He is the author of thirteen volumes of verse and eight of prose;

yet, in this, his twenty-second book, we can learn nothing of him except that he has read Keats and has listened to music and seen some pictures. We have not found one sentence which perplexes us pleasantly and makes us wonder how he came to say that in that way. We cannot surprise him at any revelation. For example, he begins with a poem of a hundred and fifty lines on "The Dreamers." The men of science, he says, the adventurers, the soldiers, the statesmen, the musicians, the painters, the sculptors, the poets, all are dreamers. He says so. The merit of the poem has to depend upon his rhythms, his observation and his manner of recording it. His rhythms are raised above mediocrity only by their almost unvaried pomp. His style is in keeping; it is lacking in precision as much as in restraint. His observation is not anywhere betrayed. We find him speaking of "the incomparable charm that June-time brings," of "impetuous Alexander" flinging "his serried phalanx;" of Chopin "whose melodies are like chords of sleep," of "the peerless splendour of the Parthenon," of Homer's heroes striding "grandly before us in a peerless row:" phrases which only prove that Mr. Scollard has never learnt the value of words. Set him beside Mr. William H. Davies, who in three lines on a London fog has the wonderful detail:

And only blind men know the way, and he is a child singing of inexperience. No man who really knew the importance of dreams and had dreams himself would have consented to leave out of a poem of that length all proof that he was sincere. June gave him a chance; surely he once saw a flower or heard a bird in June that left him unclogged by his marvellous facility in the multiplication of words; but if he did, he has not recorded it. In another poem he praises a dead man. On the first page he speaks of the dead man's dust, "wherefrom one day the violet may have birth." He has to suggest Arizona, and he can only say that it is like the Hell "that fancy pictured to the Florentine," and that "earth reveals no ghastlier, grimmer scene." We might also suppose that he had never known Arizona or death; his writing reveals the study only; and the result is that his by no means unskilled rhetoric is on the same level, in its effect, as an average political speech. Again, he laments McKinley—he, an adult man, we may assume, laments the murdered President in such words as:

And, with the sad intoning of the bells,
Bring immortelles.

Last, he has these words on a dream:

Then a surge of gold
Engulfed the rose-light, and clear Sirius paled
Into a dying point as o'er it rolled
The effulgent wave triumphant, and behold,
Day's immaterial splendour unassailed.

There is not, we think, any sentiment or observation in that which proves that Mr. Scollard ever watched the dawn.

Mr. Lloyd Mifflin is of the same school. We seem to neglect him only because he is famous in America, and there sitting where we dare not soar. The sonnet has a wonderful command of him. Three hundred and fifty times, in this volume, the sonnet has made him say grandiose or vague or sweet things which reveal nothing, except that the writer has been in the habit of reading poetry.

In Mr. Oliver Grey's "Preludes and Symphonies" we are in a different world. He teaches us at once not to expect observation or experience. He frankly uses only well-known themes, to which he is bold when he adds the decoration of a new epithet. He plays at verse as a child at "cat's cradles." He makes no pretence. He is bent on rearranging charming words, and he calls us to admire them for an hour. He could go on for ever writing as he writes "to Lilian learning Greek":

This dull Grammar holds the keys
To the realms of poesy;
Glimmering cities, fairy seas
Sleeping 'neath a summer sky.

And that is to poetry as coquetting is to love, and not unpleasant.

Mr. R. H. Foster, little as he has of Mr. Scollard's brittle pomp or Mr. Grey's thin sweetness, is of their school. That is to say that he uses verse, unconsciously perhaps, in order to give a more imposing dress to matters that do not concern him overmuch. Had he written in prose instead of blank verse, he would have used the same vocabulary: he might have been more terse, his descriptions would have been more laboured and full; but a plain man might put his verse into prose without doing it any harm. He chose blank verse as, a few generations ago, men chose the ballad form when they wanted to draw attention to a murder or a scandal, because verse is, to the majority, an unusual and dignified form. Verse puts the mayoral robes on the plain man. It is a harmless and artless deception. Mr. Forster wished to make the battle of Heavenfield impressive without loss of time, and he did it by means of lines like these:

Here on this lonely hill
Shall be our refuge and our haven of rest
To night, and ere another sunset throw
Its gorgeous mantle o'er the western sky,
Our castle and protection, to be famed
In England's annals while that England lasts . . .

So Oswald speaks; and it is good old-fashioned rhetoric, too.

Miss Kitty Balbernie reveals no more than Mr. Forster, though she uses the lyric and the sonnet. Mr. R. B. Ransford introduces her to us, saying that some of her pieces "will endure and be sung the world over," and adding that her "lyre" has only sounded "under the pressure of suffering and the tension of pain." She is not yet sixteen. There is little more to be said except that it is a pity that one who is still a child should write like an ordinary man. Of childhood there is nothing here except its immaturity.

"Centurion" is probably a man of experience. He is a soldier and an officer; many of his poems were "scribbled in note books during the war in South Africa"; yet he does not here reveal anything but the natural desire to laugh in the face of experience. When he takes his pen in his hand, he dips it, not in "the hues of earthquake and eclipse," but in ink as futile as if it had to earn a living for him. His verses are an extraordinary example of the inability of most men to use their experience instead of their chance reading. Perhaps it was in the midst of sudden death that he wrote:

Who was it woke me every day,
With what he chose to call my "tay,"
Then set my clothing in array?
My servant!

and eight more verses on that theme. Well, probably it cheered without inebriating.

"Centurion" writes like a mere writer. Mr. Neuman fails either to be graceful and readable, or to knead his experience into verse. He just fails. Some of his verses are of a grave and restrained simplicity; others are touched with the spirit of a kindly, thoughtful and experienced man—yet never does he succeed in combining his experience and his serious style in such a way as to make poetry. He is always outside of his subject. He rouses our sympathy once or twice, not by art, but by writing that is always on a fair level and by a sentiment that is lofty and obviously sincere.

SIR ANDREW CLARKE

Life of Lieut.-General the Hon. Sir Andrew Clarke. Edited by Col. R. H. VETCH, C.B. (Murray, 15s. net.)

THE biographies of soldiers are not often so interesting as is the life of Sir Andrew Clarke, but a military officer's life is seldom of so varied a kind as was that of this son of the Empire. To have played a part in the early struggles of two of the Australasian colonies, to have undertaken engineering works on a large scale, to have settled complex native problems in the Straits Settlements and to have served on the Viceroy's Council would have been enough for most men; but Sir Andrew Clarke was a man of such unceasing activity that these achievements were but a part of his career, and the training which he obtained in thus serving his country abroad only fitted him the better for becoming at home Commandant of the School of Military Engineering and Inspector-General of Fortifications. His career deserved a biography, if only as an example of how the servants of the Empire are made. It is true that his appointment to the high post of Inspector-General, at the age of fifty-eight, was much criticised, and as his namesake, Sir G. S. Clarke, says in the preface to his book:

There were actually persons who believed that Sir Andrew happened to be looking over a hedge somewhere in Victoria when Mr. Childers either stole a sheep or committed a murder—the story varied—and that the Inspector-Generalship was the reward of silence.

The cause of Sir Andrew Clarke's success in the various offices which he filled is probably to be traced in part to his faculty in recognising merit in his subordinates. It is a very rare gift, and Sir Andrew, like the late Sir Henry Cole, Superintendent of the South Kensington Museum, was an "astute detector of useful men." This gift was well used, as Colonel Vetch points out, when Captain G. S. Clarke was sent by Sir Andrew to Alexandria to make a detailed examination of, and report on, the effect of the bombardment. This officer, now well known as Sir George Clarke, had written an account of the defence of Plevna: its merits arrested the attention of Sir Andrew, with whom he was neither acquainted nor connected. That is but one example out of many of the detection of useful men. This alone shows that Sir Andrew was not an official of the stereotyped pattern, and the administrative changes which he made, and which bore so good a result, are an additional proof. Naturally, he did not always have the free hand which he desired, but even the work which he was not allowed to achieve serves to show how great was his craving to do something: criticism and academic exposition are not satisfactory by themselves to men of action.

After his retirement from the active list Sir Andrew Clarke served as an Agent-General for some time and devoted himself also to trying to teach lessons of efficiency. Some of his letters on Imperial defence are startlingly apposite at present. One letter in particular, which was published in 1889, deserves notice. After stating that "Germanised army corps are the mere luxuries of military ambition," he went on to say that:

instead of preaching impossible conscription and idly seeking to defend the greatest city of the world by cheap expedients, let us sink party spirit, departmental prejudices, even personal aims, in one great effort to create and maintain such a navy as will alone enable us calmly to face the unknown future, and to bear ourselves once more with dignity in the councils of Europe.

That sentence is of particular interest at the present moment. But whether it bear fruit or not, Colonel Vetch has every reason to be well contented with the fruits of his labour.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

NEW LIGHT ON CHAUCER'S "LEGENDE OF GOODE WOMEN"

OPINIONS differ as to the merit of the stories of faithful injured ladies to which Chaucer gave the collective title, "The Legende of Goode Women." One of the very best of modern Chaucer critics, Professor Ker, is ever ready to defend these narratives of "Cupid's Saints." To other students Chaucer seems to have found the devotion of his Heroides a monotonous theme, and to have wearied of his task some time before he reached the ninth lady, with whom he abandoned the martyrology which was to have celebrated nineteen. Again, it has lately been suggested that some of the stories may be early work in which the poet was feeling his way in the use of the decasyllabic couplets over which he ultimately attained so happy a mastery. Both the one suggestion and the other point to a feeling that in many of these tales Chaucer is not at his best, but against the Prologue to them no such veiled censures have ever been brought. In both of the two forms in which it has been preserved it is delightful. Whatever tremors he may have felt in their presence, Chaucer is as much at his ease in narrating the wrathful speech of Cupid and the pleading of Queen Alceste as in any of the talks of his Canterbury Pilgrims. Moreover, there is a simplicity—in the slang of to-day we might say a prefigurement of the Simple Life—in the picture of the courtier-poet, one of the King's Esquires, Comptroller of the Customs of the Port of London, a Justice of the Peace, and soon to be, if not already, a Member of Parliament for Kent, sleeping in his garden on a bank of green turf that he might rise the earlier to do observance to the Daisy, the most modest of flowers. In his "Troilus and Creseide" Chaucer touches some at least of the notes of Romeo and Juliet. In this Prologue to the "Legende of Goode Women," with its delight in the flowers and the sun, its picture of Cupid's wrath and appeasement, and of the fair women singing their blade in honour of Alceste, we have an anticipation of some of the charm of A Midsummer Night's Dream.

The charm of the Prologue to the "Legende" will abide, it may even prove to have been heightened, but the discoveries of the last two years have given it a different turn. As we are now taught to know it, it is more literary, more of the Court and its amusements, and savours something less, it must be owned, of the simple life. It will be remembered that the Prologue begins with a praise of Books, from which we learn more than we could ever know of ourselves. There is a similar eulogy of books at the beginning of the "Parlement of Foules," and no doubt the resemblance helped to put Chaucer's editors off the scent, and make them think that the passage a few lines further on, in which the poet speaks of gleaning where others had reaped, referred only to Ovid and the other authors from whom the lives of the Good Women were compiled. As it stands in the version which we have all hitherto believed that Chaucer first wrote, it reads:

For wel I wot, that folk han her-beforn
Of making ropen, and lad away the corn;
And I come after, glening here and there
And am ful glad if I may finde an ere
Of any goodly word that they han left.
And, if hit happeth me reherseen eft
That they han in her fresshé songés sayd,
I hope that they wil nat ben evel apayd,
Sith hit is seid in forthering and honour
Of hem that either serven Leef or Flour.

The survival of a poem, long erroneously attributed to Chaucer himself, entitled "The Flower and the Leaf," supplied the information that lovers used to range themselves under these two banners, and provoked notes to the effect that this was the earliest reference to the dispute in English literature; but to the hint given in the allusion to "fresshé songés" every one save Tyrwhitt a century ago was blind. Yet a still stronger hint was available, for in another version of the Prologue, generally accepted as Chaucer's revision of the one from which we have quoted, the passage reads much more significantly:

But helpeth ye that han conning and might,
Ye lovers that can make of sentement;
In this cas oughte ye be diligent
To forthren me somewhat in my labour,
Whether ye ben with the Leef or with the Flour.
For wel I wot, that ye han her-biforn
Of making ropen, and lad away the corn;
And I come after, glening here and there,
And am ful glad if I may finde an ere
Of any goodly word that ye han left.
And thogh it happen me rehercen eft

That ye han in your fresshé songés sayd,
Forbereth me, and beth not evel apayd,
Sin that ye see I do hit in the honour
Of love, and eek in service of the flour,
Whom that I serve as I have wit or might.

That the "ye" to whom this direct appeal is made must be some contemporary poets now seems unmistakable, but the clue to their identity lay hid in French manuscripts, and it was only when progress had been made with publishing the works of Eustache Deschamps that the meaning of the passage became clear. The honour of discovering it (a fitting reward for his many services to English literature) fell to Professor Kittredge of Harvard, who, in a brilliant article in Modern Philology (Chicago, 1903), on "Chaucer and some of his Friends," showed that several of Deschamps's poems were concerned with the rivalry of the Flower and the Leaf, and that one of these was written about this very time in honour of Philippa of Lancaster, daughter of Chaucer's patron, John of Gaunt. Now, Eustache Deschamps was already known as a friend or admirer of Chaucer, to whom he wrote a balade with the refrain, which now seems to us a little unkind, "Grant translateur, noble Geoffroi Chaucier," and sent therewith by the hands of Sir Lewis Clifford some poems of his own for Chaucer's approval.

The clue which one good American had thus discovered another good American quickly followed up, and the story, which can here only be epitomised, will be found in full, with an exhaustive discussion of its bearings on Chaucer's poetry, in two papers contributed by Mr. John L. Lowes, also of Harvard, to the Publications of the Modern Language Association of America for December 1904 and 1905. Here he shows that for the celebration of May-day by Charles VI. of France at Vincennes in 1385 Deschamps had written a "Lai de Franchise" contrasting the pomp of the King's Court with the simple maying of Robin and Marion, and that some of the most familiar lines in Chaucer's Prologue are taken from this "Lai de Franchise" of Deschamps, from the "Paradys d'Amours" and other poems by Chaucer's old acquaintance, the chronicler Froissart, and from his other French favourite, Guillaume Machault. He has taken some lines also from Boccaccio's "Filostrato" (the poem on which he drew for his "Troilus"), but it is from Deschamps, Froissart and Machault, and their poems in honour of sundry fair Marguerites, that he borrows the lines so often quoted as autobiographical.

Now have I than swich a condicioun
That of allé the flourés in the mede
Than love I most these flourés whyte and rede,
Swiche as men callen daysies in our toun.
To hem have I so greet affeccoun,
As I seyde erst, whan comen is the May,
That in my bed ther daweth me no day
That I nam up, and walkyng in the mede
To seen this flour agein the sonné sprede,
Whan hit upryseth erly by the morwe.

For a dozen lines more the borrowing goes on, not as men borrow with their eyes fixed on a book, but as a poet borrows who wants to remind his poet friends of how well their songs are printed on his memory. It is at the end of these borrowings that we come to the apostrophe to "ye lovers that can make of sentement" already quoted, and now its full meaning is clear. Instead of filling his lines with the names of his French friends and the titles of their poems, Chaucer literally gleans from them, and then tells them what he is doing and asks their help. "I should be but a nettle in your garden" Deschamps had written to Chaucer, and the Englishman writes back: "On the contrary I can but glean what you and your friends have left for me to pick up," and having thus made matters right, and cemented this poetic entente cordiale amid the horrors and stupidities of the Hundred Years War, he proceeds, as Mr. Lowes shows, to take very considerable hints for the framework of his Prologue from both the "Lai de Franchise" and the "Paradys d'Amour."

One certain result from Mr. Lowes's pamphlets is that what has hitherto been regarded as the later form of Chaucer's Prologue to the "Legende" is undoubtedly the earlier. The interchange of courtesies between Chaucer and his French friends is very pretty and charming. It is good also to have yet another instance of the absolute originality which Chaucer could give to his borrowings. Much less pleasant—though wholesome—is it to be reminded yet once more of the extreme danger of taking any word which Chaucer writes about himself in verse as literally true. This is a hard lesson to learn. Even Mr. Lowes has not learnt it quite perfectly, for in his second paper he catches himself repeating the argument that, as there would be no garden to have a "herber" in attached to Aldgate gatehouse, Chaucer must have been living somewhere else when he wrote the Prologue. Reluctantly he admits that reasoning of this kind will no longer hold good. Well! it is another illusion gone. But after all Chaucer was nearer fifty than forty when he wrote the "Legende" and nights are still cold in May. He would not have "conveyed" the lines about the early worship of the daisy had he not approved it as quite a nice thing for young men to do, but for an elderly poet it was doubtless much better to stay in bed and read pretty French poems in comfort, undisturbed by more rheumatism than a man must needs expect!

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

* * * As I have been writing about "The Legende of Goode Women," there is a point which I should like to make about its title, as it has not, to my knowledge, been brought out by Chaucer's commentators and is a good deal obscured by Dr. Murray's treatment of the word Legend in the Oxford English Dictionary. In the Prologue, as a punishment for his heresy against Love's law, Chaucer is condemned to a literary penance. "Thou shalte," he is told,

Whyl that thou livest, yeer by yere,
The mosté party of thy lyvé spendé,
In making of a glorious Legendé
Of Godé Wommen, maidenes and wyvés,
That weré trewe in loveinge al hir lyvés.

Dr. Murray quotes the second and third lines of the passage as his first example of the use of the word legend in the sense of "a story, history, account." There can, I think, be little doubt that its true meaning here is that of a Lectionary or Book of Lessons. The Sarum Legenda was a well-known book in mediæval England. It has lately been shown that an edition of it was published by Caxton, and that this, and not "The Golden Legend," was the book of which he bequeathed copies to the churchwardens of St. Margaret's. Now the third set of lessons, to be read on any day in church, were taken in whole or part from the lives of the Saints commemorated on that day. They were read at the second of the three Nocturns into which Mattins was divided, and, their contents being for the most part highly miraculous, "to lie like a second nocturn" became a mediæval proverb. Thus, when Love bids Chaucer make "a glorious Legende of Gode Wommen," it is clear that he is bidding him contribute to his worship by composing a lectionary in honour of his martyrs, and it is exactly in accordance with this that we have the reference in the Man of Law's Prologue in the Canterbury Tales to Chaucer's "largé volume," "cleped the Seintes Legende of Cupyde," i.e., the Legenda or Lectionary of Cupid's Saints. We still speak of Cupid as a god, and Chaucer, with the mediæval love of detail, argues that, if he were a god, women who died for their loyalty were his saints and martyrs, and set himself to provide a Lectionary in their honour. To gloss the word "story, history, or account," empties it of its special meaning and spoils the point.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Earliest Modern Novelist," by Edward Wright.]

THE DOWNSMAN IN EXILE

THE Downsmán in far city
May not his home forget:
The spacious hills of many a fold
He sees in vision yet.
His fancy flies the crowded streets,
The noise, the stir of town,
And peace is his where shepherds watch
All silent on the Down.

He marks anew the gracious slopes
That dip to Weald and coomb;
He hies to valleys all aglow
With fire of gorse in bloom;
He comes to the old beacon's crest
The Weald before him spread;
The quiet villages he sees
Where Sussex words are said.

And kind his heart to all he sees,
To plain as well as hill;
But kindest to the open Down,
Where one may have his will;
May roam from morn till day be done,
Nor meet forbidding board;
Where is no path that one must tread,
But free to all the sward.

So sighs the Downsmán far away
For hills that others roam;
So from the midst of alien streets
His thoughts they fly to home.
Still dreaming of the upland ways
Unwon to love of town,
He holds above all places best
The land of the South Down.

CHARLES HART.

FICTION

John Carruthers, Indian Policeman. By Sir EDMUND C. COX, Bart. (Cassell, 3s. 6d.)

THESE little tales of the experience of an Indian policeman are very ingenious and cleverly worked up. Give John Carruthers three hairs upon a table-cover, or a score or two of loose bricks, and he will build up, or demolish, an elaborate structure of intrigue and crime. As a rule, there is only a single thread to disentangle, partners and complications are avoided, the stories are short and brisk, and all to the glory of the narrator's astuteness. "The Rajapur Case," "The Stolen Dispatch," and "The Dutch Engineer" are perhaps the most striking examples of the author's invention, but most of them illustrate some interesting phase of native life. "Romeo and Juliet" is not altogether convincing, and "The Last Story" is the weakest in the volume. John Carruthers is one among hundreds of inconspicuous good men who think and act imperially in the out-of-the-world corner whither duty sends them, and by their just, if sometimes arbitrary, proceedings maintain a wholesome fear of the British Raj. They are lucky if they win for themselves the coveted K.C.S.I., £500 a year, and a country cottage. There are other compensations, however: leisure to record their extraordinary experiences for the enlightenment and amusement of home-keeping folk who could not describe off-hand the difference between a Hindu and a Brahman. Sir Edmund Cox gives his information very neatly in the course of strange and stirring scenes, and if the tales are not all true, they are all true enough and generally entertaining.

Her Highness. By FRED WISHAW. (Long, 6s.)

WITH a canting fool for a hero, two professional flirts for heroines, and the Russian Court in the days of the Empress Elizabeth for background, it may be imagined that "Her Highness" is not a very savoury story. Nor, it must be confessed, is it very interesting. Russian history is a domain with which Mr. Wishaw is fairly familiar, but he has given us much more enthralling and much better written stories than this. He tells us of Catherine—the Princess of a little German state, who cemented her hold on the throne of all the Russias with the blood of her husband—without ever once making us feel the character of the woman he is describing. Sir Guy Maxwell, it may be supposed, is meant to pass for a man of honour, but he is, after all, little more than a lay figure who holds impossibly honourable opinions because they fit him into the scheme of the story. And Mr. Wishaw himself very aptly describes Phyllis Seymour as a wax doll. However, there are adventures, there is intrigue, and there is, occasionally, a page or two of exciting incident. So that an hour spent with the book may not lack amusement.

A Madcap Marriage. By M. McD. BODKIN. (Long, 6s.)

THIS is a book by a writer of pleasant things, which, but for the fact of its being absolutely and utterly unconvincing, would be more than a little unpleasant. But since from the first the happenings and characters in "A Madcap Marriage" are quite impossible, it is useless to take the hero and heroine and their doings seriously, and we need not therefore seek for any very severe adjective with which to qualify the hero's conduct in particular. That a man could masquerade as a woman, or a woman as a man, so successfully as Frank Dalton and Florence Martyn are supposed to do, especially in clothes dropped on in the most haphazard fashion, is an impossibility. That a decent man, or a modest girl, should carry this doubtful jest to the extremes this couple do, is an impossibility, or a possibility that kills all interest in them. That a man should, in five short years, utterly forget the face of the girl he makes his wife in such a very irregular, not to say shady manner, is an impossibility. Impossible also, are most of the incidents in the Boer Campaign, where "Mrs. Marshall," as Florence Martyn chooses to call herself, coaxes a prominent British Colonel into insisting on her being taken on the nursing staff going to the front. There she, of course, proves invaluable to her forgetful husband—a surgeon-major, within five years of passing the Army Medical. Lucky man! We have quoted only a few of the impossibilities in "A Madcap Marriage," and, honestly, bearing in mind Mr. Bodkin's reputation and the charm and wit of his previous works, we wish that he had found the publication of this book an impossibility too.

THE DRAMA

"ELECTRA" AT THE COURT THEATRE

IF all who go to see the Electra acted in English will read Professor Gilbert Murray's Introduction and Notes, and Professor Tyrrell's review of the book in THE ACADEMY for December 20, 1905, they will go well primed. Indeed, there is little or nothing that can be added. Only this question arises: How does the play act? It is an important question, for too often it happens that plays which interest or enthrall in the study fall flat when seen in the theatre. There is, in this case, only one answer; it acts exceedingly well. Those who saw The Trojan Women at the same theatre last year may remember, perhaps, how the desolation, the woe, the sense of great things gone, became almost unbearable before the play was out. But for the occasional relief of added horror, there was one note, and one only throughout—the wailing of women; and since the emotions can only stand a certain amount of strain at a time, the cumulative effect of all this woe was to deaden the spirit to something not far from callousness. There is nothing of that kind in the Electra. Euripides was a skilled playwright, besides being a far-seeing judge of human nature. He knew, as we say, how to "construct a play; and in this play he keeps rousing our interest and stirring our emotions, so that every feeling shall be the finest and strongest of its kind, yet never pass through excess into numbness. The strange tenderness of Electra's peasant-husband, the desolation of Electra herself, bowed by poverty, labour and despair, her swift passages of hope and fear, her outburst of joy on learning that the stranger is indeed Orestes, the dreadful eagerness of the plotting of the double murder, and all the passage of events through the hideous deed to the appearance of Castor and Polydeuces above, and that exquisitely pathetic departure of Electra with Pylades:

ORESTES: O faithful unto death,
Thou goest?
ELECTRA: Aye, I pass from you,
Soft-eyed at last;

this mixture of pathos, tenderness, horror, hope, fear, love, hatred, mourning and joy, makes up a play that is as full as any we know, new or old, of the intellectual and emotional excitement for which we go to the theatre. And how skillfully it is all contrived! When the deaths of Aegisthus and Clytemnestra have been plotted between Orestes, Electra, and the old man, their friend, the three pray together to the gods for vengeance. That prayer, so placed, coming, as it does, just at the close of what the producers of this version have wisely made the end of the first part, just before the breathing-space that is to usher in the double doom, is one of the most effective things we have seen on the stage.

"There is, perhaps," writes Dr. Murray, "no woman's character in the range of Greek tragedy so profoundly studied," as that of Electra in this play. To see the part acted by Miss Wynne-Matthison was to see deeper into the character than ever. Hers was a performance it would be difficult to praise too highly. She made no attempt to soften the woman into any petty prettinesses. A bitter woman this, childless, loveless, save for the love of her brother and of her father's memory, eaten away with hatred and the longing for revenge and the sense of her wrongs, remorseless, cruel, hard: but still enshrining somewhere within her the graciousness that should have been hers had her life gone smoothly, able to thank her peasant husband for his forbearance and to pass, after the deed is done and the doom has been spoken, "soft-eyed at last." Not a shade of character was lost, and yet there was no extravagance of passion. Mr. Harcourt Williams made a passable Orestes, Mr. Barnes an admirable old man, and Miss Edyth Olive played Clytemnestra powerfully in her one short scene. The appearance of Castor and Polydeuces, the dei ex machina, was cleverly managed, and the setting of the play entirely satisfactory. The performance will be repeated on the afternoons of January 23, 26, and 30, and February 2.

"LA RAFALE" AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

HAVING seen La Rafale, one can well understand that Mme. Simone le Baig, for all her small eccentricities and occasional amateurishness, was an ideal impersonator of Hélène de Bréchebel. For this is a part which not only requires acting, it requires expressing. It demands a fiery, impulsive temperament. Anything else ruins the verisimilitude of the story.

Hélène is a young girl, married for convenience, according to her parents' wishes, and loved by two other men—one a rich cousin, the other a ruined gambler. The first, Amédée she has liked, the second, Robert, she does love. She learns that Robert is on the brink of ruin, that he is compromised for a huge sum which must be paid in a very short time. She throws herself into the breach with all her heart and soul. First she tries to raise money on her jewels; that will take too long. Then she tries to get Amédée to lend it her; finally she has recourse to her father. He will let her have it, on condition that Robert leaves the country. This she refuses. At her wit's end, she goes back to Amédée, agrees to his terms, and comes the next day to tell Robert the news. As she arrives Robert shoots himself.

From this brief outline it may be seen that, though Hélène is a heroine, she is one who, like Joan of Arc, is spurred on solely by nerves. What she does, she does under sheer stress of excitement. There is no pause for reflection; indeed, she hardly realises what is happening during the tempest of passion through which she passes. Her mind is fixed on her lover's salvation, and the means are justified by the end.

It stands to reason, therefore, that Mme. Réjane cannot be wholly satisfactory in the part. Once or twice, when she forgets her audience, she is magnificent, but her Hélène is not the feverish, ill-controlled nature that the author had in mind. The play leaves off at an interesting point. We could almost forgive M. Bernstein for writing a sequel dealing with Hélène after Robert's death.

FINE ART

THE OLD MASTERS—II

THE picture that has aroused most interest from the historical point of view is the portrait group by Frans Hals. This appears to have hung forgotten and unidentified for many years in an English country house, but now that it has been exhibited, for the first time, it has been recognised at once as unmistakably by the hand of the master. I agree with Mr. MacColl in the doubt he expresses as to its being a portrait of the painter and his family, but I should not give as a reason for that doubt, the difficulty of painting one's own portrait in the momentary action he has chosen. Such problems presented no difficulty whatever to Hals. It is not to be supposed that each of the figures in his famous groups at Haarlem was posed as a whole person in the position we see it. Probably, having made a sketch group, he painted the heads from each model, and the figures from one or two professional models, and he would use the same method in painting his own portrait. The authentic portrait of himself, with his wife, is in a posture no less impossible for the artist to represent directly from nature. The skill involved in dealing with such a method without the slightest evidence of dovetailing, piece-meal work or stolidity, is unique of its kind. My reason, however, for doubting it as a portrait of Hals is the difference in the features, and especially the character of the man.

We see in the Duke of Westminster's and Earl Spencer's portraits that Hals had a hard, keen, rather sly and unpleasant face, a face which prepares us for the summons at the police court which he underwent for ill-treating his wife, Annette Hermansz, with the injunction that he would in future eschew "Dronken schappij." He, who was the painter of geniality, was not a genial man, surely, but a keen and ruthless observer, and the slight grin of complacency in the other portrait, with his second wife, is not re-assuring. The portrait here lent by Colonel Warde is that of a more amiable and perhaps more stupid person. As a picture it shows the most characteristic features, the intense vivacity, the brilliant brush-work, and the defect that is nearly always to be found in his blacks, which are inky and harsh. The background of trees is by another hand, possibly Ruysdael, and is quite out of keeping in its rounded and feeble elaboration.

Returning to the English pictures, a minor painter, William Hilton, R.A., comes out with astonishing power in his portrait of his sister, Mrs. De Wint. We are strongly reminded of Mr. Sargent in this tour de force, but there is a sweetness and elegance that are reminiscent of Lawrence also. It is a very ambitious work, a little rhetorical and melodramatic in the gesture of the passionate mother clasping the child while he fondles her hair, but the dash and skill are undeniable. By George Vincent, another artist who died young, at thirty-four, are three pictures, the best of which is the view of Greenwich Hospital; its chief fault is the overcrowding of the shipping in the foreground.

As to the masterpieces by the great men here, the Miss Adney of Gainsborough, Miss Gore of Sir Joshua, the Lake of Nemi of Richard Wilson, what can one do but worship in silence and with regret and wonder that the sound tradition of their craftsmanship, with its intimate connection with its precursors, Rembrandt, Claude, Titian, should have been entirely lost and forgotten? When we enter the two last galleries, one of the reasons is plainly apparent, in the pictures of the Pre-Raphaelite school. The breach that was appearing in the Academic works of Wilkie and Mulready, etc., was widened of parti pris by Rossetti and Millais, and by this time it is a yawning gulf that all the efforts of our time will not span. After Reynolds and Gainsborough, how vulgar appear Millais and Rossetti, how silly Burne-Jones, how degraded and unclean Simeon Solomon! Alfred Hunt, Lord Leighton, Colin Hunter, what poor stuff it all is!

This is the best that the immediate past has to show, and it is as superior to the work of the present day as it is inferior to the great period. One painter alone stands out, great and to be measured with the great, Watts in the Amber Necklace, and it is Watts at his best period. After this his megalomaniac tendencies developed into monstrous proportions. Ever snatching at the Fata Morgana of his ideal, he did not perceive that he had already achieved the summit of great art, and that further development was impossible.

B. S.

MUSIC

FROM ACROSS THE SEAS

"SEA-PIECES," "New England Idylls," "Four Songs" and his fourth piano Sonata—"The Keltic"—are a group of compositions which may be taken to represent the mature powers of Edward MacDowell. He is an American composer whose name stands high among his countrymen, but up to the present his fame in England rests upon report rather than experience, so that it was with particular interest that I opened this parcel of specimens kindly sent to me by Messrs. Elkin and Co., the publishers in England. Attracted by the charming exterior, a cover of rough pale green paper with a breezy sea-sketch for frontispiece, I betook myself to the sea-pieces first. They are eight miniature pieces for piano solo with suggestive titles and short quotations of verse, which help to reveal the composer's standpoint. The titles are—"To the Sea," "From a Wandering Iceberg," "A.D. 1620," "Starlight," "Song," "From the Depths," "Nautilus," "In Mid Ocean." The first is built of broad phrases and is full of rich harmonic colouring. It looks orchestral on paper but sounds pianistic on the piano. The composer's directions given in English, as "With dignity and breadth," "Well bound throughout," "Soft, but very full and sonorous," describe the treatment. He quotes the line: "Ocean, thou mighty monster," and has attempted to compress within narrow limits the impression of power and expanse which it inspires, as if to hear the ocean roaring in the shell. Number 2, "From a Wandering Iceberg," is interesting as a study of MacDowell's position as regards harmonic structure. His key-signature indicates E major and, though much of the little piece is definitely in E minor, yet one may say that there is no real modulation, since E tonality is never really left. Incidentally, however, extremely remote harmonies are passed through, giving a sense of vagueness which is of course intentional, while the frequent use of a dominant pedal keeps one always in touch with the key. With this, Number 4, "Starlight," may well be compared, where he spends the first half making his audience entirely lose their way as regards key, and the second half in finding it again. Between these two fanciful sketches, which, it must be said, suggest improvisation rather than composition, the resolution implied in the broad and rhythmic tune of "A.D. 1620" comes as a welcome relief. This is definite in key, simple in harmony, and as a piece of music is more successful than either of the earlier ones, because clearer and less dependent upon the skill of the pianist for effect. The "Song," from its likeness in rhythm and colour to the themes of Dvořák's "New World" Symphony, may be supposed to be American in flavour, and the verse which heads it:

A merry song, a chorus brave,
And yet a high regret
For roses sweet, in woodland lanes—
Ah, love can ne'er forget!

suggests the thought of a home country. Its tunes are simple and charming. "From the Depths" and "In Mid Ocean" (Numbers 6 and 8) have an obvious affinity of intention and may be compared with Number 1. They are however, more elaborate and make much more severe demands upon the pianist's technique. They are powerful pieces of piano tone, especially Number 6, which is unified by a fine swinging rhythm and an insistent use of pedal notes. Between these two, "Nautilus," "A fairy sail and a fairy boat," stands as a dainty lyric piece, and reminds one of the grace of Grieg's Lyrische Stücke.

Though I have only attempted to mention salient features in the individual numbers of this set, I cannot even do that with the set of ten "land" pieces which make up the "New England Idylls." In these, as in the Sea pieces, there is most refreshing variety. Dainty and piquant melody is joined with great freedom of harmony; and some of them are sufficiently simple in technical requirement to be played with pleasure by ordinary human beings, an important point in pianoforte literature which most modern writers entirely ignore. This type of music, with its suggestion of a programme, not pressed home too hard, or taken in a grossly literal sense, is what generally earns for itself in the cant of modern criticism the epithet "poetic" and for its author the title of a "tone poet." Such phraseology is as unfortunate as that which describes poetry, remarkable rather for its mellifluous diction than for its substance, as "musical." In each case the external accessories of a great art are taken as representative of it: a sense of picturesque imagery and a dreamy imaginative power are taken to be the first qualities of poetry, as the jingle of sweet sounds is too often mistaken for music. These little pieces of MacDowell's come with an individuality and freshness which make them very welcome, but they are not in themselves sufficient to constitute their author a great tone-poet, or—to use a safe and a saner phrase—a great musician. To test this we must examine a larger work in which more distinctively musical issues are involved than merely a picturesque characterisation. Nothing could offer a better opportunity for this than a work in Sonata form; and in his "Keltic" Sonata we have one of MacDowell's most mature works. Again, the title and a stanza of poetry calling up visions of hero and heroine in the persons of Cuchullin and Deirdre suggest a subject-matter of mystery and romance outside the music; but whatever additional charm this may lend, and it is considerable, it cannot in the case of a Sonata usurp the place of intrinsic musical worth.

The "Keltic" Sonata in E minor is in three movements, the first of which is in a modified "first movement" form. It opens with a bold subject, its principal theme, which after some extension culminates in a downward passage of emphatic chords over a tonic pedal. This leads into a mysterious sounding chromatic passage which begins very soft and rises to a great crescendo. It is difficult to describe, for although there are suggestions of the first subject interwoven with chromatic harmonics, the sound is vague until the summit of the crescendo is reached, where chromatically descending harmonics lead evidently towards a cadence. It must be noted, however, that although this is the usual transitional passage between first and second subject, yet it has performed no modulating function, since the cadence here approached, and only avoided at the last moment, is one in E minor. The second subject, consisting chiefly of a repeated downward arpeggio in G major: it has charming expressive qualities, but is indistinctive, suggesting rather a codetta figure than a principal theme. It arrives at a definite cadence in G major from which the development begins. In this section there is much of which it is extremely difficult to trace the origin. There are gleams and reminiscences of the principal theme amidst the excitement and emotion, which is lashed up into a fury reminding one rather painfully of Liszt. A fine point, however, is made where a recollection of the first subject is given in the key of G minor as a central point in the development, but this in itself reveals what is the weakness of the movement viewed from the point of view of a Sonata. Bold as was its effect when thundered forth at the opening of the Sonata, in reality this theme lacks melodic outline. So indistinguishable is it that the composer has never used it again nor appeared to remember more of it than its general rhythm. The recapitulation of both subjects with the coda is condensed into a single page, in which a suggestion rather than a repetition of both subjects is given in the key of E major. It is no mere lack of compliance with established forms of which I complain in this movement, but a poverty of musical material which requires a modification of form, legitimate in itself, in order to escape detection. The other two movements, of which I cannot speak in detail, are more satisfactory in this way. The slow movement has for its principal theme a charming tune, whose dreamy wanderings and effects of pure tone and colour are more in place than in the rigorous first movement. The last movement supplies the place of both Scherzo and Finale, and is well knit together by a strong rhythm. Even here, however, I cannot avoid the impression that the composer does not realise the value to an audience of exact repetition. Throughout this Sonata MacDowell's method of using remote and unfamiliar harmonies always in connection with a definite key-centrestands him in good stead, and gives at once an interest and coherence which would fain make amends for the absence of distinctive melody. Nothing, however, can do so, neither this nor the stories of old time which float through the composer's brain as he writes, and may perhaps find a place in the thoughts of the listener. Cuchullin and Deirdre, heroism and beauty, these are no new considerations to the poet either in musical tone or in language. The great ones, from Homer to Beethoven, have been occupied with these things and, so far from condoning imperfections of expression, where they are concerned, we can admit none but the most perfect. Of the songs I cannot now speak particularly, but one may hope for another opportunity of discussing MacDowell as a song-writer as well as other phases of his art, when we in England have had fuller opportunity of judging it by the best test, that of practical experience.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

"PARTY Organisation and Machinery in the United States," by Professor Jesse Macy, of Iowa, is a book that will be found interesting now that the General Election is upon us. It deals with the whole work of Party Organisation in the States. It is full of information and ideas on all means of bringing about Party success, and will prove an indispensable store of practical knowledge. Chapters are included on Party Finance, the Party in Power and in Opposition, and on Party Loyalty, and election machinery is fully treated. Mr. Unwin is the publisher.

Through the drift of mankind to the cities, no economic question is of more interest at the present day than that of municipal organisation. This subject is discussed in a book entitled "The City; the Hope of Democracy," which will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on January 22. The author, Mr. F. C. Howe, is an American, who, as his sub-title attests, believes in the city. But he maintains that, if the city is to be a success, the people must take charge of things and abolish the monopolies and privileges which now lead to corruption. Municipal ownership is strenuously advocated, and the book also deals with such problems as tenements, reformatories, taxation, the prevention of crime, and "the City Beautiful." The work is based upon personal administrative experience and a thorough study of the conditions which prevail in the large towns of Great Britain and the United States.

Mrs. Cobden Unwin's book "The Hungry Forties: An account of Life under the Bread Tax from the Letters of Living Witnesses," was originally published at six shillings. Last year a sixpenny edition (revised) was issued. This edition—a large one—is now nearly exhausted, and on January 22 Mr. Unwin will bring out a new sixpenny impression. Other ventures of Mr. Unwin's in the political line are an edition in five sixpenny parts of Mr. Morley's "Life of Cobden," and a new impression of Mr. G. J. Holyoake's "Public Speaking and Debate: a Manual for Advocates and Agitators."

Mr. Walter A. Locks has written a series of Historical Stories which are connected with Old Ilford and its neighbourhood. It is announced under the title "A Maid in Armour and other Tales of Olde Ilford," by Mr. Elliot Stock.

Mr. Guy Thorne, the author of "When it was Dark," is to have an answer to his theories published very shortly. Mr. John Long is about to publish "When it was Light," by a well-known author.

"Mrs. Erricker's Reputation" is the title of a new novel by Mr. Thomas Cobb, which Alston Rivers will publish towards the end of the present month. A second impression of "The Pursuit of Mr. Faviel," by Mr. R. E. Vernede, is announced by the same firm.

The title of Mrs. Mary E. Mann's new novel, which Messrs. Methuen are to issue on the 25th, is "Rose at Honeypot." Rose Abra is the wife of a naval officer, who, during the three years' absence on foreign service of her husband, tires of the home with his sisters in which he has placed her. Her imagination kindled by the spell of writers on the country life and the English peasant, she determines to flee from the petty restraints, the social absurdities of her conventional surroundings to the wild heart of nature, to association with the noble beings who "eat and sleep with the earth." With the lady's subsequent adventures in the home of a Norfolk farm-labourer, Mrs. Mann's latest book concerns itself.

Messrs. Methuen will also issue shortly a new edition of Miss Beatrice Harraden's book, "In Varying Moods."

In connection with the Exhibition of the Staats Forbese Collection of Millet Drawings now being held at the Leicester Galleries, Mr. Heinemann announces a volume of fifty facsimile reproductions of Millet's drawings, the edition to be limited to three hundred numbered copies and to be published in the spring.

The St. Bride's Press will publish on February 1 an important work on "The Gambia Colony and Protectorate," by Francis Bisset Archer, the Treasurer of the Colony. It deals not only with matters of local interest, but details at length the history of West Africa, in its relation to the Colony, from the time of the earliest explorers. The book is fully illustrated with maps not hitherto published, and from photographs specially taken, and it has for frontispiece a photogravure portrait of the Governor, Sir G. C. Denton, K.C.M.G.

If 1905 was a slack year with most of our leading novelists, they are "putting on a spurt" in the first three months of this year. Though Mr. Rudyard Kipling is giving us no big work, he has a volume of short stories coming out within a short time. Sir A. Conan Doyle's

"Sir Nigel" which is appearing as a serial in the Strand Magazine is to be published in book form by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co., and Messrs. Methuen announce Mr. R. S. Hichens's new book, "The Call of the Blood." Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe's next book will be called "A Benedick in Arcady," and Mr. John Oxenham is also giving us "Giant Circumstance" in volume form. It is interesting to note that in all there were 1731 novels published last year. How many people could sit down and write out the names of, say, the odd thirty-one in half an hour, without reference to any book or bookshelf?

Mr. Heinemann is bringing out on January 24, a volume entitled "Frenzied Finance," by T. W. Lawson. The articles on which the book is based have appeared in Everybody's Magazine, and caused in America one of the greatest financial upheavals of recent years, which was reflected acutely in England. The book is of the most vital interest, and will appeal to everybody in any way connected with the tortuous ways of the modern financial juggler.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE CLYDE MYSTERY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with very great surprise the review of above book in your issue of December 23 and also the letter of Mr. G. S. Layard in yours of December 30, which happened to be the very day of Mr. Donnelly's death.

Your reviewer's ignorance is shown in his speaking of Dumbaie as a "submarine structure," whereas it stands four hundred or five hundred feet above sea level. The sites are not universally admitted "as evidences of the hand of man in the early navigation of the Clyde basin," unless the finding of an enormous dug-out canoe is what is meant. If the Cairn or Beacon theory is meant, I have never met anybody who supported it except its author, and I have heard it rumoured that even he has abandoned it. He, however, only claimed at most a sixteenth-century origin, while Dr. Munro assigns its date to somewhere between the fifth and twelfth centuries (pp. 192, 264). The doctor calls it a Corporation Cairn, thus reviving in a new dress the old puzzle of the Hen and the Egg: which came first? as this Corporation Cairn (p. 257) must have existed several centuries before there was any Corporation on or near the Clyde.

Dr. Munro states that both these Crannogs have been removed as an obstruction to the early navigation of the Clyde. The Dumbuck Crannog would not be an obstruction if it existed now, no matter how high it might be, while the Langbank Crannog is on the estuary and half a mile back from the River Clyde. It was covered with grass and the top of the piles reached about ordinary high-tide mark, so that if ever it was an obstruction it must have been before the last rise of the land, and its removal must have taken place more than three thousand years ago.

Nor have the "believers been reduced to a state of confusion" by that great geologist, Professor Boyd Dawkins; they simply went and examined the shells for themselves, and also the use made of them, and find that no reference whatever is made to them in any communication, they were simply handed over. They may have come to the district as manure among other city refuse and been worn as children's toys and dropped among the grass, but if they are forgeries, they are much more likely to be the work of an enemy.

Dr. Munro's statement that they were carved was publicly contradicted years ago, and two of your correspondent, Mr. G. S. Layard's statements—that the Blue Points had human faces carved on them, and that Professor Dawkins said so—are both false.

Professor Dawkins's astonishment "that the finds were unlike anything he had ever seen elsewhere," would probably have been less if he had visited the structures themselves, which Dr. Munro admits to be "virtually a new type among the early inhabited sites of Scotland" (p. 13). He might even have been inclined to agree with the late Mr. H. Stopes who wrote: "As I am familiar with the slate tools found in the Thames Valley I have no hesitation in expressing my conviction that all these objects are genuine. The fact that they are singular is, under the whole circumstances, in their favour."

The Crannogs themselves were equally bewildering to Dr. Munro, who writes of them as a "so-called Crannog," "a Broch," "a Corporation Cairn," "a Beacon," "a Fish Bothy," "a Pile Structure," "a Submarine Structure," "a Fort," "the foundation of a Stone Crannog" (p. 220), showing that he was himself absolutely at sea about it.

The subject was discussed on three whole nights by the Royal Philosophical Society, the Archaeological Society, and the Geological Society of Glasgow, and speaker after speaker condemned Dr. Munro's charges, while not one voice was raised in his favour. It will thus be seen that Scottish opinion was solid against him.

Dr. Munro himself admits that "the two submarine structures in the estuary of the Clyde, along with the portion of the relics, as to which there can be no doubt as to their being genuine, are, perhaps, the most interesting and novel discoveries of recent times within the Scottish area" (p. 179).

As your paper gives support to charges against an honourable man, I trust you will, in the interests of fair play, find room for the above. Mr. Donnelly's discoveries are not due to chance, but to the fact that he knew this district, with its topography and natural history, better perhaps than any man living.

Besides Dumbaie and the Dumbuck Crannog, Mr. Donnelly is the discoverer of the magnificent cup and ring marked rocks at Auchentorlie, and during last summer he took a leading part in exploring a new crannog at Bishops Loch, near Glasgow, which will shortly be published, and informed me that when that was completed he had some other new discovery to work out.

JAMES NEILSON.

January 11, 1906.

[Our reviewer writes:

Mr. Neilson is completely mistaken in thinking that the review of Mr. Lang's book was intended to cast the slightest reflection on the bona fides of the late Mr. Donnelly. Nor do Dr. Munro's statements in "Archæology and False Antiquities" make any such suggestion. Mr. Lang in "The Clyde Mystery" (p. 18) says: "Of course Dr. Munro nowhere suggests that any excavator is the guilty 'faker.'" Mr. Donnelly, again to quote Mr. Lang's words, "was not an excavator of trained experience . . . like Dr. Schliemann, when he explored Troy, he was no erudite savant, but an enthusiast with an eye for likely sites." The worst charge that I ever heard of against Mr. Donnelly he shared in common with several Scotch antiquaries, namely, that he had been deceived by cunning forgeries. Mr. Neilson's own letter of January 11 is the very first intimation of any one being supposed to cast doubts on Mr. Donnelly's honour. The numerous British experts on prehistoric antiquities who agree with Dr. Munro in mistrusting the genuineness of many of the Clyde finds considered that Mr. Donnelly was deceived, but not that he was a deceiver. Why cannot all who write upon this vexed question imitate the admirable good temper shown by Mr. Andrew Lang in his recent book? Nothing was further from my intention than to add fuel to controversial heat, and I should wish to withdraw any phrase that may have unintentionally given offence.]

THE IMMORTAL PHRASE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Judging from the copious quotations given by your correspondent, Mr. D. Gulliver, far from proving, in my opinion, that Shelley is a master of the "immortal phrase," he has simply demonstrated up to the hilt its rarity in Shelley's works. Whilst there are numberless passages of lyric fire and beauty in his poems, the arresting line that rivets the reader's attention and haunts his memory is seldom present.

In brief, Mr. Gulliver, like Mr. Wright, lacks the noble instinct for what is best in a poet's works.

"E. R. B." was certainly happier in his selection, for it included "Life like a dome of many-coloured glass stains the white radiance of eternity"—most certainly an "immortal phrase." To which I would venture to add: "Our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thought." But how many such lines can be found in the whole of Shelley's verse? Few indeed!

Look, however, at the wealth of arresting and immortal lines in Wordsworth:

"The light that never was, on sea or land . . ."
 "The still, sad music of humanity . . ."
 "Heaven lies about us in our infancy . . ."
 "That inward eye which is the bliss of solitude . . ."
 "Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns . . ."
 "The sleepless soul that perished in his pride . . ."
 "Of splendour in the grass, of glory in the flower . . ."
 "Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears . . ."

These are indeed to be numbered amongst those gems of poetic thought "that on the stretched fore-finger of all time sparkle for ever."

The more we study Wordsworth's poetry the more we are in agreement with Coleridge's expressed opinion to his brother poet: "Since Milton I know of no poet with so many felicities and unforgettable lines and stanzas as you."

Truly there is a moral and imaginative sublimity of utterance in Wordsworth's best work which entitles him to rank after the two greatest names in our literature—Shakespeare and Milton.

STANLEY HUTTON.

ILLUSTRATED NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Before the growing evil has become a permanent one, is it possible by constant protest to stop the new fashion of illustrating good novels, books of poetry, etc.? Personally I would never read or buy one with illustrations when it is possible to avoid it, for, as a rule, these are beneath contempt, seldom following the descriptions of the text, and usually depicting the most vulgar types of men, women, and things. Let the "six-shilling shockers" be illustrated by all means; men like reading such books, and prefer them with pictures—the more the better. But a woman who reads a great deal—like myself—and imagines the characters she is reading about, suffers so greatly from disillusion when she finds persons depicted as I have described, that all pleasure in the stories, poems, etc., is gone, and intense irritability takes its place, the text and illustrations being mostly impossible to reconcile. I appeal to you and all journals on books, to protest against, and, if possible, stop this most horrible, new, and undoubtedly growing fashion.

January 13.

A. L. T.

GRACE AFTER MEAT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The remarks in "The Literary Week" of January 13 on the beautiful habit of "asking a blessing," recall to my mind the somewhat startling "Grace after Meat" of a child of my acquaintance. It was concise and voiced at one and the same time disappointment, wrestling with a natural piety. It took this form: "Thank God for more dinner."

"WILSON CRAWFORD."

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Inasmuch as Mr. James Morrice is a "new man" to your critic, "B. S.," I may be permitted to inform him that:

- (1) Mr. Morrice is a Canadian and not an American, as suggested;
- (2) He has for some years past been a regular exhibitor at the Société Nationale and the Autumn Salon in Paris, and at the International Society here; and
- (3) Several of his works have been acquired by the French Government for the Musée du Luxembourg.

FRANK RUTTER.

MR. J. H. INGRAM'S BIBLIOGRAPHY OF MARLOWE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you allow me to point out a curious and significant mistake in the tentative bibliography appended to Mr. J. H. Ingram's "Christopher Marlowe and his Associates." One of the items is there described as "Faligan E. De Marlovianis fabulis. Paris 1887," and a remark is added to the effect that it is a discussion of the "stories" current about the dramatist. I have looked through the volume and find, as I had expected, that it is nothing of the kind, but simply a doctoral thesis dealing with the plays of Marlowe. Probably Mr. Ingram would not have been misled if the title had been "De Marlovii fabulis." It would be too shocking an alternative to think that he is unaware, for instance, that the title of Mr. Gilbert Murray's volumes, "Euripidis fabulae," does not mean in English, "Stories about Euripides," but the "Plays of Euripides." However it may be, it is evident that Mr. Ingram has not taken the trouble to examine a volume which he considers of sufficient value to put in his list, and such inadvertence is surely calculated to set up an impression not unlike distrust.

January 16, 1906.

FRANCIS WOOLLETT.

[Mr. John H. Ingram replies as follows: Sir,—Were my reply as careless as Mr. Francis Woollett's accusations, I might deem it evidence that he "has not taken the trouble to examine a volume" which he goes out of his way to attack, from the fact that he states that I made a remark, which he puts in inverted commas, in my work on "Marlowe and his Associates," which, in fact, is not there! As a proof that the work referred to was through my hands on various occasions, I enclose for your inspection some of the slips, fortunately preserved, which I signed, dated, and handed in at the British Museum Reading Room upwards of three years ago. This voluminous work being out of print, and not otherwise procurable, I obtained it from time to time, as shown, at the British Museum. Although Monsieur Faligan's work displayed extensive reading of Elizabethan literature his lore was second-hand and, therefore, of no value to me in my researches.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

- Histoire de l'Art depuis les premiers temps chrétiens jusqu'à nos jours.* Illustrated. Published under the direction of André Michel. Tome I. Partie II. 11½ x 7½. Pp. 513. Paris: Armand Colin, 1905.
- [Livre II. L'Art Roman. Cap. v. L'Architecture Romane; cap. vi. La Sculpture Romane; cap. vii. Peintures, Miniatures et Vitraux de l'époque romane; cap. viii. L'évolution des arts mineurs du VIII au XII siècle. cap. ix. L'Art Monétaire; Conclusion au tome premier; Tables.]
- Bouchot, Henri. Les Primitifs Français (1292-1500). Complément Documentaire ou Catalogue officiel de l'Exposition. 8½ x 6. Pp. 342. (Paris: Librairie de l'art ancien et moderne.)
- [M. Bouchot's views on the Van Eycks and other "French Primitives" are fairly well known in England, partly through the Burlington Magazine. This volume gives them in full.]
- Les Maitres de l'Art: Rosenthal, Léon: Géricault. 8½ x 6. Pp. 176. (Paris: Librairie de l'Art ancien et modernes.)
- [A handsome illustrated biography of the artist, with useful appendices.]

- La Revue de l'Art ancien et moderne*, edited by Jules Comte. (Paris: 28 rue du Mont-Tabor.)
- Bumpus, T. Francis. The Cathedrals of England and Wales. Second Series. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 300 (Werner Laurie, 6s. net.)
- [As we predicted, Mr. Bumpus has found it impossible to complete his work in two volumes. This second series contains Canterbury, York, St. Paul's, Winchester, Norwich, Peterborough, Exeter and Wells, and the third series will complete the work.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Henry Irving. By Christopher St. John. 11½ x 9. Pp. 27. The Green Sheaf, 1s. net.
- Tarnowski, Count Stanislas. Chopin: as revealed by extracts from his Diary. Translated from the Polish by Natalie Janotha. Edited by J. T. Tanqueray. With eight portraits. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 68. (William Reeves.)
- [Translated from a lecture delivered to the poor students of Cracow University, 1871. It is not easy to tell where the introductory remarks of Mlle. Janotha (or Mr. Tanqueray) end, and the lecture proper begins.]

FICTION.

- Methley Alice. La Belle Dame. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 382. Long, 6s.
- Bodkin, McDonnell. A Madcap Marriage. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 334. Long, 6s. (See p. 63.)
- Keighley, S. R. Barnaby's Bridal. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 286. Long, 6s.
- Hughes-Gibb, Mrs. Through the Rain. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 302. Long, 6s.
- Muddock, J. E. For the White Cockade. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 325. Long, 6s.
- Divie, Lady Florence. Izra. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 688. Long, 6s.
- Cleeve, Lucas. Soul-Twilight. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 302. Long, 6s.
- Wingfield, George. He That is Without Sin. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 317. Long, 6s.
- Dawson, Francis Warrington. The Scar. Methuen, 6s.
- Bernstein, Herman. Contrite Hearts. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 217. New York: Wessels, 15 25.
- Bennett, Arnold. Hugo: a fantasia on modern Themes. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 324. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)
- Foster, R. H. The Arrow of the North. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 316. (Long, 6s.)
- Jepson, Edgar. The Lady Nags. Peeress. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. Illustrated by Lewis Baumer. (Unwin, 6s.)
- Harvey, Edmund. Poor Raoul, and other Fables. 6½ x 5. Pp. 68. (Dent, 1s. 6d. net.)
- Peter Quinn's Book of Marvellous Fairy Tales*. By the Children's Friend, Peter Quinn. Illustrated. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 104. (Drane, 3s. 6d.)
- Perkins, Rose. Barbara Lavenacer. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 236. (Drane, 6s.)
- Bancroft, Francis. Her Reuben. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 316. (Drane, 6s.)
- Gunter, Archibald C. A Prince in the Garret. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 272. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)
- Fox, John, jr. A Mountain Europa. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 192. (Constable, 3s. 6d.)
- Wishaw, Fred. Her Highness. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. (Long, 6s.) (See p. 63.)
- Woodroffe, Daniel. The Beauty-hop. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 338. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)
- Huneker, Jas. Visionaries. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 342. Werner Laurie, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Gorst, Harold E. The Fourth Party. With a preface by Sir John Gcrst. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xii + 322. Smith, Elder, 7s. 6d. net.
- Transactions of the Royal Historical Society*. Vol. xix. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 342. New Series. 1905. Published at the Offices of the Society.
- Carter, Jesse Benedict. The Religion of Numi, and other essays in the Religion of Ancient Rome. 8 x 5½. Pp. x, 190. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)
- Lant, A. C. Vikings of the Pacific. The Adventures of the Explorers who came from the West, Eastward. Pp. xviii, 350. Illustrated. (New York, The Macmillan Co., 8s. 6d. net.)
- [Being: The Dane; The Outlaw Hunters of Russia; Benyowsky, the Polish Pirate; Cook and Vancouver, the English Navigators; Gray of Boston, the Discoverer of the Columbia; Drake, Ledyard, and other soldiers of Fortune on the west coast of America.]
- Norregaard, B. W. The Great Siege. The investment and fall of Port Arthur. With maps and illustrations. 9 x 6. Pp. 308. (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net.)
- [Mr. Norregaard was the Daily Mail correspondent with the Third Japanese Army.]

LITERATURE.

- Heroic Romances of Ireland*. Translated by A. H. Leahy. Vol. ii. Nutt, 3s. net.
- Publications of the Modern Language Association of America*. Edited by Charles H. Grandgent. December 1905. (The Modern Language Association of America, $1.00.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Carmen Sylva's Suffering's Journey on the Earth. Translated from "Leidens Erdengang" by Margaret A. Nash. 7½ x 5. Pp. 140. Jarrold, 3s. 6d. net.
- Biggs, William. The Law of International Copyright. With special sections on the Colonies and the United States of America. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xx + 850. Stevens & Haynes.
- Fox, Arthur Wilson. The Rating of Land Values. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 124. King, 3s. 6d. net.
- Spalding, E. H. Principles of Rhetoric. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 259. Heath, 3s. 6d.
- Boole, Mary Everest. Logic taught by Love. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 184. Daniel, 3s. 6d. net.
- "One and All" Gardening, 1906. Edited by Edward Owen Greening. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 192. (Agricultural and Horticultural Association, 2d.)
- Library of Congress, Washington. Report of the Libraries of Congress and Report of the Superintendent of the Library, Building and Grounds for the Fiscal Year ending June 30, 1905. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 318. (Washington: Government Printing Office.)
- Round, Cornwell. Self-Synthesis a means to Perpetual Life. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 32. (Simpkin, Marshall, 1s.)
- Spalding's Athletic Library. No. 1. Muscle Building, by Luther Gulick, M.D. Pp. 44. No. 6. Spalding's Boxing Guide. Pp. 140. Each 6½ x 5. Illustrated. (British Sports Publishing Co., 6d. each.)
- Nisbet's Church Directory and Almanack, 1906. 7½ x 5. Pp. 720. (Nisbet, 2s. net.) (See p. 69.)

The Baptist Handbook for 1906. 8 x 5½. Pp. 650. (Baptist Union Publication Department, 2s. 6d. net.) (See p. 69.)
Wesleyan Methodist Church. Minutes of Conference. 7½ x 5¼. Pp. 750. (Wesleyan Conference Office.) (See p. 69.)
Bible, Howard Wiswell. Tides of Thought. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 72. (Simpkin, Marshall, 4s.)
 [Pedestrian and often trite apophthegms in verse and prose. Printed on India paper with deckled edges.]
Campbell, Angus. Fettered Trade. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 118. (Drane, 1s.)
 [Chapters in favour of Protection.]
(Brown, Francis). Political Parables by the Westminster Gazette Office Boy. 9½ x 6. Pp. 96. (Drane, 2s. 6d. net.)
 [Reprinted, with many illustrations, including remarkable end-papers, from the Westminster Gazette, where they caused great amusement. Opposite each "parable" is a little note, recalling the circumstance that suggested it.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

Birdland Pictures. Twenty-four illustrations from photographs direct from nature, by Oliver S. Pike. 15 x 10½. Brockley: The Crofton Publishing Co., 3s. 6d. net.
 [Several of the photographs are finely reproduced, and many of them were obviously secured at risk of life and limb. Particularly good is that of the owl—startled by the click of the shutter—looking up and revealing the headless body of a rat it was in the act of devouring when disturbed by Mr. Pike's camera.]
Pictorial Practical Flower Gardening. Edited by Walter P. Wright. Illustrated. 7½ x 5. Pp. 152. Cassell, 1s. net.

POETRY.

Paterson, A. B. The Man from Snowy River; and other Verses. 7½ x 5. Pp. 184. Sydney: Angus & Robertson.
Lawson, Henry. In the Days when the World was Wide. 7½ x 5. Pp. 234. Sydney: Angus & Robertson.
Ogilvie, Will. Fair Girls and Gray Horses. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 205. Hearts of Gold. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 170. Sydney: Bulletin Newspaper Co.
Daley, Victor J. At Dawn and Dusk. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 211. Sydney: Bulletin Newspaper Co.
Herbert, Chas. Witham. Poems of the Seen and the Unseen. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 96. Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. 6d. net.
Begbie, Agnes H. The Rosebud Wall, and other poems. Illustrated by Bell C. MacGibbon. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 72. (Edinburgh, W. J. Hay. London, Bagster.)
After Adam's Fall. By the author of "David the Brooderer." 7 x 7. Pp. 48. (Kegan Paul, 2s. 6d. net.)
Denning, John Renton (J. A. N.) Indian Echoes. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 136. (Blackie, 3s. 6d. net.)

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Selected Poems of Robert Burns. With an introduction by Andrew Lang. 6½ x 4. Pp. 223. Kegan Paul, 1s. 6d. net. (See p. 53.)
The Itinerary in Wales of John Leland in or about the Years 1536-1539 Extracted from his MSS. and arranged and edited by Lucy Toulmin Smith. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xi + 152. Bell, 7s. 6d. net.
Young, T. E. On Centenarians, and the Duration of the Human Race. 10½ x 8. Pp. 147. Charles and Edwin Layton.
 [Described as "A fresh and authentic inquiry with historical notes, criticisms and speculations. Reissue, with seven additional authenticated instances of centenarians, and further observations"!]
Thomas Hughes's Tom Brown's School-Days. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 315. Long, 2s. net.
Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 382. Long, 2s. net.
Guy Thorne's A Lost Cause. 7½ x 5. Pp. 320. Paper covers. Long, 1s.
Burn, John Henry. Children's Answers. Enlarged Edition. 6½ x 4½. Pp. x, 284. (Treherne, 2s. net.)
Miller, Hugh. My Schools and Schoolmasters, or the Story of my Education. With an introduction and notes by W. M. Mackenzie. Illustrated. 8½ x 6½. Pp. xx, 558. (Edinburgh: George A. Morton. London: Simpkin, Marshall, 3s. 6d.)
Parsons, G. S. Nelsonian Reminiscences. Edited with notes, by W. H. Long. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 286. (Gibbings, 3s. 6d.)
 [Appendix: Recollections of Tom Allen, the last of the Agamemnons, Index.]

SCIENCE.

Heath, Thomas Edward. Our Stellar Universe: Stereoscopic Star Charts and Stereoscopic Key Maps. 10 x 7½. Pp. 26, vi, 26 Key Maps and 26 Star Charts in pockets at end. (King, Sell & Olding, 10s. net.)
Clerke, Agnes, M. Modern Cosmogonies. 7½ x 5. Pp. 287. Black, 3s. 6d. net.
 [Of the sixteen chapters in the volume, thirteen have previously appeared in Knowledge and Knowledge and Illustrated Scientific News. The book consists of a series of brief studies on current theories of the origin and history of the visible universe. The difficulties besetting cosmical doctrines of evolution are pointed out, and the expedients by which those difficulties have been met, though not wholly overcome, are described. The widened possibilities connected with the new science of radiology, the unification of the physical forces that may ensue upon further discoveries concerning electrical action, the function in the world of the impalpable ether, the nature of gravity are discussed or adverted to.]

THEOLOGY.

A Lay Sermon to Public School Boys preparing for Confirmation. By A Science Master. Pp. 16. 1d. Duckworth, Sir Dyc., M.D., Anglican Restlessness in the Twentieth Century, its causes and treatment. Pp. 30. 2d. Both 6½ x 4½. (S.P.C.K.)
Representative Church Council, Constitution, Standing Orders and scheme for the Representation of the Laity, as adopted at the Sessions, Nov. 22-24, 1905. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 16. (S.P.C.K. 2d.)
Haupt, Paul. The Book of Ecclesiastes. A new metrical translation with an introduction and explanatory notes. 10½ x 7½. Pp. 48. (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press. London: Kegan Paul, 3s. 6d. net.)
 [Reprinted from the American Journal of Philology. Dr. Haupt is W. W. Spence Professor of Semitic Languages in Johns Hopkins University.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Three Chronicles of London, A.D. MCLXXXIX—A.D. MDIX. Edited from the Cotton MSS., with introduction, notes and index, and compared with the printed versions, by Charles Lethbridge Kingsford. 9 x 6. Pp. xlviii + 368. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 10s. 6d. net.
 [The three London Chronicles here edited are contained in (1)—Cotton MS. Julius B ii; Cotton MS. Cleopatra Civ; and Cotton MS. Vitellius A xvj. They are roughly continuous, and between them cover the entire period from 1189 to 1509. Their main interest belongs, however, to the fifteenth century.]
Macmichael, J. Holden. The Story of Charing Cross and its Immediate Neighbourhood. 9 x 6. Pp. 344. Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.
Havell, E. B. A.R.C.A. Benares the Sacred City: Sketches of Hindu Life and Religion. 9 x 6½. Pp. xiv, 226. (Blackie, 12s. 6d. net.)
 [A handsome, lavishly illustrated and most interesting work, by the Principal of the Government School of Art, Calcutta.]
Breasted, James Henry, Ph. D. Egypt through the Stereoscope. A Journey through the Land of the Pharaohs. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 350. (Underwood & Underwood, 8s.)
 [This book is intended for use with, and is arranged in accordance with, 100 of Messrs. Underwood's Stereoscopic "Positions," which are comprised in a handsome case. There are 20 maps in a pocket at the end of the volume.]
Loyson, Madame Hyacinthe. To Jerusalem through the Lands of Islam among Christians, Jews and Moslems. Preface by Prince de Polignac. 9½ x 6½. Pp. viii, 326. (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net.)
 [We received a copy of this book in October last and reviewed it on November 25.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Translations into Greek Verse and Prose. By R. D. Archer-Hind, M.A. (Cambridge University Press.) We welcome this book of admirable renderings, showing that Cambridge scholars are still past masters in a delightful art which dullards and radicals decry. The skill which enables a man to produce a perfect reproduction of the manner of Sophocles, Aristophanes or Theocritus is not only a source of delight to intelligent readers but is the highest proof of real and fruitful scholarship in the writer. There is no more perfect instrument in the hands of the examiner than the composition paper. A really good composition shows that the examinee has in him the root of the matter. He may develop into a great emendator or into a stimulating essayist, but he has always to fall back on the instinct which made him a successful composer. Mr. Archer-Hind's book shows him to be in the first flight. He is already famous as a composer through his contributions to "Cambridge Compositions" and to the last edition of the "Sabrinae Corolla"; but all the pieces in this book appear now for the first time. "The greater part of them," he tells us in the Preface, "have not seen even the dim light of the lecture-room." Every scholar will recognise the true touch in every piece whether prose or verse. His vocabulary is extremely large and his taste is unerring. The distinguishing feature of the collection is its variety. We have not only iambs and hexameters and Attic prose, but studies in the manner of Theocritus, Aristophanes, Herodotus, many excellent choral odes, and some admirable Sapphics and Alcaics. His metrifaction is admirable. There is no monotony of cadence, and he never violates in his hexameters the rule which forbids the trochaic caesura of the dactyl in the fourth foot—an error into which modern composers often fall. Indeed, it was Munro who first called attention to this rule of the Greek hexameter, which the Latin poets neglected. Composers before Munro constantly violate it.

To give extracts would be an endless task, when everything is so good. In a fine anapaestic system rendering a passage from Shelley's "Prometheus" "sceptred curse" is finely translated by στέφανος ὑψηλόνων, but in the same piece we question περίπτωσας in poetry; and is there any authority for shortening the first syllable in κλονας? It is true that vowels are long in one dialect and short in another, as in καλός, but is there any evidence that in any dialect the first syllable of κλων was ever short? In a translation from Matthew Arnold,

But now ye kindle
 Your lonely cold-shining lights

we have the exact word for "lonely."

νῦν δ' ολοφρόνων αἰθέρ' ἔρημον πυρσῶν φλέγετε ψυχραῖσι βολαῖς, but we should prefer Τέρψιπρόνια for "Spirit of Delight," to εὐφροσύνα θεόμορφε. On p. 71 νεοθάλεις is treated as νεοθάλεις if we postulate exact antistrophic correspondence, but Dr. Verrall and others have taught us that scholars have carried this theory too far. Besides, νεοθάλει has its right quantity on page 85. By the way, ἡνίσι, from ἡνις "yearling" (gen. ἡνιος, acc. sing. ἡνίον, acc. plur. ἡνίσι) in the same piece seems questionable. But the whole book is the work of a scholar of the first order.

Among new Directories the following have been sent to us: The Baptist Handbook (4 Southampton Row, 2s. 6d. net), which, as ever, is full of valuable information, and contains a portrait of His Honour Judge W. Willis, an interesting illustrated chapter on the new chapels, etc., and full lists and reports of the proceedings of last year: The Catholic Directory (Burns and Oates, 1s. 6d. net), which besides the usual information contains a very long Advertiser, which Catholics will find of great service, and a good map of the Catholic Dioceses and Missions of England and Wales: Nisbet's Church Directory and Almanack (2s. net), an invaluable and wonderfully cheap publication, which gives full alphabetical lists of clergy and of benefices, besides other information; and the Minutes of Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church held in Bristol in July last, which contains also a number of appendices giving detailed information of the Church and its members and work (2 Castle Street, City Road, and 29 Pater-noster Row).

John Wilhelm Rowntree: Essays and Addresses. Edited by Joshua Rowntree. (Headley, 5s. net.)—Among the more picturesque incidents of contemporary religious enterprise should be counted the tramp, made last summer through the Yorkshire Dales by some seventy young Quakers, intent on re-awakening into goodly fires those dying embers of tradition which still recall the age when the Society of Friends numbered a great host in the North Country. These modern pilgrims, like the writer of these posthumous essays, were filled with noble memories and great anticipations. He, indeed, should have been their leader, and in his premature death Yorkshire Quakerism has lost one of its most notable figures, its most loyal and able sons. Principally written for his own people, and teeming with local and even personal allusions, the volume which Mr. Joshua Rowntree introduces is still of interest to a wider public. For, with all the limitations set upon it by the conditions of its writing, it is instinct with the genius of its author. Indeed it is possible that his sunny and strenuous temper, by turns passionate and playful—being as he was, half artist, half evangelist, and wholly human—would have found less perfect expression in a more systematic and finished work. For he was a man of many interests, as these thoughtful papers and addresses, written during a decade of exceptional activity, bear witness. Among the rest, he had planned a large study of Quakerism, its genesis and development, both in England and America, proposing to carry down the story to the present day; and for this purpose he had already collected a library of books, pamphlets and manuscripts. But all that he was able to complete was a minor chapter—three lectures, delivered to a Summer School, on the Rise of Quakerism in Yorkshire. The story of the advent and continual wanderings of the Early Friends, of their great meetings and their sufferings in prisons and on the public ways, is full of high spirit and of quaint incident, which loses nothing in the telling. Old manuscripts have been ransacked, especially the books of "Preparative" and "Quarterly" Meetings; and while some appear to have proved but melancholy reading, filled perhaps with the annals of a tiny community in a moorland village whose members had failed to realise the meaning of their new fellowship, others record a higher level of attainment, and yield besides a harvest of homely humour. Even the decline of the Society into its eighteenth-century slumber is lit up for us sometimes with pathetic flashes of unconscious self-revelation, as when a minute-book records the inquiry: "Whether Friends keep up their week-day meetings observing the hour appointed, and how preserved out of dulness and sleepiness when met, and how such as sit next them that be overcome by sleepiness do discharge their brotherly duty by stirring them up." But John Wilhelm Rowntree was only secondarily a student of the past. His heart went out to the future, and most of his pages are devoted to the task of enlarging and re-building that religious society to whose service he gladly devoted his talents.

Les Grands Poètes Romantiques de la Pologne. By Gabriel Sarrazin. (Perrin et Cie. 3 fr. 30.) M. Sarrazin's work concerns more even than the greatest poets of Poland, more even than Poland herself. It is the record of a cry of agony going up from the oppressed nationalities of Europe. Of these tortured races, however, none can compare with the heroic and unfortunate Poles in interest for civilised peoples; and in none of them have national faith and aspiration for freedom been so consistently hymned by their poets as in Poland. The aspirations of Russia herself have been largely fostered by her novelists and poets, but it is almost entirely due to the courage and inspiration of her bards that Poland still exists. This is scarcely the time or place to examine critically, or in any way exhaustively, the lives and labour—literary and patriotic—of the great poets M. Sarrazin deals with in his invaluable work, but the one most salient feature of the volume is, that the three famous men described are so entirely and truly typical of their own nation. They felt what they sang, and sang what their race, its deeds and sufferings, inspired them to. They, as were the chief singers of all the Slavonic nations, were deeply influenced by Byron, but what with him was but picturesque fancy, with them was the intensest tragedy of real life, not the poet's ideal pessimism, but the true portrayal of the melancholia begot by the terrible deeds amidst which they passed their existence. The nationalistic writings of Mickiewicz and Slowacki arouse the Poles to fury, or sadden them to despair, hence Dr. Brandes styles them the poets of Revenge, whilst Krasinski, who sings of the millennium yet to dawn, when lion and lamb, oppressor and oppressed, are to admire each other and forgive one another, he terms the poet of Love. M. Sarrazin not only gives critical and biographical descriptions of these three men, together with various more or less lengthy translations from their most famous works, but, in the course of his entrancing volume, contrives to present many lifelike portraits of the Polish people, to depict vividly their racial peculiarities, and to show how their sufferings overshadow all their national life. The adventures of these three poets, it may be pointed out, equal in wonder those of the heroes of Dumas or Jôkai, and it is characteristic of them, as of most noble Poles who do not die on the battlefield or the wilds of Siberia, that all of them lived a great portion of their lives in exile and died afar from their native land.

At last we are to have a corpus of our early English drama. The Early English Drama Society (18 Bury Street, Bloomsbury) is printing privately for its subscribers a limited edition of the Early English Dramatists, chronologically arranged, with occasional "extra" volumes, at a (subscription) price of £5 net for twelve volumes 8vo, and £20 net large paper. Of the First Series (John Heywood to Ulpian Fulwell) we have the first two volumes before us: John Heywood, vol. i. of three, containing Comedies, Interludes, Disputations (Four P's, John and Tib, Pardoner and Friar, Love, Weather, Witty and Witless), and Anonymous Plays, containing Hickscorner, Four Elements, Calisto and Melibœa, Everyman, World and Child, and Thersytes. Our readers will notice two interesting implications in this list. The other volumes of this Series are to be the remaining two of Heywood, three more of Anonymous Plays, and one each John Bale, Nicholas Udal, Richard Edwards, Wever and Ingelend, and Ulpian Fulwell. It will be clear at first sight to students of the Early English Drama that many of the works promised are at present only in manuscript, or very scarce. For the first time they will have an opportunity of reading in full works of which Mr. A. W. Pollard and other scholars have printed selections. All plays in previous collections will be included. The text is clear and very carefully read, and an ingenious system of notation, which appears to combine the maximum of information with the minimum of trouble and ostentation, adds greatly to the value of these volumes. We hope to give a more critical examination of them in a later issue. Meanwhile let us say that this is work that badly needed doing, and that it is, so far as we have examined it, very admirably done.

Of all the Englishmen of the seventeenth century who left their mark upon the history of the world there were few who had a more adventurous life than Captain John Smith, whose biography has been written by Mr. A. G. Bradley (Macmillan, 2s. 6d.). Smith has left us his autobiography, quaintly but bravely written in the third person and called "The True Travels and Adventures and Observations of Captain John Smith"; and in his "Accidence for Young Seamen" and "Description of New England" has given us much curious information upon naval and military life, customs and methods in his time. From this material, and from other writers on the subject, Mr. Bradley has put together a most interesting story. John Smith became a soldier of fortune at the age of sixteen, and for eight years fought in Transylvania under Prince Sigismund; and it was during this time that he performed the notable feat of conquering three Turks in single combat. For this exploit he was granted by the Prince a coat of arms containing "the figure and description of three Turks' heads," a device similar to that granted to Ednyved Vychan by Llewelyn the Great for a parallel feat against the English. Smith's coat of arms was registered at the Herald's College in 1625, and his exploit is chronicled not only in his own book but also in Purchas, and by Francesco Farnese, secretary to Prince Sigismund in "The Wars of Transylvania, Wallachia, and Moldavia." Smith was afterwards captured by the Turks, escaped, and for two years wandered over the continent of Europe studying military matters. He then went out to America, and was one of the early settlers at Jamestown in Virginia. There, as in Europe, he speedily came to the front, and became President of the Colony, which he served long and well. Then for a time he took to the sea, and, when the Pilgrim Fathers sailed, offered them his services. They were refused, for, though only fifty, he was too weak and worn to stand the hardships of colonising any longer. It would seem to have been a reproach of Smith's later years that he was unlucky. True, he had many sad adventures, he had failed to accumulate a vast fortune as others did, had won neither reward nor recognition. Yet he was a man to whom England owed much, and if Mr. Bradley's admirable little book does something to keep his memory green it will not have been written in vain.

The Life of Madame Guyon. By Thomas C. Upham. Edited and revised by an English Clergyman. New edition with introduction by W. R. Inge, M.A. (Allenson, 6s.)—This book is liberally provided with prefaces. First we have the remarks of the "English Clergyman" who edited and revised it at some unknown date. He apparently thinks that Madame Guyon was a Jansenist, and tells us that both she and Fénelon were really Protestants and were condemned as such. He holds it possible that God "may have and has a people wasting in chains and thralldom of mind" in the Roman system. Next comes the editor's own preface, and last of all Mr. Inge's short introduction, admirable in its way, but apparently intended as an introduction to Madame Guyon's own autobiography, which is not Mr. Upham's "Life." A translation of the autobiography would have been much more welcome than this re-issue of a book which is an excellent example of the art of making an interesting subject dull. The author thinks it his duty to apologise continually for the fact that Madame Guyon was a Roman Catholic, and takes pains to point out that she did not trust in "works" or other Romish delusions. It was evidently his belief that the Roman Catholic religion consists wholly in formal observances and that spirituality is not to be found among its members. The edifying remarks with which he interlards the narrative are extremely annoying. The book belongs to a bygone age, and we cannot understand why it has been reprinted. It does not give an accurate conception of Madame Guyon's character; for instance, the author's preoccupations lead him to suppress the account of her austerities and mortifications, to which he makes only a bare and apologetic allusion. Madame Guyon was an interesting and in many ways an attractive personality, and her treatment was abominable. But it is impossible to regard her character as well-balanced and still more impossible to ignore the dangers of Quietism or condemn the opposition to it as altogether unreasonable and mistaken. It is quite plain that Mr. Upham knew very little about the actual tenets of Quietism, and did not in the least understand the questions at issue in the controversy.

A Selection from the List of GEORGE NEWNES, Limited

JUST OUT

THE SPOILERS. A Novel. By EDWIN PUGH. With eight Full-page Illustrations by C. E. BROCK. 6s.

THE CHINESE AT HOME. By EMILE BARD. With 24 Full-page Illustrations. Large 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FRA ANGELICO. With Photogravure Frontispiece and 64 Full-page Illustrations. Introduction by EDGUMBE STALEY and List of the Master's chief works. 8s. 6d. net. NEWNES' ART LIBRARY.

BY THE GREAT AMERICAN ARTIST

THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS. By HOWARD PYLE. Profusely Illustrated by the Author. Large 8vo (9½ in. by 6¼ in.), cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

"A sympathetic presentation of the various Arthurian legends."—TIMES.

"A beautiful variation of an ancient and beautiful theme . . . it is enough praise to say that the prose of these old tales is equal to the pictures."—DAILY NEWS.

THE MERRY ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD OF GREAT RENOWN IN NOTTINGHAMSHIRE. Written and Illustrated by HOWARD PYLE. Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF THE CHAMPIONS OF THE ROUND TABLE. By HOWARD PYLE. Illustrated by the Author. 10s. 6d. net.

NEWNES' LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES

A Series of Popular Manuals on Scientific Subjects, written by Specialists, and profusely Illustrated

Size 6 in. by 4 in., cloth, 1s. each. Postage, 2d. extra

THE STARS.

PRIMITIVE MAN.

THE PLANTS.

THE EARTH IN PAST AGES.

THE SOLAR SYSTEM.

A PIECE OF COAL.

ELECTRICITY.

EXTINCT CIVILISATIONS OF THE EAST.

THE CHEMICAL ELEMENTS.

FOREST AND STREAM.

THE WEATHER.

THE ATMOSPHERE.

GERM LIFE: BACTERIA.

THE POTTER.

THE BRITISH COINAGE.

LIFE IN THE SEAS.

PHOTOGRAPHY.

RELIGIONS.

THE COTTON PLANT.

GEOGRAPHICAL DISCOVERY.

THE MIND.

THE BRITISH RACE.

ECLIPSES.

ICE IN THE PRESENT AND PAST.

WANDERINGS OF ATOMS.

LIFE'S MECHANISM.

THE ALPHABET.

BIRD LIFE.

THOUGHT AND FEELING.

ART IN THE BRITISH ISLES.

WILD FLOWERS.

BOOKS.

KING ALFRED.

FISH LIFE.

ARCHITECTURE.

EUCLID.

MUSIC.

ANIMAL LIFE.

LOST ENGLAND.

THE EMPIRE.

ALCHEMY.

THE ARMY.

RAPID TRANSIT.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE.

EXTINCT CIVILISATIONS

OF THE WEST.

ALPINE CLIMBING.

A GRAIN OF WHEAT.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

BRITISH TRADE AND INDUSTRY.

REPTILE LIFE.

OUR NEIGHBOURS SERIES

A Series of Handy Books dealing with the Intellectual Life of the various Peoples, their Social Divisions and Distinctions, their Manners and Customs, Wealth and Poverty, their Armies and Systems of National Defence, their Industrial Life, Rural Life, Home Life, Religious Life, Amusements, and Local Governments. Fully Illustrated, crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net each, by post, 3s. 9d.

Edited by WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

DUTCH LIFE. By P. M. HOUGH, M.A.

SWISS LIFE. By A. T. STORY.

RUSSIAN LIFE. By FRANCIS H. F. PALMER.

GERMAN LIFE. By WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

FRENCH LIFE. By Miss HANNAH LYNCH.

SPANISH LIFE. By L. HIGGIN.

ITALIAN LIFE. By LUIGI VILLARI.

DANISH LIFE. By J. BROCHNER.

AUSTRIAN LIFE. By FRANCIS H. E. PALMER.

TURKISH LIFE. By L. M. J. GARNETT.

BELGIAN LIFE. By DEMETRIUS C. BOULGER.

SWEDISH LIFE. By O. G. VON HEIDENSTAM.

GREEK LIFE. By W. MILLER.

SPECTATOR.—"Pleasant pictures of life and manners, always entertaining or instructive or both."

OUR EMPIRE

This new Series is intended to supplement the highly successful series entitled "Our Neighbours," dealing in a similar manner with the British Colonies and Dependencies. The volumes are under the competent editorship of WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON. Special attention has been paid to the Illustrations, which are numerous and carefully chosen, and descriptive of every phase and factor of Colonial life. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net each; by post, 3s. 9d.

INDIAN LIFE. By HERBERT COMPTON.

CANADIAN LIFE. By H. J. MORGAN.

AUSTRALIAN LIFE. By E. C. BULEY.

A good Atlas is indispensable, alike in the Library, the Study, and the Counting House, and there is none better than

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY CITIZEN'S ATLAS. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S. 156 Maps, Introductory Texts, Statistical Tables, Descriptive Gazetteer, and General Index. Extra crown folio. Art Canvas, 21s. net; half morocco, 25s. net.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"A good Atlas. Cheap at a guinea."

THE FIELD.—"One of the most useful Atlases ever published in this country."

THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENTS ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY. A series of 105 Physical, Political, and Statistical Maps, compiled from British and Foreign Surveys, and the latest results of International Research. Under the direction of J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E., F.R.G.S., etc. Royal 4to, cloth, 6s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The moderate price of this publication, the clearness of its printing, and the vast amount of detailed information, physical, political, and statistical, make it a boon to all students of the world's contemporary history."

THE INTERNATIONAL GEOGRAPHY. By Seventy Authors. Edited by HUGH ROBERT MILL, D.Sc., F.R.S.E. With 488 Illustrations. Third Edition. Revised. Demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

THE HANDBY ATLAS OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E. A series of 120 Maps and Plans illustrating the Geography of the Colonies with Statistical Notes and Tables. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage ad. extra.

THE HANDBY TOURING ATLAS OF THE BRITISH ISLES. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S., being the Ordnance Survey of Great Britain and Ireland in miniature, contained in 120 Coloured Maps. Size, 6ins. by 4ins. Cloth, 1s. net; limp lambskin, 2s. net. Postage ad. extra.

THE HANDBY SHILLING ATLAS OF THE WORLD. Containing 120 pages of Fully Coloured Maps, by J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, and a Gazetteer with 10,000 entries. Size 6ins. by 4ins. Cloth, 1s. net. Postage ad. extra.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 3 to 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated] [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.
West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.
Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.
Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.
OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.
SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.
Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents
Everywhere.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Every Day is Publishers' Day in the

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.

TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE AUTOTYPE Co.

74 NEW OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.C.

Reproductions in Monochrome of Famous Works of Art

By the AUTOTYPE Permanent Process.

Amongst the numerous publications may be mentioned:—

Selections from the National Gallery, London, the Wallace Collection, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery (Liverpool).

Drawings by Holbein from the Royal Collection, Windsor Castle.

Selected Examples of Sacred Art from various Collections.
Etchings by Rembrandt.

Drawings by Albert Durer.

Pictures from the Louvre, Luxembourg, Paris.

specimens of above issues will be sent free on application. Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE. — Now Ready. New EDITION. With upwards of 150 Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and 23 Tint-Block Illustrations. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Artists'
Names. Price free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,
74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE
(52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUB-
SCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying
15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PRE-
PAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it, being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

JANUARY 20, 1906

EDUCATION SUPPLEMENT

BLACKIE'S LIST

WRITE FOR COMPLETE CATALOGUE

Little French Classics

Price 4d. each Book.

"The idea is an excellent one, and admirably carried out."—Prof. SAINTSBURY.

"A considerable boon to teachers and taught."—SPECTATOR.

"These little books supply a great want."—Dr. W. H. ROUSE.

This new and altogether Unique Series of dainty booklets embraces all classes of French Literature—Travels, Stories of Adventure, Scenes of Domestic Life, Essays, Letters, Poetry and Drama—so graduated in difficulty and so varied in matter as to be suitable for readers of all stages of advancement. Many authors hitherto unobtainable in a suitable form are represented, as, for example, Bossuet, Balzac, Stendhal, Rousseau, and Pascal.

* * * Complete List on application.

Blackie's English Texts

Price 6d. each Book.

This new and highly excellent Series provides, in small compass, the works of many of the best known and most famous authors. The aim has been to include only such books as are of permanent value, and have some bearing upon the development of the national life, character, and literature. In every case the books selected are good as literature, stimulating, varied, and enlightening; books indeed which every student should know, and which, if once read, are sure to be read again and again. Each Volume is provided with a brief Introduction dealing with the Author's life and place in literature. In neat blue cloth covers, price 6d. each.

* * * Complete Lists on application.

Blackie's Library of Pedagogics

THE TEACHING OF MODERN LANGUAGES. By CLOUDESLEY BRERETON, M.A. 1s. net.

Mr. Brereton is a well-known inspector and lecturer, who has studied the subject of this brochure very carefully both at home and abroad. This book reproduces the subject of three lectures, and will be found worthy of perusal by all teachers of modern languages.

THE TEACHING OF LATIN. By W. H. S. JONES, M.A. 1s. net.

THE EDUCATION OF GIRLS IN SWITZERLAND AND BAVARIA. By Miss ISABEL RHYS. 1s. net.

THE TEACHERS' RABELAIS. Prepared by GERALDINE HODGSON. 1s. net.

BLACKIE & SON, LTD., 50 OLD BAILEY, LONDON, E.C.

EDUCATIONAL AND SCIENTIFIC BOOKS NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

The Largest Stock in London of Second-Hand School, Classical, Elementary & Advanced Scientific Books.

Mathematical, Theological and Foreign Books.
BOOKS FOR ALL EXAMINATIONS.

ALL INQUIRIES AS TO PRICES OF BOOKS ANSWERED.

KEYS & TRANSLATIONS. BOOKS BOUGHT.

J. POOLE & CO.,
(ESTABLISHED 1854)

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.
(Late of 39 Holywell Street, Strand.)

GEOGRAPHY LABORATORY METHOD.

No subject in school curricula is at the mercy of such sterile methods of teaching as Geography.

Teachers continue to include this subject in their courses with the hope that some day it may be possible to emancipate it from the plane of useless drudgery and raise it to the level of experimental science and other essentially "educational" subjects. This solution has been found in the educational stereograph, which gives the teacher the opportunity he so ardently desires of teaching Geography by a laboratory method. We cannot explain our system at length in this small space, so ask you, if you are interested, to drop us a postcard for further particulars.

N.B.—Already in use in well-known schools.

Address:

UNDERWOOD & UNDERWOOD (School Dept.), 3 Heddon
Street, Regent Street, W.

After March 25: Gwydir Chambers, 104 High Holborn, W.C.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S LIST.*FOURTH EDITION, REVISED AND ENLARGED, NOW READY ELEMENTARY TRIGONOMETRY.

By H. S. HALL and S. R. KNIGHT. Globe 8vo, 4s. 6d.

This Edition is adapted to all the modern requirements. In particular, it contains Graphs of the Trigonometrical Functions, and Examples of their use. A special feature is the large number of Examples in Illustration of Four-Figure Tables. Tables of Logarithms, Anti-Logarithms, Natural and Logarithmic Functions (specially compiled), are given at the end of the book.
* The Old Edition is still on sale.

A SHILLING ARITHMETIC.

By S. L. LONEY and L. W. GRENVILLE. 1s. With Answers, 1s. 6d.

[Shortly.]

THE BEGINNER'S SET OF MATHEMATICAL INSTRUMENTS.

Bow Compass; Dividers; 2 Nickel Set Squares, 45° (4 in.) and 60° (5 in.); Nickel Protractor; 6-in. Rule, double bevelled, inches and millimetres, and a Lead Pencil. In metal Pocket Case, 1s. 6d. net.

AN INTRODUCTION TO PRACTICAL GEOGRAPHY.

By A. T. SIMMONS, Associate of the Royal College of Science, London, and HUGH RICHARDSON, M.A., Senior Science Master of Bootham School, York. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

* The Exercises in this book include the practical work suggested in the New Regulations issued by the Board of Education.

RECENT WORKS ON GEOMETRY TO MEET THE NEW REQUIREMENTS.*Lessons in Experimental and Practical Geometry. By H. S. HALL and F. H. STEVENS. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d.A School Geometry. By H. S. HALL and F. H. STEVENS. Crown 8vo.

Parts I.-VI., 4s. 6d.; KEY, 8s. 6d. Part I., 1s. Parts I. and II., 1s. 6d.; KEY, 3s. 6d. Part III., 1s. Parts I., II., and III., 2s. 6d. [This volume exactly suits the requirements of the New Syllabus for the Preliminary Examination for the Certificate.] Part IV., sewed, 6d. Parts I.-IV., 3s.; KEY, 6s. Parts III. and IV., 1s. 6d. Part V., 1s. 6d. Parts IV. and V., 2s. Parts I.-V., 4s. [This volume exactly suits the requirements contained in both Parts of the Syllabus for the Teachers' Certificate Examination.] Part VI., 1s. 6d. Parts IV., V. and VI., 2s. 6d.

A New Geometry for Schools. By S. BARNARD, Assistant Master at Rugby School, and J. M. CHILD, Lecturer in Mathematics, Technical College, Derby. (Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books I.-VI.) Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d.

A New Geometry for Junior Forms. By S. BARNARD and J. M. CHILD. (Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books I., III., 1-31, the easy parts of Book IV., and a Description of the Forms of the Simpler Solids.) Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.
This volume contains all the Practical and Theoretical Geometry required for a pass by Junior Candidates in the University Locals.

A New Geometry for Senior Forms. By S. BARNARD and J. S. CHILD. (Containing the Substance of Euclid, Books II., VI., XI., together with the Mensuration of Solids.) Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

Theoretical Geometry for Beginners. By C. H. ALCOCK, Senior Mathematical Master at Eton. Part I. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book I.); Part II. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book III., Props. 1-34, and Book IV., Props. 1-9); Part III. (containing the Substance of Euclid, Book II., Props. 1-14; Book III., Props. 35-37; and Book IV., Props. 10-16); and Part IV. (This Part treats of Ratio and Proportion, and their application to Geometrical Theorems and Problems.) Globe 8vo, 1s. 6d. each.

Practical Exercises in Geometry. By W. D. EGGAR, Assistant Master at Eton College. Revised Edition, with Answers. Globe 8vo, 2s. 6d.

BOOKS FOR SPECIAL EXAMINATIONS, 1906.*CAMBRIDGE LOCAL EXAMINATIONS, 1906.

The Gospel According to St. Luke—The Greek Text. With Introduction and Notes. J. BOND. ( Preliminary, Junior and Senior )	2	6	Kear's Heroes of Asgard. ( Preliminary )	2	6
The Acts of the Apostles—Authorized Version. With Notes. T. E. PAGE and A. S. WALPOLE. ( Junior and Senior )	2	6	Cæsar's De Bello Gallico. Book VI. C. COLBECK. ( Junior )	1	6
—The Greek Text. With Notes. T. E. PAGE. ( Junior and Senior )	3	6	Virgil's Æneid. Book VI. T. E. PAGE. ( Junior and Senior )	1	6
Shakspeare's Henry V. K. DEIGHTON. ( Junior and Senior )	1	9	Tacitus's Agricola. A. J. CHURCH and W. J. BRODRICK. ( Senior )	2	0
—Tempest. K. DEIGHTON. ( Senior )	1	9	Orosio's De Amicitia. E. S. SHUCKBURGH. ( Senior )	1	6
Ransome's Short Studies of Shakespeare's Plays—The Tempest. ( Senior )	0	9	Horace's Odes. Books II. and IV. T. E. PAGE ( Senior )	each	1
Scott's Lady of the Lake. G. H. STUART. ( Preliminary and Junior )	2s. 6d.	sewed	—Books II. and IV. T. E. PAGE ( Senior )	each	2
—Old Mortality ( Senior )	2	0	Moliere's L'Avare. L. M. MORIARTY. ( Senior )	1	0
Addison's Covetous Papers. K. DEIGHTON. ( Junior )	1	9	Hoff's Die Karavane. H. HAGER. ( Junior )	3	0
Tennyson's Coming of Arthur and the Passing of Arthur. F. J. ROWE. ( Junior and Senior )	2	6	Schiller's Maria Stuart. C. SHELTON. ( Senior )	2	6
—Holy Grail. G. C. MACAULAY. ( Senior )	2	6	Maria Stuart. H. SCHÖNEFELD. ( Senior )	3	6
Byron's Child Harold's Pilgrimage. Cantos III. and IV. E. E. MORRIS. ( Senior )	1	9	Xenophon's Anabasis. Book V. G. H. NALL. ( Junior )	1	6
			Euripides's Alcestis. M. A. BAYFIELD. ( Junior and Senior )	1	6
			—Alcestis. M. L. EARLE. ( Junior and Senior )	3	6

JUST PUBLISHED.

THUCYDIDES. Book I. By E. C. MARCHANT. 3s. 6d.COLLEGE OF PRECEPTORS' EXAMINATIONS, 1906.

	s.	d.		s.	d.
Acts of the Apostles—Authorised Version. With Notes. [T. E. PAGE and A. S. WALPOLE]	2	6	Shakespeare's The Tempest. K. DEIGHTON. (First and Second Class)	1	9
The Greek Text. With Notes. T. E. PAGE	3	6	Ransome's Short Studies of Shakespeare's Plays: The Tempest. (First and Second Class)	sewed	0
Luke, St. The Gospel according to St. Luke: being the Greek Text as Revised by Bishop WESTCOTT and Dr. HORT. With Explanatory Notes by Rev. JOHN BOND	2	6	Scott's Lay of the Last Minstrel. G. H. STUART and E. H. ELLIOTT. (Second and Third Class)	2	0
Welch and Duffield's Exercises in Unseen Translations in Latin	1	6	Lay of the Last Minstrel. G. H. STUART and E. H. ELLIOTT. (Third Class)	1	0
Alford's Latin Passages for Translation	3	0	Cantos I.-III., 1s. 3d.	sewed	1
Cæsar's Gallic War. J. BOND and A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	4	6	Lady of the Lake. G. H. STUART. (Second and Third Class), 2s. 6d.	sewed	2
Gallic War. Books II. and III. W. G. RUTHERFORD. (First Class)	1	6	Tennyson's Coming of Arthur and the Passing of Arthur. F. J. ROWE. (First Class)	2	6
Gallic War. Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	1	6	Holy Grail. G. C. MACAULAY. (First Class)	2	6
Gallic War. Book VI. C. COLBECK. (Second Class)	1	6	Masan's Lays of Ancient Rome (containing "Horatius" and "Battle of Lake Regillus"). W. T. WEBB. (Third Class and Lower Forms)	1	9
Helvetian War. W. WELCH and C. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1	6	Horatius. W. T. WEBB. (Lower Forms)	sewed	0
Virgil's Æneid. Book I. T. E. PAGE. (First and Second Class)	1	6	Saintsbury's Short History of English Literature	3	6
Æneid. Book I. A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	1	6	Newfield's Outline of English Grammar. (Second and Third Class)	1	6
Æneid. Book VI. T. E. PAGE. (First and Second Class)	1	6	KEY, 2s. 6d. net.
Orosio's De Amicitia. E. S. SHUCKBURGH. (First Class)	1	6	Oral Exercises in English Composition. (Third Class)	1	6
Horace's Odes. Book I. T. E. PAGE. 1s. 6d. Edited by the same. (First Class)	2	0	Junior Course of English Composition. (Second and Third Class)	1	6
Euripides's Alcestis. M. A. BAYFIELD. (First Class)	1	6	Senior Course of English Composition. (First Class)	3	6
Alcestis. M. L. EARLE. (First Class)	3	6	KEY, 1s. net.
Xenophon's Anabasis. Books I. and II. W. WELCH and C. G. DUFFIELD. (Third Class)	1	6	Manual of English Grammar and Composition. (First Class)	2	6
Xenophon's Anabasis. Book II. A. S. WALPOLE. (First and Second Class)	1	6	KEY, 2s. 6d. net.
Anabasis. Book V. G. H. NALL. (First and Second Class)	1	6	Hand's Die Karavane. H. HAGER. (First Class)	3	0
Pennock and Bell's Passages for Greek Translation	1	6
Shakespeare's Henry V. K. DEIGHTON. With Appendix. (First and Second Class)	1	9

MACMILLAN and CO., Limited, St. Martin's St., London.

RESPONSIBILITY

WE are beginning to think educationally in millions, and even tens of millions. The pity is that we do not mix a little thought with our filthy lucre. What is the aim and object of this immense and gigantic expenditure? Are, for instance, the vast sums devoted to Free Education a charitable dole to the poor or a sort of forced ransom paid by the rich; or, is not Free Education itself a right granted by the State, and implying thereby corresponding duties on the part of the recipients? At present the elementary school seems largely to be a sort of bastard training in gentility, with noblesse oblige left out. Its teaching varies between flamboyant Imperialism and the doctrine that Jack is as good as his master. Where do we find taught the idea that, high and low, we are all members of one body, of one community—the State, the bloated rich quite as much as the unemployed, and that great mass of middle class English on whom the burden of taxation falls so heavily? In the great clock of Modern Society, the children of every class should be made to see the wheels go round. If both poor parents and poor children could see the works, they would realise that the aim of organised society is to see that there is a place for every one, and that every one is in his place—that is, the place that suits him best. They would also realise that while servility is out of place in a free nation, respect and reverence are its very life-blood. We want no cringing and capping, but we want respect for the noble men and women who, often at the sacrifice of themselves, are striving to make their children a credit to the State, while contributing, through the State, to the assistance of the children of their less fortunate brothers and sisters. We want no bowing and scraping, but we want an enlightened appreciation of what the other classes are doing, directly and indirectly, for the community. Whitechapel has got to understand the West End, quite as much as the West End has got to understand Whitechapel, and has got to realise its responsibility to the community. If these questions were approached from the right standpoint in our elementary schools, we should hear less of the mistress question or the servant question, and there would be fewer of the bright boys out of the Board Schools selling newspapers or drifting into other unskilled callings, when they might have entered more useful careers, because they have never had preached to them the gospel of work. By all means let us have a living wage. But the ideal of work is not money-grubbing, it is the satisfaction that arises from the profitable expenditure of that energy which is the hall-mark of health and strength; from the sense of overcoming that goes back to the days when man first started on his crusade to conquer animate and inanimate nature. The joy of achievement, the feeling of having accomplished something, the sense of not having lost a day, the conception that England expects me also to do my duty, expects me also to be a producer and not a parasite in the community—these should be the ideals of the school. Whereas we too often find that the acquisition of a smattering of book-learning is considered as raising one above the working classes (appalling misnomer!) and therefore raising one above what would normally be one's work, whether it be scrubbing mother's floor or cleaning father's boots.

To the Gospel of Work the school needs to add the commandment to be careful of the property of the State. In this way only will the child be careful of the property of others and of its own. As it is, the poor man's child is educated with no idea of the value of anything, from blotting-paper to his own soul. That which costs him nothing he naturally values at nothing; and Free Education is sometimes the one thing he looks on as a luxury he can take or leave as he pleases. At school a broken pen is immediately replaced from a gross-box, of which there are many more gross in the store cupboard. If Board School Brown breaks his compasses, a polite teacher supplies him with a new pair. If Rugby Brown breaks his, he probably has to forego a fortnight's tuckshop to replace his tools. While pin-money means much to her young mistress, Mary Jane has been trained in a school where not only pins were free gratis and for nothing, but where everything from dumb-bells to electric light was without money and without price, and there was an occasional breakfast and dinner thrown in. What does she know, or care to know, of the value of food and light, china or linen? She has been, since the days of the infant school, largely catered for by a generous public, enjoying many things at other folk's expense, and valuing those things accordingly. Many a servant with five and twenty pounds a year and all found spends every penny on her dress and other petty needs. Then she starts married life, and the tragedy begins. She who would not demean herself by washing out her own dusters or polishing a stove now finds herself in sole charge of a cottage or a top back room. She who would not help the cook to dish up dinner on the kitchen-maid's night out now bitterly regrets she never learnt to cook a simple joint. She has vague memories of making egg-snow at the school cookery classes, but she can't for the life of her remember whether vanilla essence was a necessary ingredient or not. Her husband is an equally good example of the child being father of the man. Many a penny might he save by doing useful repairs at home. But the smattering of technical work he got at the evening class with its elaborate apparatus and machinery never taught him the miracles he could effect with half a dozen ordinary tools. If he had the sense to spend in buying a few planks and nails half the money he squanders in the public house, he might put up a few pegs and shelves which would make all the difference between order and disorder, comfort and discomfort. But school has taught him that when he is out of school his work is done, and he has taken the idea with him into his life. The fault is scarcely the fault of the teachers. It lies or has lain with those in authority, who in former times were supposed to give light and leading to the schools. It is doubtless not easy to introduce into children now the sense of duty to the community, of the gospel of work, and the sinfulness of waste. But unless these evils are combated in the growing generation it will be a black look-out for England in twenty years' time.

REVIEWS

GREEK AND LATIN

ONE of the best of the many series of Greek and Latin Classics for students is the University Tutorial Series published by the University Tutorial Press, Limited (University Correspondence College Press), 157 Drury Lane. The plan of the series is to give the best possible text, clearly printed, with an Introduction supplying a brief account of the author and his chief works, the circumstances in which he wrote, and, in certain cases, his style, dialect and metre, and Notes which (wisely) avoid parallel passages and controversial discussions, and lay stress on grammar and subject-matter. We have before us a specimen, Plato's Crito (2s. 6d.), edited by Mr. A. F. Watt. The book is as good as could be, the work of a scholar with practical experience of the needs of scholars. Only in the most urgent cases does Mr. Watt trouble his pupil with variae lectiones.

There have been several recent additions to the invaluable Scriptorum Classicorum Bibliotheca Oxoniensis, published by the Clarendon Press, Oxford, at very moderate prices, running from 2s. to 10s. 6d., according to the size of the volumes and their publication in paper or cloth bindings, and on stout or India paper. We have before us four: Bucolici Graeci (Theocritus, Bion, Moschus, and other authors, known and unknown, whose surviving works have been attributed to one of these three), edited by Professor von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf; Statii Silvae, edited by Professor J. S. Phillimore; Tibulli Carmina, edited by Professor J. P. Postgate; and Plauti Comoediae, ii. (Miles Gloriosus, Mostellaria, Persa, Poenulus, Pseudolus, Rudens, Stichus, Trinummus, Truculentus, Vidularia, Fragmenta), edited by Professor W. M. Lindsay. Each volume contains a Praefatio in Latin, a list of manuscripts and the text, with foot-notes of variae lectiones. Professor von Wilamowitz-Moellendorf's Bucolici includes paraphrases of the more obscure Technopaegnia, and concludes with Argumenta Carminum; Professor Postgate adds an Index Nominum, and Professor Lindsay an admirable Schema Metrorum. It is right that every word of introduction and comment in these invaluable volumes should be written in the language of European scholarship Latin, for they are a κρημα ἐς αἰ not to English speaking students and scholars only, but to the whole civilised world.

For clearness of printing and arrangement, brevity and completeness, fine scholarship and acute criticism, we must refer once again to Professor Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, whose well-known "Griechisches Lesebuch" is the foundation of Mr. E. C. Marchant's little Greek Reader (vol i., Clarendon Press, Oxford). We remember with pleasure an old book, most of the stories in which concerned the doings of μυρὸς τρις, which combined amusement with instruction some thirty years ago. Mr. Marchant's selection from the German work comprises a number of Maxims and Anecdotes from Heraclitus, Democritus, and others, Dion Chrysostom's Hunter, the Battle between Alexander and Porus from Arrian, Strabo's description of Great Britain, Moschion's Hiero's Galleon, and Thucydides on Pausanias and Themistocles. He translates (and in spite of his deprecatory preface, translates well) the German Professor's admirable little introduction, and adds brief but important notes, founded on those contributed by Bruhn to the German work. This is a book we can recommend most cordially to schoolmasters for use in lower forms.

We have so often praised Messrs. Blackie's little Latin Texts, edited by Dr. W. H. D. Rouse, that we need spare little space to the Vergil, Bucolicon Liber, and Aeneid VI., both edited by Mr. S. E. Winbolt (6d. net). The principle is, again, a good text (A. V. E., wherever possible, in other cases M.P. and R., preference being given to M.), and a brief introduction. Mr. Winbolt's Introduction is a piece of good work. We remember how the account of the extant manuscripts of a classical author used to add to our interest in his writings as linking him with actual life and making him "real," and the inclusion of this feature in these volumes is an admirable idea.

Messrs. Blackwood's Classical texts have the advantage of illustrations, another good way of bringing things home to schoolboys. The frontispiece to Mr. R. B. Burnaby's Elegiac Selections from Ovid (1s. 6d.) gives a view of the Circus Maximus (after Canina), and the palaces overlooking it from the Palatine; and he includes art-sources so wide apart as the Bacchus and Ariadne in the British Museum and a Greek vase by Duris in the Louvres. The notes on the illustrations are full of interest, though a little further detail might have been added. Boys would like, for instance, to know the meaning of Septizonium, and to understand the two reasons which induced Severus to build that remarkable structure. The introduction treats briefly and clearly of Ovid's life and works, and the notes to the text (which is that of the Corpus) are, both on matters of grammar and interpretation, sound and illuminating. Appendix i. on the Subjunctive, and ii. on Prosody and Metre.

A recent addition to the Cambridge University Pitt Press Series is Horatius and other Stories adapted from Livy by Mr. G. M. Edwards (1s. 6d.), whose "Story of the Kings of Rome" is clearly a popular book for and among beginners. Here he gives us (often in a simplified form) Livy's narratives of Horatius and the bridge, Mucius Scaevola, Cloelia, Lake Regillus, Coriolanus, the Fabii, and Fidenae, warning his readers in a neat introduction that it is not all gospel true, and explaining why more authentic records are lacking. His notes, particular and general, are good, and there is a useful vocabulary.

We notice with pleasure a very good edition of Plautus: Capivi with Introduction, Notes and Vocabulary, by the Rev. J. Henson, M.A. (Blackie, 2s.) for the use of "moderately advanced students." His text is mainly Teubner; and he wisely refrains from filling in hiatus, except where homoteleuton gives a reasonable supposition that they were not intentional. His introduction gives a brief life of Plautus, a short chapter on the Roman Theatre, a note on the play, which might have been improved by expansion (e.g., it is useless to mention the Middle and New Comedy of Greece without saying what their characteristics were); then follow a sketch of the plot and two sections on the prosody and the metre—not entirely complete but ample for the purpose in view. In an Appendix comes a list of manuscripts with the more important variae lectiones, and the notes are printed and well chosen. The illustrations occurring in the text are very apt and useful.

FRENCH AND GERMAN BOOKS

WE must preface all notice of the French and German books that are before us with a word on Mr. Cloudesley Brereton's sterling little volume (Blackie) on The Teaching of Modern Languages with special reference to Big Towns. The teaching of modern languages is taken much more seriously nowadays than ever before; and this book—the substance of which comes from three lectures delivered last year before the London School of Economics by the author, an Inspector to the Board of Education and other bodies—is both a symptom of the change and an aid to its development. The argument of Mr. Brereton's book is too close and its pages are too full of exact and practical detail to make any abbreviation of it possible in the space at our disposal: we can only record our conviction that every schoolmaster and every one concerned with the teaching of modern languages ought to study these one hundred and seven little pages with the greatest care. Mr. Brereton's position—to use his own phraseology—is somewhere about the Left Centre. That is, he is not on the side of the teachers on the old, orthodox, classical lines, who treat a modern language perinde ac cadaver, and parse, analyse and dissect it as they do a dead language. Nor is he one of the extreme reformers, who rule out all writing, even in phonetic script, in whose class-rooms no word of the mother-tongue is ever heard, and whose plan of teaching is the "animated phonograph" plan. Starting from a position somewhere between the two, but nearer to the reformers than the orthodox, he develops, in three able chapters, his ideas on the teaching of a foreign language, side by side with and supplementary to the teaching of the mother-tongue. His work shows not only a keen eye for the needs of students and the benefits that may, and should, accrue to them from proper teaching, but a personal experience of all systems, at home and abroad, which gives great practical value to his advice and opinion. We would earnestly commend his book to all whom it concerns.

From Mr. Brereton's little book we may pass straight to the Rossmann and Schmidt French by the Direct Method series, of which the edition for use in England is published by Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack. We have before us two volumes in that series: Part iii. (third year's course), which has been adapted and enlarged by Mr. Thomas Cartwright (2s. 6d.) and volume ii. of the Fourth Year's Course, which is a Livre de Lecture, by Mlle. Hélène Vivier (2s.). The idea of the Rossmann and Schmidt course is too well known to need explanation. Translation, parsing, grammar, etc., are pushed as far as possible into the background. "Translation from the mother-tongue into the foreign language," says the German preface, "actually hinders the acquirement of the foreign tongue"; and "the too early consideration of the rules of grammar is . . . a hindrance and not a help to the acquisition of the new language." The rules of its grammar, therefore, are minimised to the extent of including (and that in the third year's course, it must be remembered) "only its more important principles." The language, in fact, is to grow in the pupil, much as his mother-tongue grew in him: his surroundings are to be (in this case) French; the subject-matter of his lessons French; he is to be questioned in French and to answer in French: while by the aid of pictures (these volumes are both admirably illustrated) during his education in the foreign language his mind is to be kept in touch with the actual.

An admirable book, which, while giving the pupil a reasonable amount of assistance, still has for its main object the persuading him to use his own wits, is M. Eugène Perrot's The Translation of French Unseens (Ralph, Holland, 2s. net.). M. Perrot begins by impressing on his readers the necessity of reading, thinking, searching for clues and using their brains before they begin to write their unseen translation, and goes on to explain how much may be done by polishing, after the rough draft is written. His introduction comprises four heads, The Rough Translation, Polishing the Rough Translation, Style, and Translation of Prose and Poetry. Then come some well chosen examples and expositions of Difficulties in French Syntax; and then the extracts from French authors for unseen translation. These are admirably selected. By easy stages the pupil is led on from a very easy passage of Xavier de Maistre through increasing difficulties, till he ends with such pieces as an extract from the Revue des Deux Mondes on glass-making, and a very fairly stiff bit of Nodier. The vocabulary (which M. Perrot advises be used as little as possible—and for our own part we think it would have been better to omit it altogether) is good, and he has wisely avoided giving any notes to the pieces set.

To his "Nouvelle Grammaire Française" Mr. J. Gauchez Anderson has now added a little book of Exercices de Grammaire Française (Methuen, 1s. 6d.), which may also be used to supplement any grammar. The work is entirely in French, and the exercises are easily calculated to lead the pupil on, step by step, into the niceties of correct diction. The book will prove exceedingly useful for fairly advanced students.

Among the "readers" in French we particularly welcome the additions to the Clarendon Press "Oxford Modern French Series," under the editorship of M. Leon Delbos. There can be no question as to which side M. Delbos takes in the controversy on the teaching of modern languages. "The one object in learning a language should be," he writes, in the General Preface included in each volume of the series, "to become acquainted with the greatest thoughts. We have before us Balzac's Les Chouans, edited by Mr. C. L. Freeman (2s.), Stendhal's Mémoires d'un Touriste, edited by Mr. H. J. Chaytor, illustrated (2s.), Erckmann-Chatrian's Histoire d'un Homme du Peuple, edited by R. E. A. Chessex (3s.), and Nodier's Jean Sogor, edited by D. M. Savory (2s.). Each volume contains a short (in Mr. Chessex's case a very short) biographical and critical introduction, and a few good grammatical and explanatory notes; and if only the covers of these volumes were not twice as ugly as they are serviceable, our praise of the series would be unqualified.

Among Messrs. Blackie's capital Little French Classics (which, by the way, are specially singled out for praise by Mr. Brereton in his book reviewed above) the newer volumes are About's Les Jumeaux de l'Hotel Corneille, edited by H. Havelock, and Mérimée's Le siège de la Rochelle, edited by J. E. Michell (4d. each) and Scribe's Le Verre d'Eau, edited by W. G. Etheridge (8d.), the last being one of the Supplementary series of complete plays edited on the same plan. The series, which is divided into three sections, junior, middle, and senior, is unique for combined cheapness and excellence.

Messrs. Macmillan send us La Bruyère's Caractères, adapted and edited by Eugène Pellissier (2s. 6d.), a new volume in Siepmann's Classical French Texts, forming the first of a new section devoted to classical authors of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In a general Preface Mr. Siepmann and Mr. Pellissier express their views on the value of the study of modern languages, and dwell, like Mr. Delbos, on the value of the literary training they can be made to supply. After a brief biographical and critical introduction, Mr. Pellissier gives his selection from the text; then come grammatical and explanatory notes and then a summary of the chief grammatical peculiarities occurring in the text, which shows the divergence between modern French and that of La Bruyère. The four Appendices give Words and Phrases for viva-voce Drill; Sentences on Syntax and Idioms for viva-voce Practice; Passages (not translated from the "Caractères") for translation into French, and subjects for Free Composition. The last is a new feature in the series, and (in good hands) should be very useful.

Among the German educational series published recently first place may not undeservedly be given to Blackie's Little German Classics, which is uniform in aim and general appearance with their Little French Classics. Already a dozen volumes of forty-eight pages each have been published, and some idea of the extent of the field covered by these books may be gathered from the fact that among the authors who have been drawn upon are Goethe, Kotzebue, Heine and Schiller. The notes are sufficiently numerous to be helpful without being of too much assistance.

Mr. C. S. Buchheim's first series of Short German Plays were so well received that he has been encouraged to produce a second, containing half a dozen playlets with from four to eight characters in each, equally suitable for reading in class or production on prize days at school. The language is simple but by no means unnatural, the speeches are short and therefore easily learnt.

A more advanced book is Mr. H. G. Spearing's Combined German Reader, Writer and Grammar (Clarendon Press). This book, as the compiler says, is not intended for very young pupils nor for self-instruction: it is essentially a class-book for those who have already had some grounding in grammatical principles. Mr. Spearing states in his introduction that one of the considerations that influenced him in compiling the book was that in learning a modern language beginners should acquire as soon as possible a large stock of common words by reading connected passages instead of isolated sentences. This plan has been studiously followed in the first pages of the book, but the exercises for translation from English into German (which are far more important than those for translation from German into English) do not run on the same lines. It is a pity that having started out on quite the right path Mr. Spearing was unable to keep to it.

We could wish that we had learned German from Mr. A. B. Hope Moncrieff's little Stories from Grimm (Blackie's Modern Language Series, 1s. 6d.). Here are a number of old favourite stories, "The Golden Goose," "Rumpelstiltskin," "Hans in Luck," and others, attractively set out in a little illustrated book, with a short introduction telling us a little about the brothers with the name so inappropriate to their works, and about the stories they introduced us to, a few notes to help us over difficulties in the translation, and a good vocabulary.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen announce for early publication a Junior French Prose, by R. R. N. Baron (2s.)

HISTORY

Three useful publications have been sent us after the plan of bound-up historical charts (a) The Students' Guide Book to British History, Parts i.—iv., Mediæval to 1485, 1s.; (b) Salient Points in Modern History, British, European, and Colonial, 1485—1901, 1s.; (c) A Students' Note Book of European History, 1789—1815, 2s. By J. S. Lindsey (Heffer, Cambridge; Simpkin Marshall, London). The pages are quarto and the charts comprise schemes of study based upon the Best Books, Outline Sketches, Chronological Synopses, Select Bibliographies, Topical Reviews, Notable Topics, Suggestive Sayings, Typical Questions. The books are intended mainly as Historical Bradshaws, and once used will become indispensable. The information as to how to study and what to study in each section should prove invaluable. The teacher or independent student will derive great advantage by grading his work upon such a scheme. It is to be hoped that in future editions the publishers will see their way to strong linen bindings.

An amplified edition of the Outlines of English History, by George Carter, M.A., is published by Messrs. Relfe, and should prove useful (History of England, in three parts; part i., B.C. 55—1485 A.D., 2s.).

Messrs. Methuen are to be complimented on the speed with which they are issuing the School Histories of the various English counties. The print is good and the illustrations excellent. To know something of the town and country in which they live is the only intelligent commencement of Geography for children. It is also an excellent means of teaching local patriotism. These books are suitable for Geographies or Readers, for general knowledge lessons, and for the school library. The history of ancient games prove one of the most interesting sections of an interesting book. (A School History of Surrey, H. E. Malden, M.A., 1s. 6d.)

Messrs. Jack have learned the value of good printing, good paper, and coloured illustrations for children's books. Their Concentric Histories appear to be a happy blend of the useful and attractive. (Our Island Story, Step 3, British History as Cause and Effect, 1s. 6d.)

Old Testament History from the descent of Jacob into Egypt to the election of Saul by Geo. Carter, M.A. (Relfe 2s.) strikes us as an especially useful book. The text of such of the Bible narrative as is necessary is incorporated in the work. This is particularly useful in a period of biblical history where the chronological arrangement of events sometimes entails more hunting up of passages than young children are capable of without undue distraction.

GEOGRAPHY

The Historical and Modern Atlas of the British Empire by Messrs. Robertson and Bartholomew (Methuen, 4s. 6d. net) was originally planned to accompany Mr. George's Historical Geography of the growth and structure of Great Britain all over the world; it now includes a handy Gazetteer, alphabetically arranged with dates of the entry of each place or country into the Empire: there is a complete index to its numerous maps, which cover the whole of the Christian era chronologically, and a good deal of the globe geographically that we by no means possess or desire.

Messrs. Blackie's Reader on Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Furness (8d.) is printed in good clear type, but is rather heavy and unattractive in its method of putting a great deal of varied information before its readers.

We confess we do not know a school or a class in which An Introduction to Practical Geography, by Messrs. Simmons and Richardson (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.), could be used to good purpose. To find Practical Surveying, Geometrical Drawing, the Use of the Magnetic Compass, Map Reading, Marking and Projection, the Study of Wave Curves, and many other subjects all within the same cover is staggering, and the smattering of knowledge to be gained by a teacher from its perusal.

The second edition, revised by Mr. C. Atchley, of vol. ii. of the Historical Geography of the British Colonies, by Mr. C. P. Lucas (the Clarendon Press), deals copiously and ably with the West Indies, a part of the Empire, which, if we mistake not, will shortly acquire new importance in the eyes of the promoters of the Monroe doctrine, as commanding the entrance to the new Panama Canal. The student is referred to many other authorities for further information, and to any candidate for the Colonial or Foreign Office this should be a most valuable aid. Clear maps illustrate each separate dependency.

Messrs. Jack have published Europe in Round the World Series (6d.). This, like the Australasia and Our English Homes, is intended to serve the purpose of a note-book in Elementary Schools or lower forms. Maps and Illustrations are included and for their purpose are all that can be desired. Inexperienced teachers must not, however, fall into the error of using these as cram-books, instead of as supplementing good oral lessons.

The World and Its People (British Empire), Nelson, 1s. 10d.) is in accordance with the latest scheme of the Board of Education. The Series abounds in good illustrations, many in colour, and all the books are well and strongly bound for class use. They will serve as interesting Readers, being in every case continuous stories.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen announce a second of edition History and Geography Examination Papers, by C. H. Spence (2s. 6d.)

MATHEMATICS

Part VIII. of the Council Arithmetic for Schools by Mr. T. B. Ellery (4d. and 6d., A. and C. Black), contains many and miscellaneous problems, deals concisely and clearly with Discount and Present Worth, Square and Cube Roots, Chain Rule and gives methods of solving those maddening questions as to approaching trains, hands of a clock, rowing against a tide, which the schoolboy must expect to find in any Examination Paper.

The Three Term Arithmetic (T. C. and E. C. Jack, Book IV., 4d.) is drawn up in such a way that it will be useful both in those schools whose school year is divided into three terms and to those which aim at getting the year's syllabus completed in the first three quarters and utilising the last period for revision. Mr. Iliffe is a thoroughly practical teacher, and the book supplies examples for carrying out the requirements of the Board of Education as to measuring and weighing. The necessary metric quantities are given as a matter of course throughout the work and not in a forbidding separate chapter. There are worked exercises as specimens and these are clearly set out as on blackboards. The elementary graphic arithmetic is a feature of the book. The Three Term Arithmetic Part VIII. (5d.) starts with Recurring Decimals, deals with Mensuration, percentages, Proportion and so on. We cannot help thinking that not enough use is made of the Unitary System, as the Rule of Three does not encourage thinking to nearly the same extent. Still, this is a useful little book.

Mr. G. F. Smith, the author of Continuous Mental Arithmetic (Nelson's School and College Series, 2s.), has evidently a low estimate of the teacher's ability to follow out his ideas, since in addition to such a query as "How many pencils at  $\frac{1}{2}$  each could I get for 2d.?" he further asks: "How many for  $2\frac{1}{2}$ d.?" "How many for 5d.?" and gives the answer in each case! Repetition is the right, nay, the only way to teach, but if the teacher cannot take the hint in one page he will not in a hundred. Nor does Mr. Smith give any help as to how new rules are to be tackled. Such a book is hardly necessary.

A New Trigonometry for Beginners, by R. F. D'Arcy, M.A. (Methuen and Co., 2s. 6d.), carries the subject as far as the solution of triangles. Graphical methods are employed throughout and, what is especially useful just now, the answers to the test papers are all based on four-figure logarithms. Mr. D'Arcy's explanations are clear and indicate experience of a certain class of pupils: thus he illustrates by diagrams the distinction between angles of elevation and depression which unaccountably perplex some minds.

READERS

Publishers seem to vie with each other in producing a never-ending succession of Readers. The New Globe Readers (Macmillan, 1s. 2d. etc.) are a wise combination of the continuous story in which sustained attention is fostered, and suitable short stories and extracts, complete in themselves, from such works as Water Babies and Carrots.

Blackie's Model Readers, to judge by the sample sent us (Book iii. 1s.), are in some respects better than any we have lately seen. The Poetry is singularly well chosen. The inclusion of complete episodes from Tom Brown, the Story of Siegfried and anecdotes of Michael Angelo are steps in the right direction, more especially as these are not mere snippets, but stories each of several chapters in length. The illustrations, some coloured, are plentiful and apposite; and one need say no more than that quite a large proportion bear the name of Brock. But there is, to our mind, one serious blemish on an otherwise excellent compilation. The reader receives a distinct mental shock in being suddenly transferred from the childhood of Mozart to a chapter on Potatoes, or from the romance of the Prince of the Lions to gruesome pictures and descriptions of the bat that flies by night. The tenor of Readers of to-day should surely be literary. With our Nature Lessons, Object-lessons and Elementary Science Lessons, and the special text-books on these subjects, there is no reason for the Reader proper being the incongruous medley it was a decade ago. The Model Readers rejoice in so brave a title that they must be above criticism, and a certain amount of rearrangement in a future edition would add fifty per cent. to their value.

Messrs. Blackie have issued a reprint of the first edition of Palgrave's Golden Treasury (Lyrics, etc., Book ii.) with notes, in good linen cover, at the marvellous price of 6d.

Messrs. Macmillan have added several to their excellent series of English Literature for Secondary Schools, varying from 1s. to 1s. 6d., according to size. Notes and Glossary by Fanny Johnson remind us that Ivanhoe (1s. 6d.) is a book for girls as well as boys, as also the charming pictures of scenes in which Rowena and Rebecca play moving parts. H. M. Buller, of Clifton College, has contributed scholarly Introduction and Notes to Macaulay's Essay on Clive (1s.). Upon this particular book of the series we must repeat a criticism made on some of the earlier numbers, that the size of the print is such as should make masters hesitate before placing it in the hands of young students who have often to work many hours by artificial light. The same remark applies to the edition of Macaulay's Essay on Addison, by R. F. Winch, which also labours under the serious defect of over-erudition. Nearly half the volume is given up to Notes, which is quite a disproportionate amount. The Tales from Scandinavian Mythology (The Heroes of Asgard, Keary, adapted by Earle, 1s. 6d.) is much better printed, and the illustrations are as delightful as the stories are fascinating. It might repay the publishers to remove the serious objection we have raised. These classics might then command a wider public than the school. Many would prefer to fill their shelves with these cheap copies of masterpieces rather than borrow more expensive copies from the lending library.

Messrs. Blackie have appreciated the true literary spirit in their edition of Bacon's Essays (E. H. Blakeney, M.A., 1s. 6d.). The Editor, a member of Trinity College, Cambridge, as was Bacon himself, has obviously performed a labour of love. The edition is bound in stiff boards, and is a handy size. The narrowness of the columns and print saves the eyesight, otherwise one would pardon a bulkier volume for the advantage of larger print.

Yet another Henry V.! (Jack's School and College Texts, 1s. 6d.) There is little new about the copy sent us, except the advantage that the notes are kept within reasonable limits, and that a very useful collection of questions set at recent examinations is appended; and attention is drawn to the most suitable passages for recitation. The text is in large and clear type. The explanatory notes are in the form of footnotes.

Mr. Addis, who writes on Style, occasionally indulges in Hyperbole. His book is not without its value in spite of occasional pomposity. (Style in Composition, Allan and Son, 2s.)

The Revision Grammar of Mr. James Hammond (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 8d.) seems itself to stand in no small need of revision. To give formulæ and appendices as the only plural in use of formula and appendix is, to say the least incomplete. By an inexplicable blunder since is ranked as a co-ordinate conjunction. Mr. Hammond provides us with a metrical surprise in John Gilpin. "A train'band cap'tain eke' (sic) was he." Luxurians is not the Latin for luxury. Mr. Hammond's comment on blank verse is quite in the best nursery-governess style. He tells us that "As used by Shakespeare and Milton this simple vehicle of expression is so varied as to be made most musical and seductive." The picture of the Tree of Tongues is likely to produce in the learner's mind the confusion of Babel.

A Sketch of English Literature with lives and work of the chief authors by Miss S. M. Du Pré (Allman, second edition, 2s. 6d.) is a carefully compiled and well-balanced volume. It is less scrappy than most books of this kind, and, if used as the editor suggests as a basis for good oral lessons, should arouse the interest of scholars in this important subject.

Plays for Girls (Blackie 4d. each), by M. F. Hutchinson, deserve praise. They have the advantage of needing no male attire on the stage, and they are both literary and topical. The Masque or Pageant of the English Trees and Flowers is a quaint "conceit" or "pleasant fancy" of the Elizabethan period, and would serve as an introduction to the serious study of the Masque. The Australian Cousin is of quite another type; up-to-date, lively, humorous. There are only five characters, and the three scenes take place in the drawing-room.

Messrs. Blackie send us six more of their English School Texts (Highways and By-ways of Literature. Edited by W. H. D. Rouse, 6d.). Dr. Rouse is indefatigable as an Editor. Nearly thirty volumes are now ready. Yet there is no suspicion of hurried work. These reprints are from good texts and in modern spelling. No change is made from the original except where abridgment is necessary. Short introductions are the only additions to the text. There are no notes. The latest additions to the Series are The Retreat of Sir John Moore, Napier's Peninsular War (2 vols.), The Taking of the Gallcon, The Black Hole of Calcutta, History of Virginia, Trips to Wonderland from Lucian. The series, indeed, shows sound judgment and very catholic taste and wide knowledge on the part of the editor. Other new volumes are Josephus, The Siege of Jerusalem (Lodge's translation, with some omissions, of Books VI. and VII.); a selection from Prescott's Conquest of Peru; a translation of Sintram; an abbreviated version of The Voyage of Captain James; the account of PP. Huc and Gabet's residence in Lla-Ssa (1845-6) from W. Hazlitt's translation of Huc; Roe's journal (abridged) of his Embassy to the Great Mogul (1615) from Purchas, and a part of Cotton's translation of the Adventures of Montluc.

Blackie's English Classics is just increased by an edition of Chaucer's Squire's Tale, with Introduction and Notes by Arthur D. Innes (Black, 2d.). The longer the initial difficulties of Chaucer's language and spelling are put off, the worse they seem to grow, and it is a good thing that pupils should be helped over the crags and pitfalls as early in their careers as possible.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Messrs. Methuen announce Easy Stories from English History (1s.), by E. M. Wilmot-Buxton, author of "The Ancient World." Messrs. Ralph, Holland and Co. announce Essays and How to Write Them, by Avary H. Forbes (2s.); The Rights and Duties of Citizenship, by Frederick Peaker; Chief Landmarks in European History, by Avary H. Forbes; Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, Macbeth, and

The Tempest, edited by C.W. Crook, interleaved for students' manuscript notes: Milton's Paradise Lost, edited by A. L. Cann, and Coleridge's The Ancient Mariner and Christabel, edited by Ernest Jenkins, these also interleaved.

THE USE OF THE STEREOSCOPE IN EDUCATION

It is many years now since Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote his famous articles on the stereoscope (which Wheatstone invented in 1838), and on sun-painting and sun-sculpture; and it is not a little surprising that the advantages of the stereoscope as a means of education are only now just beginning to be noticed. As a means of amusement, this instrument was high in favour years ago: most of us can recall old-fashioned houses in which it formed a prominent "ornament" (!) on the drawing-room table. And perhaps it was its use as a means of (very doubtful) amusement that militated against its employment in what one would have thought its obvious purpose—education. There was another objection—the fact that until the proper use of the instrument in education had been discovered and developed it did actually remain a means of trifling amusement, with no serious value in educational work.

That proper use has now, largely owing to the firm of Messrs. Underwood and Underwood, been discovered, and is being rapidly developed. But before examining the thorough and painstaking work of that firm we must spare a moment to notice the very great and vital improvements—the radical change in fact—which recent science and skill have worked in the stereograph, i.e. the double photograph which is looked at through the stereoscope.

Of old, as all will remember, the representation as seen through the stereoscope was even at its best not generally satisfactory. Either a miniature or an unnaturally magnified representation, and in both cases a badly distorted perspective, cloudy and imperfect, was the usual result. Messrs. Underwood and Underwood realised at the outset that the stereograph for educational purposes must be scientifically accurate and by careful experiments they have been able to establish standards in their processes of production which result in making their stereographs represent scenes and objects life size and moreover an absolutely correct perspective in the third dimension.

Speaking from experience, the impression one gets when examining their stereographs is that the representations are far superior in every way to all other stereographic effects one has seen, and that for educational purposes their subjects are selected on very sound lines.

Through the stereoscope these stereographs present to the eye nothing more and nothing less than would impinge on the retina were the spectator standing on the spot occupied by the camera when each individual stereographic negative was made. The result, as applied to use in schools, is this, that when the pupil looks at stereographs of, say, a cotton-field or a pyramid, his sidelong vision being shut out by the hood of the stereoscope, he is no longer sitting in his school-room and looking at a picture, but he is, as it were, bodily transported to the scene itself, and sees everything of exactly the size it would be, were he standing in real life as far off from it as the camera was.

Still something more was necessary to clear the stereoscope from the charge of being an instrument for amusement only. Pictures are always useful in education, but the best pictures cannot rise to the position in educational value which is claimed for the stereograph by the firm we have mentioned. It remained to invent the right system for the use of these stereoscopes and stereographs.

The system advocated, and adopted now by a long list of schools where Messrs. Underwood's instruments and stereographs are in constant use, is that of practical experiment, as it were a laboratory. The student who has to make a chemical compound for himself learns chemistry more quickly and nicely than the student who sees a master make it. That is the principle of the right use of the stereoscope. Take Messrs. Underwood and Underwood's series of "Industry and Commerce," sub-heading "Fibre." The pupil sees through the stereoscope not a view, but a scene, of negroes picking what looks like tufts of white wool off bushes. He is not told: "This is cotton"; but he is induced to say for himself where he is standing and what he sees. He makes his own experiments, in fact. In the same way, with "Set A," Physical Geography: he sees a hill, a cañon, an oasis, a glacier; and having once seen these amazing things, having been, as it were, present in the flesh, he will never forget the impression, nor the facts that he thus learns on the spot. He is made to think: introduced plump into the presence of something "real." Learning, in such conditions, loses half its terrors and more than doubles its value. And the stereograph is not merely a means of illustration: it becomes actually a new method of education.

This "Set A," Physical Geography, may serve us as an example of Messrs. Underwood and Underwood's system of preparing their many series of stereographs. In all, the set contains thirty-six stereographs, but eighteen of them are called "supplementary" and though most valuable, are not absolutely essential to the course. The eighteen "type," or essential, stereographs are as follows: Hill, Mountain, Niagara Gorge, Gorge in formation (Niagara), River (the Salzach), Plain, Desert, Coasts, Glacier (Gorner), Glacier (Mer-de-glace), Ice-fall (the ultimate fate of a glacier), Volcano in eruption, Lava-field, Lava-Cone, Geyser in eruption, Geyser with cone, Stalactites and Equatorial Telescope. Each of the "supplementary" stereographs follows one of the "types," and they include such subjects as Mountain-pass, Canal locks, Promontory, Oasis, Crevasse and Iceberg. All these, it must be remembered, are from photographs of actual places—which cease to be photographs and become solid realities when seen through the stereoscope.

It is obvious that no pains have been spared to make the series thoroughly representative, and developments and additions are made every day. Messrs. Underwood and Underwood very fairly claim to have invented a new use of the stereoscope, and also to have opened the way to a new method of teaching, which both theory and practice prove to be of the highest service and importance. A first glance at the catalogue is sufficient to show how thoroughly and widely they have organised the teaching of nearly every branch of education on these lines, and the number of the stereographs they have prepared on every conceivable subject is as surprising as the quality.

Into the commonly raised objection of expense we cannot enter in any detail here. But it is possible to say that the initial expense is not nearly so heavy as would be expected, and all kinds of ingenious devices for lowering it have been introduced by the firm. We heartily commend the system and its implements to the attention of all teachers.

NCW READY. Sixty-first Edition. Price 2s.

THE CHILD'S GUIDE TO KNOWLEDGE

By A LADY

The Original and Authorised Edition brought down to the present time.

London: Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent, & Co., Limited.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1760

JANUARY 27, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Thursday next, February 1, at 5 o'clock, BENJAMIN KIDD, Esq., first of two lectures on "The Significance of the Future in the Theory of Evolution." Half a Guinea the Course.

Saturday, February 3, at 3 o'clock, JOHN W. GORDON, Esq., first of two lectures on "Advances in Microscopy." Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

MANCHESTER EDUCATION COMMITTEE.

PUPIL TEACHERS' COLLEGE.

APPOINTMENT OF PRINCIPAL.

In consequence of the appointment of Mr. W. E. Urwick, M.A. Oxon, on the inspectorate of the Secondary Branch of the Board of Education, the Education Committee of the City of Manchester invite applications for the Principalship of the Pupil Teachers' College from persons of academic standing and of sound experience in the principles and methods of teaching.

The salary offered is £650 per annum.

The person appointed should be prepared to assume the duties of the office not later than April 23, 1906.

Particulars of the duties and conditions of appointment may be obtained from the undersigned, to whom applications, on the special forms provided for the purpose, must be returned not later than Wednesday, January 31. Canvassing will disqualify candidates.

J. H. REYNOLDS,

Director of Higher Education.

Municipal School of Technology,

Sackville Street, Manchester.

January 16, 1906.

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

The University of Sheffield proposes to appoint a PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION.

For particulars as to duties, salary, etc., apply to

W. M. GIBBONS,

Registrar.

THE MARCHIONESS OF GRANBY has pleasure in recommending a French lady who has a charming house where girls can finish their education.—Write to MADAME GENDROT DE LUZ, 33 Avenue Henry Martin 33, Paris.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—L. L. W., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti,
Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

PICTURESQUE OLD YORK, twelve choice Etchings by Piper, with description and notes by Rev. A. P. Purey-Cust; six parts, folio, as issued; 50s.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 10s. 6d.), 2s. 6d., cloth 4s., half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Estry, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

OLD AND NEW EDINBURGH, Six Divisions, cloth, gilt, as issued, only 15s.—Write to Lloyd and Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

Art

NAPOLEON IN 1807

VALUABLE ENGRAVING

Printed in Colour on Dutch paper (13 in. by 17 in.) from the Original Copper plate by De BUCOURT.

Price 7s. post free.

An adornment to study or drawing-room.

JAN POZNANSKY & Co., Fine Art Publishers,
42 RUE PERGOLESE, PARIS.

List of Engravings, including 18th-century Colour-Prints, free on application.

SIMEON SOLOMON.—An Exhibition of Paintings and Drawings by the late Simeon Solomon now open at THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W. 10 A.M. to 6 P.M. Admission (including Catalogue) 1s.

Distinctive System of Assurance.

LOW PREMIUMS. LOW EXPENSES.

Scottish Provident Institution

LONDON: 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.

WEST END: 17 PALM MALL, S.W.

HEAD OFFICE: 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WESTMINSTER Quibbles in Verse, 1672
Westminster Review, June, 1840
Westwood (J. O.). Facsimiles of M.S. Ornaments, 1868. or similar works

Weyman (Stanley) any first editions
Wheatley's Cries of London, 13 plates, or any Wheatley's London, Past and Present, 3 vols
Whetstones' Virtues of Sir J. Dier, 4to, 1599
Whistler (J. M.) Gentle Art of Making Enemies
Whitaker's Richmondshire, 2 vols, folio, 1823
White (J.) Voyage to New South Wales, 1790
Whitman (Walt.) Leaves of Grass, 1855
Whitney (Geoffrey) Choice of Emblems, 4to, 1586
Whymper (E.) Scrambles amongst the Alps, 1871
Ascent of the Matterhorn, 1880
Wild Wales, its People, etc., 3 vols, 1862
Wilde (Oscar) Poems
A Woman of No Importance, 1894
Lady Windermere's Fan, 1893
Salome, 8vo, 1893 or 1894
The Sphinx

Wilkinson (R.) Londina Illustrata, 2 vols, folio, 1819-25
Wilkinson (Tate) Memoirs and Wandering Patentee, 8 vols
Williams, Key into the Languages of America, London, 1643
Williamson's Field Sports, coloured, 1819
Wellington's Memoirs of a Protestant, 2 vols, 1758
Will's High Alps, 1856
Eagle's Nest
Wilson's Bryologia Britannica, coloured plates
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels, 9d. 1000, reduction for quantities and regular work. Translations.—Miss HANDLEY, Needham Market, Suffolk.

YOUNG LADY, SHORTHAND-TYPIST, with own Empire Typewriter, desires Mornin Engagement as Secretary—two and a half year reference.—Apply J. E. COOPER, 329 Clapham Road, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

The World We Live In

THERE frequently come times in the life of every man when reference to an Atlas or a geography is positively imperative. If he does not possess these himself, he borrows them, and then more often than not they are unreliable and out-of-date. While a good Atlas and a good Geography are of the highest importance to Merchants, Professional Men, and general readers of various kinds, how much more indispensable are they to Teachers and Students!—In fact, no one nowadays can afford to be without either.

A CHANCE FOR EVERY ONE who wishes to acquire

A GOOD ATLAS and A GOOD GEOGRAPHY On payment of 5s. down

(3s. 6d., and 1s. 6d. postage), you can have sent to your home IMMEDIATELY

THE BEST ATLAS and THE BEST GEOGRAPHY that can be had for the money.

THE ATLAS

THE XXTH CENTURY CITIZEN'S ATLAS OF THE WORLD (edited by G. J. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S.) is in many respects more complete than some Atlases at four times the price. Every name is clear and distinct; the plates are beautifully engraved and coloured—the maps have been reduced from the latest surveys, and are up-to-date and reliable—perfect works of art.

The Press is unanimous in its praise. Some of the highest Geographical Authorities have pronounced it THE BEST STANDARD ATLAS FOR POPULAR USE.

Not a village or hamlet has been omitted from the Map of England. The Atlas as a whole is as complete as it can be made for all the uses of general reference. It contains 156 large crown folio pages of Maps and Plans, with 210 pages of indices and descriptive text—including a valuable descriptive Gazetteer.

The Atlas forms a very handsome volume—is sumptuously produced—and may be had either in Strong Art Canvas Binding or in Half Morocco. (See Terms.)

THE GEOGRAPHY

A splendid acquisition to any one; a treasury—a storehouse of all that is worth knowing about the world, its peoples, places, customs, commerce, etc. In short, an authoritative summary of THE WHOLE OF GEOGRAPHY. Edited by Hugh Robert Mill, D.Sc. Neither technical nor elementary, it is engagingly written and comprehensive in the subjects it embraces.

Contributed to by

SEVENTY DIFFERENT AUTHORS of Various Nationalities.

each specialising in the territory with which he is most familiar.

1088 PAGES. 489 ILLUSTRATIONS.

Beautifully printed in good clear type. Handsomely bound in heavy covers.

THE TERMS

These two beautiful books—this store of knowledge—will be sent (POST FREE) to your own home AT ONCE on receipt of 5s. down. The balance of £1 12s. 6d. is payable in 13 monthly payments of HALF A CROWN. The Geography is published in Cloth only, price 15s., but the Atlas is published in two bindings—Art Canvas, £1 1s. 0d. net, and Half-Morocco, £1 5s. 0d. net. For the latter binding an extra charge of 4s. is made, which must be paid with the first or second instalment. The Atlas and Geography combined put one in possession of a knowledge of the world he lives in as complete as the united efforts of the SEVENTY AUTHORS and many geographers and cartographers can make it. This knowledge means power: it imparts a thrill of pleasure to know that all this wealth of wisdom is at one's finger ends—to draw on when occasion arises.

THESE BOOKS ARE A TREASURE

which only those who have felt the want of a comprehensive Geography—and a COMPLETE Atlas—can appreciate.

There is no excuse to be without them; the terms on which they are obtainable are THE EASIEST OF THE EASY.

ORDER FORM.

To Messrs. GEO. NEWNES, Ltd.,
3—12 Southampton Street, Strand, London.

Please send me "The XXth Century Citizen's Atlas of the World" and "The International Geography" for which I enclose the first instalment of Five Shillings. I undertake to pay the balance in thirteen equal instalments of Two Shillings and Sixpence, on the first of each month, and not to dispose of the volumes until all the instalments have been paid.

Name.....

Cheques and Postal Orders payable to Geo. Newnes, Ltd. Address.....

Date.....

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	83	The Drama :
Literature :		"Les Affaires sont les Affaires"
The Great Commoner . . . . .	85	at the New Royalty Theatre . . . . .	93
A Haunted Valley . . . . .	86	Fine Art :
A Saint of Hellenism . . . . .	87	The Arts and Crafts and
Suffering's Journey . . . . .	88	Organisation . . . . .	94
A Mighty Hunter . . . . .	89	Aubrey Beardsley . . . . .	95
International Copyright . . . . .	90	Music :
Ronceval . . . . .	91	Strauss's "Don Juan" . . . . .	96
Literary Causerie :		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	97
The Earliest Modern Novelist . . . . .	91	Correspondence . . . . .	98
Fiction . . . . .	92	Books Received . . . . .	101
Bookshelf . . . . .	102

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

ALTHOUGH we are compelled to write before the whole of the returns are available, it has already become evident that the new Parliament will be one of the most literary ever known in England, even although it is possible at the same time to say that it will contain an unusually large proportion of members who may fairly be described as illiterate. A curious feature of the time is the desire of the popular novelist to figure in politics. Fortunately he cannot be calculated upon to take one side in preference to another. Sir Gilbert Parker, who has secured an increased majority, is a Unionist. Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, who just missed getting in for his Scottish constituency, is of the same way of thinking. On the other hand, that rising and popular novelist, Mr. A. E. W. Mason, is to represent Coventry in the Liberal interest.

It is not quite the same with other branches of literature. At the head of the men of letters who will be in the present Parliament we may put Mr. John Morley without fear of any one disputing the place. He will have with him on the same side quite a brilliant band of writers. There is Mr. Augustine Birrell, who will come back fresh from the victory at Bristol; there is Professor Bryce with the renown that he won as historian of the Holy Roman Empire, and several other familiar figures. Some are new to the House, and we cannot help including among these Mr. Winston Churchill, who, though he has been in Parliament before, is always new. His life of Lord Randolph Churchill entitles him to a place among men of letters, whatever one may think of his politics. Among those to whom Parliament will be absolutely novel is Mr. C. F. G. Masterman, who, during the course of last year, published a book of Essays that proved him to be a thoughtful student of literature. It is understood that he controls the review department of the Daily News, and he will have as colleague one whose name is also intimately associated with that newspaper, Mr. Herbert Paul, who is returned as member for Northampton. So that it would appear that on this occasion literature is on the side of the big battalions, though we must not forget that in what would be the smaller army is Mr. George Wyndham.

The historian, the essayist, and the journalist take to politics readily enough, but it is curious to note that the minor poet as a rule avoids the House of Commons, his ethereal imaginings not, perhaps, fitting in very appropriately with the "matter-of-factness" of legislation. In the person of Mr. Hilaire Belloc, Parliament will have a literary man who amongst other accomplishments possesses that of writing light verse; but, so far as we know, he will be alone in the Lower House as a poet who has systematically published verses. Of course, it would be a very rash assertion that of all those six hundred people who compose the legislative assembly there was no other who had sent poetry to the newspapers, but we cannot at the moment think of any one in the list who is actually known as a minor poet.

Whatever may be said of the literary standing of the new members of Parliament, it is certain that more literary art has been displayed in the contest than on any previous occasion. The distinguishing characteristic of the speeches delivered and the articles written has been cleverness, and this applies particularly, we think, to those compositions which are more or less in the nature of caricatures. For example the "Political Parables" which appeared first in the Westminster Gazette, although Liberal in their trend, can scarcely fail to delight both sides, since they are as good-natured as Mr. Carruthers Gould's cartoons. They have been published in a book, the author being Mr. Francis Brown, and the best comment we can make upon them is to select the following, referring our readers to the book for the solution:

Once there was a man what wanted to entertain an old gent, but he'd only got a bloater, so he give it to his cook and she put it in a pie. But some of the other servants said This aint no place for us! When theyd left the cook said, If they didnt like it, its certain the old gent wont. But her master said, Well if his stomach's queasy you must make it more tasty! Bother the bloater, said the cook, I'll make a hash of it, & take a long time about it too! Oh, no, you wont, said he, youll serve it up when I want it—or youll go! This frightened her very much, & in her hurry to get it ready all the fat got into the fire and there arose a dreadful flareation and botheration. Whats up now? asked the man. I think Ive burnt myself, says she. Burnt yourself! says he, I reckon youve set the confounded House ablaze this time with your cleverness!!!

The daily papers have devoted so much space to the biography of the late Mr. George Jacob Holyoake, that we need not recapitulate his career here. Agitator, socialist, free-thinker, fire-brand, he lived through the evil days of a time that happily has passed, the passing of which was due to no one man in so great a measure as to him. To many his very name was anathema; but it must be remembered that he counted among his friends Mazzini, Garibaldi, Herbert Spencer, Harriet Martineau, George Eliot, John Bright and George Meredith. He stood for "progress" and all that "progress" is worth; and with the merits of his cause he exhibited in his own mind most of its weaknesses as well. He retained his extraordinary vitality almost to the last. It can be little more than a year ago that we heard him speak from the chair at a banquet of the Rationalist Press Association, an occasion on which he told over again with infinite gusto his favourite story of how he became liable to a fine of six hundred thousand pounds for publishing unstamped newspapers, and offered the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) to pay it in weekly instalments of a few shillings.

He shares with John Bunyan and Silvio Pellico the distinction of having written books in prison. His gaol was at Gloucester, and he was taken there on a charge of blasphemy. The chaplain, thinking to convert him, brought him, among other books, Paley's "Natural Theology," and Leslie's "Short and Easy Method with the Deists." The prisoner, however, was allowed not only books, but also pens, ink, and paper. Having read the books with close attention, he proceeded to write pamphlets about them, demolishing their arguments to his own satisfaction, if not to that of others.

In his house at Brighton the veteran reformer had a number of interesting relics recalling to his mind the many exciting events in which he had played his part. Though he was a man of peace, he specially cherished two flags, reviving memories of Garibaldi. One of them was a flag under which the Thousand of Marsala liberated Sicily; the other, pierced with bullets, had flown on the field of Mentana. Another of his treasures was a pike, manufactured in the stormy days of the Reform agitation of 1831, when Birmingham was threatening to march upon London, and the Reformers fashioned all sorts of miscellaneous weapons to compel the aristocracy to yield to their demands; while the troubles of 1867 were represented by a small bottle labelled "Mr. Secretary Walpole's tears." That distinguished Home Secretary was violently denounced by the reactionaries of the period for having refused to call out the troops to charge the populace when it pulled down the Hyde Park railings, and was accused of having wept when considering the possible consequences of a collision between the soldiers and the mob. The nick-name of "Weeping Walpole" was in consequence bestowed upon him, and phials of pills, each of which was supposed to represent a tear from the eye of the susceptible Minister, were sold at the time by hawkers in the streets.

The French Government, in spite of its anti-clerical policy, is the jealous guardian of those great movements which owe their being to the Faith which M. Combes has done his best to banish from France. Every historical student and every lover of the romantic and the picturesque must rejoice to learn that the Palace of the Popes at Avignon is to be restored, and redeemed from the ignominy to which it has so long been subject. The wonderful building which dominates the delightful unspoilt town was described most eloquently by Montalembert. "Je ne pense pas," he wrote, "qu'il existe en Europe un débris plus complet et plus imposant de l'architecture civile et féodale du moyen âge." It remains a fortress rather than a palace to this day, the more so that not a vestige is left of the frescoes attributed to Giotto, or of the world-famous decorations of the great halls where the Popes received their priests and enemies. For over a hundred years the Palace of the Popes has been a provincial barracks, and the larger apartments have been subdivided by rude partitions to make the chambres of the worthy pioupious, who cared little for the awe-inspiring fact that they were sharing their dwelling-place with the ghosts of many of the greatest figures of old Christendom.

The present state of the Home Rule question calls to mind a little-known essay by Carlyle, "On the Repeal of the Union." Written in the early part of 1848, some eighteen months after his first visit ("six days") to Ireland, and about the same time distant from his "tour" in "poor" Ireland, it shows his style at its best. Possibly the brevity of the brochure prevents its volcanic brilliance being broken by the incoherent chaotic utterances, which, as he himself says of his moods, "intermitted." Its politics, either then or now, do not come within our sphere; but the essay is a pathetic atom of the book of "Spiritual Sketches" he intended to write on the "Sister Island," which was to "begin with St. Colm, and end with the rakes of Mallow," and which would never get itself so much as written, still less published. "There is no established paper," he wrote, "that can stand my articles, no single one they would not blow the bottom out of." And his difficulties with "Sartor Resartus" are well known.

Carlyle felt acutely the misery of the Irish of the period, which, he says, "really is my problem," and was keenly affected by the fate of the Young Ireland party which "broke" over the Revolution of '48 in France. He had met some of the members of it on his first visit, and liked them, although he did not agree with them. The essay was republished separately in 1889 as "A Pearl of English Rhetoric" (with an introduction which can scarcely be described as accurate), but it was not until several years later that it was included in a volume of "Rescued Essays" published by the Leadenhall Press. It is not to be found in the collected editions of his works and is not mentioned by Froude or the Dictionary of National Biography.

The new President of the French Republic has his connection with literature, and on the highest plane, being, in his way and at his hour, a poet. He is President of the "Société de la prune," founded by M. Georges Leygues, all the members of which hail from Lot-et-Garonne. Their principal occupation is to dine together periodically, and at their banquets they sometimes recite verses of their own composition in the ancient "langue d'oc." The Figaro prints a poem which M. Fallières recently wrote on one of these occasions. Here it is for the curious to translate, if they can:

AOU REI DE LA PRUNO

Hillot dé Jansémin, coumpayre éncalourit,
Digun n'a mé dé co, digun n'a mé d'esprit,
Qué tu, sabén douctur, lou Rei dé nosto pruo.
La Pouésie én flocs dé toun amo dégruo
Coumo, aou Printéns, las flous dous frutés embaoumats,
Quand lou Bén, aou soureil, én arroso lous prats.

En dous hill déboutious dé la terro natalo,
Dam un mot amistous, d'un grand cop dé toun alo
Sous coustous esclarits quous portos, én canta,
Et dé tous digts léougés quous tressos la Courouno,
Qu'eslugro, pér là bas, aous bords de la Garouno,
Lous amics tants hurous dé lous bésé mounta.

Merci, pér jou, paourot, tout mi gnat dé bergougno
D'esta, den toun libré, á la placó d'ou mieï
Dans tout aquéts, messius, l'ourgou dé la Gascougno.
Merci dé quét haounou, jamais l'oubliderei !

It should be added that M. Fallières has written enough French verse to fill a volume, though there is no reason to believe that he will at present challenge criticism by publishing. His rival, M. Doumer, gained little but ridicule by doing so.

Our hearty congratulations are due to the National Art Collections Fund, who have, after all, obtained all the money wanted for the purchase of the Rokesby Velasquez, except £3000 which Messrs. Agnew have given them time to collect. The picture is now at Manchester on exhibition, and then it goes to Liverpool. On its return to London, next month, it will be handed over to the nation. Lord Balcarras, Mr. Isidore Spielmann and Mr. Witt have worked against heavy odds, and we cannot speak too highly of the perseverance and determination they have shown. While we are on this subject, we may add that, thanks to the munificence of Mr. J. J. Duveen, Mr. Sargent's famous portrait of Miss Ellen Terry as Lady Macbeth will be housed in the Tate Gallery as a national possession. It is in no spirit of racial jealousy that we rejoice over these two American reverses.

The Magazine of Fine Arts for January is as good as, or better than, its two predecessors. Mr. Frederick Wedmore writes on Crome and Cotman, M. Arsène Alexandre on The Pantomime and Expression in the Paintings of Nicolas Poussin, Mr. Walter Crane on Early Italian Gesso Work; and Sir James Linton, in writing on the Artists' Benevolent Institution Exhibition at Agnew's, gives high praise to the famous Velasquez, which is well reproduced as an illustration. There are many other interesting articles and notes, and the plates, which include the Ver Meer of Delft which was lately on exhibition in London, J. S. Cotman's "Bishopsgate Bridge, Norwich," and Raeburn's "Lady Maitland," are all excellently produced.

The Atlantic Monthly will in and after this month be published in England by Messrs. Constable. This magazine, which was founded very nearly fifty years ago, has had no inglorious history. In its first number Oliver Wendell Holmes began his "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table," and among its other contributors have been Longfellow, Lowell, Browning, Sainte-Beuve, Whittier, Emerson, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Bret Harte, Professor Eliot Norton, Mr. W. D. Howells, and Mr. Marion Crawford. It maintains its reputation to-day as a first-class magazine.

Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week will witness the sale at Messrs. Sotheby's of quite a medley of interesting books from the libraries of quite a medley of gentlemen representing the Church, journalism and the law. That of the late Rev. S. J. G. Fraser includes: Valpy's edition of Shakespeare, works on chess, books relating to the East, and a presentation copy from the author's father of the first edition, 1850, of Poems, by J. R. [John Ruskin]. This should excite much interest, as only fifty copies were printed. The collection of the late Mr. R. M. R. Burrell is strong in Natural History—Seebohm's "British Birds," and Gould's "Birds of Great Britain," being amongst the lot, and an exceptionally interesting copy of Dallaway and Cartwright's "History of the Western Division of Sussex," extra illustrated. Of this book five hundred copies were printed, but three hundred of them were destroyed by fire.

Mr. St. John Brenon's books would provide a library in themselves, historical, classical, dramatic, biographical, ecclesiastical, philosophical, artistic, and even the "books which no gentleman's library should be without." Numismatics is the leading feature of Mr. Trist's collection, and the portion of the library of the late Mr. Justice Day to be sold includes a first edition of Milton's "Paradise Lost." A copy of the Fourth Folio edition will come to the hammer, but as it is "sold not subject to return," it will not likely mark a record in price.

The President of the Board of Education has appointed Professor W. W. Watts, M.A., F.R.S., of Birmingham University, to the Professorship of Geology at the Royal College of Science, South Kensington, vacant by the retirement of Professor Judd. In view of the changes in organisation that may be found desirable in the Royal College of Science and the Royal School of Mines after the consideration of the report of the Departmental Committee on the College, it has been thought best to make this appointment a temporary one. Professor Watts was a Fellow of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, from 1888 to 1894, and a member of the Geological Survey from 1891 to 1897. He has acted successively as Deputy-Professor of Geology at Leeds, Birmingham, and Oxford. At the present time he is Assistant-Professor of Geology and Professor of Geography at the Birmingham University, and is Secretary of the Geological Society.

In the review of Mr. Stopford Brooke's "On Ten Plays of Shakespeare" in last week's ACADEMY, p. 58 (column i.), it was stated that Mr. Stopford Brooke "sees . . . the difference in the attitudes of Banquo and Macbeth from those of the witches." The sentence should have run: "sees the difference in the attitudes of Banquo and Macbeth towards the Witches."

The seventh German season at the Great Queen Street Theatre closes next week with a performance of Ibsen's Stutzen der Gesellschaft. Of the plays produced by them this winter two at least are to be seen in English soon. Alma Mater and Björnson's Ein Fallissement. In this latter play it is rumoured Mr. H. B. Irving and Mr. Beer-bohn Tree are both anxious to appear. But why should they not join forces; Mr. Irving playing Tjälde and Mr. Tree the old lawyer Behrent? One could not ask for anything better.

LITERATURE

THE GREAT COMMONER

William Pitt. By CHARLES WHIBLEY. (Blackwood, 6s. net.)

THE chief characteristic of Mr. Whibley's work is that he has concentrated his mind on giving us a personal study of the greatest of English parliamentarians. We need not say that it is sympathetic, since the ideals and character of William Pitt are such as to appeal with profound effect to the latest of his biographers. That it is dignified and well written is also an unnecessary statement. If there is an unsatisfactory feature in the book, we may say at once that it lies in a certain poverty of background; the majestic figure of William Pitt would be interesting in any circumstances, but it would have been much more so if placed in its natural environment. If we turn our eyes backwards for one hundred years, we find not only that the condition of England was striking and peculiar, but that the whole arena was full of new movement; at such a time, it was fortunate for England that she developed a William Pitt. But it is scarcely possible to understand the importance of the part he had to play without a close and detailed examination of the circumstances of the time. This we say without any wish to detract from the brilliant work done by Mr. Whibley.

After all, personality counts for a great deal; a statesman gives his country what he has himself, and William Pitt may almost be said to have been nursed for the part he had to play; as Mr. Whibley properly says, he was "both born and made." Native genius he had inherited in plenty, but the Earl of Chatham, who from the first designed a great place for his son, took care that the very atmosphere he breathed should be such as to prepare him for his destiny. His education was carefully calculated to develop the qualities that go to make a great statesman; he read the classics, as his biographer says, not, as is too frequently the case, for the mere study of words, but as one in search of examples of the greatest poetry and the loftiest eloquence. Lord Chatham seems to have appreciated the value of paraphrasing as an educational force, and urged his son to turn the best passages of the classics into English. Pitt himself had an early inclination to literature, and he found expression in the way most usual with ambitious young men—that is to say, he wrote a tragedy in five acts, of which Lord Macaulay says that it was "bad, of course, but not worse than the tragedies of Hayley." Literature, however, was not pursued, except in so far as it remained a solace and comfort to the man of affairs after the toil and bustle of his public life.

The study of his career is the study of one of the most typical of Englishmen. He began, as is the way with many impulsive young politicians, with a great enthusiasm for peace, retrenchment, and reform. Withal, he had a due sense of his own importance:

In a speech delivered five days before Lord North's resignation—the most arrogant speech ever delivered by a man of twenty-two—he made his intention perfectly clear. "With regard to a new administration," he said, "it was not for him to say, nor for the House to pronounce, who was to form it; all he felt himself obliged to declare was, that he himself could not expect to take any share in a new administration, and were his doing so more within his reach, he would never accept a subordinate position." It is no wonder that George Selwyn was astonished at his independence. "Young Pitt will not be subordinate," he wrote; "he is not so in his own society; he is at the head of a dozen young people, and it is a corps separate from Charles's; so there is another premier at the starting-post."

That speech would have been arrogance if it had come from one who had not the force behind him to make his words good; but we are not sure if we should so describe it in the case of a man conscious of his own genius and knowing that he alone was fit for the position which he sought to occupy. During the whole of his career, Pitt depended mainly on himself. He had, it is true, friends and pupils, of whom the most brilliant was Canning, and the one of most solid worth the Duke of Wellington, or rather Lord Arthur Wellesley, as he was then. But he was too great a man to attach himself exclusively to any one party; he was one in whom love of country was the prevailing passion, and who set himself, with the sound common sense which Wellington showed in his campaigns, to put his judgment and knowledge into practice. Pitt was a man who had cleared his mind thoroughly of cant and fad; more keenly alive than his contemporaries to the necessity of economy in the conduct of State affairs, he was, nevertheless, a prodigal with the national income, when he thought it could be spent to advantage. In dealing with France, his attitude of common sense was conspicuous. A fanatical monarchist might have refused, on what he called principle, to have any dealings with the French Republic; Pitt recognised that the form of Government of any nation is its own affair, and that it is the business of outsiders to acknowledge those whom the people put in authority.

His position was almost paradoxical during the greater part of his life; no one loved peace more, yet he was obliged to wage unceasing war; devoted as he was to economy, his political opponents accused him of being a national spendthrift: yet his consistency, as Mr. Whibley brilliantly shows, though it was by no means the shallow, pertinacious obstinacy which makes a man stick to a thing for years after he has said it, remained unbroken. Pitt, through all the vicissitudes of fortune, was true to himself, and therefore could not be false to his country. Incidents of the time obliged him to be something of an opportunist; he had a practical understanding of a point brought forward by Thomas Carlyle, namely, that no carpenter could make a perfect right angle, and if the carpenter were to devote all his time and energy to making his right angle, he would never get any further; he should get as close an approximation as is practicable, and then go on working with it. Pitt in all things considered, not so much what he would like to do, as what could be done, and he attained the great and noble end which he had continuously in view. He was ready, at any moment, to sacrifice his dearest plans and lay aside his most pronounced prepossessions. His is a fine character to study, and one that redounds to the credit of the country to which he belonged.

William Pitt exactly fitted the time in which he lived and ruled, but it will always remain a moot question how far he could have adapted himself to later requirements. In his life he was one of the most exclusive of aristocrats, and even his faults were those of the patrician. It will be remembered that he was a six-bottle man, and on one celebrated occasion he managed to get through seven bottles, a considerable achievement even in those days of hard drinking. Mr. Whibley claims that only once was he seen in the House of Commons with his mind so clouded by wine that he could not conduct the debate. The incident is one that we can look back upon with pleasure, if only for the reason that it inspired a delightful epigram:

Pitt: I cannot see the Speaker! Hal, can you?

Dundas: Not see the Speaker! Hang it, I see two.

He was also quite unable to take care of his property, and it is singular that one who so jealously guarded the funds of the nation was something of a prodigal as regards his own. But his education, like his vices, was entirely that of a gentleman, and one wonders if in any circumstances he could have descended to the minds of those vast myriads who form the electorate of to-day. Pitt had one quality at least that commended him to the multitude. In a sea of indecision he was the one man who knew his own mind. It is true that he contemptuously laid aside all the arts of the rhetorician. It is equally true that, just as the many-headed loves an aristocrat as much as a demagogue, so it loves a crisp, clear, laconic speaker as much as a flowery debater. We have enough confidence in our countrymen to believe that William Pitt would be able to sway the electors of the twentieth century as easily as he did the House of Commons in the early years of the nineteenth.

A HAUNTED VALLEY

The Casentino and its Story. By ELLA NOYES. Illustrated in colour and line by DORA NOYES. (Dent, 10s. 6d. net.)

It would be difficult, if not impossible, for a work of this kind to be successful, if it be judged from a purely literary point of view. This class of book is an attempt to combine in one volume a historical survey of some particular district, a topographical description, a practical guide for travellers, a catalogue of the antiquities and works of art to be visited, a study of the life and manners of the inhabitants and an appreciation of the scenery in all its aspects in the changing lights and successive seasons of the year. And, as if these elements in themselves were not distracting and heterogeneous enough, there is added a certain number of pictures, some of them illustrating something on the page facing them, others apparently inserted merely to divert the attention of the interested or to console the bored. Such in general terms are the discordant themes which the writer of one of these descriptive books is compelled to handle.

This singularly attractive valley of the Apennines offers perhaps as little difficulty as any region possibly could offer to the author who should set out to write a complete account of it. In the first place, its limits are splendidly defined by the mountains which enclose it and give it that conformation whence some would derive its name—Clau-sentinium; and, broken and variegated as it is by mountain-crag, forest and river, it still preserves a distinguishing character and a unity comparable only with that of a small island or a lake. It cannot be confused with Romagna on one side or the Val d'Arno and Lower Tuscany on the other. Then, too, the history of the valley is limited. Of Etrurian and even of Roman remains there is very little; of modern history there is practically none. The story of the Casentino is a vivid and continuous chapter, a typical study of the fall of feudalism and the end of the Middle Ages. It is the family history of the Conti Guidi, the powerful nobles who lived in the castles that crown almost every hill-top in the district, and who, with their relations and allies, ruled, or at any rate held in subjection, not only the valley itself but a large part of the neighbouring country. These mediæval barons of almost mythical origin lost their wealth and power step by step, and in direct relation to the rise of Florence; for, as the city increased in power, she stepped in between baron and baron or between the barons and the little towns who appealed to her for protection, and always succeeded in being well paid for her services. The history of each castle and each branch of the old noble family is the same. At some critical moment Florence interferes, the baron is dispossessed, and in the stronghold is installed the Podestà, who rules the fiefs in the name of the City. In many of the half-ruined palaces the visitor may see to-day the arms of the republican governor carved side by side with those of the older feudal lord. Since those days the Valley has hardly been touched by the turbulence of political strife. It slumbers, as it were, in the calm beauty of an autumnal light, full of memories, haunted by the great spirits of the past. "Bercant la gloire éteinte, o vallée, tu t'endors." It calls to mind not those alone who in their lifetime disturbed its peace, but those also who have outlived the fierce warriors—San Romualdo, San Francesco, Dante.

Miss Noyes has carried out her undertaking with unequal success. The arrangement of the book is unfortunate. The first chapter, which consists of a description in outline, with some appreciations of the scenery and a few of the general impressions to be gained in travelling through the Casentino, is quite unnecessary, since all that it contains is expanded, with variations, in her descriptions of each separate route and locality. The second is a historical summary, every detail of which is told again with wearisome faithfulness in the following chapters, which are topographically arranged. In reading these, we hurry in the company of the author from peak to peak, from village to village, from church to church, until we feel that the weariness will never depart out of our feet, nor the dizziness from our heads. She tells us what road or path to take, calls our attention to a fountain, an ass, a group of peasants passed on the way, points out all the architectural antiquities of the village, rushes with us into the church and castle, tells us who the decorations are by, hurries us onwards again up the hill, relating an unauthenticated legend by the way, till we reach a lonely convent half in ruins, at which point she generally breaks into semi-poetical prose about the scenery. But the breathing-time is short: we are to take another way home, and there will be more points of interest to be visited. Miss Noyes writes with obvious and sincere enthusiasm and, apparently, a thorough knowledge of the ground over which she has taken us. But as a writer of "landscapes" she does not succeed. The style of her word-paintings, instead of "rising to the occasion," as it is clearly meant to do, becomes weak, and the verbiage erratic; and instead of a piece of more than usually finished prose, there results a jerky sequence of unmelodious rhythms.

The best part of the book is, without doubt, the latter half, throughout most of which there runs some more absorbing personal or, at any rate, human interest. The chapter on the home life of the peasants, their religious observances and their work in the fields is admirable. It is sympathetically and simply written, and brings out excellently that patriarchal, primitive, peaceful and, on the whole, happy state of life which is still the lot of the peasants who live in the more inaccessible parts of the Casentino. Of St. Francis, Miss Noyes has, of course, nothing absolutely new to tell us; but she has localised such of the incidents of his life, both authentic and legendary, as are connected with the Valley in a chapter which can hardly fail to interest. Last, the chapter on Dante (interrupted and defaced by an absurd and irrelevant picture of "A Sheep Girl," with an anæmic lamb apparently dying unnoticed in the foreground) is well worth reading. In the greater part of it the author is on firm ground, and she does not attempt to make definite assertions with regard to any unproved fact. As we have said, the human interest is the theme which Miss Noyes treats best, and she has made this chapter interesting precisely because she deals with the most human side of Dante's character. She does not write of the half-mystic lover of the "Vita Nuova," or of the philosopher of the "Convivio," or of the seer of the "Divina Commedia," but of Dante the man—the exile who longs to return to Florence, and the mature lover complaining of the disdainful attitude of his Casentinese lady. The materials are, of course, the letters addressed respectively to the Florentines and to Henry VII. and dated from somewhere in the Casentino in the spring of 1311, and the group of poems generally known as the "Rime Pietrose," which were, perhaps, composed in the Valley.

Whatever interpretation we put upon these poems and whatever date we assign to them, it was a happy chance which directed the illustrator of this volume to draw her inspiration from the sestina: "Al poco giorno ed al gran cerchio d'ombra." In the ingenious and pleasing frontispiece we undoubtedly see the lady of the poem, a lady very young, with yellow hair and a garland of grasses, clothed in a pale green robe. But, to fit in with the colour-scheme of the picture, she has thrown loosely over the green robe a pink mantle. She sits in the centre, with hands outstretched on each side of her. Behind her is a cave—Fons Sarni—from which the water issues in two runlets and flowing over her hands falls down on each side of her feet in the seven streams which meet to form the Arno. In the background are the pines, the mountains and the stars. In the decorative border are two little medallions; the lower shows a castle on a hill-top with armed men tilting at one another in the foreground; in the upper is a wooden cross, supported by two figures, which we take to be SS. Romualdo and Francesco, and a kneeling woman, who must be some Franciscan saint.

A SAINT OF HELLENISM

Julian the Apostate. By GAETANO NEGRI. Translated by DUCHESS LITTA VISCONI-ARESE. With an introduction by Professor PASQUALE VILLARI. 2 vols. (Unwin, 21s. net.)

"To write with authority about another man," said Stevenson, "we must have fellow feeling and some common ground of experience with our subject." The late Senator Gaetano Negri's study of the life and times of Julian the Apostate may not be free from minor defects, but it has this great merit—that there is perfect sympathy between the author and his subject; and for this reason it may be said to add to our knowledge of this most fascinating emperor, though it brings to light no new facts about his brief and romantic career.

By this time, however, the life story of Constantine's nephew is well known to all students of Byzantine history and has even been popularised by the powerful, if inaccurate, romance of the Russian novelist, Merejkowski. His protean character and his extraordinary vicissitudes of fortune have contributed, quite as much as his determined attempt to disestablish Christianity, to make Julian a figure unique and unsurpassed in interest among all the Roman Emperors. That after being brought up in the Christian faith he should have reverted to Paganism and attempted to revive a general belief in the gods of Olympus, is by no means the most striking contrast afforded by the third ruler of Constantinople. His antipathy against Christianity is naturally accounted for by the crimes of the Christian emperors who preceded him, by the vices and corruption of the ecclesiastics at the Imperial court, and by his intimacy with the writings of Plato, Aristotle and the noblest of Greek authors. From his earliest boyhood Julian only saw the worst side of Christianity, corrupted and demoralised by worldly success, and the best side of Paganism. He knew that Constantine's acceptance of Christianity did not restrain him from subsequently murdering his wife and child, while the second Christian emperor, Constantius, was the murderer of his father, his brothers, and all his family. It was natural, then, that the imprisoned youth should see in Christians only oppressors, enemies, and gaolers. His Christian education consisted in being commanded to accept dogmas against which his reason revolted, while all the virtues extolled by Christ he saw practised, not by his Christian acquaintance, but by the few who nourished him with the forbidden fruit of Hellenism.

Far more difficult is it to explain how it was that this dreamer, this serious-minded bookworm, who was practically unversed in the most elementary military exercises, suddenly became an intrepid man of action, a most prudent but skilful commander, when, at the age of twenty-four he was unexpectedly raised to the dignity of Cæsar, and given the desperate task of leading the Roman legions in Gaul against the victorious barbarians. Indeed, his series of brilliant victories, achievements worthy of a Cæsar, an Alexander or a Hannibal, can only be accounted for by the fact that Julian, too, was a born military genius, who, without being taught, instinctively knew the right thing to do and the right time to do it.

But it is not Julian the victorious general and the brilliant administrator so much as Julian the religious reformer who interests Signor Negri. This much can be seen by the very plan of the work, in which one chapter—a long one, it is true—is devoted to Julian's life, and all the others to the consideration of the causes which led to his abortive revival of Paganism. These causes are examined minutely and exhaustively by Signor Negri, who, if he at times wearies us by unnecessarily repeating himself, nevertheless deserves our heartiest thanks for the lucid and invincible manner in which he proves that Julian's aim was to effect a moral still more than a religious reformation. It is very evident that our author is cynically of opinion that Julian's austere morality far more than his religious beliefs interfered with the success of his scheme.

To Signor Negri Julian's attempt to re-establish Paganism as the state religion of the Roman Empire is most interesting, "because it is a symptom and a proof of the corruption into which Christianity had fallen, when, secure from persecution and recognised as a legal institution and instrument of government, it was no longer subjected to those conditions to which it owed its virtues."

Julian . . . wished to reinstate ancient polytheism, which for him represented Hellenism, civilisation, and Hellenic culture, in opposition to the new Christianity that threatened to destroy it; but to reinstate it, he wished to Christianise it both in its morals and its ecclesiastical constitution. . . . This bitter enemy of Christianity made a propaganda of all the virtues taught by Christianity—temperance, respect for sacred things, love of our neighbour, contempt for riches, interest in spiritual things, and, above all, charity. Christianity had so little succeeded in infusing these virtues in the Lower Empire that, on becoming its official religion, it had been obliged to renounce them, but at the same time it had created monachism as a sort of hot-house in which these virtues were preserved under the zealous care of a rigorous asceticism. Julian pretended to remodel the work of Christianity by means of polytheism, on which he wished to impose the duty of rendering society moral.

By copious extracts from Julian's writings, as well as by constant references to his acts, Signor Negri reveals an important fact overlooked by too many historians, namely, that Julian, although a Pagan in ritual, was essentially a Christian in ethics. On assuming the imperial purple, Julian, instead of indulging in wholesale murder after the fashion of his Christian predecessors, shows remarkable clemency to his deadliest foes. His first act after being hailed as Augustus by the legions is to save his enemies, the friends of Constantius, from the fury of the soldiery. "Leave here, and go where thou wilt in safety," are the Christ-like words of this Pagan emperor. Again, in his manifesto to the riotous inhabitants of Bostra, Julian is obviously animated by the true spirit of Christian ethics:

Agree among yourselves, and let no one commit violence or injustice. . . . We must persuade and instruct men by means of reason, not with blows or violence or by tormenting the body. Now, as in times past, I exhort all those who follow the teachings of true piety not to do any hurt to the crowd of the Galileans, not to insult them, and not to attack them violently. We should not hate but compassionate those who act perversely in matters of supreme importance; because the greatest good is piety, and impiety the greatest evil.

It is to be regretted that Signor Negri should have cited as Julian's the epistles to Iamblichus and certain other letters of more than doubtful authenticity; but he has undoubtedly rendered a real service to historical truth by calling attention to the exalted sentiments contained in the admittedly genuine writings of the emperor, and incidentally to the need of a new and carefully edited translation of all Julian's letters and discourses.

Another point of interest well brought out by Signor Negri is that though Julian failed to christianise Paganism, Christianity itself had already been paganised to a very large extent by Origen and his followers. In an abstruse but exceedingly interesting chapter on Neo-Platonism it is advanced that this system of philosophy was the common origin both of the superstitious polytheism of Julian and of the mystical dogmatism of Athanasius. The stimulating suggestions thrown out by Signor Negri in the course of his patient and searching investigation of the rival philosophies current in the fourth century render his work of real value to all interested in the early history of the Church as well as to those who wish to understand the mental attitude of his hero.

He has little difficulty in proving that the supposed last words of Julian: "Thou hast conquered, O Galilean," are an ecclesiastical fiction invented some centuries after the emperor's death, and he seems also to favour the theory that the fatal javelin was thrown by a Roman Christian and not by a Persian. But though not actually pronounced, the words attributed to Julian may well have been in his mind at the last moment, for before he left Antioch he realised that his effort had failed utterly. And its failure arose, according to Signor Negri, because Julian endeavoured to adapt society to his ideals of faith and conduct, whereas Christianity succeeded, according to the same authority, because it adapted its faith and moral code to the needs of the society of the time.

Of the merits of the translation some opinion can be formed by the extracts already given; and, though some obscurities may be due to the author, the translator shows a disposition, regrettable in what is intended to be a popular work, to employ unfamiliar and borrowed words where simpler terms might with advantage have been used.

SUFFERING'S JOURNEY

Suffering's Journey on the Earth. By CARMEN SYLVA, Queen of Roumania. Translated from "Leidens Erdengang," by MARGARET NASH. (Jarrold, 3s. 6d.)

CARMEN SYLVA has long been known in this country as an imaginative writer, and, though it cannot be said that as a poet she ranks high with the critical, she has probably a larger number of admirers than the critical suppose. Other writers of the same order have had the same fortune, but with less desert. There is no artificiality, no factory work, in the literary productions of the Queen of Roumania. Though the stream that flows from her pen may bring no considerable amount of poetic treasure, it resembles the best in welling spontaneously from a natural fountain, and, were it not allowed so free a course but put under the guidance of art, its yield of thought, of fancy, of feeling, would seem more abundant, and better too. Though Carmen Sylva may be appreciative of art in others, she does not seem to know the use of it for her own work, if "work" it should be called. For reading her is less like perusing a written composition than listening to an imaginative child pouring forth fancies unrestrained and unexamined, as children will do by firelight. It is delightful hearing, though we smile from time to time at some breathless tumble from too lofty a flight, or at some pretty extravagance which has no unlikelihood for the narrator; and we suppose it is because the writings of Carmen Sylva retain so much of this childlike romance and tender feeling that they please the simple-minded more than does many a better-made article. Of this book, so clumsily called in English "Suffering's Journey on Earth," we can only speak from the version before us, which is very evidently not a good translation. It is an apologue such as the "Pilgrim's Progress" might suggest, telling of how Suffering came upon the earth, and what part it plays for good and harm in the world of mankind. For this purpose it is personified, as also is its parentage. To carry the story on, Life, Love, Happiness, Strife, Patience, Despair, Work, Pain, Death (which is not a complete list), are personified too; and it is the part that Suffering plays, as she encounters now one and now another of its personages on her way through the world, that makes the story. Now, any one with half the imagination of Carmen Sylva can see that this is a really great theme; less than half, however, would have shown her more clearly than the whole that great constructive ability as well as fancy was necessary to do justice to it. From the architectural point of view the highest genius would be tasked to treat it in the "grand manner;" and though the simplicity of John Bunyan would have made perfect work of it in another style, a world of patient skill lay hidden in Bunyan's simplicity. Of that subordinate but necessary quality Carmen Sylva could bring to her theme no adequate supply; and the consequence is that in point of construction her apologue of Suffering is too often weak, uncertain, and even baffling. It is not a matter that her imagination could sufficiently attend to. But even here the fault may be the translator's: for certainly in other respects the work suffers, not for want of literary sympathy on the part of Miss Nash, but for want of literary training and efficiency. The wrong word is too frequent, and often vexatiously damaging. Passages that are dismally prosaic are yet plainly and easily capable of taking the more appropriate diction in English which we cannot doubt they had in the original. But, while these passages blot the book very distinctly, they occur at considerable intervals after the opening chapters are past, while elsewhere the translator's English is lifted into a strain of simple but most effective eloquence by heartfelt sympathy with the author's meaning and intention. The most admirable pages, and those that appeal most strongly to the feeling and conscience of Everyman, relate the story of "The Hermit," which is remarkably dramatic and not less remarkable for its even simplicity. The chapter entitled "Lottie" is of nearly equal merit. The personification of Patience is so finely conceived that that it is unlikely to be forgotten; Work is almost as impressive a figure, and Death is more original than either. Scores of passages—arresting, some by their prettiness, and some by their thought—are scattered through the book, which, with all its faults in this translation, should be read.

A MIGHTY HUNTER

Outdoor Pastimes of an American Hunter. By THEODORE ROOSEVELT. (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.)

THE American hunter, the author of this volume, is no less a personage than the President of the United States of America. Among former works he has published perhaps "The Strenuous Life" is the best known, and certainly this, his last book, might be truly called "The Strenuous Hunter."

Here we have a man simply as a gallant and generous sportsman, the fact of his high position in the world never intruding in the smallest degree. From beginning to end of his book the author treats of the pursuit and capture of purely wild animals, whether chased by hounds, or stalked and shot by rifle. His pages are alive with healthy incident and an observant criticism of birds and beasts, together with an admirably expressed appreciation of the wild and beautiful districts he visited in search of sport.

From a British point of view this work is enhanced by being written in good readable English, such as any educated gentleman would wish to express himself in were he to set down his experiences in whatever form of sport he followed, though but few authors possess so direct and explanatory a style of writing as does Mr. Roosevelt, and 'one, too, that entirely dispenses with the slangy and high-falutin words and sentences so common in American journalism.

The most interesting quarry hunted by Mr. Roosevelt, and the one that, it is evident, attracts him more than others, is the cougar. This fierce beast, a huge cat in appearance, is from seven to eight feet in length from nose to tip of tail and weighs from about one hundred and fifty to over two hundred pounds, the largest male cougar killed by the author scaling two hundred and twenty-seven pounds. The cougar is found and chased by large high-couraged hounds, about a dozen being employed for the purpose, against which even a wolf cannot make a fight. The duty of these hounds is to bring the cougar to bay or to put it up a tree, and then to stay with the animal until the hunters come up. Sometimes Mr. Roosevelt has known a cougar remain up a tree for several hours before he was able to find his hounds that had treed it and were baying at the foot of the tree; and so keen and well-trained are these hounds that they will drive a cougar up a tree overnight and be found in the morning still keeping guard over their prisoner.

Of the cougar the author writes:

No American beast has ever been the subject of so much loose writing or of such wild fables.

Even its name is unsettled. In the Eastern States it is usually called Panther or Painter; in the Western States, Mountain Lion, or towards the South, Mexican Lion.

The Spanish speaking people usually call it simply Lion.

The Cougar is shy and elusive to an extraordinary degree, very cowardly and yet bloodthirsty and ferocious. The average writer, and, for the matter of that, the average hunter, where Cougars are scarce, know little or nothing of them. Fables aside, the Cougar is a very interesting creature. It is found from the cold, desolate plains of Patagonia to the north of the Canadian line, and lives alike among the snow-clad peaks of the Andes and in the steaming forests of the Amazon.

Deer are the customary prey, it appears, of the cougar, and it is also a dreaded enemy of sheep, calves, and especially colts, and a big male will even kill a full-grown horse or a cow, a moose or a wapiti. The illustrations that accompany the chapters on cougar-hunting are excellent, as they are reproduced from photographs taken of these animals when actually in touch with the hounds, and in some cases as they crouch snarling on the branch of a tree just out of reach of a dog's teeth. When in the open, brought to bay and killed by the hounds, a cougar leaves many a reminiscence of the struggle in the form of deep bites, and cuts from his claws, and in the illustration called "After the Fight" we have a photograph of hounds licking their wounds and resting after a battle with a cougar.

In "A Colorado Bear Hunt" the author gives a very graphic description of his adventures in tracking bears with hounds, the photographs of bears treed high up in the air being particularly interesting. Of bears we read:

Frequently I have been able to watch bears for some time while myself unobserved. With other game I have very often done this within close range, not wishing to kill creatures needlessly, or without a good object; but with bears my experience has been that chances to secure them come so seldom as to make it distinctly worth while improving any that do come. I have not spent much time watching any bear unless he was in a place where I could not get at him, or else was so close at hand that I was not afraid of his getting away.

On one occasion the bear was hard at work digging up a squirrel on the side of a pine-clad hill, and while at this he looked rather like a big Badger. On two other occasions the bear was fussing round a carcass preparatory to burying it. I was very close, and it was extremely interesting to note the grotesque, half-human movements and giant awkward strength of the great beast. He would twist the carcass round with the utmost ease, sometimes taking it in his teeth and dragging it, at other times grasping it in his fore-paws and half lifting, half shoving it. Once the bear lost his grip and rolled over, and he then struck the carcass a savage whack, just as a pettish child will strike a table against which it has knocked itself.

At another time I watched a black bear getting his breakfast under stumps and stones. He was very active turning a stone or log over, and then thrusting his muzzle into the empty space to gobble up the small creatures below before they recovered from the sudden inflow of light. From under one log he turned out a chipmunk squirrel, and danced hither and thither with even more agility than awkwardness, slapping at the chipmunk with his paw while it zigzagged about, until finally he scooped it into his mouth.

We turn from bear-hunting to the coursing of wolves, the stalking of deer and wapiti, and to incidental accounts of the chasing on horseback, on foot, and with and without hounds, of various other animals; all described in a very vivid and pleasant manner by the author, with an undercurrent of natural history, and frequent tributes to the bravery of his guides and hunters, his horses and dogs, not omitting some of the objects of pursuit.

As an example of the above remarks, here is an instance of the author's appreciation of a companion, whose portrait he gives by river-side, and who is evidently a grand old hunter and sportsman. The quotation is from the dedication of Mr. Roosevelt's book and is addressed to John Burroughs, otherwise Oom John. It runs:

DEAR OOM JOHN,—Every lover of outdoor life must feel a sense of affectionate obligation to you. Your writings appeal to all who care for the life of the woods and the fields, whether their tastes keep them in the homely, pleasant farm country or lead them into the wilderness. It is a good thing for our people that you have lived; and surely no man can wish to have more said of him.

A fascinating chapter in Mr. Roosevelt's work is headed "Wilderness Reserves." These reserves consist of vast tracts of wild country, containing in some cases even small towns and villages, in which large game, such as bears, deer, buffalo and elk, are rigorously protected.

On the subject of protecting game by means of these reserves Mr. Roosevelt writes with much force; we will quote him shortly:

The most striking and melancholy feature in connection with American big game is the rapidity with which it has vanished.

At the present moment the great herds of caribou are being butchered as in the past the great herds of bison and wapiti have been butchered. Every believer in manliness, and therefore in manly sport, and every lover of nature, every man who appreciates the majesty and beauty of the wilderness and of wild life should join hands with the far-sighted men who wish to preserve our material resources, in the effort to keep our forests and our game beasts, game birds and game fish—and, indeed, all the living creatures of prairie and woodland and sea-shore—from wanton destruction.

That the existence of reserves intended for the protection of animals from extinction is fully justified by results may be gathered from the photographs given in Mr. Roosevelt's book, for we therein see antelopes, bears, deer and other animals, placidly feeding and parading close to houses and villages, and even a wild, untamed grizzly bear, in one picture, being fed by a cook at his kitchen door!

The book before us concludes with a list and clever criticism of all the better known works on big game shooting. The final, and by no means least interesting, chapter is entitled "At Home," which describes the author's country house and its surroundings, with capital drawings and descriptions of the different tame animals he and his children find so much delight in taking kindly care of.

P.

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT

The Law of International Copyright. With special Sections on the Colonies and the United States of America. By WILLIAM BRIGGS, LL.D., etc. (Stevens & Haynes, 16s.)

DR. WILLIAM BRIGGS is justified in describing this work, as he does in the Preface, as "the first work in English on the Law of International Copyright." Some of the textbook writers, more particularly Mr. Easton in the fourth edition of "Copinger on Copyright," have touched upon this branch more or less fully and have collected most of the Conventions, Treaties and Statutes which constitute its corpus; but it has been reserved for Dr. Briggs to be the first to devote an adequate treatise to an exposition of the whole subject. That he has collected a mass of information in his 816 pages goes without saying, and he has certainly made a valuable contribution to the literature of the question. It may, however, be doubted whether he has chosen his time of publication very wisely in view of the fact that both England and America are contemplating new codes, which will probably, in many respects, modify the existing law both at home and abroad.

The book covers a wide field; it treats the subject historically and theoretically; it deals with the law as it stands, and with the law as, in the author's view, it ought to stand, and it may be safely premised that the most exacting student will find plenty of material in these pages. This said, it must be confessed that Dr. Briggs is a little confusing in his arrangement. His distinction between laws past, present and future is not always perfectly clear, and we fear that the inquiring layman, endeavouring to deduce from this volume his exact rights and duties, might find himself very considerably perplexed. Not that it is fair to lay the whole blame for this state of things upon the shoulders of the author, for the matter is one which is barely susceptible of lucid treatment, full of perplexities, anachronisms and absurdities. Some of the countries not signatory to the Berne Convention rest their international relations upon treaties and enactments which really belong, in many cases, to ancient history, and it is no doubt necessary to go into the beginnings of International Law in order to render the position intelligible. But, if so, this should be done pro hac vice and not fundamentally.

The Berne Convention is so paramount in its operation, affecting, as it does, not only Union countries, but countries outside the Union, when works of their authors are first published within the Union, that we think it would have been wiser to have treated it as fundamental rather than subsidiary to the domestic laws. To consider, for instance, the law of Great Britain as though the Berne Convention did not exist is surely a work of supererogation, if it is not actually misleading. We find, for example, the English rule as to formalities confused by a consideration of those required before the Act of 1886 and the Order in Council thereunder made the Berne Convention operative, and those (if any) necessary after that drastic change. Dr. Briggs, for instance, labours to show that residence within the British dominions has never been dispensed with in the case of aliens, and questions the finding of the English law officers in the opinion communicated to the United States in 1891; but, whatever may have been the case before the Berne Convention, since it became law, and since, too, it became part and parcel of the law of England—which the author himself admits on page 508—it is undoubtedly the fact that residence on British territory has not been a necessary condition to British copyright, and it seems a pity that rules which obtained under the old International Copyright Acts should be discussed as though they were operative to-day, and not relegated to their true position in a historical retrospect.

A good point is taken in the chapter on "The Conflict of Jurisdictions and of Laws"—that "a country can only place duties upon its own public;" and we wish that all alien copyright reformers would accept the dictum in its entirety. But, unluckily, this is far from being the case. The United States, for instance, heedless of the rules which custom has decreed shall govern international relations, imposes, as well as its own onerous conditions in the United States, duties upon aliens in their own countries and therefore, incidentally, requires British authors to understand American law—a somewhat large order.

It is inevitable in a work of these dimension that omissions and errata should occur, and it may be useful to point out a few which might be corrected. On page 161 Bolivia and Belgium should be added to the countries embraced in the Convention of Monte Video, and similarly on page 242 they should be given as afterwards subscribing to it with France, Spain and Italy. Again, on page 277, note 1, Bolivia is given as not having ratified the Monte Video Convention, whereas it did so on November 5, 1903. Deposit in England is mentioned on page 313, note 3, as an obligation attaching to the "author"; the word should obviously be "publisher"—who alone is liable. Sweden, as well as Norway, has not accepted the Additional Act of Paris, and should be added on pages 508 and 509, and the statement on page 517, as to foreign authors outside the Union and English copyright, ignores the Additional Act which makes nationality immaterial and requires only first publication in a Unionist country to give protection throughout the Union. This, indeed, seems to be clearly admitted by the author's own conclusion on page 521. By an obvious slip Registration and Deposit are given on page 525 as formalities required by English law "before the claim to copyright can be enforced." The deposit of copies has, of course, nothing whatever to do with copyright; it is, as we have already said, merely an obligation on the publisher, and a very unfair obligation, too, a survival of the Dark Ages and the Imprimatur. China, Norway, and practically Japan should be added to the list of countries proclaimed by the United States under the Chace Act on pages 645 and 659. It may, again, be queried whether the Chace Act affects the law as to the unpublished works of aliens, as is assumed on page 646. The common law rights in such works are not derived from, nor dependent upon, the Statute, but appear to be of universal application, and not limited to citizens of proclaimed countries. To the Colonies which have their own copyright laws (page 594) should be added Jamaica, Malta, Sierra Leone, Straits Settlements, Transvaal, and Trinidad.

Dr. Briggs has attempted a difficult task, and deserves recognition as a pioneer in what is practically new country. We do not doubt that in future editions of the work it will prove practicable to remove some of the defects to which we have called attention, and correct some of the errors, which were, in many cases, inevitable. The work represents an enormous amount of painstaking labour.

W. MORRIS COLLES.

RONCEVAL

O WOE's me, ye people,
And woe, brave warriors all,
For the flower of all princes
Dead on Ronceval.

There lie many stark fighters
That with Roland rode,— Rinaldo of the White Thorn,
Ogier and Galdebode.

And Roland, ah Roland,
That was first of them all,
Lieth among his captains
On red Ronceval.

Queens weep for Roland,—
Kings go heavily:
There was none in all Christendom
Better loved than he ;

Prince of all courtesy,
Very true and kind,—
Tears are in the dwellings
Of Kaiser and hind.

For herdsmen have hearkened,
Keeping sheep on the hill,
To a sound like the wind's crying,—
Yet all winds are still.

It is the horn of Roland
That shall never more call,
That mourneth for slain armies
On red Ronceval.

C. FOX SMITH.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE EARLIEST MODERN NOVELIST

THE general difference between the literature of the age of Elizabeth, and the literature of the reign of Louis XIV., is that the one smacks of the tavern and the other has an air of the drawing-room. In the blue chamber of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, France, in the seventeenth century, educated itself. What the ladies of the period there learned from the men of letters in one department of literature, they quickly began to practise in another. The Précieuses were not the affected creatures that Molière portrayed. One of them, Mme. de Sévigné, excelled all writers in the form of literature which she adopted; another, Mme. de La Fayette, created the novel of manners.

In "La Princesse de Clèves" the first of modern novelists related the story of her own strange love-affair. She was a brilliant woman of the Court, with a cast of mind resembling somewhat that of Jane Austen. Good sense, a certain staidness of soul, and a vivacity which, tempered by keen insight, turned rather to ironic raillery, were some of the elements of her nature. But what distinguishes her is a veiled movement of emotion, which enables us to divine in the depths of her heart the hidden suffering which was, perhaps, the source of her genius. At the age of twenty-two she was married to M. de La Fayette, a man who adored her, but failed to win her affection. Three years afterwards she fell in love with La Rochefoucauld. She separated from her husband, but did not become one of the mil e tre in the list of Don Juan's conquests. At a reading of the famous "Maximes," in the house of a common friend, she learned the real character of the man. The more guarded her manner became, the deeper grew his passion. It transformed his nature, enduing him with the strange virtue of constancy. In after years, when she, a woman no longer young, and he, an old man, were both infirm and nearly dying, they at last came together in a tender and rather melancholy friendship, which endured until death. The manner in which they lightened each other's troubles is described by Mme. de Sévigné. Sometimes, as they sat together in Mme. de La Fayette's garden on a summer evening, the conversation was so sad that, as the most vivacious of letter-writers told her daughter, there seemed nothing else to do but to bury oneself. In lighter moods, they refined on the analysis of feeling in the sentimental romances of the age. Mme. de La Fayette contemned these works as much as La Rochefoucauld relished them, but to entertain him she collaborated in the composition of a tale in the same manner. "Zayde," as it was entitled, is now a faded, colourless thing, but it took the town in 1670. Two years afterwards Mme. de La Fayette indulged her own tastes in the composition of "La Princesse de Clèves," a novel of manners only some two hundred pages in length.

One curious result of the success of Molière's Les Précieuses Ridicules was to make one woman, at least, anxious to avoid being charged with the crime of having written a masterpiece. One of her disingenuous disclaimers contains a happy piece of criticism :

I am flattered [she wrote to a friend] by the suspicion that I am the writer of the work. Were I sure that the author would never claim it, I should be glad to accept it as mine. . . . It is a perfect imitation of the society at the Court, and of the way of life there. A novel, however, it is not, but only a book of memoirs; this, I understand, was the title, but it has been changed.

The observation is an illuminating one. The art of modern novel-writing is thus derived from the French art of memoir-writing. Instead of relating the incidents of her life in the manner of Saint-Simon, Mme. de La Fayette cast them into the form of a romance. An historical colouring is pretended as a slight disguise: but the society depicted is the society of the early days of Louis XIV. :

Magnificence and gallantry have never appeared in France with so much brilliance as in the last years of the reign of Henri II. . . . Ambition and love were the soul of this Court, and engaged equally the men and the women. There were so many interests and so many cabals, in which the ladies played an important part, that sentiment was always mingled with politics and politics with sentiment. No one was tranquil or indifferent; all were engaged in pleasing and serving, in injuring others and advancing themselves. Boredom and idleness were unknown; pleasures or intrigues occupied everybody.

One of the most difficult branches of politics was marriage, as the Prince de Clèves found when he fell in love with Mlle. de Chartres. But in spite of this, and in spite, too, of the fact that he failed to win the girl's heart, he succeeded in making her his wife. In changing her name, Mlle. de Chartres did not change her feelings, and, as there ever remained in her something desirable but not to be attained, M. de Clèves did not cease to be an unquiet lover when he became a husband. Jealousy had no part in his trouble: never was husband so far from feeling it, never was wife so far from exciting it. So innocent was she that when at last the Duc de Nemours discovered that he had the power to move her, she was insensible of danger.

Thus far the story is pleasant enough, but scarcely remarkable for dramatic power. Its charm lies in the grace and simplicity of the style; in the feminine subtlety with which gradations of sentiment are delineated; and, above all, in the picture of the refinement of manners. The personages, as Taine remarks, are presented to the public by Mme. de La Fayette as her friends would have been presented by her to the guests in her drawing-room. The emotions are as subdued as the manner in which they are expressed; they reveal themselves in under-statements and scarcely perceptible modulations in the sober, courtly phrase. But what audacity of conception, what power of seeing into the winding recesses of the heart, are concealed under the polished form of the sentences! The action of the story becomes rapid and powerful as soon as Mme. de Clèves finds that one man has gained her esteem, and another her love. She is a very young girl, with neither parent nor friend to help and counsel her. Recognising her own weakness and inexperience, she determines to leave the court. Her husband, however, dismays her by refusing her request as an unreasonable whim. He is the man whom she honours, so she boldly and candidly confides in him:

"Well," she said, casting herself at his knees, "I am about to make an avowal which no wife has ever made to her husband. The innocence of my conduct and of my intentions gives me strength to do so. It is true I have reasons to withdraw from the Court. I wish to avoid the perils in which persons of my age sometimes find themselves. I have shown no signs of weakness, nor do I fear that I shall show any, if you will grant me the liberty to retire from town. I beg your pardon if I have some feelings which displease you; at least I shall never displease you by my actions. Think of what friendship and esteem one must have for one's husband to do what I now am doing. Help me, pity me, and love me still if you can. . . ."

"Have pity on me, madam," he said. ". . . You appear to me more worthy of honour and admiration than ever a woman of Society has been, but I find myself the most unhappy man that ever lived."

Human nature cannot maintain itself at this level. M. de Clèves gradually grows embittered against his unknown rival, and his jealousy turns into cold, sullen fury when, through the unchivalrous advances made by M. de Nemours, he is led unjustly to suspect his wife. He frets himself into a fever and dies. There then ensues a strange struggle between Mme. de Clèves and the Duc de Nemours. The libertine prevails upon her to admit that, at least, she returns his regard:

Mme. de Clèves yielded for the first time to the inclination which she had for M. de Nemours, and looking at him with eyes full of sweetness and charm, said: "I shall not tell you that I have not seen the attachment which you have for me. Perhaps you would not believe me if I did. I confess then not only that I have seen it, but that I have seen it in just such a manner as you may wish it to appear to me."

But there still remains in her something invincible even by him—her sense of self-respect and her distrust in his constancy. She is now a woman versed in the bitter knowledge of her world. Rejecting his offer of marriage, she retires from the court and lives quietly and rather sadly until in the course of years her passion is extinguished and her mind assured.

That is the end of the first novel in the modern manner, which, as an exquisite study of the heart of a remarkable woman, has never been surpassed. And what an interest it derives from that other story of the wistful friendship between Mme. de Clèves and M. de Nemours in their sickness and old age!

EDWARD WRIGHT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "Around an Old Catalogue," by Cloudesley Brereton.]

FICTION

Rose at Honeypot. By MARY E. MANN. (Methuen, 6s.)

IN one or two novels—"The Patten Experiment," for instance, and "The Parish Nurse"—Mrs. Mann has shown us what she thinks of the poor in the country, that "peasant" on whom literature, rebounding from one convention to another, has lavished so much idealism, sympathy and admiration. Arcadia, to Mrs. Mann, is a country whose inhabitants are dirty, vicious, ignorant, stupid and ungrateful. And there is a great deal of truth, as no one will deny, in her pictures. There is not the whole truth. We are of opinion that she exaggerates, that she sees one side only, that she passes over, unnoticed or unmentioned, much goodness, patience and quiet heroism. Still, in days when the cry of "Back to the Land" is raised, it is no bad thing to let people see that to "eat and sleep with the earth" is not to have solved all life's troubles nor to have become possessed of a ready-made nobility of character. Rose Abra, the young and pretty wife of a Naval Lieutenant, chose to spend the last months of her husband's three years' cruise as lodger in a Norfolk cottage. The tenant of the cottage was a drunken ruffian, his wife a whining slut, his son a little fiend of cruelty. All the bad points of the Jaggerd family would occupy more space than we can devote to the book. But there was another lodger, a young gamekeeper of (very nearly) gentle birth and a great soul: and the ostensible plot of Mrs. Mann's book is the love-story of Lawrence Ferraday and Rose Abra, with its melancholy but serenely beautiful close. The book is (need we say it?) well written—there are many things we should like to quote as examples of good work—well composed and continuously interesting.

The Spoilers. By EDWIN PUGH. (Newnes, 6s.)

HAVING read about half Mr. Pugh's book just before going to bed, we passed a wretched night; before the next day was out, we had read the rest, and slept soundly. For, if he tells us exactly how the next burglar will enter our house, he tells us later by how simple and cheap a contrivance we can be sure that we hear him when he does. Indeed, we are not sure that so thorough a knowledge of burglars and their ways must not be held to imply a mis-spent youth. Surely, practical experience alone— But there is a Law of Libel, and we must hold our hand; hastening to assure Mr. Pugh that, if he forces us to suspect him of having been a burglar, he forces us also to acknowledge him a very able novelist. His story suggests in some ways "Oliver Twist." Here is Bill Sikes (Chick Marketer); here is Nancy (Judith), and here is Fagin (Bill Fix). But here, emphatically, is not Oliver. Mr. Pugh has a boy, indeed—Deuce Marketer, by name; but he is such a real boy, such an absolute boy, so full of actuality and life and "the real thing," that we must apologise for mentioning him in the same breath with that bloodless little prig, Oliver. Perhaps Miss Porch and Mr. Gandy are a little Dickensy: but they are genuine enough, and fill a necessary place in a story that has, turn and turn about, thrilled us with dread and pity, and set us laughing aloud with its natural, inevitable humour. "The Spoilers" is a capital book.

Hugo. By ARNOLD BENNETT. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

MR. BENNETT has surpassed himself in his latest fantasia on modern themes—"Hugo." Two sham deaths, an interrupted suicide, a simple suicide, two attempted murders, a rescue from a tomb, a gramophone's record of a dying man's speech—such is nostri farrago libelli. The salt of Mr. Bennett's melodramas lies in the fact that his hero and his villain (however wild their actions may be, and they are as wild as ingenuity can imagine) never talk fustian, they utter common sense: they delight in Johnson, they quote Montaigne. And this gives to their absurd adventures an air of probability that is almost ludicrous. That is Mr. Bennett's cleverest artifice. He never makes an attempt to modify or explain: he piles improbability upon improbability with calm assurance, and mortars it all together with clever little facts and truths in a style which is always restrained and neat, and by its very lack of ornaments convincing. Nothing could equal the speed with which the story pursues its intricate way. From the moment when Hugo wakes, in the domed room that crowns his great establishment in Sloane Street, and looks out over London and sees the two long lines of his three thousand hands converge and disappear into Hugo's—to the last splendid moment when Louis, his half-brother and whole enemy, reels from out the tomb in the Brompton Cemetery, thwarted in his madman's scheme to bury Hugo's love alive, there is no pause or hindrance in the swift course of the melodrama. We notice with interest that Mr. Bennett has expressed his views upon the effect of elections upon literature in an article of some feeling—natural feeling: and he laments the fate of the bookseller who through their influence must go "without capers to his mutton." This proves Mr. Bennett's intention in publishing, during this week, to be benevolent—and not, as we first thought, audacious. He does not wish to distract all interest from the elections, but to do all in his power to alleviate the lot of the oppressed and caperless. We wish him success.

The Interpreters. By MARGARETTA BYRDE. (Unwin, 6s.)

THE interest of this story is well sustained from the first page to the last. We see Rhoda depart across the sea on her mission of vengeance, and then we settle down to follow the fortunes of Arthur Dyne and Agnes Vandeleur, quite sure that the murder, which Rhoda suspects and which apparently can never concern the hero and heroine, will some day be a thread in the yarn of their lives. But for a long while it is kept out of sight, and the quiet scenes of life in a country town chronicle the love-affairs, the friendships and the fads of a little set of people, pleasant and unpleasant, but all unaffectedly and easily described. The author loves Elena, the saintly invalid; but the reader, with the notorious perversity of readers, will hurry past her to get to Mrs. Lyon Grindall with her following of "girls," her Browning Society, her quotations and her determination "to do a little good to every one." She says of herself that she lives in the Beatitudes, and when her pupils annoy her she prays for them aloud; so no one can feel surprised when she first repudiates her mother and then prevents her from making a dying confession of supreme importance to others. Lady Octavia, the exponent of the Higher thought, is an amusing crank, and not, like Mrs. Lyon Grindall, a hypocrite. Incidentally we hear of a Christian Scientist who lectured to a room full of people and gave most of them the measles. In fact, the pleasant characters in this novel are all successfully pleasant and sensible, the others are entertaining, and Reuben Latta, the leading villain, is so human and half-hearted in his villainy that we rather like him.

The Beauty Shop. By DANIEL WOODROFFE. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

"THE Beauty Shop" is not a pleasant book. From beginning to end it tastes nasty. There is but one character in it with the ordinary right feelings of a gentleman, and he is so feebly sketched by the author that he appears a crank when he is meant to be a strong man. For the rest, they are of modern Society, as the Society novelist loves to paint it—vicious, irresponsible, merely animal in their appetites, and below the animals in that conscious service of their appetites which is the main business of their lives. The chief character is a mongrel foreign blackmailer, and to Mr. Woodroffe's credit it must be said that the secret of his being a blackmailer is very fairly well kept to the end. The heroine is a girl who deliberately marries him for his money while she loves another man, and deserves, therefore, all she gets. The book is not ill-written. The author, we suspect, has studied French models—not to the best purpose. The story, no doubt, was written "with a good purpose." The worst of it is that such stories never do any good. They gratify the unwholesome curiosity of people who lack the sense to see the dulness and stupidity of such topics as this.

The Arrow of the North. By R. H. FOSTER. (Long, 6s.)

WE seem to remember a recent playful suggestion on the part of a contemporary that reviews might be labelled with the time-honoured  $\alpha$ ,  $\beta$ ,  $\gamma$ , of the University class-lists in order to extend the qualifying range of the limited stock of adjectives at the reviewer's disposal. Or how would it be (in view of the subtle variations of merit to be found in every department of literature) to employ carefully graduated colour-washes? Each subject might have its own colour, while the key to the values of the various tints would, of course, appear on the cover. Apart from the delicate precision thus attainable, how charmingly varied would be the appearance of the printed page! Suppose historical romances, for example, were to range from crimson through scarlet to palest pink. One might then confer the scarlet on, say, something by Mr. Hewlett, while this little notice of Mr. R. H. Foster's new story might appear upon a quiet pink or an unassuming light red ground. We leave the suggestion to our readers' fancy. At any rate, Mr. Foster's prose work is always good, as far as it goes, and this tale of his well-loved Northumbria in the days of the seventh and eighth Henries is fully representative. He can never be said quite to lose himself in his period; but he looks back upon it with some discernment, and, resting upon the sound belief that human nature varies little from age to age, he peoples his tales with actual and sober dramatis personæ well furnished with accurate historical properties and accoutrements. As a boy of twelve, his hero helps to repel the Scottish assault upon Norham Castle in 1597. Later he tumbles into love with a lass on the other side of the border, and, in spite of the schemes of a jealous beauty on his own side and the troubles incidental to those rough times, he survives to win his lady love and to slay his rival in single combat on Flodden Hill. Perhaps, however, the book wins its chief effect by virtue of its "historical geography." Mr. Foster reconstructs a partly vanished countryside with a skill and imagination which alone make his story well worth reading. The preliminaries to the tragedy of Flodden, too, seem to us particularly well described.

THE DRAMA

"LES AFFAIRES SONT LES AFFAIRES" AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

IT is easy in writing of matters theatrical to indulge in careless use of the superlative. Too much criticism nowadays consists in indiscriminate labelling of plays and acting as "great," "epoch-making" and "unsurpassed," rather than in any reasonable or reasoned attempt to consider the worth of the work of the playwright or the player. Thus it comes about that, seeing M. de Féraudy as Isidore Lechat after having praised Mr. Tree to the skies for his Isidore Izard, the critics are at a loss how to describe the French actor's performance. If only they kept the word "great" and the word "masterpiece" wrapped up in cotton wool for occasional use, they would now be able to bring those treasures forth to the light of day. For M. de Féraudy's performance is a triumph. It is the triumph of an artist over the material given him; it is the triumph of a personality, it is the triumph of a man.

That one should be able to write thus two days after having seen the performance is a proof of its virility. There is little or no recollection of the play, there is but dim remembrance of the other characters in the drama. The mind cannot go beyond this colossal figure of Mammon in the flesh, of this human Mint. But we do not owe this powerful impression to the author, we owe it to the actor.

The production of Les Affaires sont Les Affaires is perhaps the best exposé of the viciousness of adaptation that could have been afforded us. Whereas Lechat is a comprehensible character (apart now from considerations of acting), Izard was a stage figure, a finicking eccentric, who could no more have dominated the world of finance than could his meek-mannered wife; whereas the daughter is in the French play a clever character-study, in the adaptation she became a mere lay figure; whereas, in fine, Les Affaires sont Les Affaires is a real attempt on the part of the dramatist to express a thought, to limn a portrait from life, Business is Business was a piece of theatricality built to suit a personality, and very badly built at that.

The French play is not a great work of art. But it is the next best thing: it is an honest attempt at great work. That in M. de Féraudy the author found the ideal exponent of his financier is one of those turns of fortune's wheel for which the playgoer has to be thankful.

FINE ART

THE ARTS AND CRAFTS AND ORGANISATION

THERE is now being held at the Grafton Galleries the triennial celebration of the Arts and Crafts Exhibition Society, a society which has undoubtedly in a large measure fulfilled what William Morris modestly explained were the objects of its foundation: "to give those artists in the employ of commercial organisers an opportunity of working more directly for the public, and to win for them that applause and sympathy of their brother artists which every good workman naturally desires." This was said at a lecture delivered in Liverpool in the foundation year of this "small and unpretentious" society, 1888. Its work since then has undoubtedly helped to encourage and foster a true appreciation of the meaning of "Craft" as opposed to "Manufacture"; the one synonymous with all that is virile, personal and responsible, the other—with that irony which the derivation of a word often supplies—but the monotonous and lifeless duplication of a machine.

The exhibitions have done more than this. They have made the Crafts a fashion amongst a section of the younger generation of artists, who might otherwise have swelled the ranks of the picture-makers; they have weaned the public from the vulgar notion that to work in wood, iron and the precious metals is less honourable than to palter with more plastic materials; they have, in fact, sown an idea broadcast which is bringing forth some fruit and a plentiful crop of unmaturing buds. With the growth of the idea, we have had more thought and consideration given to the educational aspect of the question. The facilities for being trained in the various arts and crafts have been increased with the development and readjustment of our technical schools. And, although these are very far from being perfect, inasmuch as there is a lack of co-ordination and consistency in the methods and standards which obtain, all that has been done and is being done originated in the Arts and Crafts revival of the 'eighties and has been kept alive since then by the formation of various guilds and the increasing number of their exhibitions.

It may be well here to ask ourselves, before going further, what is the net result so far of the last twenty years of endeavour? The thing which is most apparent is the enormous increase in the number of independent craftsmen, and the absence, hitherto, of any standard of taste as a restraining influence on personal caprice. It has been said that "the tendency is for art to become more and more individualistic and therefore to open up more and more scope for individual expression"; but the danger of accepting such a tendency as a principle on which to work is only now realised to be a false hypothesis. The cult of "New Art" has ramped through its destructive course. It has attempted to throw tradition to the winds and build anew on individual caprice. It has performed prodigious feats of nimbleness in the application of natural forms to construction and abnormal forms to design. But it has burnt itself out under the forced draught of its own energy. Extravagance can only be excelled by extravagance, and there must inevitably come a day when such methods must cry a halt. New Art has served its purpose: to a great extent it had its birth in a reaction against the lethargy of interest which existed in our applied arts. It has excited interest where there was none, and perhaps has brought home to the craftsman, as nothing else could, the wisdom of using "the steadying influence of the old examples, with nature always at hand to verify our references," as Mr. Walter Crane has aptly expressed it. What is principally noteworthy in the present exhibition, as compared with its predecessors, is the apparently universal recognition of this truth; and we observe the steadying influence of tradition on every hand. This being so, it is not surprising to see how harmoniously the diversified units contrast one with another, with but few exceptions, to make up a pleasing "ensemble." No doubt, good arrangement is responsible for some of this effect, but it is principally the presence of a greater reserve, a more correlative standard of design and inspiration, which binds the works of these craftsmen into closer union than heretofore. Approaching the subject in this spirit, few could be found who would prefer such work as that of Lalique or Gaillard to the delightful jewellery designs of Mr. and Mrs. Gaskin, and many will welcome the renewed life that is given to the allied arts of the miniaturist, the illuminator and the calligrapher in the exquisite designs and paintings of Miss Jessie Bayes and Miss Florence Kingsford and the penmanship of Mr. Graily Hewitt.

With the spell of mediævalism still upon us, we may, without a discordant note being touched, turn to the dignified designs for Gothic windows by Mr. Leonard Walker and Mr. Hugh Arnold. These seem to us to have happily attained a combination of expression and impressiveness, together with the best technical traditions of glass. The furniture is, with few exceptions, true to our best national styles of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The elaborate sideboard exhibited by Messrs. Morris and the Ashbee ironbound writing cabinet, alone stand out as conspicuous failures. Of the Bindings there is but one criticism that suggests itself on work which seems to retain an all-round craftsmanlike excellence; we should prefer to see a less wiry use of tooling and a less insistent use of pattern than that which prevails in some of the more gilded examples. The almost complete absence of wall-paper designs may perhaps be taken as a healthy sign of the revolt against what, at its best, is a most uncraftsmanlike craft, and one in which the designer must have well-nigh played himself out. The very limited display of fabrics can hardly be accounted for so easily, though the few pieces that are shown harmonise most decoratively with their surroundings, which is perhaps the best possible test of their beauty and fitness. The conspicuous centre-pieces of the large gallery, by Mr. Conrad Dressler and Mr. Harold Speed, by their very nature take a place apart from their surroundings, but the former's enamelled earthenware triptych is a masterly handling of the material, in a Della Robbia manner. Without mentioning in detail the many beautiful exhibits in metal ware, pottery and glass, we may draw attention to the sculptured ivories and metal-bound caskets by Mr. Richard Garbe, who seems to be as prolific as he is varied in the manner and material by which he translates his ideas.

If we are to draw any conclusions from the present exhibition, we should say that without showing any work of exceptional brilliancy, it reveals a sanity and restraint in the conception and execution of all branches of the crafts which augur well for the future ability of our craftsmen to tackle works of greater import. This brings us back again to the all-important question of how work is going to be found for their ever-increasing numbers. The fact has to be faced, that the members of what Morris called "the group of gentlemen workmen" stand in a class by themselves, and the tendencies of our present educational and industrial systems appear, not only to increase their numbers, but to keep them in their position of splendid isolation. At present they possess all the privilege of directing public taste and at the same time acting as finger-posts to the manufacturer, without reaping any adequate reward for their services.

To tell the truth, there is but the most meagre demand for craft-work, as such, and it would be interesting to know how many of the exhibitors at the Grafton Galleries depend solely on legitimate craft-work. A few, we know, get their opportunity, but the majority have to be content with employment at the hands of the manufacturer, which, as Morris again has shown, is a sorry substitute for the opportunity of work. That this is no exaggeration of the case is proved by a pamphlet which has been recently published by the Junior Art Workers' Guild; and it is a healthy sign when we find our younger workers not only ready to admit the circumstances but preparing themselves to overcome them. From a section headed "The Limitations of the Arts and Crafts Movement" we take this indicative passage:

The present problem owes its origin in a great measure to the fact that the Arts and Crafts movement has directed its energies too exclusively to the creation of a supply of skilled craftsmen, on the assumption that a demand for good work might reasonably be left to take care of itself. We fully appreciate the gravity of the situation that has thus been created and the necessity of finding a solution to it. Indeed in this connection we feel ourselves in the position of commissioners in the arts whose duty it is to investigate and collect evidence on these points.

One fact is made clear, that, if commercialism is to have a wholesome check and the prestige of the craftsman to be upheld, there must be a much more complete organisation amongst workers than at present exists. Such an organisation should be sufficiently comprehensive to undertake administrative responsibilities, associating itself with the educational side of the question on the one hand, and the manufacturers on the other. Consisting, as it would, of the best workers and the best thinkers in the various spheres of activity, it would represent those most competent to give the result of their practical experiences for the benefit of our educational system and the advancement of our art industries. Is it too much to hope that by the binding together of our scattered units throughout the land into a federation of art-workers, such influence might be brought to bear upon the taste of the public that it would no longer be worth while for our manufacturers to waste time and capital and the labour of their workmen in producing inferior wares to supply an altogether degrading demand? Might there not at least be achieved some relationship between the manufacturer and the skilled craftsman, whereby a legitimate compromise might be arrived at, which would do honour to their respective spheres of usefulness? D. H.

AUBREY BEARDSLEY

MIDDLE-AGED, middle-class people with a predilection for mediæval art still believe that subject is an important factor in a picture or drawing. I am one of the number. The subject need not be literary or historical. After you have discussed in the latest studio jargon its carpentry, valued the tones and toned the values, motive or theme must affect your appreciation of a picture, your desire, or the contrary, to possess it. That the artist is able to endow the unattractive and woo you to surrender, I admit. Unless, however, you are a pro-Boer in art matters and hold that Rembrandt and the Boer school (the greatest technicians who ever lived) are finer artists than Titian, you will find yourself preferring Gainsborough to Degas and the unskilful Whistler to the more accomplished Edouard Manet. Long ago French critics invented an æsthetic formula to conceal that poverty of imagination which usually stares from their perfectly executed pictures, and this was eagerly accepted by Englishmen, both painters and writers. Yet, when an artist frankly deals with forbidden subjects, the old canons regular of English art begin to thunder, the critics forget their French accent; the old Robert Adam, which is in all of us, asserts himself; we fly for the fig-leaves.

I am led to these reflections by the memory of Aubrey Beardsley and the reception which his work received, not from the British Public, but from the inner circle of advanced intellectuals. Too much occupied with the obstetrics of art, his superfluity of naughtiness has tarnished his niche in the Temple of Fame. "A wish to épater le bourgeois," says Mr. Arthur Symons, is a natural one. I do not think so; at least in an artist. Now much of Beardsley's work shows the éblouissement of the bourgeois on arriving at Montmartre for the first time—a weakness he shared with some of his contemporaries. This must be conceded in praising a great artist for a line which he never drew, after you have taken the immortal Zero's advice and divested yourself of the scruples.

"I would rather be an Academician than an artist," said Aubrey Beardsley to me one day: "it takes thirty-nine men to make an Academician, and only one to make an artist." In that sneer lay all his weakness and his strength. Grave friends (in those days it was the fashion) talked to him of "Dame Nature"—"Damn Nature!" retorted Aubrey Beardsley, and pulled down the blinds and worked by gaslight on the finest days. But he was a real Englishman, and from his glass-house he peppered the English public. No Latin could have contrived his arabesque. The grotesques of Jerome Bosch are positively pleasant company beside many of Beardsley's inventions. Even in his odd little landscapes, with their twisted promontories sloping seaward, he suggested mocking laughter; and the flowers of "Under the Hill" are cackling in the grass.

An essay which Mr. Arthur Symons published in 1897, has always been recognised as far the most sympathetic and introspective account of this strange artist's work. It has now been reissued with illustrations by Messrs. Dent (6s. net). Those who welcome it as one of the most inspiring criticisms from an always inspired critic, will regret that eight of the illustrations belong to the worst period of Beardsley's art. The designs for the Morte Darthur, with few exceptions, have no artistic significance. Kelmscott dyspepsia following on a surfeit of Burne-Jones belongs to the pathology of style, but it is a phase that should be produced by the prosecution, not by the eloquent advocate for the defence. Moreover, I do not believe Mr. Arthur Symons admires them any more than I do; he never mentions them in the text. "Le Débris d'un Poète," the Coiffing, Chopin's Third Ballad, and those from Salome would have sufficed. With these omissions the monograph might have been smaller; but it would have been more truly representative of Beardsley's genius and Mr. Arthur Symons's taste.

At one time or another every one has been brilliant about Beardsley. "Born Puck, he died Pierrot," said Mr. MacColl in one of the superb phrases with which he gibbets into posterity an art or an artist he rather dislikes. "The Fra Angelico of Satanism," wrote Mr. Roger Fry of a recent exhibition of the drawings. There seems hardly anything left even for Mr. Arthur Symons to write. Long anterior to these particular fire-works, however, his criticism is just as fresh as it was eight years ago. I believe it will always remain the terminal essay.

The preface has been revised, and I could wish for some further revision. Why is the name of Mr. Leonard Smithers—here simply called a publisher—omitted, as the other Capulets and Montagus are faithfully recorded? When no one would publish Beardsley's work Mr. Smithers stepped into the breach. I do not know that The Savoy exactly healed the breach between Beardsley and the public, but it gave the artist another opportunity; and Mr. Arthur Symons an occasion for song and prose. Mr. Leonard Smithers, too, was the most delightful and irresponsible publisher I ever knew. Who remembers without a kindly feeling the little shop in the Royal Arcade (et in Arcadia ego) with its tempting shelves; its limited editions of 5000 copies; the shy, infrequent purchaser; the upstairs room where the roar of respectable Bond Street came faintly through the tightly-closed windows; the genial proprietor? In the closing years of the nineteenth century his silhouette reels (my metaphor is drawn from a Terpsichorean and Caledonian exercise) across an artistic horizon of which The Savoy was the after-glow. Again, why is Mr. Arthur Symons so precise about forgetting the date of Beardsley's expulsion from the "Yellow Book"? It was in April 1895, April 10. A number of poets and writers blackmailed Mr. Lane by threatening to withdraw their own publications unless the Beardsley Body was severed from the Bodley Head. I am glad to have this opportunity, not only of paying a tribute to the courage of my friend Mr. Smithers, but of defending my other good friend Mr. John Lane from the absurd criticism of which he has been too long the victim. He could hardly be expected to wreck a valuable business in the cause of unpopular art. Quite wrongly Beardsley's art had come to be regarded as the pictorial and sympathetic expression of an unfortunate tendency in English literature. But, if there was any relation thereto, it was that of Juvenal towards Roman society. Never was mordant satire more evident. If Beardsley is carried away in spite of himself by the superb invention of Salome, he never forgets his hatred of its author. It is characteristic that he hammered beauty from the gold he would have battered into caricature. A veritable antithesis to Strauss, who seemingly destroyed by his music what he wished to re-create. Salome has survived both. And Mr. Lane informed an American interviewer a short time ago that since that April Fool's Day poetry had ceased to sell altogether. The bards had unconsciously committed suicide, and The Yellow Book perished in the odour of sanctity.

Recommending the perusal of some letters (written by Beardsley to an unnamed friend) published not long ago, Mr. Arthur Symons says: "Here, too, we are in the presence of the real thing." I venture to doubt this. I do not doubt Beardsley's sincerity in the religion he embraced, but his expression of it in the letters. At least, I hope it was insincere. The letters left on me a disagreeable impression, both of the recipient and the correspondent. You wonder if this pietistic friend received a copy of the Lysistrata along with the eulogy of St. Alfonso Liguori and Aphra Behn. A fescennine temperament is too often allied with religiosity. It certainly was in Beardsley's case, but I think the other and stronger side of his character should, in justice to his genius, be insisted upon, as Mr. Arthur Symons insists upon it. If we knew that the ill-advised and unnamed friend was the author of certain pseudo-scientific and pornographic works issued in Paris, we should be better able to gauge the unimportance of these letters. Far more interesting would have been those written to Mr. Joseph Pennell, one of the saner influences, or those to the author of this eloquent appreciation.

"It was at Arques," says Mr. Arthur Symons . . . "that I had the only serious, almost solemn, conversation I ever had with Beardsley." You can scarcely believe that any of the conversations between the two were other than serious and solemn, because he approaches Beardsley as he would John Bunyan or Aquinas. Art, literature and life, are all to this engaging writer a scholiast's pilgrim's progress. Beside him Walter Pater, from whom he derives, seems almost flippant—and to have dallied too long in the streets of Vanity Fair.

ROBERT ROSS.

MUSIC

STRAUSS'S "DON JUAN"

BESIDES the pleasure which alternating performances of the London Symphony and Queen's Hall orchestras give their Albert Hall audiences on Sundays, these concerts may also be supposed to develop popular intelligence by titillating its bumps of comparison. Everything in life, of course, depends on the point of view. But, while every one knows where he disagrees with another, it takes some reasoning power to explain satisfactorily why; and this can only be done by comparing the points at issue. For years we have admired the artistic perfection of what is now the London Symphony Orchestra, and many times have seen it forced to rise at the Queen's Hall after the performance of some great work conducted by Henry Wood, in acknowledgment of the enthusiasm of a packed house. For this reason it was a little disappointing to witness the somewhat flat reception vouchsafed to the second and third movements of Tschaikowski's sixth Symphony, when rendered by the same body on Christmas Eve at the Albert Hall. If, on the one hand, it proved that this admirably trained band is as plastic to the ruling bâton as water to the wind, on the other it raises the question as to how far a less accomplished orchestra in the grip of a more dominant personality may surpass it in interpretation sometimes. It is, in fact, not a matter of playing but of conductorship, and conductorship depends quite as vitally on temperament as on knowledge. Musical knowledge forms, of course, the indispensable skeleton of musical existence; but the human organism would be highly ineffective if people discarded everything but their bones, and we may apply the same principle to music. However, the art of conducting is a gift in itself. Many great men fail as leaders of men, and many thorough musicians, whom no one will suspect of lack of temperament either intellectual or emotional, prove incompetent at the conductor's desk. Tschaikowski himself felt the most extraordinary diffidence when called upon to face an orchestra, even in the interpretation of his own work. That form of nervousness known as losing one's head in public with him assumed the sensation of its being physically loose and in danger of rolling off his shoulders, and, when he took the bâton for the first time in his right hand, the left was seen firmly clutching on to his head by its fair beard. Years and experience largely modified this feeling, but conducting was always distasteful to him, and in this art he never reached the proficiency of his contemporary, Berlioz, whose inspiration leavened whatever instrumental body he handled, as yeast does bread.

Besides alternations of orchestras, we have agreeably varied programmes at the Albert Hall, though, as is natural at Christmastide, the themes of most works lately under consideration are based on a belief imbedded in the hearts of all men, whether religious or irreligious—namely, the redemption of the erring through a purer being's love. On Christmas Eve we heard the Overture to Tannhäuser from the London Symphony Orchestra; and the following week Mr. Wood gave us Strauss's symphonic poem, "Don Juan," as the most important item of the programme. Some authorities consider this the Viennese composer's best work, but not perhaps the most characteristic of his peculiar bent. Richly orchestral though it is, it certainly seems less bristling than usual with those eccentricities in which Strauss loves to enclose his ideas. We can get at the kernel without being baffled by the prickly husk. In this composition, we are told, Strauss first declared himself a writer of programme-music, and therefore the work is not to be separated from Lenau's poem, on which it is based. Thus, when all the strings, followed by a passionate tutti, rush upwards and downwards in the opening bars, we take these figures to be typical of Don Juan's wayward impulses in process of what is popularly known as "sowing wild oats." Then come the resonant themes introducing the hero's personality. We are treated to a good deal of agitation and discontent on his part, crossed and recrossed by episodes dealing with those divers women whose first appearance always gives him joy. Zerlina trips in on strings and wood wind, and a "blonde countess" sweeps by in a violin solo, to a background of tremolo and cascades of arpeggi on the harp. This is a most beautiful flowing figure, and we are a little sorry when Don Juan tires of it, which he does—pretty soon. The countess was evidently no better than she should be—too easy a conquest in point of fact—and her themes only serve as introductory to those of the ideal woman for whom the hero through all his experiences has never ceased to yearn. This lady, by name Donna Anna, is apparently a little shy of presenting herself, for fragmentary shadows of her theme come and go before she ventures to appear. When she does, there can be no doubt as to the wisdom of Don Juan's choice. Donna Anna's limpidity of soul is perfectly conveyed to us by clarinet and horn to a delicate accompaniment of other instruments, and for some time Don Juan and the orchestra remain completely under her sway, much to the satisfaction of the audience. We follow this gentle being through her gradual yielding and her lover's inconstancy, till she finally disappears in a minor key—poor thing!—after a last appeal to Don Juan's higher self; and the opening themes, emphasised by the lower strings—mark! the lower strings—bassoon and brass, drag down the hero's soul into its sad, bad courses again. And, of course, he ends tragically, though the music gives us to understand there is immense enjoyment first. We hear the old themes, suggestive of satiety, after "a gorgeously coloured musical picture of unbridled orgy." He goes mad—so does the music, slightly—then they both recover, and Don Juan meets his end by a duel, in which he allows himself to be despatched. Life having no further charms for him, as the concluding dissonances of the work point out, it can only be resolved, like the music, by death—pizzicato. Snap! his soul goes forth; and we wonder how it fared thereafter, and if Donna Anna's prayers were as efficacious as those of Tannhäuser's holy maiden to redeem an erring spirit. The theory of salvation through the vicarious penance, devotion and self-sacrifice of a sister-soul was Wagner's favourite creed, and doubtless recommends itself agreeably to that section of fiery masculinity which loves the things of Time without losing faith in those of Eternity. That this belief can be reduced to an absurdity was once proved to the present writer by an old diplomat, who, recalling with complacency several episodes in a highly coloured career, added piously: "But, whatever my shortcomings, I do not fear that I shall lose my soul—because—parce que, voyez-vous, j'ai une bonne religieuse qui se flagelle pour moi!"

Strauss takes himself and his Don Juan extremely seriously, and it is interesting to see that this really noble work was included in the first concert given in Paris last week by the united forces of the London Symphony Orchestra and the Leeds Chorus. The excellence of both vocalists and instrumentalists will doubtless take some of our friends over the water completely by surprise. But it is to be hoped that both countries will benefit artistically by the interchange of thought and aspiration realised in this musical entente cordiale.

E #.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MESSRS. J. M. DENT AND Co. some months ago took over from Messrs. Sampson Low the series of political biographies known as the Queen's Prime Ministers, which they are issuing under the more comprehensive title of "The Prime Ministers of England." They are adding almost immediately a volume on Lord Rosebery by Mr. Samuel Herbert Jeyes. Mr. Stuart J. Reid is the editor of the series, of which several volumes are in third, fourth, and fifth editions, Froude's "Beaconsfield" being in a ninth edition.

Immediately after the General Election will be published a new edition of the "Popular Handbook to the New House of Commons" (1906), with over five hundred portraits and caricature sketches of members, and numerous electoral maps and particulars of the polls, forming a complete record of the new parliament and comparisons with the results of previous general elections. The publishers are the "Pall Mall" Press.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark have in the press, and will publish in the early spring, a new work by the Rev. D. W. Forrest, D.D., of Edinburgh, entitled "The Authority of Christ." While all Christians acknowledge that Authority as final, there is a wide diversity of opinion with reference to what it really covers and the right method of construing it. The purpose of this book is to inquire as to the sphere in which that Authority operates and as to its character within that sphere.

Dr. E. G. Hardy, Vice-Principal of Jesus College, Oxford, is publishing through Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. a volume of "Studies in Roman History," containing a fairly exhaustive treatment of the attitude of the Roman Government towards Christianity, besides other contributions to the scientific study of Roman history of the kind (now emanating from Oxford) which promises to render less indispensable in the future a knowledge of German works and the German language. It is to be hoped that the author's impaired vision will not altogether preclude the possibility of a successor to the present volume.

Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton are publishing immediately three new schoolbooks under the editorship of Mr. E. E. Speight, B.A., F.R.G.S., whose previously issued educational works have had a warm welcome from the teaching world. "The Imperial Reader," edited by the Hon. W. P. Reeves, High Commissioner for New Zealand, formerly Minister of Education in New Zealand, and Mr. Speight, contains a descriptive account of the territories forming the British Empire. In the making of this book Field-Marshal Viscount Wolseley, Viscount Milner, the Earl of Dunmore, Sir Harry Johnston, Major-General Baden-Powell, and many other administrators have lent their assistance. "Britain's Sea Story" is the title of a volume edited by Mr. Speight and Mr. R. Morton Nance, and is illustrated from Mr. Nance's paintings of scenes in our naval history. The third schoolbook is "A Nature Reader" for senior students, edited by Sir John Cockburn, K.C.M.G., formerly Premier Minister of Education in South Australia, who is well known in educational circles in this country, and Mr. Speight.

Mr. Charles Hannan's new novel, "Thuka of the Moon," now in the press, will shortly be published by Messrs. Digby, Long and Co., who issued the same author's successful early English novel, "The Coachman with Yellow Lace." Messrs. Digby, Long and Co. will also publish immediately a new novel, entitled "The Cuckoo's Egg," by Mr. Clarence Forestier-Walker, author of the successful novel, "The Chameleon," which ran into three editions.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall are issuing a novel, dealing with life at a public school, entitled "The Bending of a Twig," by Mr. Desmond Coke, the author of that amusing skit, "The Dog from Clarkson's." We understand that Mr. Coke has two aims in view: for the book, as well as showing life as it is at one of our great public schools, will also satirise the false sentiment and melodrama which are often poured into such stories. There will be no effort made to conceal the identity of the particular school, for we hear that the book will be illustrated with many photographs of scenes at Shrewsbury, where the action of the story passes.

On January 29 Mr. Unwin will publish a new story by Mrs. Hamilton Synge, author of "The Coming of Sonia," a book which was very well received by the critics a year or two ago. The new book, which is entitled "A Supreme Moment," is the story of a brother and sister. Agatha sacrifices herself entirely to her brother, encouraging his weaknesses and accepting his veiled though very real tyranny as her duty. Upon the neighbourhood, well-behaved and self-satisfied, descends a new personality, and it is on the working out of its effect upon everybody that the motif of the story depends. There is a mystery about the newcomer. She has a disturbing effect upon several people, leading to the breaking of a long-standing engagement, and other events. In the stress of an intense moment a strange experience comes to Agatha, an experience of the spirit piercing through the material; the explanation of which, whether natural or supernatural, is left to the reader.

On January 29 Mr. Unwin will publish a volume, entitled "Our School out of Doors," by Miss M. Cordelia Leigh, daughter of the late Lord Leigh, and author of "Simple Lessons from Nature," and other works. The book is designed for the assistance of teachers in nature-study who are taking their scholars for outdoor rambles. Two lessons are arranged for each month of the year, dealing in as simple a manner as possible with some of the natural objects common at the different seasons. The subjects chosen include animals, plants, rocks and stones, and also natural phenomena such as clouds, rain, ice and snow. The book is fully illustrated, and has been revised by Lord Avebury, Mr. R. R. Lydekker and Dean Ovendon.

Mr. Unwin is publishing a popular half-crown edition of Mrs. Mary Davies's "The Housewife's What's What—a Hold-all of Useful Information for the House." It will be ready on January 29. Mr. Unwin is also issuing new impressions of Mr. Alfred Perceval Graves's "Irish Song Book," and the Rev. E. J. Hardy's "How to be Happy though Married."

Less than a fortnight before his death Mr. G. J. Holyoake passed the last proofs of his "History of Co-operation," which is shortly to be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin. The first edition of this work appeared some twenty years ago. The new edition has been practically rewritten, and embodies the history of the movement up to the present day. It is a curious coincidence that only last week Mr. Unwin issued a new edition of Mr. Holyoake's "Public Speaking and Debate." Mr. Unwin is also the publisher of his "Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life," and his second autobiographical volume, "Bygones worth Remembering."

Messrs. Watts are issuing for the Rationalist Press Association, at the popular price of sixpence, Mr. Joseph McCabe's reply to Sir Oliver's "Matter and Life," under the title of "The Origin and Life." The argument, though necessarily somewhat controversial in tone, is mainly constructive in aim.

The same firm are also publishing an essay by Mr. J. M. Robertson on "What to Read," and a somewhat important volume dealing with "The Churches and Modern Thought," by Philip Vivian. The writer endeavours to set forth the reasons why many earnest and thoughtful men and women are unable to belong to the various Christian Churches, and invites candour in considering the grounds of belief.

Mr. Thomas Cobb's new novel, "Mrs. Erricker's Reputation," will be published on Tuesday, by Alston Rivers.

Alston Rivers will publish next month a volume of Thackeray essays now collected for the first time. "The New Sketch Book," as the work is entitled, consists mainly of critical articles, as to the authenticity of which, in spite of their being anonymous, Mr. R. S. Garnett, the editor, entertains no doubt.

On Tuesday next will be published a new and original volume by Mrs. John Lane entitled "The Champagne Standard," a series of impressions of things characteristic in social England and America.

CORRESPONDENCE

EXPLANATIONS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have read with complete agreement your review of my "Selected Poems of Robert Burns." The book was first published some twenty years ago, but I was given no opportunity to correct my old introductory essay for the new edition. With such an opportunity I should have adopted the opinions of the reviewer.

Turning to another matter, may I also express my acquiescence in the topography of Mr. Neilson's letter on "The Clyde Mystery"? In days when canoes navigated the Clyde, beacons were not needed, and as the Langbank and Dumbuck structures belong to the age of canoes they cannot possibly have been meant for beacons. They are, in fact, stations on either side of a ford, so their raison d'être is obvious. Dr. Munro himself speaks of "the keepers of the watch tower at the ford of Dumbuck" (Proceedings Soc. Ant. Scot., 1900-1901, p. 296). This explanation is simple and obvious.

I do not think that the reviewer of my little book mentioned the essence of my argument. He speaks of the disputed objects as "cunning forgeries," and no mortal could suspect the regretted Mr. "Donnelly" (as he still calls that investigator) of either forgery or cunning. My point is that many of the disputed objects, though almost without parallel in British sites, have a great number of parallels in most other parts of the globe. I give proofs, the result of special study of the subject. A forger who knew the facts must have been a deeply studious archæologist; yet, on the theory of fraud, he deposited his fabrications in ancient sites where, in the natural and known course of things, they had no business to be, as the learned forger must have been aware. Herein lies the puzzle, which has not been solved.

January 22.

A. LANG.

THE CLYDE MYSTERY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am sorry that Mr. Neilson has taken my little joke seriously. I am also very sorry to learn that on the day it was written Mr. Donnelly died. If he had lived to read it I feel sure he would have taken it as it was meant. Mr. Neilson accuses me of two "false statements." First that the Blue Points had human faces carved on them. For this Dr. Munro was my authority. Secondly, that Professor Dawkins said that they were carved. This I never said, nor even hinted.

I cannot but reiterate your reviewer's wish that all who write upon this subject would imitate the admirable good temper shown by Mr. Andrew Lang in his recent book.

I am afraid my little joke was out of place in the ACADEMY, and should have been sent to 10 Bouverie Street.

G. S. LAYARD.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In a letter signed James Neilson which appeared under the above heading in the last issue of the ACADEMY (20th inst.), I find the following statements: "Nor have the 'believers been reduced to a state of confusion' by that great geologist, Professor Boyd Dawkins; they simply went and examined the shells for themselves, and also the use made of them, and find that no reference whatever is made to them in any communication, they were simply handed over. They may have come to the district as manure among other city refuse and been worn as children's toys and dropped among the grass, but if they are forgeries, they are much more likely to be the work of an enemy."

The shells above referred to are two fresh-looking oyster shells, "drilled with one or more holes," which Prof. Boyd Dawkins identified as those of the American oyster known as "Blue Points." Mr. Neilson in the above extract attempts to belittle their significance as evidence of the hand of a "faker" in the production of the much-discussed Clyde relics by informing your readers that no reference whatever was made to them in any communication. This is not a correct statement; for, in the paper read by the late Mr. Adam Millar, F.S.A. Scot. (one of the excavators of the Dumbuck fort), at the S.A. of Scotland, April 13, 1896, and published in vol. xxx. of their Proceedings, these shells, along with the other shells in this fort, are thus described:

"A number of shells have been found: in nearly every case holes have been bored in them, and some attempt at ornamentation has been produced by cutting straight lines in the pearly inner surface of the shells" (p. 305). "Of shell-fish shells the quantity is very small indeed—five oyster-shells, one cockle-shell, and three limpet-shells. The mussel is represented by two fragments only, while of the whelk or periwinkle there is not the slightest trace. It is to be remembered that nearly all these shells bear marks of ornamentation" (p. 306).

In a footnote Mr. Millar gives a minute description of the famous "sculptured limpet-shell having on its inner surface a very good representation of a human face." The editor of the British Archaeological Association (September 1901) published an illustration of what is described as an oyster-shell from Dumbuck having a human face carved on it, which, however, seems to have been a mistake for the limpet-shell from Dumbuck. No wonder that outsiders like your correspondent Mr. Layard and a reviewer of Mr. Lang's book, "The Clyde Mystery," in the current number of the Reliquary, should refer to these "blue points" as having human faces on them.

Mr. Neilson seems uncertain about the scientific value of his explanation as to how the "ornamented" "blue points" got among the Dumbuck relics; and so he actually contemplates the alternative of forgery—a fact which Mr. Lang candidly admits—but in that case Mr. Neilson thinks it "much more likely to be the work of an enemy"—which is precisely the theory of Dr. Munro. But if this "enemy" introduced these "blue points" into Dumbuck, why should he not introduce all the "queer things" into the débris of the Clyde sites? Once "forgery" or "faking" is admitted, the only question which remains to be solved is, how far the process has been carried, i.e., how many of the Clyde relics come under the same category as the "blue points"?

It may be mentioned that Mr. Millar described the Dumbuck hill-fort, with all its heterogeneous relics, as belonging to a pre-Celtic race of the Stone Age. All the stone implements and ornaments of bone, shale and shell, including the "blue points" and other ornamented oyster shells, are now exhibited in the National Museum. The spearheads of slate and of shale were accepted by the authorities as practicable weapons of that period, until Mr. Lang, some three years later, came on the scene and pronounced them to be "arms d'apparat weapons of show or ceremony."

VERITAS.

January 22.

[This correspondence must now cease.—ED.]

ROBERT BURNS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The notice of Burns in the current number of the ACADEMY begins: "Before these words are in print, Scotland will have celebrated the day when 'a blast o' Janwar win' blew hansel in on Robin.'" This is dated "January 20," but Robert Burns was not born till the 25th; moreover, the storm alluded to, which blew the inmates of the "auld clay biggin" out of doors, and forced them to take refuge in a neighbour's cottage, did not come till eight or nine days later, as stated by Gilbert Burns, the poet's brother. So that the notice of celebration is a little premature.

May I correct a small error in the lines quoted from "Tam o' Shanter"?

"Or like the snow-falls in the river" should be:

"Or like the snow falls," etc.,

"falls" being a verb, and "like" = "as." This is what Burns wrote, as appears from the early Edinburgh editions; but the mistake is a common one.

C. S. JERRAM.

January 22.

[We are obliged to our correspondent for pointing out the slip in regard to the date of Burns's birth.

The text of the verse of "Tam o' Shanter," as quoted in our review, is that of the earliest Kilmarnock edition, and it is also that adopted by the "Globe" edition, in which special care is paid to textual matters.—ED.]

ENGLISH ÆSTHETICS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The papers are now quite interesting, though you would never suspect the fact from the long lists of provincial towns (of which no one has ever heard since the last election) at present distorting columns usually occupied by those exquisite prose poems, the Times advertisements. How you miss them! It always produces a certain thrill to discover some particular morning that it is positively The Last Day on which you can secure Whitaker's Almanack for ninepence during the rest of your life, and that if you join the Book Club you will get Bradshaw for nothing! The important news of the evening journal, "Serious illness of a Gaiety Chorus Girl," "Five Babies smothered in Bermondsey," "Victory of the All Blacks," is, of course, for the present relegated to an inferior place. Leader-writers, who a few weeks ago gave Russia the quietus, are now composing epitaphs for the British Empire. But the law reports still hold their own, and here, as always, may be found indications of current thought, more pregnant than the tide of the election. They still afford material for the future short or longer history of the English people by the John Richard Greens of posterity. The decisions of "the most august of human officers," as Mrs. Luxmore called the Bench, are no less romantic than those of the Cadi in the Arabian Nights. This was brought home to me by perusing two cases recently reported in the Morning Post—that of Mrs. Rita Marsh, and the disputed will of Miss Browne. I yield to no one, not even to a solicitor, in my ignorance of English law, but I have seldom read judgments which seemed so conspicuously unfair, so characteristic of the precise minimum of æsthetic perception in the English people.

The hosteleries of Great Britain are famous for their high charges, their badly kept rooms and loathsome cooking and, let me add, their warm welcome. In the reign of Henry III. there was legislation on the subject. The colder and cheaper hospitality of the Continent strikes a chill, I am told by those familiar with both. The hotel selected by a certain Mrs. Rita Marsh was an exception to the ordinary English caravanserai. It was replete with real comfort, but the garden contained an oubliette, down which Mrs. Marsh, while walking in the evening, inadvertently fell. On the Continent the oubliettes are inside the house, and you are ostentatiously warned of their immediate neighbourhood. These things are managed better in France, if I may say so without offending Tariff Reformers.

The accident disfigured Mrs. Marsh for life, and for the loss of unusual personal attractions an English jury has awarded her only £500! The judge made a joke about it, Mr. Gill was very playful about her photograph, and every one, except, I imagine, Mrs. Marsh, seems to have been satisfied that ample justice was done. The hotel proprietors did not press their counterclaim for a bill of £191! Chivalrous fellows. Still, I can safely say that in France Mrs. Marsh would have been awarded at least four times that amount, though if she had been murdered the proprietors would have only been fined forty francs. But beauty to its fortunate possessors is more valuable than life itself, and the story is to me one of the most pathetic I have heard. To the English mind there is something irresistibly comic when any one falls, morally or physically. It is the basic force of English Farce. Jokes made about those who have never fallen, too great to appease, too high to appal, are voted bad taste. Caricaturists of the mildest order are considered irreligious and vulgar if they burlesque, say, the Archbishop of Canterbury for example, or unpatriotic if they hint that Lord Roberts did not really finish the Boer War when he professed to have done so. After Parnell came to grief I remember the Drury Lane pantomime was full of fire-escapes, and every allusion to the cause célèbre produced roars of laughter. Mr. Justice Bigham was only a thorough Englishman when he gently rallied the jury for awarding, as he obviously thought, excessive damages; so little is beauty esteemed in England.

The case of Miss Browne was also singular. She left a trust fund "for the erection of an ornamental structure of Gothic design, such as a market cross, tall clock, street lamp stand, or all combined, in a central part of London, the plan whereof shall be offered for open competition and ultimately decided upon by the Royal Institute of British Architects." The President of the Probate Division said he was satisfied that Miss Browne was not of sound mind, and pronounced against the will, with costs out of the estate. I wonder what the Royal Institute think of this legal testimonial. It seems almost a pity that some one did not dispute Sir Francis Chantry's will years ago on similar grounds. I recommend the suggestion to Mr. MacColl, that it might still be upset,

That would settle once and for all the question whether the administration of the Bequest has evinced evidence of insanity or not. A recent Royal command left the matter undecided. I do not, however, wish to criticise the Trustees, but to defend the memory of Miss Browne (who may have been eccentric in private life) from such a charge, because her testamentary dispositions were a trifle æsthetic. The will was un-English in one respect—"no inscription of my name shall be placed on such erection." Was that the clause which proved her hopelessly mad? The erection was to be Gothic. I know Gothic is out of fashion just now. Ruskin is quite over; the Seven Lamps exploded long ago; but Miss Browne seems to have attended before her death Mr. MacColl's lectures, knew all about "masses" and "tones" in architecture, and wished particular stress to be laid on "the general outline as seen from a good distance." This is greeted by some of the papers as particularly side-splitting and eccentric. Looking at the long unlovely streets of London, never one of the more beautiful cities of Europe, where each new building seems contrived to go one better in sheer uglitude, and even the builders of the Tube stations have ventured into the Vitruvian arena, you can easily suppose that poor Miss Browne, with her views about "general outline seen from a good distance," must have appeared hopelessly insane. The decision of the court is not likely to encourage any further public bequests of this kind. I have cut the British Museum and National Gallery out of my own will already. And I understand for the first time why Mr. MacColl, with his passionate pleading for a living national architecture, for official recognition of past and present English art, is thought by many good people quite odd. How he managed to attract the attention of any but the Lunacy Commissioners I cannot conceive. Valued critic and valued artist, I only hope he will attract no further attention.

Since it is evident that the law will assist in blackening reputations (with the exception of Mr. Druce's) even in the grave, I claim that the Miss Brownes who take advantage of life, and time by the forelock, to put up monuments in the already too hideous thoroughfares should be pronounced non compos mentis. The perpetrators of the erection in High Street, Kensington, hard by St. Mary Abbots, may serve as an example. Inconvenient, vulgar, inapposite, this should debar even the subscribers from obtaining probate for their wills. I invoke posthumous revenge, and claim that at least £500 damages should be paid as compensation to the nearest hospital for the indignant blind.

Q. V.

NEW LIGHTS ON CHAUCER

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The material in Mr. Pollard's most interesting "Causerie" of last week's ACADEMY is too extensive to be commented upon in the compass of a letter, but there are some points in it which seem to call for notice from admirers and students of Chaucer. I, for one, am not willing to give up a belief in the poet's originality at the bidding of two or more American cousins. Similar attacks on Chaucer's originality have been often made before, even in respect to the very French versifiers now mentioned in Mr. Pollard's essay, and they have been as frequently refuted. Probably the best résumé of the whole case is that given by another Transatlantic Professor—T. R. Lounsbury, of Yale University—in his monumental work, "Studies in Chaucer: his Life and Writings."

Although such careful writers as Sir Harris Nicolas impress upon readers the caution which Mr. Pollard urges "of the extreme danger of taking any word which Chaucer writes about himself in verse as literally true," it should, also, be borne in mind that there is a danger in the opposite direction, and it is advisable not to disbelieve any such autobiographical confessions too hastily; until they are proved false, let their author have the benefit of the doubt.

And this caution brings me to my most important point. Various writers besides Mr. Lowes, including, indeed, so eminent an authority as Professor Hales (ACADEMY, December 6, 1879) and, apparently, Mr. Pollard himself, assume that it was impossible for Chaucer to have a little garden attached to or by his tower at Aldgate, and that he would not be able to roam into the meads near by, to admire his favourite daisies in the mornings of the merry month of May. And why not, pray? May came twelve days later then, when the Old Style prevailed, and the poets have told us what doings were carried on in that month of flowers. It does not do to regard Aldgate with twentieth-century eyes. If the maps of London, even so late as the Elizabethan period, are referred to, it will be seen that not only were Bishopsgate, Shore-ditch and neighbourhood interspersed with gardens within as well as without the walls, but in a map of 1593, before me, Aldgate itself appears to have garden ground about it, and fields closely adjacent. Halliwell-Phillipps, in his "Outlines of the Life of Shakespeare," 4th ed., pp. 72-3, 88-9 and 113-118, puts the case very clearly before the reader.

After all, it seems safest not to exchange our "old lamps for new ones" until the old have been proven useless.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

THE IMMORTAL PHRASE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I would point out to Mr. Hutton that my late letter dealt only with Shelley's powers of description and invocation. The truly great poet must be many-sided, and few have surpassed the "Ineffectual One" in range of qualifications. As a lyrist he is unequalled. Note, in "Prometheus Unbound," the Semi-chorus of Spirits, the melodious endearments of the Earth and the Moon, and Asia's exquisite song, commencing:

"My soul is an enchanted boat."
Perhaps the most beautiful song in our language is:
"Rarely, rarely comest thou,
Spirit of Delight!"

It has but one fault; the fourth verse smells of plagiarism. Mr. Hutton may be able to identify. In the following quotations qualities are displayed which none would think of searching for in Wordsworth. Specimens of amorous rhapsody:

"See, the mountains kiss high heaven,
And the waves clasp one another;
No sick flower would be forgiven
If it disdained its brother;" etc.

Follows, of course, the ineffable "Indian Serenade," and that lovely cameo "Good-night":

"'Good-night?' No, love! the night is ill
Which severs those it should unite;
Let us remain together still—
Then it will be good night."

To match these in wanton yet delicate artifice, Mr. Hutton must go to those ancient masters of the fanciful and passionate, Lodge, Herrick, Suckling, Lovelace. Shelley was dexterous in vivid satire. Read:

"Things whose trade is over ladies
To lean, and flirt and stare and simper,"

and

"Suppers of epic poets—teas
Where small-talk dies in agonies—" and that wonderful consummating stroke commencing:

"All are damnable and damned."

We must go to the Elizabethan dramatists to equal the following as a specimen of virile invective:

"—two vultures sick for battle,
Two scorpions under one wet stone," etc.

Shelley had many and marvellous gifts, but a poet should be judged by his worst as well as his best. It would be unkind to quote Wordsworth at his worst.

D. GULLIVER.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I be permitted to endorse most heartily Mr. Stanley Hutton's letter in last week's issue of the ACADEMY. He has concisely expressed what must have been in the minds of many of your readers after a perusal of the letters of Mr. Gulliver and Mr. Wright.

Like Mr. Hutton, I am entirely in accordance with your own dictum re "the ineffectual angel" as printed in your issue of January 6.

The divine phrase, felicitous and sublime, which one encounters again and again in Wordsworth, only once or twice confronts us in the whole poetic work of Shelley. As "E. R. B." says, "the immortal phrase" in Wordsworth may sometimes be an oasis in a desert; but, speaking of poetry in general, such instances are exceptional; as a rule the immortal phrase is the crest of a sure and indomitable wave of transcendent emotion. Mr. Hutton's excerpts are from poems which are abiding glories in the firmament of our national literature, and in them Wordsworth is peculiarly Wordsworth—they are wholly characteristic of the man, and they stand as convincing evidence of his greatness.

As to whether we should weigh the merits of a poet by the quality of the general bulk of his work, or by isolated instances of undeniable sublimity, is a question not at present on the tapis.

JAMES A. MACKERETH.

January 21.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—This, as affecting Shelley, is a most interesting, not to say incendiary, question. Perhaps one may, for clearness, state it in the form of a proposition as follows:

All great poets are great phrasemakers:

Shelley was not a great phrasemaker:

Therefore Shelley was not a great poet.

Now this is, in effect, a restatement of Matthew Arnold's assertion that Shelley was lacking in "natural magic." "I will not deny," said Arnold, "that Shelley had natural magic in his rhythm: what I deny is that he had it in his language." Just previously Arnold had defined what he meant by "natural magic." "When they speak of the world" (he is writing of Keats and—I think any Frenchman would join with us in smiling at the conjunction—Maurice de Guérin) "they speak like Adam naming by divine inspiration the creatures: their expression corresponds with the thing's essential reality." This inspiration, then, this temperature of mind in which the thought is not so much expressed by the words as fused, so to speak, like some precious metal, by the electric emotion, itself into a molten coinage of splendid words—this Arnold denied to Shelley, and such, I take it, is the position of the writer of the review on Blake in the ACADEMY of December 23.

When to this faculty—the signet of the great poet—is united a "moral profundity" (to use Arnold's phrase), the philosophic mind, we have the very great poet; we have Shakespeare, Dante, Sophocles. Keats, as an instance to the contrary, though by reason of his superb natural magic a great poet, was not one of the supremely great. He had no "moral profundity." But Wordsworth, it is claimed, fulfilled both these conditions, and must therefore be ranked with the great philosophic poets, with Shakespeare, Dante, and their peers. Well, with the restriction that it is but a slender figure, an extremely attenuated bard, that mounts to these lofty seats (for the bulk of his work, if not positively ugly, is, æsthetically considered, extremely "plain"), I do not think that his right can be seriously disputed. For it is precisely this "moral profundity" that gives greatness to his verse at its best, that spreads an inexplicable sense of space, of magnitude, over such a passage as that quoted by your reviewer—a feeling that derives not from the noble words alone, not from the thought alone, but "a sense sublime of something far more deeply interfused."

But, to return to Shelley, did he possess that gift of "natural magic in his language" which is the essential of the great poet? He did not—as I think. Then was Shelley not a great poet? Such a statement seems to be so absurd that I would prefer at once to destroy, or rather to extend, a definition that would lead to such a preposterous conclusion. Any such rigid definition of the phrase "great poet" as would exclude the greatest lyrists in any language would merely serve to confute itself. For Shelley, as Arnold admitted, had "natural magic in his rhythm," natural magic in his melody. Macaulay, long ago, pointed out that Shelley was a type of the true "bard," the inspired singer. Is there anything so thrilling, so aerial in its music, so lambent, so translucent in texture as Shelley's verse? "It is beautiful," to quote Mr. Edmund Gosse, "beyond the range of praise."

I contend, then (to cut short a letter of inordinate length), that such a supremacy as this in any one of the parts that go to the formation of a poet amounts to greatness. Shelley is the greatest of lyric poets. Therefore Shelley is a great poet.

F. KNOX LINTON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Stanley Hutton's contribution in this week's ACADEMY to this discussion seems very little to affect the point at issue. He appears to forget the basis on which all controversy rests—personal predilection; and thus his opinion that your previous quotations from Shelley seem only to strengthen the position he defends is worthless.

The familiar and beautiful lines he quotes may seem to him of far greater beauty than those of Shelley, but on many ears their haunting melody is lost, and the supreme excellence he claims for them may seem to exist only as an idea of a fanatical devotee. His quotation of a saying of Coleridge, too, demands some investigation, and, unless he can show it to have been said after reading Shelley's verses, it is not likely to influence many who have followed this correspondence with attention. It is impossible in a matter like this to dogmatise. Each mind is the sole arbiter on points of taste, and its decisions are not affected either by pleading or argument.

FRANK TOVARGUE.

January 23.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am willing and anxious to break a lance or two in this tournament, as a Wordsworth champion.

The attempt to settle precisely the respective positions occupied in the Poetic Pantheon by two eminent poets is an exceedingly hazardous one: so much has to be taken into account, so many allowances have to be made. Moreover, there is a childish irrelevancy in this foot-rule system of measurement which may well give us pause; while to draw up a class-list arranging the great creative artists in order of merit—so many marks to each!—argues in the self-appointed examiner more hardihood than discretion or reverence.

Still, when all is said, it should surely be possible to approximate towards a sound estimate, to arrive at a general tentative judgment, of the relative excellences of two such poets as Wordsworth and Shelley.

In the first place, I am confident enough that this cannot be accomplished by the means favoured, apparently, by some of your correspondents—viz., by picking out "purple passages" from each, totting them up, and deciding the question so, proclaiming the victory of the top scorer!

We must take a far wider view of the matter. Premising and assuming that poetry is something indefinitely more than mere word-beauty, expressed in and through rhythm, rhyme, assonance, and sundry other devices—these being but "the trappings and the suits" of the art; believing, rather, that no definition can be other than monstrously inadequate which fails to recognise, as of its very essence, a certain spiritual insight into and interpretative and imaginative fervour in dealing with, man and nature, using formal beauty as a medium, I proceed to consider the claims of Shelley and Wordsworth. Much as I admire the former, the conviction forces itself upon me that Wordsworth is not only the nobler poet but a poet of a higher order also; and the chief grounds upon which I base this profound conviction may be set down briefly as follows:

(1) Inasmuch as poetry is, in its larger and more serious aspect as a powerful auxiliary of human progress, concerned closely with "the criticism of life," actual life, that poet will be, in this respect, the greater whose work deals the more thoroughly, the more intimately, the more consistently and the more vitally with it.

Can one doubt whose message is the prevailing one here? Wordsworth's "criticism of life" is wide, deep, healthful and always in touch with facts and the realities of existence; Shelley's outlook, on the contrary and by contrast, seems shallow, restricted, morbid. He rarely got a grip of things as they are; his vision of humanity being distorted by a philosophy as false as it was weak.

Shelley was a romantic of the romantics, and his poetry reflects more persistently than that of any other man of the school except Keats, their leading characteristics: aloofness from and want of sympathy with actualities involved in the determined search for ways of escape from real life into unrealisable ideal conditions. But Wordsworth, planting his feet firmly upon the earth, chooses the loftier task of extracting from "the common things that round us lie" the sacred truths they have to impart, thus throwing a light of glory and dignity upon everyday affairs, reconciling us to irksome circumstances, and helping us to refine and sanctify "the passions that build up our human soul" so that we may come to "recognise a grandeur in the beatings of the heart."

(2) Ruskin's definition of poetry as "the suggestion by the imagination of noble grounds for the noble emotions" may further assist our inquiry.

If he is right—as I believe he is—Wordsworth's superiority is evident. Practically his whole business from "Descriptive Sketches" to "Thanksgiving Ode" was the doing what Ruskin said. To accomplish it, he felt himself "a dedicated spirit"; upon it, he concentrated all the forces of mind and heart. His types of humanity were selected, his incidents were related, for this one purpose. His meditations were directed towards it, and his sublime Nature philosophy was subservient to the same end. Surely no one can say this of Shelley.

(3) If the remarks above are just, they partly explain the effect upon men of the writings of the two. Wordsworth's poetry is almost always strengthening, uplifting, joy-bringing and consoling in an extraordinary degree; while Shelley's, by reason of his pessimism and the constant ferment within him of riotous ideas and lawless emotional forces, communicates to us much of his own ill-regulated nature and infects us constantly with depressing feelings, gloomy forebodings and distressing melancholies. Remembering Emerson's maxim, that the quality of poetry may be judged by the frame of mind which it induces in us, can there be doubt, then, on this count, whose place is the higher?

(4) Again, the intellectual and moral range of Wordsworth is far more extensive than that of Shelley, his outlook upon the world and its activities in every way saner and more mature; he is in more immediate and constant touch with nobler ideas, and treats the vast primitive passions with an elemental grandeur, solemnity and sense of responsibility out of Shelley's reach, and it would seem, beyond his capacity. Compare for example "Michael" and "The Brothers" with "Julian and Maddalo," the Political Sonnets with "The Masque of Anarchy," "The Prelude" with "Alastor."

(5) In every sense, too, Wordsworth is a more original poet than Shelley. The finest Nature poetry of the latter is little better than an echo of that of the former, whose efforts here partake of the nature of a Revelation!

(6) As to technical equipment, Shelley's lyrics are certainly supreme of their sort; but one is not sure whether after all Wordsworth's do not more than make up in subtlety of harmony for what they lack in melody. Besides, Shelley is lyrical and little more; his blank verse is much inferior to that of the other; and in sonnet-writing, in which Wordsworth ranks with Shakespeare and Milton, Shelley scarcely ever rises above the schoolboy-exercise level.

(7) Neither does Shelley ever attain to anything like the spontaneity, inevitableness, effortlessness of Wordsworth. Evidences of labour show through the former's poetry to a most unfortunate extent.

(8) Best test of all: breadth of appeal to persons of all tastes, ages, stages of education, positions in life, occupations, interests, opinions, temperaments and conditions. It is here that Wordsworth's pre-eminence is most clearly seen. Shelley's appeal is to a select coterie; Wordsworth's to mankind. The immensely more extensive literature that has already grown up around the Cumberland poet's work indicates something. But we know, from their own testimony, that people so widely separated mentally and spiritually as, e.g., J. S. Mill, George Eliot, Jowett, G. F. Watts, Coleridge, Hazlitt, Lamb, De Quincey, and hundreds more have written of Wordsworth in terms little short of idolatry, so great reverence and love had they for him.

He is more frequently quoted, too, than any other poet except Shakespeare and Milton; and, showing how his thought is permeating and influencing the best thinking of the day, it is rarely that one takes up any book of note, or leading review, or literary journal without meeting references to him, and often long quotations.

For these and dozens of other reasons, I must place Shelley considerably below Wordsworth, who shall have one, at any rate, of my three votes for poets to represent England in any World Congress.

G. E. BIDDLE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Newnes's Art Library. Fra Angelico. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xxx, 64. (Newnes, 3s. 6d. net.)

[A life of Fra Angelico by Mr. Edgcumbe Staley, and a list of the painter's chief works, divided into localities, a photogravure frontispiece (The Descent from the Cross), and 64 fine reproductions. We are glad to see nine out of the twelve matchless frescoes in the Chapel of St. Lawrence (Niccolo V.) in the Vatican.]

Repertorium für Kunstwissenschaft. xxviii Band, 5 u. 6 Hefte. 10½ x 7. Pp. vi, 157. (Berlin, Reimer.)

The Junior Art-Workers' Guild—What it is—and where it stands. An appeal to craftsmen. 9 x 6. Pp. 7. (See p. 94.)

Sawyer, Amy (pictured by) The Seasons. 10 x 10. Pp. 13. (Sands, 3s. 6d.) [The Months, rather than the Seasons. Twelve reproductions in colour of drawings, each month being named after a flower, except December, which is Snow. An appropriate quotation opposite each. Miss Sawyer has not Mr. Walter Crane's skill in making flowers out of human beings, but her designs are bold and strong, and one or two, January and November for instance, are very good.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Whitley, Charles. William Pitt. 8 x 5½. Pp. 347. (Blackwood, 6s. net.) (See p. 85.)

[Illustrated with portraits, caricatures and a facsimile.]

St. John, Christopher. Henry Irving. 11½ x 9. Pp. 27. (The Green Sheaf.)

["Christopher St. John," who is known as a playwright, makes a slashing attack on those who dared to say that Sir Henry Irving was not perfection as man, actor and artist.]

Early Lives of Charlemagne. By Eginhard and the Monk of St. Gall. Edited by Professor A. J. Grant. 6½ x 5. Pp. xxxii, 179. (Moring: The King's Classics, 1s. 6d. net.)

[Professor Grant has translated these lives from Jaffé. He adds an introduction and some notes, and there is a good index.]

EDUCATION.

Jack's Mathematical Series. Iliffe, J. W. The Three Term Arithmetic. Book VII. 7 x 5. Pp. 88. (Jack, 5d.)

Blackie's New Concentric Arithmetics. Book III. By D. M. Cowan. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 80. (Blackie, 4d.)

Workman, W. P. and Clacknell, A. G. Geometry, Theoretical and Practical. Part I. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 355. University Tutorial Series. (University Tutorial Press, 3s. 6d.)

[Part II. was reviewed in the ACADEMY (Education Supplement) last week.]

Blackie's Little French Classics. Chanson de Roland, racontée pour les enfants par Stéphane Barlet and Léon Duchemin. Pp. vi, 40. (4d.) Gérard de Nerval: La Main Enchantée. Pp. 55. (6d.) Each 6½ x 4½. (Blackie.)

Smith, A. H. A First Year's French Book on the Oral Method. 7½ x 5. Pp. x, 139. (Blackie, 1s. 6d.)

Cicero: Pro Lige Manilia; with introduction, notes, etc. By W. J. Woodhouse. Illustrated. 7½ x 5. Pp. xl, 128. (Blackie, 2s.)

Blackie's Latin Texts. Cicero: De Amicitia. 7½ x 4½. Pp. xiv, 42. (Blackie, 6d. net.)

Price, A. C., and Norwood, C. A Latin Vocabulary: in use in the junior forms at Leeds Grammar School. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 19. (Blackie, 4d.)

Blackie's English School Texts. Livy: Hannibal in Italy, pp. 123; Travels of Captain John Smith, pp. 137; de Quincey's English Mail Coach, pp. 96. Each 6½ x 4½. (Blackie, 6d. each.)

Blackie's English Classics. Tennyson: Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington, pp. vi, 34; Byron: Ode to Napoleon, etc. pp. 24; Shelley: Lines written among the Euganean Hills, and The Sensitive Plant, pp. 40. Each 6½ x 4½. (Blackie, 2d. each.)

Carman, M. C., B.A. The Function of Words: a guide to analysis and passing. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 156. (Swan Sonnenschein, 2s.)

[Mr. Carman is English Master in the Khedivieh School, Cairo, and his book is intended for those who have already mastered the simplest rudiments of the language.]

Simpson, Percy. Scenes from Old Play-books, arranged as an introduction to Shakespeare. 8 x 5½. Pp. viii, 248. (Clarendon Press, 3s. 6d.)

[A very good book. Mr. Simpson has stage-managed performances of Shakespeare at Denstone College, and knows his subject on the practical as well as the theoretical side. His little introductions on "A Shakespearean Play" and "Shakespeare's Theatre" are scholarly and full of life, and his selections well chosen and helped out by stage-directions. The slight liberties he takes with the text are pardonable, considering the object of his book. Glossary and Index, and de Witt's drawing of the Globe Theatre for a frontispiece.]

Jack's Concise Histories. Cartwright, Thos. Our Island's Story Step by Step: The Making of Britain. Pp. 304. The Making of Europe. Pp. 271. Each 7½ x 5½. (Jack, 1s. 8d. each.)

Harmsworth Self-Educator. Part 7. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 144. (Carmelite House, 7d.)

FICTION.

Mann, Mary E. Rose at Honeypot. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 308. (Methuen, 6s.) (See p. 92.)

Stanton, Coralie, and Hosken, Heath. The Forbidden Man. 7½ x 5. (White, 6s.)

Pugh, Edwin. The Spoilers. 7½ x 4½. (Newnes, 6s.) (See p. 92.)

Waltz, Elizabeth Cherry. The Ancient Lanark, a Kentucky Romance. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xv, 269. (Methuen, 6s.)

Coulson Kernahan, Mrs. The Sinners of Seraphine. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 316. (Long, 6s.)

Tytler, Sara. The Bracebridges. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. (Long, 6s.)

Cule, W. E. The Black Fifteen, and other school stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 280. Illustrated. (Melrose, 2s. 6d.)

HISTORY.

Hesseling, D. C. Het Negerhollands der Deense Antillen. Bijdrage tot de Geschiedenis der Nederlandse Taal in Amerika. 9 x 6. Pp. x, 290. (Leiden: Sijthoff, m. 4.25.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Brotherston, R. P. The Book of Cut Flowers. 7½ x 5. Pp. xvi, 300. (Foulis, 3s. 6d. net.)

["A complete guide to the preparing, arranging, and preserving of flowers for decorative purposes." One of the appendices deals with the Japanese methods.]

The Writers' and Artists' Year-Book, 1906. 7½ x 4½. Pp. viii, 78. (Black, 1s. net.)

The Oxford Year-Book and Directory. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xix, 764. Swan Sonnenschein, 5s. net.)

[This book forms a "second edition of Part I. of the 'Oxford and Cambridge Yearbook,' brought up to date. It contains a list of living graduates of Oxford University, with brief details of their careers.]

The Englishwoman's Year-Book and Directory, 1906. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 402. (Black, 2s. 6d. net.)

[The twenty-sixth annual issue of this invaluable work, edited by Miss Emily James.]

- Wilmshurst, W. L. Christianity and Science. The latest phase. 7×4½. Pp. 92. (Rider, 6d. net.)
- Lewis, Caroline. Lost in Blunderland. The further adventures of Clara, with fifty illustrations by S. R. 7½×4½. Pp. xvi, 148. (Heinemann, 2s. 6d.)
- [Mr. Heinemann does well to call attention at the present moment to this most amusing book, published in 1903.]
- Sinclair, William Macdonald, D.D. The Two Cries. I. The Cry of the Unemployed. II. The Cry of the Jews in Russia. 7½×4. Pp. 24. (Melrose, 3d.)
- [Sermons preached in St. Paul's Cathedral by the Archdeacon of London.]
- The Hearst Medical Papyrus*. Hieratic Text in 17 facsimile plates in colotype. With Introduction and Vocabulary by George A. Reisner. 13½×10½. Pp. 48, etc. University of California Publications. Egyptian Archaeology, vol. i. (Leipzig: Hinrichs, m. 25.)
- [A duplicate of the Ebers papyrus, brought to Dr. Reisner at Dér-el-Ballas in 1901.]

ORIENTAL.

- Tuhfa Dawi-l-Arab*. Ueber Namen und Nisben bei Bohari, Muslim, Malik, von Ibn Hatib Al-Dohsa. Herausgegeben von Dr. Traugott Mann. 9½×6½. Pp. 33, 201. (Leiden: Brill m. 7.50 net.)
- Wilmshurst, W. L. The Chief Scripture of India (The Bhagavad Gita) and its relation to present events. 7½×4½. Pp. 84. (Wellby, 1s. net.)
- [An introduction to the study of the Bhagavad Gita, calling attention to its relation to the Western religious thought of the present day. A thoughtful and well-written paper by a widely-read man, who hopes that "some day, in the inevitable course of the world's evolution, all races of men will form 'one fold under one shepherd.'"]

POETRY.

- Eaton, Arthur Wentworth. Poems of the Christian Year. Pp. 97. Acadian Ballads and de Solo's Last Dream. Pp. xii, 107. Each 7½×5½. (New York: Thomas Whittaker, $1 net each.)
- Noguchi, Yone. The Summer Cloud: Prose Poems. 7½×5½. Pp. 122. (Tokyo: The Shunyodo, 3s.)
- [A very dainty little book, well-printed on rice-paper with a coloured title-page and marginal drawings of flowers. Mr. Noguchi's prose poems are full of beauty.]
- Salmon, Arthur L. A Book of Verses. 7½×5½. Pp. 75. (Blackwood, 2s. 6d. net.)
- [Mr. Salmon's prose-work is already well known to readers of the ACADEMY, and his verses, to which we shall return in a future issue, are equally worth their attention.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Wordsworth's Guide to the Lakes*. Fifth edition (1835), with an introduction, appendices, and notes, textual and illustrative, by Ernest de Séincourt. 7×4½. Pp. xxviii, 204. (Frowde, 2s. 6d. net.)
- [Uniform with Mr. Nowell C. Smith's "Wordsworth's Literary Criticism" reviewed in the ACADEMY, January 13, 1906. There is a Map of the Lake District and a few illustrations chosen from books published before the "Guide to the Lakes." Appendices: Wordsworth's letter to Beaumont on Building and Gardening and Laying out of Grounds, and his two letters to the Morning Post on the Kendal and Windermere Railway.]
- Nelson's Sixpenny Classics. Fenimore Cooper: The Last of the Mohicans. Pp. 424; Dickens: Oliver Twist. Pp. 434; Kenilworth. Pp. 577. Each 6½×4½. (Nelson.)
- Young, Filson. Mastersingers. 7½×5½. Pp. x, 216. (E. Grant Richards, 5s. net.)
- [Mr. Young's book of essays on musical subjects was originally published in 1901. The new edition leaves the old essays practically as they were, and contains three new ones, on "The Music of the Cafés," "The Spirit of the Piano," and "The Old Cathedral Organists."]
- The Hungry Forties*: Life under the Bread-tax. With an Introduction by Mrs. Cobden Unwin. 8½×5½. Pp. 117. Second People's Edition. (Unwin, 6d.)
- Morley, John. The Life of Richard Cobden. In five parts. Part I. 9×6. Pp. 208. (Unwin, 6d. net.)
- Blake, William. The Marriage of Heaven and Hell. 5×3½. Pp. 39. (E. Grant Richards: The Venetian Series, No. ii., 6d. net.)
- Lyrists of the Restoration*, from Sir Edward Sherburne to William Congreve. Selected and edited by John and Constance Masefield. 5½×3½. Pp. xxiv, 282. (E. Grant Richards: The Chapbooks, No. i, 3s. 6d. net.)
- Ruskin Treasures. Wealth. 4½×2½. Pp. 50. (Allen, cloth, 6d. net; leather, 1s. net.)
- [The first of a series of little books on Life, Art, Trade, Work, etc., made up of sentences and paragraphs from Ruskin.]
- Campbell, Lord Archibald. Reveries. New edition. 7½×5½. Pp. 63. (C. J. Clark, 3s. 6d.)
- Les cent meilleurs poèmes (lyriques) de la langue française*. Choisis par Auguste Dorchain. 5½×3½. Pp. 16, 159. (Gowans and Gray, 6d. net.)
- [From Charles d'Orléans's "Le Temps a laissé son manteau" to Gabriel Vicaire's "Jeunesse." An admirable little selection, at once choice and catholic. One might almost say that it is good that M. de Heredia is dead, that no anthology "des morts" should appear without some of his sonnets. But we could wish "Isotta" and "Cartagena des Indes" had been included.]
- Penny, F. E. Caste and Creed. 7½×5½. Pp. 380. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.)
- [A new edition of a successful novel by the author of "Dilys."]

SCIENCE.

- Haeckel, Ernst. Last Words on Evolution: a popular retrospect and summary. Translated from the second edition by Joseph McCabe. With Portrait and three plates. 9½×6½. Pp. 127. (Owen, 28 Regent Street, 6s. net.)
- [Translations of the three lectures delivered by Professor Haeckel at Berlin in April 1905. "The Controversy about Creation," "The Struggle over our Genealogical Tree," and "The Controversy over the Soul." With Evolutionary Tables and a Postscript on "Evolution and Jesuitism."]

SPORT.

- Waller, P. How to Play Association Football. With diagrams. 7½×5. Pp. 79. (Blackie, 1s. net.)
- Spalding's Athletic Library. Jiu Jitsu, the effective Japanese mode of self-defence. 6½×5. Pp. 79. (British Sports Publishing Co. Ltd., 6d.)
- [Illustrated by 35 snapshots of K. Koyama and A. Minami, "well-known native experts."]

THEOLOGY.

- Lépiciér, Rev. Fr. A. M., O.S.M. The Unseen World. 7½×5. Pp. 284. (Kegan Paul, 6s.)
- ["An Exposition of Catholic Theology in its relation to Modern Spiritism," by the Procurator-General of the Servites and Professor of Divinity in the Propaganda.]
- Abbott, Edwin A. Johannine Grammar. 9½×5½. Pp. xxviii, 687. (Black, 16s. 6d. net.)
- [The sixth part of Dr. Abbott's "Diatessarica," the fifth being his "Johannine Vocabulary." That volume (the first of a work of which this is the second) dealt with characteristic Johannine words and synonyms, i.e., with obscurities caused by the meaning of words; this deals with obscurities caused by inflections of all parts of speech, and by combinations of words. The plan of Mr. Abbott's great work is as follows: Book i.: Forms and Combinations of Words (Adjectives, Adverbs, Anacoluthon, Apposition, Article, Asyndeton, Cases, Conjunctions, Ellipsis, Interrogative Sentences, Mood, Negative Particles, Number, Participle, Prepositions, Pronouns, Subject, Tense, Voice). Book ii. Arrangement, variation, and repetition of words, and connexion of sentences. Appendices: Twofold meanings and events; and Readings of B not in Westcott and Hort. Indices to "Johannine Vocabulary" and to "Johannine Grammar."]

TRAVEL.

- Maxsted, Hugh Rochfort. Three Thousand Miles in a Motor-Car. 7½×5. Pp. 144. (Treherne, 2s. 6d. net.)
- [Through France, Italy, and Switzerland. By the author of "Three Men in a Motor-Car," etc. With a map, plan of towns, etc. Illustrated from photographs. The car was a 20 h.p. Léon Bollée.]

THE BOOKSHELF

WE notice here a few educational books which, for one reason or another, were omitted from last week's Supplement:

Elementary Graphic Statics. By W. H. Blythe, M.A. (W. Heffer and Sons, Cambridge; Simpkin, Marshall and Co., 1s. 6d.)—The size of this book, about 11 by 8½, sufficiently indicates its object, viz., to simplify the subject by large and clear diagrams. This minimises work at the blackboard, while the figures are always available for reference. We can heartily recommend this work to all teachers.

Elementary Physics, Practical and Theoretical. J. N. Brown. (Blackie and Son, 2s. 6d.)—This is the third volume of the Elementary Physics edited by Mr. Kerr, of Allan Glen's School, Glasgow. The speciality of the book is a series of experiments, neither difficult nor expensive, illustrating the law of dynamics, hydrostatics and heat, to which are added practical hints which may avert many a disheartening failure.

Examples in Physics. C. E. Jackson, B.A. (Methuen and Co., 2s. 6d.)—Mr. Jackson is Senior Physics Master in Bradford Grammar School. About one-third of his book consists of elementary examples with answers, adapted to a three years' school course. The remainder is made up of Problem Papers which the author claims to be fully up to University Scholarship standard. From a cursory perusal we are disposed to believe that this is the case, and such a collection of original and interesting exercises has, we know, long been a desideratum.

Elementary Chemistry. Progressive Lessons in Experiment and Theory. Part i. (Clarendon Press.)—This book is distinctly a new departure, aiming not so much to teach the facts of Chemistry as to lead pupils to think scientifically by means of them. With this object experiments are described in full detail, so that teachers may be relieved from incessant applications of manipulation, and so be able properly to direct the attention of their class to the interpretation of results.

Elements of Quantitative Analysis. By G. H. Bailey, D.Sc., Ph.D. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d.)—"It is to be feared," says the preface to this volume, which is dated from Victoria University of Manchester, "that the study of Quantitative Analysis is too often restricted to the performance of a series of experiments, the precise significance of which is of little concern to the student." This is the same complaint made by the two authors of the "Elementary Chemistry," and therefore seems to indicate a general defect in the method of teaching this science. Mr. Bailey divides his book into four parts, the first of which is introductory, while the last, giving practical instructions for various technical analyses, will probably be stimulating even to those who never get so far. It is just the manual for a keen and ambitious student.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW

No. 415. JANUARY 1906. 8vo. price 6s.

- I. PROTECTION AND THE WORKING CLASSES.
- II. RELIGION UNDER THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.
- III. NOVELS WITH A PHILOSOPHY.
- IV. FANNY BURNEY, HER DIARY AND HER DAYS.
- V. THE BRITISH MUSEUM LIBRARY AND ITS CATALOGUE.
- VI. LUCRETIVS AND HIS TIMES.
- VII. THE VISIONARY ART OF WILLIAM BLAKE.
- VIII. THOUGHT IN ARCHITECTURE.
- IX. NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, MAN AND AUTHOR.
- X. THE GROWTH OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY.
- XI. THE FALL OF MR. BALFOUR'S GOVERNMENT.

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.,
39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO*PAST AND PRESENTBy T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-legged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net,
by post 12/11 each.

FISHINGEdited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English GardensWritten and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.Wall and Water GardensBy Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations.
21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.Trees and Shrubs for English GardensBy E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net.
507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,*and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and PinksWritten by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated [A.D. 1720.]

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily
THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

ARE YOU READING

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER?

The Ideal Weekly Magazine Review for lovers of good literature. A large number of Book Reviews, brilliant Articles and clever Stories appear every week. Also a page of

LITERARY PROBLEMS

with Prizes for their solution. These latter are of unique interest, and furnish an intellectual stimulus to a large circle; as many as 2000 entries having been recorded at one time for one section only of this feature of the paper. Every issue also contains four or five cartoons by

"F. C. G.,"

including one specially drawn for this issue.

Please send a post-card for a Free Specimen copy.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER,
TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of

THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1761

FEBRUARY 3, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Professor WILLIAM STIRLING, M.D., LL.D., D.Sc., Fullerian Professor of Physiology, R.I., will, on Tuesday next, February 6, at 5 o'clock, begin a course of Six Lectures on "Food and Nutrition."

Subscription to this Course One Guinea; to all the Courses in the Season, Two Guineas.

TO PARENTS AND GUARDIANS.—Horticultural Pupils.—Two public school men would take a Pupil to learn well-established and profitable business. Showed over 19 per cent. profit last year. Books kept by Chartered Accountants. Premium for the course, £50.—WELLS & BAWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

THE UNIVERSITY OF SHEFFIELD.

The University of Sheffield proposes to appoint a PROFESSOR OF EDUCATION.

For particulars as to duties, salary, etc., apply to W. M. GIBBONS, Registrar.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—A. B., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP, Secondhand Bookseller, 100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND 4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 1805, 6d.), 2s. 6d., cloth 4s., half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Eastry, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF ARCHITECTURE, by E. LOMAX, C.E., and THOS. GUNYON ARCH, C.E.; 2 vols.; good condition; hundreds of plates, etc. What offers? Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER, Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

NEW BOOKS AT CLEARANCE PRICES.

—Prices include carriage.—Turner, Water-Colour Sketches (£3 3s. net), 27s.; Douglas's Fra Angelico (21s. net), 12s.; Baldrey's Herkimer (21s. net), 14s.; Who's Who, 1905 (7s. 6d. net), 3s. 6d.; Lady Dilke's French Decoration and Furniture in the 18th Century, French Engravers and Draughtsmen, French Painters, French Architects and Sculptors, 4 vols. (£5 12s. net), £3 15s.; Conybeare's Alfred the Chronicler (7s. 6d.), 2s.; Gregorovius's Rome, complete set, as new (£3 3s. net), 45s. Catalogue of Recent Secondhand Purchases just ready; state wants.—Galloway & Porter, Booksellers, Cambridge.

MORLEY BIOGRAPHY, new and uncut, 30s.; Ruskin's Letters to M. and H. G., privately printed, 25s.—Apply Miss WARD, Belmont, Exeter.

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, Vols. 136-356.

New Series, Vols. 1-103.

Fourth Series, Vols. 132-139.

Few Vols. missing.

A. ALTHOFF, 6 Bond Court, Walbrook, London, E.C.

CHINA, JAPAN, and the PHILIPPINE ISLES. Now ready, CATALOGUE 39. MSS., and Printed Books from the Sixteenth to the Eighteenth Century about the above. To be had post free.—Jacques Rosenthal, Karl Str. 10, Munich, Bavaria.

DE IMITATIONE CHRISTI.—Now Ready. CATALOGUE 38. MSS. Editions, Translations in 62 different Languages, etc., of the Imitation of Christ. Splendid printing in the French Livres d'Heures fashion, Red and Black, with Borders. Price 2s.—Jacques Rosenthal, Karl Str. 10, Munich, Bavaria.

INCUNABULA TYPOGRAPHICA. Pars II. —Now ready, CATALOGUE XI. 2000 Incunabula for Sale. With 290 Facsimiles of Prints. Price 6s. Both parts 12s. Jacques Rosenthal, Karl Str. 10, Munich, Bavaria.

INCUNABULA BIBLIOGRAPHICA.—Now ready. REICHLING. Appendices ad Heinii Copingeri Repertorium Bibliographicum. Fasc. I., II., containing a full description of 792 Incunabula unknown to both Writers, more than 813 Corrections. Price 20s.—Jacques Rosenthal, Karl Str. 10, Munich, Bavaria.

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, complete Set from Commencement, 1888 to 1903. Uniformly bound in publisher's cases; published by Cassell & Co.; 16 vols., £4 4s. Complete sets are now scarce.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WINDOW in Thrums (A), 8vo, 1889
Winslow's Good News from New England, 1624
Wit and Drollery, 1661, or 1682
Wit at a Venture, 1674
Witther (G.) Carmen Eucharisticum, 4to, 1649
Collection of Emblems, sm folio, 1635
Juvenilia, 12mo, 1633, or any of his Works
Wit Restor'd; Select Poems, 1658
Wit's Labyrinth, by J. S., 4to, 1648
Wit's Magazine, 2 vols, coloured plates, Tegg, n d (1812), or either vol
Witt's Recreation, 1640, 1641, 1654, 1663
Woods' New England's Prospect, 4to, 1637, or imperfect
Woodburn's Gallery of Portraits, 2 vols, 1816
Woodward (G.) Elements of Bacchus, 1792
Eccentric Excursions, 1796
Caricature Magazine
Any books illustrated by him
Wordsworth (W.) Descriptive Sketches, 1793
An Evening Walk, 1793
Poems, 2 vols, 1798-1800
Poems, 2 vols, 1800
The Waggoner, 1819
Peter Bell, 1819
World in Miniature, 43 vols, 12mo or 8vo, n d (1820, etc) or any odd vols
Wouwermann, Œuvres de, roy folio, 1737
Agnes Grey, 1847
Wuthering Heights, 3 vols, 1847
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

DEVICES & DESIRES* 3rd Edn.

New Poems. By P. HABBERTON LULHAM

"There is much that is delicately felt and finely expressed 'The Old Doctor' is admirable."—WILLIAM ARCHER.

"These verses are the expression of a fine temperament, touched with a fine sympathy for fine ideals, emotions, and moods, all through these poems one feels a brave comradeship. The love poems are very spontaneous. They ring clean and clear."—JAMES DOUGLAS.

"Imaginative strength . . . excellently poetic description . . . bold and beautiful imagery."—ACADEMY.

"He sings manfully, with genuine passion and a great variety of ideas."—THE TIMES.

"Excellent original ideas."—ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"Depth of feeling, and powers of original imagery, which are as rare as they are welcome."—THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The writing is simple and clear, the observation charming, and the passion indubitable."—THE DAILY CHRONICLE.

"We think it ('Heart Husbandry') an admirable sonnet well worthy of a place in any sonnet anthology of the present decade."—THE DAILY NEWS.

*BRIMLEY JOHNSON & INCE, 35 Leicester Sq. 3/6 net.

Typewriting

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels, 9d. 1000, reduction for quantities and regular work. Translations.—Miss HANDLEY, Needham Market, Suffolk.

YOUNG LADY, SHORTHAND-TYPIST, with own Empire Typewriter, desires Morning Engagement as Secretary—two and a half years reference.—Apply J. E. COOPER, 329 Clapham Road, S.W.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts), Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French. German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

TO AUTHORS.—ISABEL H. CAINE (Certificated Cambridge) undertakes all descriptions of TYPING at 9d. per 1000 words; with Carbon Duplicate, 1s. Excellent references.—The Hollies, Durrington, Worthing.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

J. F. MILLET EXHIBITION.

100 Drawings by J. F. MILLET, including the famous "ANGELUS," also Exhibition of FRENCH ILLUSTRATED BOOKS of 18th Century. THE LEICESTER GALLERIES, Leicester Sq.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO.'S NEW BOOKS

NOW READY.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL

BY

WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.

With Portraits. In 2 vols., demy 8vo, 36s. net.

VOLUME II. OF THE NEW EDITION.

GROVE'S DICTIONARY OF MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

New Edition. Edited by J. A. FULLER MAITLAND, M.A., F.S.A.

In Five Volumes. Vol. II., F—L. 8vo, 21s. net. [Tuesday.

* * Previously published, Vol. I., A—E. 21s. net.

VOL. II. READY NEXT TUESDAY.

OBSERVATIONS OF A NATURALIST IN
THE PACIFIC between 1896 and 1899.

By H. B. GUPPY, M.B., F.R.S.E.

Vol. II. Plant-Dispersal. With Illustrations and Maps. 8vo, 21s. net.

* * Previously published, Vol. I., Vanua Levu, Fiji: Its Physical and Geological Characters. 15s. net.

SECOND EDITION.

THE FOUNDERS OF GEOLOGY.

By SIR ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, F.R.S., D.C.L., D.Sc. 8vo, 10s. net.

[Tuesday.

THE RELIGION OF NUMA,

And other Essays on the Religion of Ancient Rome.

By JESSE BENEDICT CARTER, Professor of Latin in Princeton University. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE WORKING CLASSES

Edited by GEORGE HAW. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

The HISTORY of AMERICAN PAINTING

By SAMUEL ISHAM. With 12 Full-Page Photogravures and 121

Illustrations in the Text. Super-royal 8vo, 21s. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE

Illustrated.

Price 1s. 4d.

Annual Subscription, 16s.

The FEBRUARY Number contains:

THE PORTRAITS OF KEATS.

By WILLIAM SHARP. With 12 Portraits (1 in tint)

A DIPLOMATIC ADVENTURE

I. A STORY. By S. WEIR MITCHELL, Author of "Hugh Wynne."

Fourth Instalment of

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S

New Novel, FENWICK'S CAREER.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN &amp; CO., LTD., LONDON.

LONDON LIBRARY

ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President—The Right. Hon. A. J. BALFOUR.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. VISCOUNT GOSCHEN; FREDERIC HARRISON, Esq.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, Esq., F.R.S.

Trustees—EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.; Right Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.

Committee—Sir Rowland Blennerhassett, Bart., LL.D., Dr. J. H. Bridges, Horace T. Brown, Esq., F.R.S., Prof. Ingram Bywater, Prof. Lewis Campbell, LL.D., Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D., Sydney Gedge, Esq., Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S., Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S., Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D., Mrs. J. R. Green, Rev. W. Hunt, M.A., Litt.D., Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I., Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B., Sidney Lee, Esq., Litt.D., W. S. Lilly, Esq., Sidney J. Low, Esq., Sir Frank T. Marzials, C.B., Sir F. Pollock, Bart., Rev. J. H. Rigg, D.D., H. R. Tedder, Esq., Rev. H. Wace, D.D., Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B., A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 3s. a year, with an entrance fee of £1 1s.; Life Membership, according to age. Fifteen Volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-Room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1626 pp. 4to, 1903) is now ready, price 4s. 2s.; to members, 25s.

"One of the most sagacious and judiciously liberal men I have ever known, the late Lord Derby, said there was a kind of man to whom the best service that could be rendered was to make him a life member of the London Library."

W. E. H. LACKY

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

Published at the Offices of "COUNTRY LIFE," Ltd., 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	107	The Drama (continued):
Literature:		"ady Inger of Östraat" at
The Statesman as Critic . . . . .	110	the Scala Theatre . . . . .	119
In Memoriam . . . . .	110	"La Père Lebonnard" at the
Geography and Imagination . . . . .	111	New Royalty Theatre . . . . .	119
Tinsel Queens . . . . .	112	Fine Art:
Birds, and Red Herrings . . . . .	113	Two New Books on Constable . . . . .	119
Reviews and Magazines . . . . .	113	Beautiful London . . . . .	120
Unveiled . . . . .	115	Music:
A Literary Causerie:		The Oxford History of Music—I . . . . .	121
Around an old Catalogue . . . . .	115	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	122
Fiction . . . . .	116	Correspondence . . . . .	123
The Drama:		Books Received . . . . .	125
Nero without Tears . . . . .	118	Bookshelf . . . . .	126

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

A GLANCE through the membership roll of the new House of Commons, now practically complete, shows that some further names are to be added to the list of those who combine the pursuits of literature and politics. Mr. J. H. Yoxall, the Liberal member for Nottingham (West), is the author of at least one deservedly popular novel, "Alain Tanger's Wife." Mr. S. H. Butcher, one of the two Unionist representatives of Cambridge University, has written several books on classical topics, of which "Some Aspects of the Greek genius" is perhaps the most generally known, while the combined names of "Butcher and Lang" stand for a delightful translation of Homer's "Odyssey." Mr. L. G. Chiozza-Money, Liberal representative of North Paddington, published quite recently an economic treatise called "Riches and Poverty." Lieutenant Carlyon Bellairs, who sits as a Liberal for King's Lynn, has written a good deal upon naval matters; Mr. Julius Bertram (North Herts) has written on economics; and another new recruit, also a Liberal, is Mr. R. C. Lehmann (Leicestershire, Harborough division) a writer of light verse and fiction, who has already some half-dozen volumes to his name, and is well known in journalism as a member of the staff of Punch and for a brief period Editor of the Daily News.

The obituary of this week chronicles the death of a well-known author in the person of Charles John Cornish. He belonged to the tribe of open-air essayists, of whom Isaak Walton, Gilbert White, Richard Jefferies and Thoreau are the most brilliant examples. It is high praise to say of Mr. Cornish that he was not unworthy of the band to which he belonged. We do not for a moment contend that he was as good a writer as any of them, but his interests were wider and broader. The son of a clergyman of the English Church, he had abundant opportunities during boyhood of assimilating that fundamental knowledge of Nature and her ways which either comes unconsciously during childhood or not at all. As the late Sir Walter Besant pointed out on a well-known occasion, no man who has not learned to love tree and flower, bird and beast in the plastic days of youth will ever be their familiar in later life, however much he may wish to be.

With Mr. Cornish, literature was what Sir Walter Scott said it should always be, not the main purpose of life but a staff to help one along. His hardest work was probably done in St. Paul's School, to which he was appointed classical master in 1884. Many ex-pupils have testified to the kindly influence exerted by Mr. Cornish over them in their school days. But his vacations were spent in the pursuits dear to the country gentleman. He was particularly fond of shooting and fishing, but his interests extended far beyond the bounds of sport. It might be said that anything which had life excited in him a boundless curiosity, and the papers on Natural History which he contributed to the pages of the Spectator were looked forward to with pleasant expectation by the readers of that journal. He was also for many years one of the most important writers in Country Life, and until his death acted as its shooting editor. There he was not confined to Natural History, but wrote, always pleasantly and with information, on old houses, old churches, old bells and kindred subjects, for along with the growth of his taste for Nature there had been developed a lively interest in the things of the past.

Still, after all is said and done, the chief distinction of Mr. Cornish lies in his open-air essays. Without the passion and poetry of Richard Jefferies, he possessed an animated and breezy style and powers of description that have seldom been surpassed. One compares him almost inevitably with Richard Jefferies because the two writers were most successful in dealing with what is practically the same part of the country. We all know that intense love of the Wiltshire Downs evinced by the boy from Coate Farm, and in search of Weyland Smith Jefferies had extended his wanderings to the vale of the White Horse and the Berkshire Downs where Mr. Cornish found material for some of his best books. Perhaps it may be convenient for our readers if we give a list of his publications. They began with his book on the New Forest in 1894, followed by the Isle of Wight in 1895, Life at the Zoo in the same year, Wild England of To-day, 1896 (this we should be disposed to regard as his best book), Animals at Work and Play, 1896, Nights with an Old Gunner, a record of holidays spent in Norfolk, 1897, Animals of To-day, 1899, the Naturalist on the Thames, 1902, and the life of Sir William Henry Flower, 1904.

While the desire of George Jacob Holyoake that his ashes should be laid close to the graves of George Henry Lewes and of George Eliot evinces friendship and esteem of the highest character, it also greatly adds to the interest of a portion of Highgate Cemetery. Inscribed on George Eliot's memorial obelisk are her well-known lines:

Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence; and the proximity of the Herbert Spencer memorial-stone, with its simple record: "Herein lie the ashes of Herbert Spencer," and the association in death of the name of the old Agitator with his friends and co-workers impart to the couplet a fresh significance.

It was on the suggestion of the late William White, when he was contributing his Parliamentary sketches to the Illustrated Times forty odd years ago, that G. J. Holyoake undertook, when he found himself less able for public work than he had been, to write "Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life," and his recent volume, "Bygones Worth Remembering." With William White and his son, "Mark Rutherford," Holyoake was on terms of intimacy, though of late years he had not often met the latter. Mr. Hale White's "Recollections of George Eliot" in the Bookman for August 1892 gratified him exceedingly; but he did not seem to be aware—or would not own his knowledge—that in "The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford," under the designation "Theresa," there is a vivid description of George Eliot.

On a flat marble stone alongside the last resting-place of George Eliot the following is engraved:

Elma Stuart
(née Fraser),
of Ladhope, Roxburghshire, whom for 8½ blessed years George Eliot called by the sweet name of daughter.

She was pioneer in England of the Salisbury system of prevention and cure of disease, and author of "What must I do to get well, and how can I keep so."

What though thy name by no sad lips be spoken,
And no fond heart shall keep thy memory green,

Thou yet hast left thine own enduring token,

For earth is not as though thou ne'er hadst been.

Few leave behind them such a beautiful memory to be cherished in the hearts of their friends.

In a scholarly and very well-written article on Lucretius in the Edinburgh Review, perhaps the finest passage is this description of the poet's philosophy: "The poet speaks in the tone of one weary of worldly pleasures, who has reached, by what strange or ill-starred ways we know not, that sad Garden of Proserpine where men sit and rejoice that

Even the weariest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea."

It is curious, however, that no reference is made to "The Lotos-Eaters," a poem in which Tennyson set himself to render Lucretius as he set himself to render Malory in the Idylls. The spirit of Lucretius is reproduced—and how beautifully reproduced!—in the well-known passage:

We have had enough of action, and of motion we,
Roll'd to starboard, roll'd to larboard, when the surge was seething free,

Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam-fountains in the sea.

Let us swear an oath, and keep it with an equal mind,

In the hollow Lotos-land to live and lie reclined

On the hills like gods together, careless of mankind.

For they lie beside their nectar, and the bolts are hurl'd

Far below them in the valleys, and the clouds are lightly curl'd

Round their golden houses, girdled with the gleaming world:

Where they smile in secret, looking over wasted lands,

Blight and famine, plague and earthquake, roaring deeps and fiery sands,

Clanging fights, and flaming towns, and sinking ships, and praying hands.

But they smile, they find a music centred in a doleful song

Steaming up, a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong,

Like a tale of little meaning though the words are strong;

Chanted from an ill-used race of men that cleave the soil,

Sow the seed, and reap the harvest with enduring toil,

Storing yearly little dues of wheat, and wine and oil;

Till they perish and they suffer—some, 'tis whisper'd, down in hell

Suffer endless anguish, others in Elysian valleys dwell,

Resting weary limbs at last on beds of asphodel.

Surely, surely, slumber is more sweet than toil, the shore

Than labour in the deep mid-ocean, wind and wave and oar:

O rest ye, brother mariners, we will not wander more!

In the new number of the Edinburgh Review there is also a suggestive article on the Visionary Art of William Blake. For the purpose of showing that everything in the eyes of William Blake had a conscious spiritual existence, the reviewer quotes the following little poem:

Each grain of sand,
Every stone on the land,
Each rock and each hill,
Each fountain and rill,
Each herb and each tree,
Mountain, hill, earth and sea,
Cloud, meteor and star
Are men seen afar.

He goes on to say that the creed is the same as that of Gérard de Nerval's beautiful sonnet, of which the following are four lines:

Respecte dans la bête un esprit agissant :
Chaque fleur est une âme à la Nature éclosée ;
Un mystère d'amour dans le métal repose ;
"Tout est sensible !" Et tout sur ton être est puissant.

One wonders that a well-known verse of Mr. Gilbert's was not made to follow. He might have had this sonnet in his mind when he wrote it. It can scarcely be necessary to recall to our readers the passage we mean:

His most æsthetic, very magnetic fancy took this turn—
If I can wheedle a knife or needle,
Why not a Silver Churn?

A writer in the Daily News says that Mr. Labouchere has left St. Stephens for Florence, the "rose-red city half as old as Time," but Petra is the place so described in Dean Burgon's poem:

Not virgin-white like that old doric shrine
Where erst Athena held her rites divine,
Not saintly grew like many a minster fane
That crowns the hill and consecrates the plain,
But rosy-red as if the blush of dawn
That first beheld them were not yet withdrawn ;
Match me such marvel save in eastern clime—
A rose-red city, half as old as Time.

Our readers will remember an article on Prize Poets in the ACADEMY for May 6 last, in which these lines were quoted from Burgon's Newdigate.

The two vacancies in the Académie Française caused by the deaths of the duc d'Audiffred-Pasquier and M. de Heredia, who held seats numbered thirteen and thirty-nine respectively, have been filled by the election of M. Alexandre Ribot and M. Maurice Barrès. Although but little known as a writer, M. Ribot is one of France's most popular orators. He has been before the public since 1878, and has been in the Cabinet several times. He is an ardent Republican, and has written a good deal on social subjects in England. His biography of Lord Erskine, which appeared in 1866, is a most interesting work. M. Barrès, on the other hand, is a great writer. Still young in years and appearance, he is nevertheless a leader of the new school of fiction-writers. And that he is recognised as such is shown by the vote given for him by M. Edmond Rostand. If ever two men were opposed in political ideas it is MM. Rostand and Barrès. And yet the author of Cyrano de Bergerac, despite illness, came from Campo specially to vote.

M. Maurice Barrès is probably the more widely interesting of the two new members of the French Academy. We have told before the story of the ingenuity with which he advertised the magazine, Les Taches d'encre, which he edited in his youth. The assassination of Morin by Mme. Clovis Hugues was, at the moment, the talk of the town. "Morin ne lira plus 'Les taches d'encre'" was the inscription on the boards of the sandwichmen whom M. Barrès sent round the streets. It amused the populace, but it did not sell his paper. He was very disappointed, and confessed to a friend with whom he was conversing in front of Tortoni's that he would shrink from no folly from which he could derive publicity. "I even feel capable," he said, "of getting out of my carriage in a state of nudity at the foot of this flight of steps." From that enterprise, however, he was dissuaded; and he ultimately obtained his publicity by other means.

Les Taches d'encre, being the production of a boy of two-and-twenty, bore the stamp of youth and amateurishness. We find the indication in the announcement that "this paper, being literary, will seldom have anything to say about the theatre." We also find it in a later and more delightful announcement that "the staff being down with influenza, the paper will come out late as usual." Some brilliant things, however, were printed in its pages—some of the editor's own short stories, among them—and M. Jules Claretie predicted a distinguished future for him. "Make a note of the name of Maurice Barrès," he wrote to a friend, "I prophesy that it will become famous."

M. Barrès's career, however, has not been solely literary. He has been mixed up in a good many political movements, including Boulangism, Nationalism, and Anti-Semitism, and has had some stormy adventures. Once, while conducting an Anti-Semitism campaign in Lorraine, he was set upon by a mob, thrown out of his carriage, which was smashed to atoms, and dragged about a muddy road by the heels. There was a day when he wrote a letter for publication, renouncing political strife for ever; but three weeks afterwards he was rushing in an express train from Italy to Paris to offer himself as a candidate for one of the arrondissements. He has travelled much, but his heart is always at home. It has been written of him that "in Greece he saw only the Gothic ruins of the crusades, and at Athens it was of Lorraine that he was thinking."

Mr. Henry Jackson, the new Regius Professor of Greek at Cambridge, is said to be the only man who ever beat Sir Richard Jebb in an examination. This was in a competition for one of the University prizes. In the Classical Tripos he was third in the year in which Jebb was Senior. Like Jowett, he is perhaps greater as a Platonist than as a Hellenist; but no one is likely to say of him—what scoffers said of Jowett—that he will now have a motive for learning Greek, and that his appointment is thus an instance of "the endowment of research."

We have sometimes told stories illustrating the methods in which authors advertise themselves and their books. As an example of the early methods of publishers, an advertisement which the Observer reprints from its issue of a hundred years ago is worthy of prominence. The names of the works announced do not matter, since they have long since been forgotten; but the list is followed by these delightful, though ungrammatical, remarks: "The above have been read by a respectable literary gentleman, who approves of the moral tendency and abilities of the writers. All of which are written in chapters." When we next receive the insidious paragraph which sometimes relates how such-and-such a new sensational romance has kept the typewriters gasping, or caused them to fight for the privilege of transcribing the next instalment, this is the precedent that we shall recall.

Mr. Oliphant Smeaton, in proposing the "Immortal Memory" at the joint dinner the other day of the Edinburgh Burns and the Ninety Burns Clubs in the Scottish capital, quoted from the Lounger of December 9, 1786 (four months after the issue of the Kilmarnock edition), an estimate of the work of the northern bard by Henry Mackenzie, "The Man of Feeling," which has particular interest from the circumstance that it elicited complete approval from William Cowper. "The power of Burns's genius is not less admirable" (wrote the now forgotten Edinburgh littérateur) in tracing the manners than in painting the passions or in drawing the scenery of nature. Though I am far from meaning to compare our rustic bard to Shakespeare, yet whoever will read his lighter and more humorous poems, the dialogue of 'The Twa Dogs,' his 'Dedication to Gavin Hamilton,' his 'Epistle to a Young Friend,' and to 'W— S—,' will perceive with what uncommon penetration and sagacity this heaven-taught ploughman from his humble and unlettered station has looked upon men and manners."

We mentioned not long ago the reproach against Gravesend of the indifference to the Dickens memories associated with many of its buildings and surroundings, and to its situation in the heart of the Dickens country. That reproach is about to be removed. A branch of the Dickens Fellowship has been founded in the town, and the inaugural meeting is to take place under mayoral auspices. This tardy recognition, however, will not explain away Dickens's indifference to Gravesend.

The London Branch of the Allgemeinen Deutschen Sprachvereins, or General German Language Association, will hold its Seventh Anniversary Meeting this (Saturday) afternoon, at the Holborn Viaduct Hotel at half-past four. The Association has now some six hundred members in England, at least half of whom are English by birth or naturalisation. The founder and president of the Branch is Dr. Aloys Weiss; and the object of its labours is to promote in England a knowledge and love of the German language and literature, in the sure hope that the increase of such knowledge will tend to the increase of mutual admiration and friendship between the two countries. Lectures, meetings, the dissemination of books, and examinations are the processes it employs in its successful and truly valuable work. The proceedings this afternoon will consist of a reception, the transaction of certain necessary business, the Presidential address at 5.30, a lecture by Professor Walter Rippman on "Grave and Gay in the Sayings of Hans Sachs," a concert and a réunion. The Secretaries are Dr. Ludwig Hirsch, Bonna, 25 Gleneldon Road, Streatham, and Mr. Adolf Schönheyde, Wilhelmina Villa, Alwyne Road, Canonbury.

On February 5 will be opened at the Royal Photographic Society's house, 66 Russell Square, an exhibition of remarkable photographs of persons and places by Mr. Alvin Langdon Coburn, an American gentleman of twenty-three, who has already made a big reputation on both sides of the Atlantic. His portraits include a number of modern men of letters; his views of places; scenes in New York, London, Edinburgh, Assisi, Sicily, Rome and Venice. Mr. George Bernard Shaw contributes an introduction to the catalogue. The exhibition remains open till March 31.

The arrangements of the Society of Arts for next week are as follows: Monday, February 5, at 8 P.M.—Cantor Lectures: "Modern Warships," by Sir William White, K.C.B., F.R.S. (five lectures); Lecture II.—Armour protection—system of disposition—methods of manufacturing armour plates—recent improvements in quality, and consequent changes in designs of warships. Tuesday, February 6, at 4.30 P.M.—Colonial Section: "Imperial Immigration," by Octavius Charles Beale, President of the Federal Council of the Chambers of Manufactures of Australia; the Right Hon. the Earl of Elgin, K.G., G.C.S.I., K.C.I.E., Secretary of State for the Colonies, will preside. Wednesday, February 7, at 8 P.M.—Tenth Ordinary Meeting: "Progress in Electric Lighting," by Leon Gaster, A.M.I.E.E.; Sir William Preece, K.C.B., F.R.S., will preside.

On Tuesday, February 9, at 2.30, Messrs. Vedrenne and Barker will produce at the Court Theatre A Question of Age, a comedy in three acts, by Robert Vernon Harcourt, and The Convict on the Hearth, by Frederick Fenn. The plays will be repeated on the afternoons of February 9, 13, 16, 20 and 23.

At the London Institution, Finsbury Circus, Mrs. E. Burton Brown will deliver an illustrated lecture on "The Development of Sculpture in Greece and Rome" on Monday next at 5 P.M. On Thursday, at 6 P.M., Dr. F. J. Sawyer will deliver an illustrated lecture on "The History of England as taught in its songs."

The Institute of Civil Engineers. Ordinary Meeting, Tuesday, February 6, at 8 P.M.; Paper to be further discussed: "The Railway-Gauges of India," by Frederick Robert Upcott, C.S.I., M. Inst. C.E.; and ballot for new members. Students' meeting, Friday, February 9, at 8 P.M.; Paper to be read: "Electric Driving at the Locomotive-works of the North London Railway," by R. H. Mackie, Stud. Inst. C.E.

LITERATURE

THE STATESMAN AS CRITIC

Wallace, Burns, R. L. Stevenson. Appreciations by Lord ROSEBERY. (Stirling: Mackay, 2s. 6d. net.)

MANY professional literary men rejoice in the possession of one or two friends who, though they do not pretend to be critics in the true sense of the term, nevertheless possess a sane and sound judgment of books, which renders their conversation as delightful as it is instructive. The fact that their energies are chiefly directed to other than literary pursuits, and that their lives are commercial or professional, though it gives colour to what they say, in nowise invalidates the opinions they express. On the contrary, their more direct contact with life emancipates them from a certain atmosphere of the study in which things are often seen out of proportion. Lord Rosebery may be described as a glorified example of this broad-minded style of figure; his highest interests are not, in the strictest sense, literary, but he possesses a sincere love of books, and his judgment has been purified by a wide experience and by the habit of looking at questions which influence a great mass of men. It is this which enhances the value of the lectures brought together in the book before us; here, no attempt is made to supplant the work of the expert critic, which lies in two directions—learning and taste. The learned critic is most deeply interested in texts and sources; he knows that there is no plant without its seed, and he will show how some of the most exquisite songs of Burns, for instance, were built up and welded together out of fragments picked from many quarters. On the other hand, the æsthetic critic is valuable for the reason that he points the way to what is admirable—delights in perfect expression and is a connoisseur of phrase and sentence. The appreciation of a man like Lord Rosebery supplements these others.

Like Carlyle, he seems, in reviewing the life of Robert Burns, to be struck most with the all-round ability of the poet; he quotes with gusto the saying of the Duchess of Gordon: "No man's conversation ever carried me so completely off my feet," and remarks that she who spoke was the friend of Pitt and the London wits—the queen of Scottish society. Again, he gives us the well-weighed deliverance of Dugald Stewart:

All the faculties of Burns's mind were, so far as I could judge, equally vigorous; and his predilection for poetry was rather the result of his own enthusiastic and impassioned temper than of a genius exclusively adapted to that species of composition. From his conversation I should have pronounced him to be fitted to excel in whatever walk of ambition he had chosen to exert his abilities.

And of his prose compositions the most severe judge spoke thus:

Their great and various excellencies render some of them scarcely less objects of wonder than his poetical performances. The late Dr. Robertson used to say that, considering his education, the former seemed to him the more extraordinary of the two.

The marvel is that the man who is truly able in one direction is also able in many; it was probably by a sort of accident that Burns became a poet. There are many other careers in which he might possibly have won equal, if not greater distinction, and in descanting on what he actually did, Lord Rosebery's interest is somewhat larger and broader than that of a professional writer. He sees that Burns gave endurance to the dialect of Scotland—that but for his exquisite use of it, it might have faded away altogether, or come to be regarded only as a grotesque English patois. Just as we study the early language of our ancestors in order to have a full understanding of Chaucer, so we familiarise ourselves with Scotch in order to know Burns; for, like almost all other poets, he is untranslatable; there is no rendering of his works either in English, French, or German that at all does justice to them. He is, indeed, as difficult to translate as Horace or Heine. In regard to the sins and transgressions of the bard, Lord Rosebery is still bent upon drawing a wide moral for popular use. The following is one of the most eloquent passages in the address he delivered at Glasgow:

Is it not then, when all seems blank and lightless and lifeless, when strength and courage flag, and when perfection seems as remote as a star, is it not then that imperfection helps us? When we see that the greatest and choicest images of God have had their weaknesses like ours, their temptations, their hours of darkness, their bloody sweat, are we not encouraged by their lapses and catastrophes to find energy for one more effort, one more struggle? Where they failed we feel it a less dishonour to fail; their errors and sorrows make, as it were, an easier ascent from imperfection to infinite perfection.

His oration on Robert Louis Stevenson is in a different tone. Here he praises the "sedulous ape," but, of course, he does not ignore the fact that Stevenson had a certain genius of his own to begin with; if a dullard were to follow his example, the result would most probably be disastrous. But it would be useless to deny that the man who wrote those pathetic lines—the lines printed over his grave at Samoa and under his statue at Edinburgh, lines which one can never read without a new emotion—must be recognised as a voice and no echo:

Under the wide and starry sky
Dig the grave and let me lie.
Glad did I live, and gladly die,
And I laid me down with a will.

This be the verse you grave for me:
Here he lies where he longed to be;
Home is the sailor, home from the sea,
And the hunter home from the hill.

With the concluding sentiment of Lord Rosebery's address, we have considerable sympathy; he says that there would be few mourners if the Edinburgh statues transformed themselves into Gadarene swine and ran headlong into the sea at Leith. Perhaps an exception might be made in favour of Scott's monument, which forms, and we hope ever will form, a fitting centre for the metropolis of the North; but for the rest, Edinburgh would be none the poorer were its statues swept away.

IN MEMORIAM

In Memoriam. Annotated by the Author. (Macmillan, 5s. net.)

It was a feeling of true piety that moved the present Lord Tennyson to give us his father's own notes on the "In Memoriam"; though it is only too clear from the poet's words, which are quoted in the preface, that the supplying of notes to his own poems was a thoroughly uncongenial task. The truth is that "In Memoriam" is, and must remain, an obscure poem, though full of bright points of light. It is obscure, partly because it appears to have a coherent plan and structure, while as a matter of fact the structure is essentially desultory; and further it is obscure, both because of its compressed allusiveness, and because it is full of echoes, echoes of thoughts and phrases that were familiar to the poet, but which are not necessarily familiar to his readers. The poem is a learned poem; it is not a piece of pure fancy, of spontaneous imagination, but the mature work of a man who had read widely, and pondered, in a poetical way, scientific problems. It is probably fair to say that what has displaced the poem from the lofty position of influence that it once possessed over the most thoughtful minds of the time is that the science with which it is permeated is the early Victorian science;—that is to say, the science which was bent, not so much on the unflinching investigation of things as they are, as on the attempt to discover that the teaching of science was not really at variance with the teaching of revealed religion. In this respect Tennyson, who had an extraordinary faculty for seeing into the heart of a question, arrived, it is clear, at a more unbiassed view of the situation than most of his contemporaries; but he felt his responsibility to religious feeling so strongly, he was, like the Psalmist, so utterly purposed that his mouth should not offend, that he tended to use a phraseology which seemed to imply a greater degree of orthodoxy than he really owned.

There are certain lyrics of "In Memoriam" which will continue to rank among Tennyson's very best poems. But interspersed with these are lyrics which are really neither forcible nor lucid. We will quote a single instance of a section which is radically obscure, and on which no real light is cast by the commentary (No. lxi.).

If, in thy second state sublime,
Thy ransom'd reason change replies
With all the circle of the wise,
The perfect flower of human time ;

And if thou cast thine eyes below,
How dimly character'd and slight,
How dwarf'd a growth of cold and night,
How blanch'd with darkness must I grow !

Yet turn thee to the doubtful shore,
Where thy first form was made a man ;
I loved thee, Spirit, and love, nor can
The soul of Shakespeare love thee more.

All the assistance that Tennyson claims to give to the reader of these intricate lines, is the comment: "In power of love not even the greatest dead can surpass the poet." It is, indeed, plain that this is the meaning of the last two lines; but how many readers could disentangle the complicated texture of the first two stanzas?

Moreover, the orthography of this book is not perfect. What, for instance, could be more unfortunate than that in the fine stanza (cxxvi.) the line should have the word "hear" misprinted as "here," which is fatal to the grammar, while the mistake is again repeated in the notes?

And hear at times a sentinel, etc.,

The interest, after all, of the commentary is, partly, that we see, so to speak, the dust and chips of the workshop, and partly, too, that we discover the thought which underlies the poems to be really neither abstruse nor recondite at all; it is, to use a metaphor, as though we were shown the very ordinary soap and water, out of which the swimming opalescent bubbles were blown by the breath of the poet.

Nothing gives us a finer idea of the splendid reserve and economy of Tennyson than to see the poems which he discarded, though they contained memorable stanzas, because they were otiose or faulty in structure; and, on the other hand, nothing is more enlightening than to see, as we do, the thoughts that are common to all intelligent minds, which formed the substance of some of the noblest poems, displayed in all their bareness: that is, after all, the work of the great poet—to seize an ordinary thought, which in its bare prose outline is little more than a platitude, and to exalt it by art into a noble and memorable phrase, giving a holy and solemn music to an idea which could otherwise hardly be recognised as profound at all.

But the book is, after all, a book for poets to read; because the ordinary, sensible person might only, in studying it, come to the conclusion that the essence of high poetry, when thus extracted from its mature form, was of a kind that was hardly worth the trouble of the process. To be confronted, after a strenuous intellectual effort with a perfectly familiar and simple thought—a Philistine might think that it was hardly worth the trouble! and none but a poet can discern the exquisite alchemy, which transmutes the commonplace material into something which has power to move, and comfort, and sustain the irresolute and failing soul.

GEOGRAPHY AND IMAGINATION

The English Voyages of the Sixteenth Century. By WALTER RALEIGH. (Glasgow: MacLehose, 4s. 6d. net.)

PROFESSOR WALTER RALEIGH has here given us an extremely interesting book, of which one chapter is devoted to the English Voyagers of the sixteenth century, one to Richard Hakluyt, and the third, which concerns us most, with the influence of the voyages on poetry and imagination. It is, in a way, an attempt to explain how in the spacious days England became a nest of singing birds. Man's imagination, we are told, is limited by the horizon of his experience. We are all strictly bounded in our knowledge, but here and there occurs a rift in the cloud or a new prospect gained by climbing; and, when this happens, we have one of the great ages of the world. Mr. Raleigh argues that it was thus in the age of Elizabeth.

The recovery of the classics opened a long and fair vista backwards; the exploration of the New World seemed to lift the curtain on a glorious future. And the English, the little parochial people, who for centuries had tilled their fields and tended their cattle in their island home, cut off from the great movements of European policy, suddenly found themselves, by virtue of their shipping, competitors for the dominion of the earth. It is no wonder that their hearts distended with pride, and, hardening in their strength, gloried. A new sense of exaltation possessed the country, the exaltation of knowledge and power. The rising tide of national enthusiasm flooded the literature of the people, and surprised the dwellers on many a high and dry inland creek.

He then proceeds by the method of analysis to trace the influence of the voyages on the poetry of the time. The discovery of foreign lands had certainly set the poets dreaming the most gorgeous dreams, the most notable being undoubtedly to be found in Christopher Marlowe. Mr. Raleigh says that the tasks which Dr. Faustus assigns to his serviceable spirits might have been studied from the reports of travellers:

I'll have them fly to India for gold,
Ransack the Ocean for orient pearl,
And search all corners of the new-found world
For pleasant fruits and princely delicacies; . . .
I'll levy soldiers with the coin they bring,
And chase the Prince of Parma from our land
And reign sole King of all our Provinces.

Marlowe reached some of his highest points of eloquence in dealing with the sea, and it is curious that Shakespeare, who was inland bred, developed the same characteristic. Mr. Raleigh points out that a genuine sailor's "chanty" is introduced into The Tempest:

The master, the swabber, the boatswain, and I,
The gunner, and his mate,
Loved Moll, Meg, and Marian, and Margery,
But none of us cared for Kate;

and remarks on this that the little lyric with its "scurvy tune" suggests life ashore. One of Shakespeare's most eloquent references occurs in Ludovico's last apostrophe to Iago:

O Spartan dog
More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea.

Shakespeare's acquaintance with the work of the voyagers is betrayed, according to our author, by the use of the name Caliban, a distortion of cannibal, and Setebos, who is a divinity of the Patagonians, is described by Master Francis Fletcher as "Settaboth, that is, the Divell, whom they name their great god."

Another point to which Mr. Raleigh draws attention we have not seen noticed before. It is that in The Tempest Shakespeare was chaffing the imperialists of his time.

The humours of this ideal as a practical theory of colonisation tickled Shakespeare's fancy; the combination of the virtues of the Golden Age with that extension of trade and of sovereignty which was aimed at by the explorers made a delightful paradox; and he interrupts Gonzalo's speech with a running fire of scornful comment from the two men of sin.

We have quoted sufficient to show that the Professor of English Literature in the University of Oxford has succeeded here in writing a most interesting and suggestive chapter. The subject is one we hope he will return to. It has been treated by the late John Richard Green and others, but the vivifying touch of Mr. Raleigh produces freshness wherever it alights.

TINSEL QUEENS

Queens of the French Stage. By H. NORL WILLIAMS. (Harper, 10s. 6d.)

IF we begin by saying that we were disappointed in Mr. Williams's volume, we must hasten to add that it was nobody's fault but our own. We had expected something much more scientific—a history, in fact, of French acting from the pre-Molièrian times, through that great reformer, through la Champmeslé and Adrienne Lecouvreur and Rachel, to the modern French stage—Bernhardt, Réjane, and the rest. In forming these expectations we had forgotten the nature of Mr. Williams's previous books—his “Madame Récamier,” his “Madame du Barry” and others—pleasant, chatty chronicles, in which a due regard to the most recent discoveries of fact was not allowed to interfere with the attractions of gossip. The history of French acting still remains to be written for English readers. In the book before us there are plenty of indications that material is not lacking; and this book would have been a good opportunity for its ordered use. With Molière and Armande Béjart, his wife, we have the first revolt against the stilted declamation and pseudo-classical stiffness of the Hôtel de Bourgogne. After Molière's death we get back, with Marie de Champmeslé, to the tradition which Molière attempted to break down, so far as comedy was concerned. La Champmeslé was the greatest exponent of the school which sang rather than spoke its lines. “A kind of measured chant” is Mr. Williams's apt phrase for the diction that was in fashion. Adrienne Lecouvreur revolted against these “bawlings,” as Riccoboni called them. She conceived the idea that the characters in a tragedy were, after all, human beings suffering natural emotions, and that they should express their feelings like human beings, and not in accordance with what the Middle Ages supposed to have been the diction of Greek gods and heroes. The fight was long and bitter. The Quinaults, Duclos and Desmares—indeed, the whole Société—opposed her by fair means and foul, by open dispute and petty annoyance. The fight would probably have gone against her, had not there risen, from the grave as it seemed, a Molièrian ghost—the great Baron, who had played with Molière, had loved (if scandal spoke truly) the wife of Molière, and came back at the age of sixty-seven, after twenty-four years of private life, to throw the weight of his immense reputation and his unequalled gifts into the scale with the plucky Adrienne. There is no more dramatic incident in all the history of the art of acting. The battle was won; the “natural” school held the field, and it only remained for succeeding players to clear away surviving abuses. With Justine Favart, in the middle of the eighteenth century, we have the reform of costume.

Before her time, actresses who played the parts of soubrettes and peasant-girls wore immense paniers, with diamonds in their hair and long gloves reaching to the elbow. But when, in August 1753, she created the rôle of Bastienne in Les Amours de Bastien et Bastienne, a parody of Jean Jacques Rousseau's Devin du village, which she had composed herself in collaboration with Harny, she appeared on the stage wearing a simple woollen gown, with her hair flat on her head, a cross of gold on her neck, bare arms and wooden shoes. The sabots offended some critics in the pit, and murmurs of disapprobation were heard. The Abbé de Voisenon, however, saved the situation by a happy mot. “Messieurs,” he cried, “ces sabots-là donneront des souliers aux comédiens.” The pit, appreciating the abbé's wit, broke into laughter and applause. . . . In Les Trois Sultanes, the plot of which was derived, like several other of Favart's vaudevilles, from the Contes moraux of Marmontel, she played the part of Roxelane in a dress “made at Constantinople with the materials of the country.” This was the first occasion on which the costume of Turkish ladies had been seen upon the French stage, and though Favart himself declares that it was “at once decent and voluptuous,” it was objected to; and when soon afterwards another play in which the action passed in the Orient was represented before the Court, Justine's reforming zeal received an abrupt check by an order from the Gentlemen of the Chamber to confine herself to the ridiculous and fantastic costume established by custom.

Under the influence of Marmontel, Mademoiselle Clairon—the admired of Goldsmith and Garrick—removed the last traces of the “tragical hiccup,” as Garrick called it, of the French tragedian, still further naturalised gesture and movement, and, unlike the impulsively natural Dumesnil, approached most nearly to the modern actor and actress by making a science of nature, determining beforehand exactly what the character would do in such and such a circumstance, and then practising it till it appeared to be done on impulse.

Had Mr. Williams cared to develop this side of his story, his work would have had a more permanent value, but it would not have been nearly so amusing to read. He is mainly concerned with the biographies of these ladies, Armande Béjart, Marie de Champmeslé, Adrienne Lecouvreur, Justine Favart, and Claire-Joseph-Hippolyte Clairon. He does not touch Rachel, and the inclusion of the dancer, Marie-Anne de Camargo, will serve to show what his main preoccupation is. He tells his stories well, and while making no attempt to “whitewash” his heroines, he protects them against the unfounded scandal that—then as now—attacked the memories of famous actresses. Armande Béjart was the wife of Molière, but she was not also his daughter, as his rival and enemy Montfleury insinuated in a memorial to the King and the author of the Fameuse Comédienne practically declared. She was certainly a heartless coquette; she was not—or so Mr. Williams tries chivalrously to prove—unfaithful to her husband; but we think he goes too far in trying to prove that she was not mercenary. La Champmeslé, a married woman, was the mistress of Racine, and deceived him with Charles de Sévigné, the Comte de Clermont-Tonnerre, and many others; Adrienne Lecouvreur, as she ousted the artificial from tragedy, so she ousted the merely mercenary from her amours: “She loved,” says M. Paléologue, “by a moral inclination,” and was morally inclined to a good many people, including, probably, Voltaire, in favour of whom, as Mr. Williams puts it, she may have “yielded to the customs of the profession.”

The love of her life was probably Clavel, the actor, and the letter to him in which she practically begs him not to marry her because it would be against his interests, is justly called by M. Larroumet: “one of the tenderest and most touching letters to be found in literature, real or imaginative.” Justine Favart—by instinct and desire an honest wife—suffered extraordinary persecutions at the hands of Maurice de Saxe, then an elderly Don Juan, who in former days had been one of Adrienne's “moral” inclinations, and who at the age of fifty odd wooed Justine with verses stolen from Voltaire, imprisonment in a convent, abduction, threats to murder her husband and other pleasant approaches. Clairon was the mistress of Marmontel, and of others too numerous to record.

Our brief résumé will give some idea of what may be found in Mr. Williams's book. In ordinary circumstances such matter would be tedious enough; in the present case it has an interest far above that of common scandalous gossip. At point after point we touch the history of French literature. We see the intimate connection between the poet and dramatist and the theatre, a connection usually at its most intimate between the dramatist and the leading lady. Indeed, Mr. Williams conveys far more information on the history of acting than he would seem to, because in most cases it was just through the liaison (in Molière's case, the marriage) between author and actress that new ideas of the art were conceived and brought into being. Molière—Racine—Voltaire—Marmontel: there you have four very important steps in the history of the French theatre; and if Mr. Williams has made the personal side of his history, rather than the artistic, the prominent side, why, so much the more readable will his book be found by those who are not students of the art of acting. It remains to be said that he tells his stories very well, and has a wide knowledge of the memoirs, the letters, the epigrams and so forth which illustrate his subjects, and quotes them freely on his handsome pages. The illustrations are well chosen and well reproduced.

BIRDS, AND RED HERRINGS

The Bird-Watcher in the Shetlands. With some Notes on Seals—and Digressions. By EDMUND SELOUS. Illustrated by J. SMIT. (Dent, 10s. 6d. net.)

THERE is a distinct development, in the present volume, of Mr. Selous's characteristic manner, as displayed in his two former books on the same subject. We have the same power of observing and recording minutely, the same impromptu, but vivid and literary, style, and the same excursions along trains of thought which may or may not be particularly relevant to the subject in hand. But this time the observations are less copious, though not less thorough, and the digressions more plentiful and luxuriant. The author, indeed, glories in his digressiveness, proclaiming it in his title, and justifying his profession with much zest and thoroughness as he unfolds his tale. There is less in this book of the phonetic rendering of the nuptial cries of stock-doves or puffins, and more of the characteristic literary allusiveness and the arguments from the foot to Hercules. Mr. Selous is a somewhat "harbiterary gent," and most other members of the human species who presume to follow him in his contentions may expect a good deal of sportive and back-handed bludgeoning as they go. They must not look for the same consideration as if they were guillemot chickens or green cormorants. But those of them who are less minutely patient naturalists than this very impatient writer will find his latest book far more entertaining reading than its excellent predecessors. It is less a catalogue of squawks and gestures, and more generally picturesque and episodic in treatment.

The book is a record of several lonely weeks spent on the Shetland sea-cliffs in what passed for the summer of 1902. Few naturalists would have shown the author's perseverance in observation during such weather as he describes, even if they would have borne with equanimity his other cross of "doing for himself" in a small and incommensurable cabin. His longings for some one to cook his porridge for him are among the most human touches in the book. Though the breeding-season was almost over, on this second visit the author had before him, day after day, thousands of the strange and beautiful sea-birds of those most bird-loved of islands, including such scarcer species as the fulmar petrel and both kinds of skua. Incidentally he raises a well-grounded protest against the name of "Richardson's skua" as applied to the smaller, or "Arctic," species. There is undoubtedly, to most people's taste who love wild birds, something distasteful and inharmonious about the proprietary sort of nomenclature, so far as the English name in common use is concerned. As a method of doing honour to the naturalist who discovered or otherwise elucidated the bird as a species, it is surely better to perpetuate him in the Latin name of science, if in this way at all. The author had also under frequent observation a well-stocked seal-cove resorted to by seals of two different species, and his account of these active and playful creatures is full of pleasant charm. He has covered a good deal of the ground on these Shetland cliffs in his book, "Bird Watching," but the observations here brought forward have plenty of interest and originality.

Mr. Selous's most distinctive characteristic as a naturalist is his refusal to take anybody else's word for anything, and, when this attitude is joined to such rare patience and ability to observe, it is a valuable qualification. He has also to a very considerable degree that power of inference and interpretation which every naturalist needs if he is to follow up the immense vistas of understanding which reveal themselves as he studies his subject in the light of the evolutionary theory. No one who attempts to understand birds' motives or to interpret their actions can confine his speculations and inferences to the ornithological kingdom, and many of Mr. Selous's extensions of argument to the spheres of men and of morals are full of acute and suggestive thought. But few writers have embarked upon philosophy in so unphilosophic a spirit as Mr. Selous in many of his most characteristic excursions, and he shows himself so incapable of treating the other side of any question with a moment's patient hearing that he is sometimes merely puerile. His disdain of other people's opinions is a capital quality so long as he is among the birds, but it is bound to serve him somewhat ill when he flies high and wide on a course of his own into all the problems of moral and natural philosophy, which are too extensive for the accurate single-handed observation of even the acutest ornithologist. But Mr. Selous is always interesting, even in his most desperately petulant tantrums, and he cares far too much for the interests of truth to let his beliefs have any influence on his observations. To all who are interested in bird-study the appearance of one of his books is an event of genuine importance.

REVIEWS AND MAGAZINES

THE Quarterly for January is particularly strong, and this may be said of all the reviews and magazines that have come under our notice. Professor Francis Gummere's learned critical article on "Originality and Convention in Literature" we have noticed in a previous number; and it is enough for our present purpose to call attention to Mr. Schiller on "Plato and his Predecessors." In "Art under the Roman Empire," Mr. H. Stuart Jones, plunging into one of the vexed questions of archaeology, traces in his own way the history of art from the last century of the Republic to the Christian art of the fourth century—the date of the mosaics of S. Maria Maggiore, and probably, we may add, of S. Prassede and other churches in Rome; noting the changes that came over the arts owing to the rise and decay of Hellenism; the forced growth of Augustan art; the brief brilliance of Flavian art; the gradual encroachment of Orientalism; the changes introduced into architecture and ornament by the fact that the importance was shifted from the outside of the Pagan temple to the inside of the Christian basilica. Perhaps the most interesting element in Mr. Stuart Jones's sound article is the stress he lays on the native sculpture of the Romans and Italians themselves, the art of portraiture in stone which continued, unaffected by foreign influence, but affecting here and there imported art. This was the art which gave us the vivid, brutal, convincing busts of Roman and Italian men and women which rouse our admiration in the museums; and its history and importance are given in this article the prominence they deserve. Mr. Sidney T. Irwin writes well on Hazlitt and Lamb; Hazlitt the critic, and the modern critic, to whom modern prose owes more than we are apt to realise; Lamb, the poet; not a critic, but "the steward of the poet's mysteries, who brings forth of his treasures things new and old." In the same Review, "Vernon Lee" writes on "The Riddle of Music," i.e., the presence in music of the two elements, the emotional or associative, and the æsthetic. The two are interdependent or interacting, and their origin, explanation and action are discussed in a philosophic and most interesting article.

Curiously enough, there are papers on Fanny Burney in both the Quarterly and the Edinburgh. The writer of the lumbering, slipshod article in the latter dwells on Fanny Burney as the representative of a class that was new in her day, the cultivated middle class that was just coming into existence. In the Quarterly Mr. J. C. Bailey writes a very charming and subtly critical article on Fanny as the "demoiselle de quatorze ans," as Mme. de Staël called her; the Fanny who never allowed herself to grow up, to develop; the woman who hugged all the restraints and conventions of womanhood and thought always of others rather than of herself, "the martyr of conscience, the devotedly obedient daughter, the most sincerely humble-minded of all the people who have written successful books," who achieved a triumph which was, indeed, the triumph of her sex.

Mr. Bailey, like the writer in the Edinburgh, dwells on the value of the Diary and of the picture it gives of Dr. Johnson. Reference to the very able article in the Edinburgh on "Lucretius and his times" will be found elsewhere in this number. That on "The Visionary Art of William Blake" does much to explain what is difficult and strange in that artist's nature: his hatred of oils, of chiaroscuro and of Nature. "Nathaniel Hawthorne, Man and Author," says nothing, we think that has not been said before, except perhaps in pointing out the resemblance between Donatello in "Transformation" and Pater's Denys l'Auxerrois. "Thought in Architecture" continues the valuable line of thought started in a recent Edinburgh, and noted in the ACADEMY of August 5; and the historical paper on "The British Museum Library and its Catalogue" pays deserved tribute to the colossal work, and suggests one or two reforms. With one of these—the abolition of the volumes of the Catalogue marked "Academies"—we heartily agree; but the writer does not seem—we speak with due deference to one who is clearly an authority on the subject—to realise the difficulty of separating I from J in a Catalogue containing all languages.

In the Fortnightly, besides the second of Tolstoy's articles on "The End of the Age," the first of Mr. Henry James's "New York: Social Notes," and Mr. H. C. Shelley's paper on "Ebenezer Elliott, the Poet of Free Trade," we have read with great interest Mr. H. M. Paull's "Critical Notes on As You Like It." Mr. Paull compares Shakespeare's play with its original, the story in Lodge's Euphues, and with the original of Lodge's story, "The Coke's Tale of Gamelyn." A careful columnar comparison of the three plots shows, once again, Shakespeare's genius in making use of his material. Another good point made by Mr. Paull is this: that the idée mère of the play is not that country life is all good, town-life all bad, as Hazlitt interpreted it, but that both are good or bad according to the strength or weakness of the man who lives them. That is both a far truer and a far more Shakespearean view of life than the usual interpretation of the play affords. Incidentally, Mr. Paull explains that it is to this "moral", and not to the construction or classification of the play, that its odd title refers.

The Dublin Review is one which non-Catholic readers should not allow themselves to overlook. Frankly a Catholic Review, it contains a great deal of sound criticism and literature that may be read with profit and pleasure by all who have outgrown childish intolerance. The number before us (January 1906) is particularly good. Professor J. S. Phillimore culls ivy-berries from the anthology: in other words, he writes on Leonidas of Tarentum, with quotations beautifully translated into real English lyrics. Mrs. Meynell's poem "To the Body"; Father Thurston's paper on the Prætorium of Pilate and the Pillar of the Scourging, an article on St. Catherine of Siena's Letters, and the Abbé Dionnet's views on the Church in France are all things that may be read by people of all shades of religious opinion, while to the educated Catholics of the country this excellent review stands in no need of commendation.

In the Contemporary Review we find a very interesting article by Mr. Havelock Ellis on "The Celtic Spirit in Literature." What is this Celtic spirit? It may be divided, says Mr. Ellis, under two heads: the love of the remote as remote—the preference, that is, for the world of twilight over the everyday world of fact—and the love of the decorative in method. These two features are the result of two qualities in the Celtic nature, inventiveness, and quick sensibility to impressions. This latter must be carefully distinguished from emotion. The Celts, says Mr. Ellis, are not emotional. The human does not interest them much; they live in a land of dreams. On the other hand the Nordic spirit, that is the spirit of the fair, long-headed peoples of Northern Europe, of the peoples who produced the Icelandic Eddas and the "Chanson de Roland" is emotional; it loves fact, and shuns mystery; it is solely interested in the human, is practical, a little monotonous and goes far deeper than the Celtic. Mr. Ellis goes on to show how these two qualities, the Celtic and Nordic, are to be found combined in great English writers. He regards the union as the secret of our pre-eminence in literature. Shakespeare shows throughout "a constant dramatic opposition and contrast" of these two elements; but the further he developed, the more Celtic he became, and Prospero in The Tempest is "the supreme embodiment of a Celtic artist in literature." Ben Jonson was far more purely Nordic; so was Bacon; but in Chaucer, Spenser, Sir Thomas Browne, Keats, Coleridge and Hawthorne, this Celtic spirit is present in large measure. A most interesting and suggestive paper contains also a shocking example of a very Nordic poet coming to grief over a very Celtic subject—Tennyson's "Idylls of the King."

In Blackwood's Magazine (Blackwood's is always very hard to beat), the Warden of Wadham writes in defence of John Williams, who married Cromwell's sister, "trimmed" between King and Parliament, Church and Chapel, and was made Warden of Wadham by the Presbyterians, Master of Trinity, Cambridge, by the Independents, and Bishop of Chester after the Restoration. Mr. Barry Pain has a long poem, "The Dream of the Dead World," and the whole of the magazine is as interesting and good as ever.

The Cornhill Magazine for February, too, is a good number. Mr. A. D. Godley has some verses, not quite up to his best; Mr. S. J. Tallentyre writes on "Society in the Time of Voltaire"; the series, "From a College Window," is continued; Mr. Warwick H. Draper writes on "George Eliot's Coventry Friends," and there is a brilliant article by "A Young Playgoer" on the "Grandeur et Décadence de Bernard Shaw." The young playgoer pays a handsome tribute to Mr. Shaw's wit and vivacity, "the vigour, the suppleness, the adorable rat-tat" of his writings, and proceeds to show, with infinite coolness and exactitude, that Mr. Shaw is, in spite of all, a moral coward. He wrote, in the face of opposition, four good plays, Arms and the Man, Widower's Houses, Mrs. Warren's Profession, and Candida. By that time he had mastered the difficulties of his art, and had become "spoiled" by success: thenceforth he has let his fatal facility master him. He is not thorough; in fact, he shirks. His technique has fallen to pieces (the young playgoer is of opinion that of John Bull's Other Island, Acts I. and II. could, with a little alteration, be omitted entire, Act V. without any). In that play, and again in Major Barbara, he shies at the personal problems which the action raises; sheers off to further needless discussion of "ideas" which are not new. It is a clever indictment, and a true one (something of the same sort has been tentatively expressed in these columns before); moreover it is written in the best of good taste and temper. Mr. Andrew Lang in "Freeman versus Froude" is neater than ever. Froude was an honourable, an absolutely honourable historian ("no sane man could doubt" that); but—Mr. Lang devotes page after page to showing mistakes of Froude's which came in surprisingly useful to an historian of a violent Protestant bias. At the same time, Freeman was an ill-mannered, ill-equipped critic: what an attack he might have made if he had only known one half of the "mistakes" which Froude was guilty of!

In the Atlantic Monthly (now published in England by Messrs. Constable) for January, we notice an interesting essay by Mr. Maurice Maeterlinck: "Of an anxious morality," in which he pleads that, since the old Christian morality no longer suffices for some people, they should try not to give too much power to "common sense" to the exclusion of the other elements of the mind. Other articles to which we may call attention in various periodicals are "The Stuarts in Rome" by Mr. H. M. Vaughan in Macmillan's; Mr. Edward Thomas on "Richard Jefferies" in Temple Bar; "Church Music," and "Recent Excavations in Crete and their Bearing on the Early History of the Aegean" in The Church Quarterly; and the interesting Burns number of T.P.'s Weekly for January 26.

UNVEILED

DEEP in the stillness of a night
Whose rain had drenched the way I trod
I wakened from day's earthy dreams
And walked alone with God.

The moaning winds were hushed in rest,
The world seemed sleeping after pain,
And where the cloudy rack had gloomed
The stars shone clear again.

Each wayside puddle held a glimpse
Of heights wherein it used to dwell,
As if the rain had brought with it
Memories of whence it fell.

Rained down and drowned in dusky pools
The quiet stars lay shining through;
And earth was all so steeped in heaven
That it was heaven too.

I listened, and the voice of God
Spoke to me in that lonely place;
I raised my eyes in wondering fear,
And looked, and saw His face.

And ever since, I see but God
In earth and man, in deep and height,
As one whose eyes the sun has filled
Looks round, and sees but light.

A. ST. JOHN ADCOCK.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

AROUND AN OLD CATALOGUE

MODERN centralisation is the death of provincial talent. The emporium with its octopus-like branches in every country town strangles any attempt at local originality. This mechanical standardisation of taste naturally results in an insufferable monotony. At any given moment you may be certain that, in no matter what town you alight, you will find the people of the place all wearing white coats or acquascutums, and talking about the last machine-made novel, by the author of "When all was blue." What a distressing contrast to the fresh and endless variety of a hundred years back, when every country town worthy of the name was a little independent world of light and leading! At present Scarborough is probably like the rest of our watering-places—a mere dumping-ground for London "notions," to use a Yankee term. Eighty years earlier Scarborough was still a planet, not a mere reflecting satellite in the cosmos of taste and fashion. At that date a certain John Cole, the leading bookseller of the town, printed and published an illustrated catalogue, which, as far as one knows, has no rival outside London to-day. Only a very limited number was struck off, the intention of the old bibliophile or philobiblist, as he prefers to call himself, clearly being, not merely that the catalogue should serve as a sale's list, but also as a sort of advertisement de luxe of his more delectable wares, possibly too as a kind of menu on which his humbler patrons, unable to purchase the more expensive books, might feast their eyes, as women feed on fashion plates, or growing boys on the description of gargantuan junketings.

There were two copies on drawing paper, six on tinted paper, and twenty-five on medium writing—a proof positive that the worthy bookseller was quite as eager to make known that he was the owner of certain excellent things, as he was desirous of offering them for sale. Doubtless, he felt all the pride of the possessor of a good wine cellar. The excellent stock he had laid down could not fail to improve with keeping. One cannot help comparing this discreet inventory with the frantic announcements of cheap bargains, remainders, and annual clearance sales which betray the frenzied anxiety of the modern shop-keeper to be rid at all hazards of the ephemeral rubbish with which he is loaded up. The old bookseller was a connoisseur, the tradesman of to-day is too often but a mere cash register.

"Come, give us a taste of your quality," is the appropriate question which garnishes the frontispiece, followed by a quaint sort of Quarles-like emblem of J. Coles's name and profession, consisting of an eye, a lump of coal, and a book with the word "seller" across its open page. That somewhat naïve anagram is a pleasing intimation that the eighteenth century was still persisting in Scarborough, although the year of imprint is 1825. Scarborough was probably at that date about a quarter of a century behind London. Now, all provincial towns must keep Greenwich time, and even give the lie, if necessary, to the sun.

Quite a noticeable portion of the entries comprise the names of books actually printed and published in Scarborough. To-day the budding author who aspires to fame is forced to send his work to London to be hall-marked. Several of these books are from the Press of John Cole himself. In some cases there are extra special editions on pink paper, limited in certain instances to half a dozen, which seems to indicate that even at that bygone date the collector of limited editions had appeared in Scarborough. The old anagrammatic spirit turns up in the announcement of an "aenigmatical catalogue of books of merit on an entirely new plan" by the bookseller himself. The plan resembles more than anything else the kind of antiquated question we still constantly meet with in examination papers composed by persons who imagine they are examining in Literature. Here are some, as samples:

The meditations of that charitable Divine who gave the money, the copyright, etc. produced (upward of £700) to the poor.

The Book which Dr. Johnson when at Oxford took up, expecting to find it a dull one, but found it quite an over-match for him.

The poetical works of him whose "Virtue formed the magic of his song."

In addition to this collection of literary conundrums, local belles-lettres are represented by a poem on the death of an infant. Several verses are cited in extenso from this choice "bocquet." It is rather a shock to find a sort of prose verdict of accidental death appended to this poetical post-mortem. We are informed in a footnote to the poem: "The infant whose death is commemorated, died at Scarborough, in consequence of a hurt it received on falling out of bed."

Theology occupies a good deal of space. Our ancestors dosed themselves with it in the same way as we dose ourselves with patent medicines. Let us add, they probably did themselves infinitely less harm. Not a few of the sermons are funeral orations by local Bossuets and Bourdaloues. We have "The virtuous woman, a tribute to the memory of the Right Hon. Lady Anne Hudson of Bessingby," illustrated by a woodcut signed T. Bewick, depicting Hunmanby, the residence of the select preacher Archdeacon Wrangham, who apparently also dabbled in the making of guide-books and verses, to judge by other entries. Another eminent divine of the neighbourhood has no less than three publications devoted to his memory, one of which bore the inscription: "Break the shell and you have an angel," a curious parallel to the verse of "hatched a cherubim." Those indisputable adjuncts to a funeral which the old pauper described as "hurns and willers" were evidently much to the fore in Scarborough in those days. Two quotations from a theological treatise of the seventeenth century recall the curiosa felicitas of thought and phrase of Jeremy Taylor and Sir Thomas Browne. The first is from "The Golden Meane:"

Men as they are all the Sons of their Mothers, are all the subjects of misery; borne to live few dayes in many dangers; whose glory (if they were Monarchs of their owne desires) may be well compared with their shadowes in the Sunne; for as the bodies shadow is at morning before us, at noone besides us, and at night behinde us: so is earthly glory, at morning or at prime before us, in a goodly lustre; at noone, or in the full besides us, in a violent heat; at night or in the wane, behind us, in a neglected pity. The differēce that is, is amongst some, that at noone, or in the meridian of their greatnesse, instead of having their glory beside them they are theselves beside their glory.

The second is from a treatise on the nature of Wit, Wisdom and Folly, and is equally charming:

"All men should be wise." Prov. i. 20, etc.

Observe for whom men should be wise: namely for themselves as well as for others. Wise men should not be like shell-fishes which breed Pearls for others to wear, but are sick of them themselves; not like a Mercury Statue, which shows the way to others, but stands still itself; not like a whetstone, which sharpeneth the knife, but is blunt itself, nor like Plutarchs Lamice, which have eyes abroad, but are blinde at home; for he who is Wise, should principally be wise for himself; and be like the Cynamon-tree, which lets not out, or spends all its sap in leaves and fruit which all fall off, but keeps the fruitful part of its fragrances for the Bark which stays on. It were small happiness for the man, who heals others, and he incurably sick himself; to save others by his wisdom, and lose his own soul by his folly and iniquity; like the ship, Acts 27, which was broken in pieces itself, but helped the Passengers safe to shore; or like those who built the Ark for Noah and were drowned themselves."

The only educational book in the lot bears the bewildering title of "Chickens feed capons: or a dissertation on the pertness of our Youth, in general, especially those trained up at tea-tables." Inevitably one recalls the old Latin grammar tag: "Quis non odit protervam pueritiam?" But tea-tables are a new feature in the complaint. Was tea, then, the first meal at which was relaxed that muzzling order that children should be seen but not heard?

Local records very properly find a large place in the catalogue. Naturally the "Spaw" of Scarborough claims the lion's share, but the catalogue goes as far afield as Ecton in Northants, where the ancestors of Benjamin Franklin lie buried, and Naseby, whose rector appears to have aspired to do for his village what White did for Selborne.

Naseby [so the preface runs] is very conspicuous in history and its natural productions are various and pleasing. It affords to a contemplative mind, recreations substantial and instructive, and acts its part in the demonstration of a God—an obvious reminiscence of Paley and the theory of design.

From the new natural history to the old is but a step to the rear. We drop back plump into Pliny, as the French would say, in a notice of "British Curiosities" dated 1721. We read à propos of Mount's Bay, in Cornwall, that "among the rocks on the coast are bred the Pyrrho-corax a Crow with Red Beak and Feet, which will often set houses on fire, and steal money or other things." An interesting quotation is given from an old Herbal under the rubric Camelon:

This is called a Wolishe thystell, or a wylde thystell. He hathe white leves, greate brode and red flowers. It groweth by wayes. The virtue of this herb is yt. thou take this herbe, when the sone is in Capricorne, and the mone is newe: while thou bereste it about thee, there shall be no myschefe the befall.

From magic we pass to the miraculous. According to the blackletter "Treasure of Pore Men":

Who that letteth thy blode on the XVIII day of Marche on the ryght arme, And on the XI day of Apryl on the left arme, they shall neuer be bynde for this hath been proved.

After this it seems almost bathos to quote from another notice that phlebotomy was much the fashion in the middle ages—and that Robert Botevylleyn, a founder, claimed in the abbey of Pipewell four bleedings per annum.

C. B.

[Next week's Causerie will be on "The Endings of Novels," by P.]

FICTION

Visionaries. By JAMES HUNEKER. (Werner Laurie, 6s.)

THESE visionaries are near the borderland of sanity, and they are at large. Two have escaped from a lunatic asylum and get locked up again, but they are not madder than the rest. They all have dreams they cannot distinguish from realities; they die of their own monstrous inventions; they are morbidly sensitive to odours; their affections travel in forbidden ways. There is no manifestation of the abnormal seized by modern Frenchmen that has not attracted this young American too, no twisted by-way in morals and philosophy his men and women do not follow, fascinated and misled. He is, indeed, so plainly under the spell of his masters that at first we suspected him of being their shadow and of having no substance of his own. The second story, for instance, that about the Deadly Art of Perfume, convinced us that the author had read his Huysmans and also that he knew how to make magic with a string of picturesque words. The one before that, too, had juggled marvellously with words and had instantly assured us that we should find in this volume the very latest affectations in art. We are to worship Weber to-day, it seems, and to renounce Wagner and all his works. We are too much behind the fashion to know it, but we were not greatly surprised. Though the cry itself was new, the voice sounded familiar. What did surprise us was to find in the third story, "The Purse of Aholibah," pictures that stay and take shape in the mind like things actually seen. The author's style is sometimes grotesque in its desire both to startle and to find true expression. He has not followed those great novelists who write French a child may read and understand. He calls the moon "a spiritual gray wafer"; it faints in "a red wind"; "truth beats at the bars of a man's bosom"; the sun is "a sulphur-coloured cymbal"; a man moves with "the jaunty grace of a young elephant." But even these oddities are significant and to be placed high above the slipshod sequences of words that have done duty till they are as meaningless as the imprint on a worn-out coin. Besides, in nearly every story the reader is arrested by the idea, and only a little troubled now and then by an over-elaborate style. It most of us are sane, the ideas cherished by these visionaries are insane; but the imagination of the author so illuminates them that we follow wondering and spell-bound. In "The Spiral Road" and in some of the other stories both fantasy and narrative may be compared with Hawthorne in his most unearthly moods. The younger man has read his Nietzsche and has cast off his heritage of simple morals. Hawthorne's Puritanism finds no echo in these modern souls, all sceptical, wavering and unblessed. But Hawthorne's splendour of vision and his power of sympathy with a tormented mind do live again in the best of Mr. Hunecker's stories. We were first led to this comparison when we read "The Spiral Road" and were dazzled by the wild flight of Karospina and Mila across the sky in their chariot of fire. The Russian dreams of regenerating mankind by his new art, and the people of the world gather together on the seashore to watch the first exhibition of it. He paints pictures on the sky, wonderful moving pictures as evanescent as a song, blazing symphonies of colour that are to arouse the world. The man who looks on sees suns and moons, golden landscapes, men, ships, the four cryptic creatures of Ezekiel's vision, "a cyclopean and dazzling staircase thronged by moving angelic shapes, harping mute harps, stretched from sea to sky, melting into the milky way like the tail of a starry serpent." In the end he sees the woman he loves ride beside the pyromaniac in a cloud of fire to destruction. Of all the moaning multitude huddled on the strand he who warned Mila is doomed to be the sole survivor. To quote the author himself: "Emerson the mystic, transposed to the key of France, sometimes makes bizarre music." This music we shall listen for again, for, though it is certainly bizarre, it is neither dull nor empty.

Martha Rose, Teacher. By Miss BETHAM-EDWARDS. (Long, 6s.)

READERS who retain a pleasant remembrance of Miss Betham-Edwards's stories of East Anglia as it was in early Victorian days may take up this book with the assurance that they will find much to amuse and interest them. With the lives of farmers and villagers at that period the author is thoroughly at home, and, although she is almost too deeply in earnest, too minute to be picturesque, her scenes bear the stamp of truth, and there is an old-fashioned air about them that is attractive. No doubt the world went well enough when a good harvest was the verdict upon the year, and that being pronounced there was no more to say. The affairs of the parish and of the nearest market-town supplied sufficient topics of discussion, the labourer neither knew nor concerned himself with what took place beyond his immediate neighbourhood. That these "good old times" are far more agreeable to read about than they were to live in few will doubt who follow Miss Betham-Edwards's interesting narrative. Conditions of existence were hard upon the field-worker, and cruel to his children at such seasons as stone-picking, for instance; and the authority and patronage exercised by the small squires, parsons and parsons' wives must have added many a drop of gall to the small beer of life. The simple love-story of Martha Rose and Clem, the young farmer who is considered above her in social position, is the thread upon which are strung scenes of village life and amusements, curious incidents, quaint old customs, and unfamiliar forms of speech. Many characters flit through the book, some of them delicately touched in like Martha herself, others strongly drawn, as in the case of the two brothers, Sam Weedon, and the blind fish-hawker. Each of them illustrates some east country type of farmer or worker, or some "genteel" person of higher degree. That they live again in these pages is only what is to be looked for from Miss Betham-Edwards's experience and ability; an author sure of her ground, who knows what to tell and how to tell it effectively, alternating humour with pathos, fact with sympathetic insight. As to the story, she has practically none to tell, but her volume descriptive of a village community in the 'forties is eminently readable, and even valuable.

Nature's Vagabond, and other Stories. By COSMO HAMILTON (Chatto & Windus, 3s. 6d.)

IN Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's new bookful of stories the pièce de resistance occupies the first hundred pages or so, while the fifteen "etceteras"—the mixed biscuits—fill the remaining two-thirds. We opened upon one of these first, and, lured thence by morsel after dainty morsel to the end of the book, only turned back last to the little story, to make therein a pleasant discovery. For "Nature's Vagabond" is a happy example of the, not very common, long story in miniature—a very different thing from the short story proper, and a form of fiction which seems to suit Mr. Hamilton's light, clever touch to perfection. Of some of the other pieces it may fairly be said that they are incidents, fragments, beginnings and endings, rather than complete contes; often some smart scrap of dialogue, epigram, even some pet personal grievance will evaporate from the memory less readily than the theme itself. But the three-and-twenty bright little chapters, written carefully to scale, and tracing the vagabondage and difficult reclamation of Billy Rudd (who, going down brilliantly from Oxford, went into the country to write a history, and, being there, lay in the sun for ten years and backed horses instead) just nicely contain all those effects, gay, pathetic and humorous, which seem sometimes to overflow narrow boundaries, yet might be lost within wider spaces. Of the rest, the most impressive is "This was Love," a terrible little tale in which a young wife whose husband has been killed through falling over a cliff goes mad and comes every day to the ledge from which he fell to repeat the words which she had called down to encourage him as he lay dying below her. "The Problem Browning Set"

(suggested by "A Light Woman"), interesting as it is, would have been improved, we think, by expansion; and altogether, perhaps, "Cupid among the Primroses," witty, ironic, and with the author pleasantly obtrusive everywhere, will win as many votes as anything in the collection. By-the-bye, Mr. Hamilton, like most of us, sometimes makes the drollest mistakes. You cannot very well chuck "the shop" (Woolwich) for Charterhouse, can you? (vide "Blood Boughton"); nor can you usually do a hole at golf in two if your "second" only lands you on the green. (pp. 303-305).

A Mountain Europa. By JOHN FOX, jun. (Constable, 3s. 6d.)

THE scene of Mr. Fox's new story is laid in the Cumberland Mountains, among the primitive people about whom he has told us elsewhere many strange and interesting things; a people of English descent, upon whose lips linger words and forms of speech Shakespeare heard and used; the last distinctively national remnant on American soil, whose mode of life, customs and manners have remained unchanged for generations. To the Cumberland came Clayton, the son of a millionaire of yesterday, to overlook the working of a mine half forgotten in prosperity, and he meets Easter riding her bull up the mountain path. It is an effective first appearance, a charming picture of a kind to remember. Easter is haughty and indifferent, but endowed with a beauty that need not go beautifully for conquest, since, clad in a single garment of blue homespun with a man's hat perched upon the side of her head, she wins Clayton's heart and strengthens her hold upon grim Sherd Raines. Clayton is at first a patient tutor to an apt pupil, but not for long: Easter loves with all the intensity of her half wild nature; Clayton, a man of sensitive honour, is infatuated, but not beyond anxiety as to how his family will receive Easter as his wife. So the story runs on to the inevitable point that offers a choice of tragic endings; the one swift and merciful, leaving a tender fading memory, the other with its prospect of disenchantment, reproach, recrimination. The reader is moved by the situation, admires the handling of it, and reluctantly admits that nothing could be more sensible and comfortable for all concerned than the author's solution of the difficulty. It is a pretty little tale, delightfully told, set in an old new world of thought and feeling.

Mrs. Erricker's Reputation. By THOMAS COBB. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

THIS book is the story of an attractive but misguided young widow, whose real kindness of heart shows itself in her reckless generosity and self-sacrifice for a not very interesting sister-in-law as well as for her boy, and so, like the proverbial charity, covers a multitude of small sins. Mrs. Erricker strikes the reader as too sensible a heroine to play the pranks she does, wasting her allowance on cards, and in other equally unnecessary escapades; but the story is brightly written and amusing, besides being well constructed. The contrast of character between the two men who want to marry Georgiana Erricker is very well worked out. The unappreciative mother-in-law, with whom we sympathise on several occasions and the "nice" girl, are also very well drawn, and the other necessary characters have all a touch of real life in them. The chief fault of the work is a tendency to over accentuate the wrong-doings of the heroine. But it does not "taste nasty" and can be recommended as a novel to read, that neither bores nor shocks the reader. Mr. Cobb's well-known smartness of dialogue does not always free him from slovenliness of style.

La Belle Dame. By ALICE METHLEY. (Long, 6s.)

WE are annoyed with Miss Methley for wantonly spoiling a good piece of work. The portrait of Mrs. Grey—"la belle dame," who steals the family jewels, commits murder, tries to force her drugged ward into a marriage she loathes, and, after qualifying for the Chamber of Horrors, poisons herself in the penultimate chapter—is a good character-study of a modern type of Becky Sharp. But the writer's powers of portrait-drawing are completely discounted by the structural improbability of the plot. The book opens with an unlikely episode. No starving woman would sell herself, body and soul, to a stranger for thirty shillings, in order to provide burial for a dying mother. Clergymen officiating at St. Peter's are not so blind as to marry drugged brides without any suspicion of what is toward. Little girls do not steal big sealed letters off tyrannising mothers' dressing-tables, and sew them up in their frocks. Yet we are asked to believe all these and other unlikely things. Were these things merely incidents, it would not matter; but they form the very foundations upon which the plot is built, and we can only say that Mrs. Grey's long career was far less due to her own cleverness than to the convenient stupidity and blindness of those who came in contact with her. There are limits to the credulity even of the novel-reader.

THE DRAMA

NERO WITHOUT TEARS

A SAD case was reported in the Midlands a short while ago. Two romantic ladies had formed an attachment similar to that of the nymphs of Llangollen. Though Tarquin was conspicuous by his absence, they decided in true Roman fashion to emulate Lucretia. The whole thing seems to have been arranged by parcels post. On each of them receiving from the other a volume of poems, they were quietly to take poison. At the inquest it was stated that the two poets thus favoured were the late Mr. Ernest Dowson and Mr. Arthur Symonds—a veritable Roland for an Oliver. When I commit suicide I shall choose the poems of Mr. Stephen Phillips as a stirrup-cup for eternity. The idea only occurred to me after seeing Nero, a play presenting life in its lighter aspects. Years ago, when I said that I thought Mr. Laurence Binyon a much finer poet than his cousin, I was told that as I grew older I should become wiser. Eternal youth or second childhood makes me cling to an illusion of the last century. I still prefer Mr. Laurence Binyon. And I have tried so hard to admire the poems and plays of Mr. Stephen Phillips and studied all that Mr. Churton Collins has to say. Like the tunnel mystery it is a matter of opinion.

If you write too much about things you dislike, you are apt to become disagreeable yourself. There is an old Sanskrit proverb, that the axe which hews down the sandal-wood always retains the scent of the sandal. Critics, especially dramatic critics, ought (besides knowing Sanskrit) to remember the proverb and only write about what they like. This is hardly a truth in art whose contrary is also true, as Hegel remarked. I can hardly promise that any one who praises Mr. Pinero or Mr. Bernard Shaw will become agreeable, or even a dramatist. Nor can I in praising Nero aspire to be a Stephen Phillips. That is partly because I have become a critic and have failed to write poetry or drama. All the great actor-managers have received (I will not say read) my plays. I have waited for hours outside the St. James's Theatre and thrust manuscript into the unwilling hands of Mr. George Alexander. Shortly afterwards Paolo and Francesca was produced. With great difficulty I have obtained through a friend, who knows Mr. Max Beerbohm, an introduction to Mr. Tree. Appointments have been made and never kept; in despair I have sent manuscript. It is never returned; Herod appears. These are dramatic or literary coincidences on which I make no comment.

It seriously seems to me that any one with a fair education could write blank verse of the Nero kind. You take the expressions of common parlance and arrange them into feet. For example: I had a very few minutes to keep the appointment, which was for 7 p.m. at the Tivoli. I told my valet to pack. I hailed a hansom at Paddington and got there punctually.

But a short time was mine wherein to go,
I threw my cloak and toga to my man.
He is a servant I can recommend.
I hailed a chariot at the Flavian Gate,
Promised the driver thrice his double fare.
We reached the Tivoli at seven sharp.
Punctuality is the thief of time.

The last line is a good example of the paradoxes of Nero. For modernity is rather the note of the play, and Mr. Percy Macquoid has been called in to act as Petronius Arbiter. It is needless to say that everything is done in a sumptuous manner. The Duchess of Somerset, who must regret the rain of Cinderellas, can safely recommend the youngsters to be taken to see Nero, and hear a Little Roman History instead of silly fairy stories; but I think in the last act Mr. Brock (the manufacturer of fireworks, not the sculptor) might be called in to act Beaumont to the Fletcher of Mr. Stephen Phillips. The British chieftain, too, besides threatening, might prophesy about England's future greatness. Nothing affects the auditorium more than prophesying after the event:

BRITISH WARRIOR.

Then Nero I will tell thee to thy face
That Boadicea's subjects shall, I know,
Invade the precincts of Eternal Rome.
Like bees they swarm upon the Appian Way.
The Via Sacra; yes the Palatine;
The garden of Lucullus (heaped in ruin).
A nation still unknown to Cæsar's rule
Shall stalk thy streets armed with books of red.
And notes of colour thou wilt hardly relish,
Thou damned æsthete.

NERO.

A Murrayain on thee!

Though every one was prepared for a white-washed Nero, and some of us have been brushing up Gibbon in order to refute the dramatist, the dear old bogey of our childhood is there in all his true colours. He has not changed; he has merely developed and has done a good deal of reading in his retirement. While an obvious reference (it is in no way a plagiarism) to certain lines of Marlowe links the play to English literature:

Yet hath none fairer strayed into the world. . . .
Since she who drew the dreaming keels of Greece
After her over the Ionian foam, one dramatic critic naïvely says it haunts the memory It does.

In a drama, that is also literature, one never wants to know the names of the players, if they act well. I suppose that is fatal to professional success. Miss Kittie Snooks would no longer excite public attention in the illustrated papers. Her dog, her motor-car, her villa on the Thames, all the equipments of a great English actress would be wasted, and the illustrated papers would lose their half-tone blocks. But I sometimes doubt whether there is such a thing as tradition or art in acting. It is a question of personality and magnetism, and the natural power to display those gifts. It never matters, even, when, as is often the case, Mr. Tree does not know his part. You go instinctively to see Tree. The caste of Nero is extraordinarily fine. I have never seen Mrs. Tree under such disadvantages, to such advantage; though I remember her art in many another play. It is popular to say that she has not the physique for some particular rôle, and she is always spoken of as a Lady Sandow manquée. As Agrippina her performance is masterly. By her elocution alone she gives to tawdry verse dignity, and her gestures are beyond all praise. In quality her acting is French. Miss Collier, the most charming of all our younger actresses, sacrifices herself nobly. I can imagine what she could do as the Duchess of Padua (one of Nero's unpublished plays), or in Webster's Duchess of Malji.

Given real poetry she could give us so much in return. Mr. Robert Farquhar is now, I am glad to say, a recognised artist. I used to think he was the greatest English actor off the stage. The part of Anicetus conceals his great talent. On the head of Mr. Esme Percy, too (the only Romeo who has been seen in England), a laurel should be laid. His rendering of Britannicus might be canvassed if there were not so much camp in it already.

When Mr. Tree is laid to rest in the Abbey (may his death be far distant), it shall not be said of him that he neglected current literature as was whispered of a distinguished contemporary. Certain influential intellectuals cried for the moon of literary drama, and Mr. Tree gave it to them in Mr. Stephen Phillips. He has valiantly tried to reconcile the divorced wife of Drama to a recalcitrant spouse. I fear the experiment is a failure, or perhaps the literature that once adorned our stage is dead, and it is the deceased wife's sister we are entertaining unawares.

ROBERT ROSS.

"LADY INGER OF ÖSTRAAT" AT THE SCALA THEATRE

THE Stage Society cannot be accused of narrow-mindedness. The two performances it has given this season have presented one feeble modern comedy, one strange, shapeless but genuine little study of life, and one vast piece of romantic trickery written fifty years ago by an author who later proved himself the bitter foe of all the tricks. Ibsen was about twenty-seven when he wrote Lady Inger of Östraat. He was afire with patriotism, and—in a manner which he has repeated since—he showed his country how dear she was by holding her blackest period of degradation up to view. The plot of this play is indescribable. Even in 1855, we should imagine, Ibsen ought to have known better than to suppose that, having got a grand idea, he ought to wrap it up in such an inexplicable medley of intrigues, mistaken identities, mad scenes, mysterious strangers, trap-doors, corpses, Irresistible Seducers and so forth. Throughout its five long acts it is very difficult indeed to discover what it is all about, and only after some cogitation does the idea that underlies the play come out. That idea may be expressed in several ways. You may put it thus: that people who are called to heroic tasks—Lady Ingers who take up the deliverance of their country from the tyrant's yoke—cannot for one moment think of themselves or lift their hands for an instant's recreation and refreshment, without ruining far more than themselves. Or you may put it thus: Women are the most powerful things in the world. Granted, but their power is not rightly to be exercised in the channels of politics and patriotism, least of all in prolonged heroisms that must last for years. Their minds are shifting sands, and they are sure to come to grief, bringing down with them in their fall the cause they championed. Lady Inger turned aside from her high calling to dally a month or two with a lover. From that step you can trace the ruin of herself, her son, her three daughters, and her country. And those who had the patience to sit out the hours of blind groping after expression which the play exhibited were rewarded after all by the discovery of an idea under the fantastic trappings, the ridiculous, threadbare suits. They enjoyed, too, some dramatic scenes, and some fine acting on the part of Miss Edyth Olive as Lady Inger.

"LA PÈRE LEBONNARD" AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

Le Père Lebonnard is an old play; and it has been done into English—without success. But it still has a certain appealing humanity which, despite its dialogue, despite its prolixity, makes it draw audiences. Like Les Affaires, it is a one-part play. And only the general excellence of the acting deceives one into believing that it is anything else.

M. Silvaine does not tower head and shoulders above the rest of the company, simply because that rest is too good.

This question of the company is, indeed, one of the most interesting which has been aroused by the season of the French plays. In the German season at the Great Queen Street Theatre, it is the custom to rely upon a stock company for every production, and only to introduce occasional "stars" for special performances. At the New Royalty we are continually meeting new people, we have continually to cope with new intonations, new mannerisms and new stage management. On the whole, perhaps, the German company's system is preferable. It is a far greater proof of an actor's power to be able to appear throughout the season in a series of differing rôles; it is far more satisfactory for an audience that has been pleased with an actor previously to see him again, in a new and perhaps more trying part, successfully overcoming those difficulties.

On the other hand, it is good that London should be given an opportunity to see the leading actors and actresses of Paris in parts that they have made their own. For the first season, therefore, this system may succeed. Afterwards, the introduction of the stock company may be found advisable.

FINE ART

TWO NEW BOOKS ON CONSTABLE

John Constable, d'après les Souvenirs recueillis par C. R. LESLIE, traduits avec une Introduction par LÉON BAZALGETTE. (Paris: Fleury, 6 francs.)

Constable. By M. STURGE HENDERSON. (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.)

THE duplicate reviewer must always be an object of suspicion. If he be either the friend or the enemy of his author he is likely to do the public a twofold injustice. If he be neither, the double pronouncement of his verdict aggravates whatever margin of error there may have been in his judgment. Having already once noticed Mrs. Henderson's book on Constable, I am precluded from saying more about it than that it is, in the main, a faithful abstract of Leslie's life illustrated with reproductions from Constable's sketches at South Kensington and in the National Gallery, and that there is one important point with which the author does not deal (nor, for that matter, does M. Bazalgette), but which is well worth study, namely, the question of Constable's portraits.

In M. Bazalgette's case the omission is easily explained. His purpose is to fill a gap in the history of French art, with which the name of Constable must always be associated, and this purpose he has fulfilled most excellently. He has translated Leslie verbatim, has prefaced the translation with an admirable introduction on the Landscape Painters of 1830, and has completed his work by notes added from the Earl of Plymouth's book and other sources.

These notes are so well selected that, in themselves, they prove how thoroughly M. Bazalgette has understood the various points of importance in Constable's history. He also appears to be most accurate, for the only mistake I have noticed is one which he has copied direct from myself. To these merits M. Bazalgette adds one which is perhaps less important than intelligence and accuracy, but in these days rather more rare, namely the merit of a style so plastic and so musical that all who know the charm of Leslie's pages will reap a double harvest of pleasure in reading this French version. On one point, perhaps, we may question M. Bazalgette's judgment, namely the note in which (p. 85) he professes his astonishment that Constable could admire "l'académique et froid Nicolas Poussin," and explains that he must have been "séduit par l'intense harmonie des couleurs et de compotion qu'offre parfois le peintre des Arcadies." Surely no better instance than this could be given of the range of Constable's critical taste, which enabled him to pass the gulf of time and technical aims which separated him from Poussin, and recognise in the "Phocion" the same reverence for the majesty of nature which inspired his own art?

The question of Constable's portraits is so obscure that it is hardly wonderful that none of his biographers should have faced it fairly. The difficulty of obtaining information about pictures in private hands is so great that time and chance must inevitably play a large part in working the matter out. Pressure of work for some years has made it impossible for me to follow up even the few lines of inquiry which seem possible. Nevertheless some new facts have come to light in the past four years which may be of use to those with more leisure. Two small early portraits ascribed to Constable were sold at Messrs. Foster's in December 1902. The less skilful of the two was in many respects so childish in treatment that 1802 or 1803 at the latest seemed the most probable date. The second was much more soundly and solidly handled; certain passages of blue and white showed Constable's broad characteristic touch, but the features were still clumsy, and the modelling empty. The small sketch recently exhibited at Messrs. Shepherd's in King Street is probably rather later in date than either of these.

Then follows the period of Constable's work at Birmingham, where he painted the portraits of the Lloyd family. Several of these still remain in the possession of their descendants, and one was shown in the admirable exhibition of portraits at Birmingham three years ago. Of Constable's connection with Birmingham Leslie says absolutely nothing; nor is he more enlightening as to the really fine portraits in the possession of Sir Cuthbert Quilter, which were first brought into prominence by the Earl of Plymouth and were afterwards exhibited in Bond Street. Leslie, however, says a good deal about Constable's work at Ham House, which has never been thoroughly examined and classified. Here Constable painted intermittently for some years, restoring and making replicas of portraits by the great masters of the eighteenth century, an occupation to which he owed almost all his technical skill. The portraits of his friend Archdeacon Fisher and his wife are also in existence, and a little research would doubtless result in the identification of other pictures mentioned in his correspondence, published and unpublished. Among them is a large group of children with a donkey, of which Constable has left a thumbnail sketch in pen and ink.

The vastly increased interest shown in English portrait-painting must be my excuse for these random notes; but the subject is perhaps worth following up. Constable is an artist of the first importance, and the best of his portraits reach such a high level of excellence that they may easily be confounded with the work of his contemporaries who owe their reputation to portrait-painting only. It is thus desirable in every way that the identity of Constable's portraits should be established and recorded before the lapse of time makes the finding of authentic evidence difficult or impossible.

C. J. HOLMES.

BEAUTIFUL LONDON

It is probable that with a new government, including several members of the London County Council, and a new Ministry anxious to show its gratitude to London voters for their volle face, we shall see a renewal of the agitation for the establishment of some permanent consultative body, to which questions of public improvements might be referred, as urged by Sir Aston Webb when President of the Royal Institution in 1903. The matter has been reopened by the Earl of Plymouth in the paper which reflects for the present the hopes and wishes of the Government, the Tribune (January 22). The letter from this distinguished and powerful authority immediately drew a chorus of approval from Sir Aston Webb, R.A., Mr. George Frampton, R.A., Mr. John Belcher, A.R.A., and Mr. Goscombe John, A.R.A. Sir Aston Webb again urges the establishment of an advisory committee:

who would, no doubt, at first at any rate, be willing to act gratuitously for the honour and beauty of their city, [and that] officials should be instructed to consult those whose training has fitted them to consider the matter from the æsthetic side.

Mr. Frampton writes to the same effect. Mr. Belcher goes further, and, as in 1904, proposes that the First Commissioner should be invested with greater power of control, or that a Ministry of Fine Arts should be created, the latter course being advocated also by Mr. Marion Spielmann. Mr. Goscombe John asks whether "it is not pathetic to wander along the Embankment or in the parks, and feel the emptiness of it all," and urges that the mission of sculpture is to "express the joy of life, and the poetry of history and romance."

But what is more remarkable than the unanimity in speech of these gentlemen is their unanimity in reticence, for, with the insidious modesty characteristic of members of the august body to which they belong, not one mentions the Royal Academy. Although advisory committees may not be regarded with favour by qualified judges, the scheme would be worthy of consideration, if we could be sure that the members would be truly representative of the best expert opinion in architecture, sculpture and decoration. The Royal Commission on the administration of the Chantrey Bequest is so recent that the public will do well in scrutinising very closely any project that is approved by a body which was shown to be unduly partial to its own members. We do not want another "job" for the Royal Academy. It is better that our streets and squares and embankments should be empty of decoration than that they should be filled with pretentious and inferior art.

When we think of Mr. Gilbert's "Amor" shooting his darts down Piccadilly as an "expression of the joy of life," of Landseer's "repeated lions" in Trafalgar Square, of the Gordon in unstable equilibrium in the same place by Mr. Hamo Thornycroft, of the fossilised photograph by Sir Edgar Boehm at Hyde Park Corner, the Sir Hugh Rose which may be similarly described, by the late Onslow Ford, and, last but not least, of Sir William Richmond's stencil plate running riot round the spandrels of St. Paul's Cathedral, we must feel little disposition to permit the Royal Academy to have the sole guidance of our taste in sculpture and decoration. There has been no suggestion that it should, but the Academy as a body is known to be rapacious in act and reticent in words and therefore extreme circumspection is advisable.

I doubt exceedingly whether, even if a representative body could indeed be established, any conscious effort towards dignity and taste in certain limited sites would be of much value. There has been a great deal of these so-called improvements in partial and private enterprise, especially in the year of the King's accession, and it seems to me that London is losing in character. There was something in the London of twenty years ago that had a sort of grandeur and strangeness, that was picturesque if not beautiful. The mixture of grandeur, squalor and vulgarity in such a view as that up Ludgate Hill, with the railway bridge and the advertisements and St. Paul's looming in the background, has a fascination in its kind. The causes of ugliness in a great city like London or Berlin lie far deeper than can be touched by any committee of taste. If beauty does not spring up unasked from our daily vocations as it has in the past, and does to some extent even now in Florence and Venice, and as it always does in the ancient cities of India, can it be imposed consciously and pompously, and can it be a vital thing? What would Ruskin have said? Would he not say that London is as beautiful as it deserves to be?

In this connection we must admit that Sir William

Richmond shows good sense, as he usually does, in his public utterances :

I have a very strong feeling that the city is always interesting that grows, I may say, naturally (Tribune, Friday, January 26). One of the best managed cities that I know in Europe, is Turin. But it is not equal in interest to old cities that grow up on account of necessity, in which the architecture and building schemes represent the necessity of the moment. . . . Upon that committee there should be only men well known for the integrity of their tastes, and who have absolutely no axes to grind. That is important. You must have varied intellects and no narrow minds or faddists on such a body. I would not have a man who had particular Gothic or classical proclivities.

All most excellent. Unfortunately, right opinions do not necessarily involve right action, as Sir Peter Teazle remarked to Joseph Surface, or words to that effect.

B. S.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—I

THE publication of this work, begun in 1901, was completed at the close of 1905 with the appearance of the sixth volume, in which the late Mr. Edward Dannreuther, under the title "The Romantic Movement," treats of music in the nineteenth century. We have before us, therefore, in this work a record of the development of the art unique in English literature, in which its growth is traced from the incipient efforts at polyphony in the ninth century, the first attempts to produce two concordant sounds simultaneously, to the appearance of the "romantic" operas of Wagner. The object of the work is avowedly to trace the evolution of the art, not to record the achievements of artists, although the latter necessarily follows in some degree from the former. It has been carried out by five men whose names alone vouch for thorough scholarship and both careful and original research. They are Professor H. E. Wooldridge (formerly Slade Professor of Fine Arts at Oxford), Sir C. Hubert H. Parry (Professor of Music at Oxford), Mr. J. A. Fuller-Maitland, Mr. W. H. Hadow, who is also general editor, and Mr. E. Dannreuther. It is my object, in a few short papers, to trace very roughly the general course of the work, and especially to call attention to those points which appear now for the first time, either as a result of recent investigation or as a personal opinion differing from that usually accepted.

It will be readily inferred that the greatest opportunities for fresh investigation are to be found in the early history of the art, and to assign this period to Professor Wooldridge was a particularly happy choice, since much of the history must be necessarily gathered from records and sources which, as they are not distinctively musical, require a wide basis of knowledge for their interpretation. The author begins by rapidly tracing the descent of Christian music directly from that of the Greeks. The technique of scales, etc., was inherited and preserved, not lost and revived partially by Ambrose and Gregory as often supposed, though their compositions are the earliest extant in Christian times. Having identified the two technical systems, Professor Wooldridge next shows how the Christian point of view immediately modified their practice.

The intention and value of a Greek composition, both words and music, was purely artistic, and the aim of the composer was directed towards the perfect rendering of the general poetic character of the words, and even to exact verbal expression. The aim of the Christian composer was entirely different, for the intention and value of the words set by him is not artistic but religious. . . . It is not the exact character of the words therefore but this general religious sentiment, this common fervour animating the whole congregation, that the Christian composer seeks to render in the music to which the texts are to be sung.

Then he shows how this resulted in a greater sweetness and tenderness of melody, especially displayed in the instinctive avoidance of the major sixth, and that hard interval the "tritone," which later earned the name of "diabolus in musica." But most interesting is his method of accounting for the existence of the polyphonic principle in Christian music, which for all their elaborate technique and scientific reasoning never became apparent to the Greeks. The mere transference of the art to new races was not in his opinion sufficient to account for the presence of a principle so entirely new, but some more definite cause must be found, and this the author finds in the purpose to which music was applied, that of public worship, or, as he calls it, the congregational principle.

The congregation was now to be manifested in its particularity, and though still perceived as collective and united in virtue of the common act of worship, was to be recognised also in its individual and manifold elements; the individual utterances therefore were now to be seen as various yet united in one whole, as distinct yet blended in a general consonance.

The earliest attempts at the blending of different sounds were, as is well known, in the direction of "Organum" or "Diaphony," a process by which the plain-song of the Church was sung both at its original pitch and at the interval of a fourth or fifth below, and by means of doubling either or both parts at the octave a certain amount of variety was obtained. This primitive and apparently obvious device was, in fact, the germ from which sprang all modern music and the story of its gradual development into counterpoint occupies this volume. The reader is referred directly to the testimony of early treatises and manuscripts, for example the "Musica Enchiriades" often ascribed to Hucbald, but more recently supposed to be by Odo, abbot of St. Pons de Tomières in Provence, and the "Micrologus" by Guido D'Arezzo. Although such an account would appear to be as faithful as possible, yet the historian is from time to time baffled by the fact that, when a glimpse of the actual practice of composers is obtained, they often exhibit a knowledge and treatment apparently in advance of what is prescribed by the theorists. Embarrassing as this at first sight appears, it is no more so than would be the position of the antiquarian of the year 2500 A.D., should he be so unfortunate as to discover at one time a copy of Macfarren's Harmony and the score of Ein Heldenleben. The imperfections of notation at this early period, however, oblige us to rely upon accounts rather than compositions, but it must always be borne in mind that the same imperfections induced extempore experiment on the part of singers in a marked degree.

Partly through this and partly from theoretic considerations, the parallel movement of the "organal" part with the "plain-song" became modified until it no longer was a recognisable reduplication of it, until, in fact, first by means of "oblique" motion and later by "contrary" motion, it became an independent melody, and the name of "Discant" took the place of "Organum." As the independence of parts or voices became a recognised quality, the need for a more exact notation became imperative, a notation which should determine at once the elements of pitch and measure. The evolution of this important part of musical technique occupies a large section of Professor Wooldridge's first volume, to an exact account of which he is largely helped by the anonymous treatise, "Discantus Positio Vulgaris," the later writings of Walter Odington, and "Ars Cantus Mesurabilis," ascribed to Franco of Cologne. The intricate methods of rhythmic modes, which resulted in the establishment of triple time as the perfect measure, he ascribes, not, as is usual, to a reverent desire to symbolise thereby the Holy Trinity, but to its derivation from the classical poetic metres. No doubt it was afterwards considered symbolical, and it was this supposed significance which caused it to be rigorously maintained to the detriment of the art and the exclusion of the simpler duple measure.

When we come to the description, with copious musical illustrations, of various types of composition as practised up to the first part of the fourteenth century, the rival influences of theoretic reasoning and of the practical expediency of performers are fully exemplified. These forms range from the vague "Organum purum" to the highly systematised "Rondels" of Adam de la Hale, and include the "Conductus," and most important of all, the "Motett." It is impossible here to dwell on the distinctive features of each form; one common feature, however, is all important. Although discord is used with amazing freedom, and this includes the use of imperfect concords, thirds and sixths, yet all rest upon a basis of perfect concords, that is to say octaves, fifths and fourths occur upon the accents and are the consonant principle of the harmony. These forms are therefore directly descended from the early "Organum" and a complete revolution was necessary before any development of counterpoint as we know it—that is, founded upon the opposite principle of successions of imperfect concords—could be realised. How this took place is the subject of Professor Wooldridge's second volume and must be left for future discussion, but there is one more point which requires notice in the music of the thirteenth century, and that is a single specimen of composition, anonymous and of English origin, the six-part "Rota," "Sumer is icumen in." The existence of this piece of work standing head and shoulders above its fellows in technical workmanship and musical design, is one of the greatest surprises in the art of music. The discussion of it here and of the alterations which are found to have been made in the manuscript is interesting and enlightening, but it still remains a work of unexplained genius.

Professor Wooldridge's work has been greatly enriched by the use of a manuscript of thirteenth-century music in the Laurentian library at Florence, and he is able to give as examples photographic facsimiles, as well as pieces scored in modern notation by him for the first time. There is just one point which mars his method with regard to these latter, and that is his persistent use of the G clef transposed for tenor and counter-tenor parts. To students the C clefs are infinitely simpler to read in a score and give a more musician-like appearance. This, though a detail, becomes important where examples hold such a prominent place. For the number and variety of these, however, we cannot be too grateful, since by their means we are brought into direct touch with a phase of music not usually accessible, but which forms a most important link in our musical ancestry.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

WE notice a number of interesting volumes in Messrs. Macmillan's spring list. First and foremost, perhaps, comes "Lord Curzon in India," a selection of sixty or seventy of Lord Curzon's speeches, which, it is claimed, will constitute not only a compendium of his Viceroyalty, but a handbook to Indian politics and administration superior to any work in existence. Passages of merely local or momentary interest have been omitted, a few footnotes have been added, and Sir Thomas Raleigh, Legal Member of Council, contributes an introduction.

Another book of interest to students of our Indian Empire is Mr. A. Fielding Hall's "A People at School," which deals with the progress and retrogression of the Burmese since their coming under British rule. Mr. Hall will be remembered as the author of "The Soul of a People."

Then there is the "Memoirs of Archbishop Temple," edited by Archdeacon Sandford, and written by seven contributors: Earlier Years (1821-1848), by Canon Wilson of Worcester; the Education Office (1848-1857), by W. H. J. Roby; Rugby (1857-1869), by Mr. F. E. Kitchener; Exeter (1869-1885), by Archdeacon Sandford; Canterbury (1896-1902), by Archdeacon Spooner (the Diocesan Episcopate) and the Bishop of Bristol (the Primacy). The editor adds a summary in five chapters. Another eagerly expected biography is the life of Henry Sidgwick, by Mrs. Henry Sidgwick and Mr. Arthur Sidgwick.

Mr. Thomas Hardy will publish shortly with Messrs. Macmillan the second part of The Dynasts, the great historical drama of the Napoleonic wars, of which the first part was published in 1904. This volume (which does not complete the work) consists of six acts and forty-three scenes. It covers nearly all Europe and ends at Torres Vedras and Albuera.

We note also with pleasure the announcement by Messrs. Macmillan of "Brief Literary Criticisms," selected by Miss Elizabeth M. Roscoe from the Spectator articles of her uncle, Richard Holt Hutton; the first volume of "The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas," by Dr. Edward Westermarck; Miss B. E. Meyer's translation of Höffding's "Philosophy of Religion": the late Canon Overton's History of the English Church from 1714-1800 (vol. vii. of Stephens and Hunt), completed and prepared for press by the Rev. Frederick Relton; and a "Handbook of British Inland Birds" by Mr. Anthony Collett, with coloured illustrations by Mr. Eric Parker. Mr. Collett is a writer of very charming prose; but it appears that his object in the present case is to give a simple and practical authority for the identification of birds, nests and eggs, subjects on which he may be absolutely trusted.

Mr. H. Saxe-Wyndham, the Secretary of the Guildhall School of Music, is at work on a history of Covent Garden Theatre. It is remarkable that whereas Drury Lane occupies some two and a half pages of the British Museum catalogue, the other great patent theatre has not a single heading to itself. In Mr. H. Barton Baker's "History of the London Stage" there is a fairly full account of the various theatres known under the name of Covent Garden.

Amongst fiction to be published next month by Messrs. Cassell and Company are "The Red Seal," by Morice Gerard; "The Mystery of the Shadow," by Fergus Hume; and "The Burglars' Club: a Romance in Twelve Chapters," by Henry Hering.

"Through Race-Glasses," by Mr. Francis E. Vincent, is a new book which Mr. Werner Laurie will shortly publish. It consists of a collection of stories of a more or less sporting character.

Mr. Filson Young is at present engaged on a Life and Account of the Voyages of Christopher Columbus, which the firm of E. Grant Richards hopes to have ready for publication in the autumn of this year. There is reason to believe that many English collectors have in their possession a good many of the original charts and documents relating to Columbus's voyages, and therefore Mr. Filson Young asks for the co-operation of private collectors. Communications to be sent to the address of his publisher, 7 Carlton Street, Regent Street, S.W.

Mr. Francis Joseph Bigger, M.R.I.A., editor of the Ulster Journal of Archaeology, has in preparation the biographies of the Ulster leaders in the insurrection of 1798. These will include William Orr, Henry Monro, James Hope, Henry Joy MacCracken, Samuel Neilson, and Thomas Russell. The writer has been collecting material for years, and now that many of the secret state papers have been made accessible a vast amount of new information has been obtained. Each biography will be treated separately, and fully illustrated with portraits and sketches depicting the persons of the period, the scenes in the patriots' lives, their homes, the battles in which they engaged, their executions, and their graves. Irish paper will be used, the illustrations made and the printing done in Ireland. The publishers will be Maunsel and Co., Ltd., Dublin.

A system of exact Classification suitable for Public Libraries, technical and elementary schools, and other educational purposes, has long been a desideratum. Such a work, arranged in a series of divisions and related subdivisions, and apparently providing places for every subject of moment, has been prepared by Mr. James Duff Brown, the Borough Librarian of Islington, and will be issued this season by The Library Supply Co. A novel series of tables is provided, enabling subjects to be sub-divided to any extent, and the scheme is so arranged that it can be applied to the largest library or the small collection of the private collector. It can be used for arranging specimens, classifying material on any topic, grouping of business papers, or any purpose in which classification is necessary. For English libraries, in which exact Subject Classification has been comparatively neglected, this book should prove of great service.

Tolstoy's "The End of the Age," which during its serial publication in the Fortnightly Review has created a great deal of interest, is being published by Mr. Heinemann next week, together with other material embodying Tolstoy's view of the crisis in Russia.

Among the earliest publications in Messrs. Brown, Langham and Co.'s Spring List will be a book of interesting reminiscences by Mr. H. G. Keene, C.I. Mr. Keene is one of the survivors of the old régime in India, and in this book of memories, called "Here and There," there are many amusing stories of Old Haileybury, and of Indian life in days before the Mutiny. The second part of the volume contains recollections of later life spent in London and elsewhere, with gossip about some distinguished persons whom the writer had the fortune to meet on his return from exile.

The same publishers will bring out early next month a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Lacon Watson's "Christopher Deane." In view of the interest that has been shown lately in stories of School and College Life, "Christopher Deane," which treats of Winchester and Cambridge, should have considerable success in its present form.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE ROKEBY VELASQUEZ

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—While the gentlemen connected with the National Art Collections Fund were giving their time and services to the work of finding money to purchase the Rokeby Velasquez for the National Gallery, it seemed ungracious to criticise the work adversely, as after all it was they who took the responsibility, and private persons subscribed the funds. But now that the picture is acquired for the nation I presume it can be openly discussed, and certainly there is something in regard to it that requires explanation. This is the strange fact that although so much fuss was made about the work, it was not deemed worth an expert critical notice. One would have thought that considering the public were asked to buy the picture for £50,000 or thereabouts, some authority would have come forward with a complete criticism of the work, especially when, judging by letters in the press, there was a divergence of opinion as to its merits and value, these letters it may be remarked mostly appearing after the statement in the December Burlington Magazine that "the opinion of all critics in this country (England) whose word carries any weight is unanimous in favour" of the acquisition of the Velasquez. But all we have heard about the picture are vague statements such as: "It is representative of the artist," "It is a beautiful work," "There are Berlin and American buyers waiting for it," and so on. It is quite clear that if, when opinions differ, enormous sums are paid for pictures on the ground of such bold assertions as these, the National Gallery will be deluged with offers of doubtful works, for the same statement can be made of half the pictures that come on to the market.

Now, judging the absence of proper critical notices by ordinary standards, the conclusion one must arrive at is that the picture will not stand favourable criticism, and herein I think lies the secret of the difficulty experienced in getting the money, for while no critical reasoning was put forward as to why the picture should be purchased for the nation, there was much adverse reasoning to be answered as to why it should not. Of the miscellaneous arguments used for the purchase of the picture, the only two plausible ones were that it is a beautiful work, and that it is peculiarly typical of the master's best style. This latter argument is applicable to pictures already possessed by the nation, and in itself cannot obviously hold good. If Rembrandt had painted Adam and Eve (or even the heads only) as he drew them in his etching, the picture would be worth nothing from a public gallery point of view, however typical it might be of his best style. In respect of beauty, mere perfection of form is not sufficient in such a work which requires an idea embodied. Now what is the idea in this picture? Unless it is vanity it is nothing: and the picture represents Venus and Cupid! Can you imagine a greater anachronism? If you make Venus vain of her looks, why not paint Vulcan vain of his strength, or Apollo of his form, or Christ of His goodness? If you exhibited Hercules inducing some one to feel his muscles, you would not be doing a more absurd thing than to paint Venus steadily gazing into a mirror; though Hercules was only a demi-god. Venus is a goddess typical of beauty as well as of love, and to suggest vanity is to suggest the possibility of comparison to her disadvantage, which of course is to dethrone her. To suppose therefore that Velasquez intended this picture to represent Venus, is to assume that he was impervious to incongruity. Much more likely that he painted a Spanish dancing girl, awaiting her lover, and put in a Cupid, just as nearly every other artist from Titian to Fragonard symbolised a contemporary love scene with a Cupid. The fact that Cupid is holding the glass to Venus, does not alter my position, but rather strengthens it, because the action implies surprise or wonder.

Velasquez had a decidedly poetical turn of mind, and if he had desired to put his conception of Venus on canvas, he would probably not, like Titian, have been contented with calm radiant beauty. He would more likely have emphasised the beauty with some separate attribute, as the sculptor of the Venus de' Medici who added modesty; or as Botticelli who depicted Venus at her birth when he could appropriately add innocence; or as Rubens who painted her as the embodiment of voluptuousness. But the last thing he would have done was to depart from mythical history and the practice of the great painter who preceded him, by making Venus so self-conscious of her beauty as to typify the paltry trait of vanity. It seems to me clear, then, that from the point of view of motif, the picture as a representation of Venus and Cupid cannot stand. As a fine example of painting by Velasquez it does stand, but from what point of view is a value of £50,000 placed upon it for a public collection?

There was a similar want of expert criticism at the time the £30,000 "Portrait of Ariosto by Titian" was purchased. It afterwards turned out that the picture had nothing to do with the poet, and later that it was only partly painted by Titian. Nothing whatever has been indicated as to wherein lie the features which give the work a value of £30,000.

MAN IN THE STREET.

Florence,
January 26.

WORDSWORTH AND SHELLEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent's voluminous epistle, in which he pelts us with reasons for acknowledging Wordsworth's superiority to Shelley, is an admirable illustration of the maxim that it is dangerous to prove too much. I am reminded of the question asked by the foreman of the jury at a famous trial for treason, when the Attorney-General had made a speech of inordinate length on behalf of the Crown: "How could we convict the prisoner when Mr. Attorney took nine hours to prove him guilty?" May I for the moment assume the rôle of "Advocatus Diaboli" and present the other side of the question?

I will not insist upon the proof from parody, but it is a significant fact that no great poet has been so often and so effectively parodied as Wordsworth. His warmest admirers cannot deny that the famous stanza:

I put my hat upon my head,
And walked into the Strand,
And there I met another man,
With his hat in his hand,

is only too faithful a reproduction of much of his poetry. Indeed, is there any poet as great as Wordsworth who has left behind him such a mass of printed trash? I possess an edition of his poems in six volumes, and I would undertake to put all the pure gold into one volume, leaving the other five little more than a heap of alloy and dross. Shelley's faults are great and evident, but he cannot be charged with descending into the depths of bathos as constantly and as resolutely as his illustrious contemporary. It may be also true that Shelley is not a great dramatist; but there is not the faintest trace of dramatic power in Wordsworth. I frankly concede that the "Ode to Duty," the "Intimations," and half a dozen of the sonnets are beyond the reach of Shelley; but, on the other hand, I insist that "Adonais," the "Lines in the Euganean Hills," and the "Ode to the West Wind" are equally beyond the reach of Wordsworth. These splendid poems remind me of another of Shelley's gifts which your correspondent has ignored, and which Macaulay with true critical instinct selected as the hall-mark of the highest poetical nature, the gift of converting the abstract into the concrete. This was the peculiar gift of the Greek genius; and it makes Shelley's genius, in my judgment, more akin to the Greeks than even Milton's or Keats's. It places Shelley in the same rank as his two immortal predecessors, Spenser and Bunyan. Such men are the true "seers," who "see visions and dream dreams"; and this divine faculty of theirs, by virtue of its rarity and beauty, redeems a host of faults.

Something more I had to say, but I will have mercy upon your readers.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

THE IMMORTAL PHRASE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—None of the allusions in your last issue to my letter re the "Immortal Phrase" require serious comment save one, that of Mr. Frank Tovargue, who in the course of his deprecatory remarks says: "his (referring to myself) opinion that your previous quotations from Shelley seem only to strengthen the position he defends is worthless."

I have, Sir, italicised the word "your" because Mr. Tovargue has fathered on you the quotations of Mr. D. Gulliver to which I took exception. Thus proving that he has not followed this correspondence so carefully as his own statement would imply.

Might I in all courtesy ask Mr. Tovargue this: if to be inspired with a genuine admiration for some of the noblest lines yet written by any poet since Shakespeare and Milton is to entitle one to the appellation of "fanatical devotee," what name shall be given to one who equally admires a poet whose words, beautiful as they are, "came like water, and like wind (they) go;" leaving no lasting or ennobling influence on the minds and hearts of his readers?

In brief, granting that Shelley's poetry is, in parts, as beautiful as a rainbow, is it not equally true that like the rainbow it fails to touch the universal heart of mankind?

It is needless for me to labour the "great divide" between the two poets, for Mr. G. E. Biddle has admirably and critically anticipated any words of mine on the subject in his extremely interesting letter contained in your last issue.

STANLEY HUTTON.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Whilst deprecating dogmatism in settling the comparative merits of Wordsworth and Shelley, one of your correspondents formulates his own dogma that "Each mind is the sole arbiter on points of taste, and its decisions are not affected either by pleading or argument." It seems to me, however, there is a standard of taste (an inadequate word) in poetry from which common sense, as distinguished from sentimentalism, would not appeal. To appreciate great poetry is, probably, as much a gift of nature, as is the ability to write it, and it is very true that the accepted literary critic is, like the poet, born and not made. Hence, to question the verdict of an inspired authority like Coleridge would pre-suppose the questioner to be on the same plane of capacity for giving judgment. What he said respecting the many "unforgettable lines" of Wordsworth has been already "investigated" and confirmed by all succeeding reliable critics, and by the tribute of his own wonderful verse, "With steadfast eye I viewed thee in the choir Of ever-enduring men."

Matthew Arnold's "ineffectual angel" was one of those happy phrases which expressed more, in its assessment of Shelley, than many a long critique. To be compared with "the angels" is no small praise, and to be an "ineffectual angel" is more than to be a minor poet. If one might classify it as natural history, it is probably something like his own skylark which he desired so much to resemble, "part spirit and part bird."

How frequently one is put out of love with one's own favourite poet by the effusive quotations of injudicious friends of the same writer. The prolonged quotations of perfervid sentimentalists are not only seldom to the point, but of such a nauseating lukewarmness as to make one wonder at the twaddle the great poets were guilty of. Looking down from "the abode where the Eternal are," both Wordsworth and Shelley might often exclaim, "Save me from my friends."

J. E. K.

January 27.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The correspondence under the above heading appears to be passing into a discussion between the admirers of Shelley and Wordsworth as to which poet published the greater number of quotable sentences. One correspondent concludes that Wordsworth is the greater genius because "he is more frequently quoted than any other poet except Shakespeare and Milton." Surely this is an error as to the ratio of citation. If the quoted phrase is to be accepted as the criterion of greatness, Pope and Butler (of "Hudibras" renown) are far above Wordsworth and even above Milton! This is, indeed, reductio ad absurdum!

If any benefit is to be obtained by proving one poet inferior or superior to any other poet do let a higher and more literary standard be adopted to settle the man's rank in the poetic hierarchy than this competitive plan! Notable, quotable sayings are generally of the proverb type, and the more they are circulated the more defaced and defiled they become.

JOHN H. INGRAM.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Interested as I have been in this correspondence, I have been wondering all along whether we should get through it without reference to Tennyson's "Jewels five words long." We have not: Mr. Stanley Hutton gave it us plump in his letter of January 20. My object in writing is to implore that no one may repeat it.

"Jewel's five-words-long,
That on the stretch'd forefinger of all Time
Sparkle for ever."

"The stretched forefinger of Time!" Held up to show his jewels, I presume, like the ring-fingers of a suburban lady drinking tea! "All Time." What does all mean here? "The stretched forefinger of all Jones" makes nonsense. How could some of Mr. Jones, or some of Time stretch a forefinger? "Of all Time sparkle for ever." The late laureate was really anxious, it appears, to make an "immortal" phrase and so piled on pleonasm of eternity. And I have not touched at all upon the absurdly inappropriate idea of Time wearing jewels anywhere. It seems to me that in the whole of English literature there is no such inept and faulty phrase—outside The Critic.

H. L. E.

ILLUSTRATED NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was much interested in the letter on this subject addressed to you in the ACADEMY of January 20, by a writer signing herself A. L. T. If A. L. T. is not herself a story-writer, she can at least sympathise with what those of us who are have to suffer. Here is an experience of my own. Not long ago I was asked to contribute a story to a Christmas Number, and my story turned on the old theme of a girl dressed as a man (I need not say that it was a story of the rapier-and-cloak order). The whole point of the story was that the girl must not be recognised to be a girl; and when I sent the manuscript to the artist, I impressed this upon him. The result was that I received in return a drawing which displayed a peculiarly well-developed female figure almost bursting the seams of a too scanty male costume. I showed it to a friend: "In which pantomime is she principal boy?" was his apt question.

The case is too often the same with novels. They are carelessly read by overworked hack artists, with results that we all know. Even Cruikshank (as I remember it was shown in your paper not long ago) was not above reproach in this matter, and the modern artist is far worse. A. L. T.'s irritability is shared, I feel certain, by many of us.

But it is, perhaps, only fair to remember that, as the modern novel is written for people entirely destitute of imagination, so the illustrations are made with the same class in view. The process that has been going on in the theatre since the Bancroft days is going on in fiction too. The imagination is being killed by inanition. People have been too lazy and too stupid, for want of practice, to exercise their own imagination; and while on the one hand, we have the peddling "realistic" novel that can omit no smallest detail, so we have the illustrator, who steps in to add bewilderment to tedium. There are exceptions, of course. The original illustrator of Sherlock Holmes in the Strand Magazine was (or is, for I forget his name) an artist of sufficient power to be welcome to stamp his imagination on our own. If there were more like him, A. L. T. and I and others would have less reason to complain.

URSA MAJOR.

AUBREY BEARDSLEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Robert Ross's one besetting sin—over-great modesty—is amply shown in his article in the ACADEMY of January 27, on an Essay written by a poetaster on Aubrey Beardsley and recently re-issued by Messrs. Dent. It has prevented him from mentioning an admirable criticism of his own on the artist's work, which was prefixed to my edition of "Volpone, or, The Foxe," a book illustrated by Beardsley, which gained for my firm the Grand Prix de Paris at the Universal Exhibition of 1900. Mr. Ross's "Eulogy" of Beardsley is far more valuable to the person who is making the acquaintance of that artist's work, and is written with far greater knowledge of, and sympathy with, its subject.

I had with the issue of No. 1 of "The Savoy" a similar experience to Mr. Lane's. A round robin was sent me by its contributors declining to allow their work to appear unless Mr. Beardsley's work was withdrawn. As I regarded, and still regard, Mr. Beardsley's work as of far greater worth than that of every other contributor to "The Savoy" put together, I said to the editor, "I will do without the other people's work, and stick to Beardsley." It may amuse some to know that, much to the annoyance of my literary editor and to the great delight of Beardsley, I was myself the art editor of that, to me, unforgettable publication.

I am afraid Mr. Ross is poking fun when he alludes to my "limited editions of 5000 copies"; they were, alas! editions of from 200 to 500 copies, and even then would never sell out. If I sold 300 copies of any book with Beardsley's illustrations I was overjoyed. Now, they all fetch a considerable premium on the moderate prices at which they were originally issued.

During Mr. Beardsley's last illness I had many "serious, almost solemn," conversations with him, and there is no doubt whatever in my mind as to his sincerity as regards his religion, although his expression of it in his letters to me was very different from his correspondence with the "un-named friend," who may or may not have been "the author of certain pseudo-scientific and pornographic works issued in Paris," mentioned by Mr. Ross.

LEONARD SMITHERS.

January 31.

ROBERT BURNS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am obliged to you for inserting my letter about the date of Burns's birthday.

As to the correct reading of the line in "Tam o' Shanter" I find editions vary; some having "the snow falls," others either "snow-falls" or "snowfall." I took mine from W. S. Douglas's edition, which professes accuracy, and I have read somewhere (I think in the Centenary edition of Burns) that "like the snow falls" was what the poet wrote, but that it was altered to "snow-falls" or "snowfall" by Chambers, who mistook the construction of the sentence, in which either "like"="as" or (as I now think probable, "like-falls"="like the snow that falls." In any case "falls" is a separate word and a verb.

In your editorial note to my letter, you refer to the "Kilmarnock edition" as your authority for the other reading. There must be some mistake here, since the Kilmarnock edition appeared in 1786 and contains the poems written up to that date; whereas "Tam o' Shanter" was not written till 1790 or 1791, and appeared first in the Edinburgh Magazine of March 1791, and was published in what is known as the "Second Edinburgh Edition" of 1793. Possibly this is the one you intended to name.

C. S. JERRAM.

OUR CURATE'S EYES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A few months ago the question was raised in your columns as to the authorship of the witty epigram on "Our Curate's Eyes," and the name of Rowland E. Egerton-Warburton was cited as its possible and even, probable author. The question is so far settled by a letter from Mr. Warburton's son which I received a few days ago. He writes, "In looking over an old book of my father's I have come on 'Our Curate's Eyes' that you wanted to know about: On back is written by him—'This epigram was given to me by the Bishop of Peterborough at Crewe Hall, December 1873. He said: "I will not put my name to it as I might be supposed the author"—which I suspect he was.—R. E. E.-W."

Nunney Delamere, Frome.

January 25.

ROBERT BATEMAN.

MR. J. H. INGRAM'S BIBLIOGRAPHY OF MARLOWE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I hasten to apologise to Mr. J. H. Ingram for my inadvertence in not quoting him correctly. As I had not his volume before me when writing, I unfortunately trusted to memory. Mr. Ingram is not, however, ingenuous enough to admit that I was substantially right, although verbally wrong. That this is the case will appear when I say that the item in question figures as follows in his bibliography: "Faligan, E. De Marlowianis fabulis. Paris, 1887. A thesis exposing many of the fables about Marlowe."

Now my contention is that Mr. Ingram was evidently led astray by the title of the book and after a perfunctory examination described it in accordance with his misconception. I find it impossible to account for his description in any other way. The greater part of the volume is made up of an examination of Marlowe's plays with an elaborate study of their sources, and so far is a valuable contribution to the study of Elizabethan literature. Mr. Ingram's statement that it is based on second-hand knowledge is but another example of his accuracy. Certainly M. Faligan is not a discoverer. It has been left for Mr. Ingram to find out that the best-known play of Thomas Heywood should be credited to Ben Jonson, and that both the second and third parts of Henry VI. are based on the "True Tragedy of Richard Duke of York."

FRANCIS WOOLLETT.

[Mr. Ingram replies:

In courtesy to the Editor, who has published this correspondence, and the readers who may have perused it, I condescend to answer Mr. Woollett's further letter, which should have been restricted to his apology. On January 16 he asserted that I had made a "mistake" in saying what I had never stated; secondly, he averred that, as he "had expected," the work of M. Faligan was "nothing of the kind" described by me, but "simply a doctoral thesis dealing with the plays of Marlowe," which he now tries to qualify; and, thirdly, he alleged that I had "not taken the trouble to examine" the volume, because, forsooth, he finds "it impossible to account for his description in any other way." Founding his accusations first on a faulty memory, and then on his own personal opinions!

I have nothing to retract or revise of my note on M. Faligan's book. In a treatise on Marlowe a considerable portion of the book is necessarily devoted to an examination of his dramas, but a large section of this one is allotted to his life and deals with all the old problems and fables connected with it, such as the Collier forgeries; theory of Marlowe's soldiering; Manwood supporting the poet at college; Elizabethan idea of "early age"; Greene's posthumous tract, and so forth. I carefully read and made notes of the volume, but could not gather a single item of fresh information from it.

The new matter which Mr. Woollett now introduces into the correspondence has nothing to do with M. Faligan's work, and has been sufficiently dealt with in other publications. I shall have nothing more to say on that subject until the re-issue of my book on Marlowe.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Social Caricature in the Eighteenth Century. By "George Paston." 15½ x 11½. Methuen, 52s. 6d. net.

Hind, C. Lewis. Days with Velasquez. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xii, 160. Black, 7s. 6d. net.

[Twenty-four full-page illustrations, eight of which are "reproduced in the colours of the original paintings," the remainder in black and white. At the end of his appreciation Mr. Lewis Hind has added a list of the "Principal Works of Velasquez," arranged by locality.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Bielschowsky, Albert. The Life of Goethe. Authorised Translation from the German by William A. Cooper. In three vols. Vol. i. 1749-1788. From Birth to the Return from Italy. Illustrated. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xvi, 439. Putnam.

[Bielschowsky's Goethe, sein Leben und seine Werke, the first volume of which appeared in 1895, was at once hailed as supplanting the Life by Lewes, till then unrivalled. Professor Cooper's translation will be welcomed. The quotations are given both in German and English, and he has added a few notes. The portraits are most interesting.]

Barine, Arvède. Louis XIV. and La Grande Mademoiselle (1652-1693). Authorised English Translation. Illustrated. 9 x 6. Pp. xii, 394. Putnam, 12s. 6d.

[The French work was published in the spring of last year. The translation makes a sumptuous volume, fully illustrated.]

EDUCATION.

Leigh, Hon. M. Cordelia. Our School out of Doors: a Nature book for young people. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 141. Unwin, 2s.

[Designed for the assistance of teachers in Nature Study. The school is supposed to be taken for a country walk twice a month and to be studying on the spot.]

Frazer, Norman L. Summary of English History. With 53 illustrations and 12 maps. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 216. Black's School History. Black, 2s.

FICTION.

Synge, Mrs. Hamilton. A Supreme Moment. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 315. Unwin, 6s. Cobb, Thomas. Mrs. Erricker's Reputation. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 308. Alston Rivers, 6s. (See p. 117.)

Coke, Desmond T. F. The Bending of a Twig. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. (Chapman and Hall, 6s.)

Howard, Keble. The Smiths of Surbiton. A Comedy without a Plot. Illustrated. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 400. Chapman and Hall, 6s.

Parrish, Randall. A Sword of the Old Frontier: a tale of Fort Chartres and Detroit. Illustrated. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 407. Putnam, 6s.

Hamilton, Cosmo. Nature's Vagabond and other Stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 324. Chatto & Windus, 6s. (See p. 117.)

Betham-Edwards, Miss. Martha Rose, Teacher. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. John Long, 6s. (See p. 117.)

Fenn, George Manville. Aynsley's Case. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. John Long, 6s.

Trowbridge, W. R. H. A Dazzling Reprobate. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 299. Unwin, 6s.

Joubert, Carl. The White Head (Baylaxa Ruka). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 327. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Forestier-Walker, Clarence. The Cuckoo's Egg. 7½ x 5. Pp. 304. Digby, Long, 6s.

Livingstone, Belle. Letters of a Bohemian. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 154. Greening.

Orczy, Baroness. A Son of the People. 7½ x 5. Pp. 340. Greening, 6s.

LITERATURE.

Koster, Edward B. Over Navolging en Overeenkomst in de Literatuur. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 80. Wageningen: Pieterse.

Sandbach, F. E. The Heroic Saga-Cycle of Dietrich of Bern. Popular Studies in Mythology, Romance and Folklore, No. 15. 6½ x 4½. Pp. iv, 68. Nutt, 6d. net.

[The development of this saga (which moderns have strangely neglected in favour of the once less famous Siegfried) from its origin in History and Mythology, and some account of the poems comprising the Dietrich Cycle. With a list of the more important poems and a bibliography.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Science Year Book, Diary, Directory and Scientific Summary, 1906. 9½ x 6½. King, Sell and Olding, 5s. net.

[The second annual issue of this invaluable book contains new and additional maps and notes and a fuller directory, with a list of books published during last year. Any page of the book can be had separately.]

Robertson, John M. What to Read: suggestions for the better utilisation of Public Libraries. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 15. Watts, 2d.

Guyot, Yves. The Comedy of Protection. Translated by M. A. Hamilton. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxxii, 325. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

Catalogue of the Principal Works in Circulation at Mudie's Library. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xviii, 719. Mudie's Library.

The Cambridge Year-book and Directory. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xv, 784. Swan Sonnenschein, 5s. net.

[See note to the Oxford Year-book in "Books Received," ACADEMY, January 27.]

Sharpless, Isaac. Quakerism and Politics. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 224. Philadelphia: Ferris & Leach.

[A series of papers dealing with the aims and influences of Quakerism.]

Northcote, Hugh. Christianity and Sex Problems. 8½ x 6. Pp. 257. Philadelphia: Davis, $2.00 net.

Lane, Mrs. John. The Champagne Standard. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 314. Lane, 6s.

ORIENTAL.

Some Sayings from the Upanishads. Done into English, with Notes, by L. D. Barnett. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 59. Luzac, 1s. 6d. net.

[Dr. Barnett is Assistant in the Department of Oriental Books and MSS. of the British Museum.]

POETRY.

Graham, John Ramsay. Verses. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 57. Greening, 5s. net.

Bryant, Marguerite. Verses to Many Friends. 7 x 4½. Pp. 72. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

The Tragedies of Algernon Charles Swinburne. In five vols. Vol. v. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 451. Chatto & Windus, 6s. net.

[Contents: Lochner; The Sisters; Marino Faliero; Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards.]

The King's Novels: Charles Reade's Peg Woffington. 6 x 4½. Pp. xviii, 274. De La More Press, 1s. 6d. net.

Mrs. Beeton's Book of Household Management. 8½ x 6. Pp. 2056. Ward, Lock, 7s. 6d. net.

The Story of the Nations. Japan. By David Murray. With a supplementary chapter by Joseph H. Longford. 8 x 6. Pp. x, 464. Unwin, 5s.

SCIENCE.

Saleeby, C. W. Ethics. Pp. 115; Bennett, Edward T. Spiritualism. Pp. 140. Each 7½ × 4½. Shilling Scientific Series. Jack.

Moore, J. Howard. The Universal Kinship. 8½ × 5. Pp. 330. [The chief purpose of this book is to prove and interpret the kinship of the human species with the other species of animals.]

Prince, Morton, M.D. The Dissociation of a Personality: a Biographical study in Abnormal Psychology. 8½ × 6. Pp. xii, 569. Longmans, 10s. 6d. net.

[This book is more interesting than any novel. It is a long study of a lady who was an instance of multiple or "disintegrated" personality. She was, in fact, three or four people, not one. Professor Prince is a well-known American nerve-physician. This volume forms Parts i. and ii. of a larger work, "Problems in Abnormal Psychology," but is complete in itself.]

Snyder, Harry. Dairy Chemistry. Illustrated. 7½ × 5½. Pp. xii, 190. Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Snyder is Professor of Agricultural Chemistry in the University of Minnesota, and this book is the outgrowth of a course of lectures delivered there. The main object is to present concisely the principal changes that take place in the handling of milk and its manufacture into butter and cheese; but the sanitary condition of milk, the feeding of dairy stock, and other subjects are also treated.]

THEOLOGY.

Vivian, Philip. The Churches and Modern Thought: an inquiry into the grounds of unbelief and an appeal for candour. 8 × 5½. Pp. xvi, 398. Watts, 6s. net.

[An endeavour to set forth "not only the destructive but also the constructive, results of a search for truth," by one who "succeeded in extricating himself from a quagmire of demonstrably false superstition."]

Lüdemann, Hermann. Biblical Christianity. Authorised Translation by Maurice A. Canney. 7½ × 5. Pp. x, 82. Owen, 2s. net.

[Dr. Lüdemann, Professor (Ord.) of Theology in the University of Bern, is a "Liberal Protestant."]

Salt, Henry S. The Faith of Richard Jefferies. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 15. Watts, 2d.

[Reprinted from The Westminster Review.]

TRAVEL.

Raleigh, Walter. The English Voyages of the Sixteenth Century. 8½ × 5½. Pp. 205. MacLehose, 4s. 6d. net. (See p. 111.)

Kemeid, Halil-J. The Standard Guide to Egypt and the Sudan. Ninth yearly edition, revised. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 258. Simpkin, Marshall, 1s.

THE BOOKSHELF

WE have received two books that are as like as two peas but come from different publishers. One is Henry Irving, by Austin Brereton (Treherne, 1s. net), the other is The Art of the Theatre, together with an introduction by Edward Gordon Craig and preface by R. Graham Robertson (T. N. Foulis, Edinburgh and London). Both books are bound in brown paper, very handsomely printed and illustrated. Mr. Brereton's book is a collection of articles which he has written at various times on Sir Henry Irving, and it contains two appendices which will be of value to the student and the annalist, a chronological history of Sir Henry Irving's life and a full list of the parts he played. Mr. Gordon Craig's book calls for fuller notice. Every one knows Mr. Gordon Craig as a scenic artist, who in Bethlehem, Ibsen's Vikings and other productions achieved by unconventional means effects of real and surprising beauty. He is less fortunate when he comes to theorise; or rather his theories are perfectly right and his illustrations and details often wrong. His main contention is that the art of the theatre is a composite art, that it is composed not of words only, nor of movement only, nor of colour and form only, but of all three and of other things that work together; and he maintains very rightly that to secure artistic unity in theatrical production there ought to be one guiding mind to control all those different elements into harmony. He is right in thinking that the Drama grew originally out of movement, not out of speech; in Greece out of dancing, in England out of religious ritual into which speech came gradually to be introduced. Where he is absolutely wrong is in such statements as this; "Hamlet has not the nature of stage representation," and the inference that Hamlet was written for the closet, not for the stage, and is complete in itself without performance. He is wrong in implying, as he does, that the Miracles and Mysteries are not quite so complete without performance as Shakespeare's plays. To read them is to see that they are infinitely less theatrical, far more didactic, far less dependent on scenic representation than any play that Shakespeare ever wrote. He goes off on a strange error on the matter of stage-directions. His opinion is that Shakespeare omitted stage-directions because he felt justified in leaving those things to the higher authority, the stage director. If Shakespeare omitted stage-directions, he did so because there was nobody who could carry them out. It was no use his describing an orchard, a palace or a room, because, whatever he said, his manager would be bound to give him exactly the same curtain for each. When Mr. Pinero or Mr. Jones occupies two pages in describing a room he does so, because he knows he will get exactly what he asks for. He becomes, in fact, the stage director, for it is a matter of common knowledge that the modern dramatist is a more important person at a rehearsal than the manager and that it is he who directs the costumiers, scene painters, and actors alike. In the case of revivals the manager takes his place, but it is nearly always the case that there is one mind responsible and controlling. The fact is that in his claim for a stage director Mr. Gordon Craig is not demanding anything that we have not got. His demand is really, if he knew it, for more intelligence, more artistic sense, in the mind of the stage directors whom we have. We may say in conclusion that the more they take the opinion of Mr. Gordon Craig on matters of detail, the more likely they are to achieve beauty in their productions.

Midsummer Eve, by Gordon Bottomley, is a dramatic poem of extraordinary vagueness, with an almost mawkish insistence on some ideas of sex that will spoil for many its frequent passages of beauty. It is described as a pastoral and brings before us with a solemn sloth of movement the reticent loveliness of a June night. Five girls meet in the moonlight in the door of a great barn, to watch through the enchanted eve of midsummer for visions of their future loves. A cow is dying of milk fever in the neathouse, and the girls talk sadly, wonderingly, and without reserve of the cares and pains of female things. They see no imaged swains, but the fetch or wraith of one of themselves, who is at once seized with the consciousness of death. It is vaguely suggested that the fetch milks the sick beast, so that it dies, and, at the end, we are given to understand that the girl dies, and perhaps also the one who waits with her. Surely an intangible warp on which to weave the texture of a poem. But the woven gossamer has parts so perfect that it is an impertinence to mention them with such brevity. We like especially this song of bee-swarming:

"Fetch the porridge pot hither to me,
The porridge pot and the dairy key,
And bring me a clout to wind my hair
Or the swarming bees will tangle there:
They drip from the hive in the orchard long
And coil the green-cherried boughs among
As they follow the tanking tune I ring
Under the cherry leaves' shivering . . ."

and these lines, of the last load of hay:

"Yet here's the haysel done with: how it hurt
To rake behind the last dim cart; and now
My soul creeps in me like the low pale night mist
To know that in a moment past this moment
We shall not hear it slowly any more
Down in the lane where, wisping the close trees,
It follows us like a mournful sound of change."

The book is beautifully printed by hand, and illustrated, by Mr. James Guthrie, at the Pear Tree Press.

Flowering Plants, their Structure and Habitat, by Charlotte L. Laurie (Allman and Sons, 2s. 6d.), is intended for those already possessing some knowledge of Botany, and treats mainly of the Ecology and Histology of Plants. These subjects have been comparatively neglected in schools, though capable of being made intensely interesting. The book forms a supplement to the author's Text-book of Elementary Botany, and is very attractively illustrated by Miss Boys-Smith, whose drawings are original and not mere reproductions from Sachs.

For beginners a useful little book (in the hands of good teacher) is Mr. C. L. Cooper's First Lessons in Botany, an introduction to nature-study, illustrated by C. C. Cooper (Blackie, 6d.). We say in the hands of a good teacher, because there is nothing but the skeleton—the dry bones which the teacher must clothe with flesh and endue with spirit, before botany can mean anything in the world to a child. Still it is an accurate and comprehensive little book from which the bare details and nomenclature of the science may be profitably learned.

Freehand for Teachers and Art Students, by E. A. Branch (Ralph Holland, 2s. 6d.), contains thirty-two photographic representations, including inlays, patterns on pottery, textiles, repoussé, wrought iron, carved work and natural foliage, together with one hundred diagrams of construction; and opens with a brief outline of the principles of ornament and the construction of patterns, with forty illustrative diagrams. This Introduction is a new feature in a book of this kind, and Mr. Branch may justly claim that his book is not only a complete course of freehand drawing in outline, but likely to be of service to students of elementary principles of ornament and elementary design. His examples all come from S. Kensington; each is thoroughly analysed, and a complete set of working diagrams is given; and to this (second) edition four photographs of natural foliage, with diagrams of construction, have been added. The book has already made its mark, and the new issue will win increased favour.

New Drawing Course. J. Vaughan. Stage v. (Nelson, 2s. 6d.)—This is a Teacher's Handbook, quarto, with firm linen cover, and on excellent paper. Messrs. Nelson are well in the van of progress in this scheme of Drawing, Design, and Manual Occupations, and the book is a marvel at the price. The blackboard illustrations and other plates are sensible and exactly what the teacher wants, no small achievement in these days of rapid development of Codes. The object-drawing and cardboard and clay modelling deserve especial mention. Teachers will find remarks quite as suggestive among the hints as to common errors as among the specimens of work rightly finished. The compiler quite justly insists upon drawing as a necessary ingredient in every child's education, and not as a mere by-subject or extra. With this comprehension of the scope of the subject, naturally the need for more system and cohesion is obvious.

FOR ART LOVERS

Newnes' Art Library

Each volume contains about sixty-four full pages in monochrome, and a Frontispiece in photogravure. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced. Each volume also contains a list of the principal works of the artist. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E. Phythian.
FRA ANGELICO. By Edgcumbe Staley.
LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By Henry Miles.
BOTTICELLI. By Richard Davey.
SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. Baldry.
CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir James D. Linton, R.I.
VELASQUEZ. By A. L. Baldry.
GOZZOLI. By Hugh Stokes.
RAPHAEL. By Edgcumbe Staley.

VAN DYCK. By Hugh Stokes.
G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. Pantini.
TINTORETTO. By Mrs. Arthur Bell.
PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. Arthur Bell.
BURNE-JONES. By Malcolm Bell.
FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. Konody.
EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By Malcolm Bell.
PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By Arsène Alexandre.
DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI. By Ernest Radford.

"Messrs. Newnes' new celebrated series devoted to the great masters . . . excellently reproduced, and apparently considerable trouble has been taken to secure reproductions of some of the least known and less accessible of the painters' chief works."—STUDIO.

Drawings by Great Masters

The Drawings in this new series are reproduced on a large scale on a page 11½ in. by 8½ in. The volumes each contain 48 Reproductions, many of them printed in colour, and several of these are mounted on coloured papers in harmony with the tints in which the Illustrations are printed. The volumes are bound in delicately toned paper boards with vellum backs, and a beautiful design printed in three colours. 4to. 7s. 6d. each net.

HOLBEIN. By A. Lys Baldry.

ALBRECHT DURER. By Dr. Hans Singer.

"It is sure of a welcome. The reproductions are printed with unusual care."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

Modern Master Draughtsmen

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters"

7s. 6d. net each.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. Martin Wood.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By Malcolm Bell.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. Martin Wood.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. L. Baldry.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. Hans Singer.

Master Etchers

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters"

7s. 6d. net.

MERYON. By Hugh Stokes.

Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts

A series of volumes for those interested in the Applied Arts of the past, providing information of a really practical value to Collectors and Students. Particular attention has been paid to the Illustrations, which are both numerous and of the highest quality, and include both monochromes and subjects in colour. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net each.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. Pitcairn Knowles.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. Kendrick.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By Frederick Fenn.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By Percy Bate.

OLD PEWTER. By Malcolm Bell.

IMPRESSIONIST PAINTING: ITS GENESIS AND DEVELOPMENT. By Wynford Dewhurst. With 94 Illustrations in monochrome and five in colours. Small folio, 25s. net.

MODERN MURAL DECORATION. By A. L. Baldry. With 116 Illustrations, four of which are in colour. Buckram, crown 4to, 12s. 6d. net.

TURNER'S LIBER STUDIORUM. With 71 Reproductions. Oblong medium 4to, quarter vellum, cloth sides, 10s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS. By Howard Pyle. Profusely illustrated by the Author. Royal 8vo cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MERRY ADVENTURES OF ROBIN HOOD, OF GREAT RENOWN IN NOTTINGHAMSHIRE. By Howard Pyle. With Illustrations by the Author. Royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE STORY OF THE CHAMPIONS OF THE ROUND TABLE. By Howard Pyle. With Illustrations by the Author. Royal 8vo, cloth gilt, 10s. 6d. net.

THE MEANING OF PICTURES. Six Lectures given for Columbia University at the Metropolitan Museum of Art by Professor JOHN C. VAN DYKE. With 31 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 5s. net.

Complete Illustrated Book-List post free on application.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 3 to 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

FEBRUARY 1906

- The Flood. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.
 The Centenary of Pitt. By T. E. KEBBEL
 Mr. John Burns the Workman-Minister. By ROBERT DONALD
 A Great Moral Upheaval in America. By Admiral Sir CYPRIAN A. G. BRIDGE, G.C.B.
 The Bishop of London on the Declining Birth Rate. By JOHN W. TAYLOR (Professor of Gynaecology, Birmingham University)
 The Children of the Clergy. By the Right Rev. Bishop WELLDON
 An Official Registration of Private Art Collections. By Mrs. S. ARTHUR STRONG, LL.D.
 A Visit to the Court of the Tashi Lama. By C. VERNON MAGNIAC (late Private Secretary to the British Commissioner in Tibet)
 The Deans' Memorial and the Athanasian Creed. By the Very Rev. the Dean of LICHFIELD
 The Reading of the Modern Girl. By FLORENCE B. LOW
 The Reviewing of Fiction. By RICHARD BAGOT
 Church and State in Russia. By J. ELLIS BARKER
 The Native and the White in South Africa. By W. F. BAILEY, F.R.G.S. (Irish Land Commissioner)
 Local Autonomy and Imperial Unity: The Example of Germany. By GEORGE FOTTRELL

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & COMPANY, LTD.,
5 NEW STREET SQUARE

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily
 THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.
 Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.
 Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.
 OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.
 SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.
 Office: Great New Street, E.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.
 Fullest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE DUNDEE COURIER

Has double the circulation of any Morning Paper North of the Forth.
 Literary Notes on Monday. Reviews on Wednesdays.
 London Office, 109 Fleet Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.
 LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.
 Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON."
 Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

Every Day is Publishers' Day in the

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.
 TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.
 West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
 AND AFTER DINNER.

& BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

NOTICE.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE (52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1762

FEBRUARY 10, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,
Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Thursday next, February 15, at 5 o'clock, HENRY B. IRVING, Esq. M.A. First of Two Lectures on "The English Stage in the Eighteenth Century." Half a Guinea the course.

Saturday, February 17, at 3 o'clock M. H. SPIELMANN, Esq., F.S.A. First of Two Lectures on "George Frederick Watts, as a Portrait Painter." Half a Guinea.

Subscription for all the Courses in the Season Two Guineas.

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING.

Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND ABROAD.

SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

SPA, BELGIUM, PENSIONNAT DE DEMOISELLES; Principal, MADAME LECOQ. References in England. Pupil speaking English one hour daily can be received for half-fees.

OKHAM SCHOOL (Rutland).

A small well-endowed Public School with numerous Exhibitions to the Universities.

The alterations and additions, which are now complete, make the buildings exceptionally good.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH. For particulars apply to the Headmaster.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL

for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—A. B., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A.

(Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

TO AUTHORS OF DICTIONARIES.—The ADVERTISER RECOMMENDS as SECRETARY one who has a passion for words. Philology flows in his mental veins.—B. S. G., 44 Kenwyn Road, Clapham.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS

OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

SECOND-HAND BOOKS AT HALF-PRICES! NEW BOOKS AT 25 PER CENT. DISCOUNT! Books for Oxford and Cambridge Local, College of Preceptors, and all other Examinations supplied. State wants, send for List. Books sent on approval. BOOKS BOUGHT. Good Prices given. W. L. FOYLE, Cecil Court, Charing Cross Road, W.C. (2 minutes from Trafalgar Square.)

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO.

Established
1854.

104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

ARCHÆOLOGIA CANTIANA, Vols. 1-25, cloth, £8 8s.; Shaw's Kentish Dialect, wrapper (pub. 10s. 6d.), 2s. 6d.; cloth 4s.; half-Rox. 5s.; Shaw's History of Easby, 4to, half-Rox., 9s. 6d.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

MORLEY, LIFE OF GLADSTONE, 1st edition, 3 Vols., new and uncut, 30s.; Ruskin's Letters to M. and H. G., privately printed, 25s.—Apply Miss WARD, Belmont, Exeter.

JUST PUBLISHED.

CATALOGUE (No. CIV.) OF SECOND-HAND FRENCH BOOKS, comprising History and Literature—Memoirs—Biography and Correspondence—Art—Folk-lore—Travel—Fiction etc.

MONTHLY LIST (FEBRUARY) OF SECOND-HAND BOOKS, chiefly English, including Works on Art and Architecture—Antiquarian Literature—Bibliography, etc.; also of NEWLY PUBLISHED BOOKS, English and Foreign.

B. H. BLACKWELL, 50 & 51 Broad Street Oxford.

SOWERBY'S BOTANY, Last Edition, with Supplement, Edited by Syme; Life-size Drawing, hand-coloured, of every British Plant. Bound in ½ morocco; published £29 net. for £16.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

For Books Wanted see page 151.

Distinctive System of Assurance.

LOW PREMIUMS. LOW EXPENSES.

Scottish Provident Institution

LONDON: 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
WEST END: 17 PALL MALL, S.W.
HEAD OFFICE: 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING.—Novels, 9d. 1000, reduction for quantities and regular work. Translations.—Miss HANDLEY, Needham Market, Suffolk.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts), Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French, German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

TYPEWRITING.—AUTHORS' MSS. of all kinds carefully TYPED at moderate rates by a Cambridge Graduate (Honours) with knowledge of French, German, and Italian.—A. U. BOWMAN, Hanover Lodge, Kensington, Bath.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH. — THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Art

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

CHATTO &amp; WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

FOR LIFE—AND AFTER. By GEORGE R. SIMS.

The story strongly illustrates the peril of conviction on circumstantial evidence, and will cause the reader to recall a celebrated case on which opinion is still sharply divided.

CASTE AND CREED. By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Sanyasi," "Dilys," etc.

"A vivid and notable novel."—OUTLOOK.
NATURE'S VAGABOND, etc. By COSMO HAMILTON, Author of "Duke's Son."

"Mr. Hamilton writes cleverly, and two or three stories in this volume are strikingly original. . . . There is genuine pathos in 'This is Love.'"—TRIBUNE.

HUGO. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

"Beyond doubt, amazingly exciting. 'Hugo' is full of originality, and raises the sensational novel to the level of an artistic achievement. No one but Mr. Bennett has done that since Stevenson died."—MORNING LEADER.

MR. SWINBURNE'S TRAGEDIES. COLLECTED LIBRARY EDITION, in Five crown 8vo volumes, bound in buckram, with gilt tops, price 30s. net for the Five Volumes.

Vol. V., completing the Series, and containing Lochrine, The Sisters, Marino Faliero, and Rosamund Queen of the Lombards, is now ready.

THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD. Being a Choice of Passages from his Works made by ALFRED H. HYATT. Uniform with The Pocket R. L. S. and The Pocket Richard Jefferies. In 16mo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net; leather, gilt top, 3s. net. (Shortly.)

CHARING CROSS AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD. By J. HOLDEN MACMICHAEL. With 3 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.
"Sure of becoming a standard work on the district with which it deals."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

LIFE IN MOROCCO. By BUDGETT MEAKIN, Author of "The Land of the Moors." With 24 full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. (March 1.)

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net. (March 8.)

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS IN THE PRESS. LOVE AND LORDSHIP. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." (March 1.)

IN THE ROARING FIFTIES. By EDWARD DYSON, Author of "The Gold-Stealers." (March 8.)

MARA: AN UNCONVENTIONAL WOMAN. By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "Heirs of Reuben." (March 15.)

A MENDER OF NETS. By WILLIAM MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol." (March 22.)

In the Press. CHEAPER EDITIONS. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY. With a Frontispiece by STANLEY L. WOOD.

THE CRUISE OF THE "BLACK PRINCE" PRIVATEER. By Commander CAMERON. With 2 Illustrations by P. MACNAB.

CHILDREN OF TO-MORROW. By WILLIAM SHARP.

NO OTHER WAY. By Sir WALTER BESANT. With 12 Illustrations by C. D. WARD.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

BEN-HUR: A Tale of the Christ. By LEW. WALLACE.

MR. VERDANT GREEN. By CUTHBERT BEDE. With 65 Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth, 1s. (Shortly.)

New Volumes of the
ST. MARTINS LIBRARY.

In the press. Pott 8vo, cloth, 2s. net per vol.; leather, 3s. net per vol.

TAINE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Translated by H. VAN LAUN. In 4 vols., with 32 portraits.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, St. Martin's Lane.

FROM THE
De La More Press List

THE HEART OF A GARDEN.

A "garden book," written primarily from the literary point of view, but containing much information of use to amateur gardeners. With verses. By ROSAMUND MARRIOTT WATSON. Numerous fine half-tone illustrations. Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. (Ready.)

"The Heart of a Garden" is a gem of literature, and to those who know and love Nature will be joy for ever." DAILY MAIL.

THE LITTLE BLACK PRINCESS.

A true Tale of Life in the Never-Never Land by JEANNIE GUNN. A fascinating picture of Native Life on a Station in the Australian Bush. With many illustrations from Photographs taken expressly for the book. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE KING'S CLASSICS.

NEW VOLUME NOW READY.

EARLY LIVES OF CHARLEMAGNE.

By EGINHARD and the MONK OF ST. GALL. Edited, with Introduction and Notes by Professor A. J. GRANT. Frontispiece. 1s. 6d. net. Quarter vellum or limp lambskin, 2s. 6d. net.

THE KING'S NOVELS.

Art Wrappers, 1s. net; Green Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Quarter Vellum, 2s. 6d. net each.

With Introductions by Dr. RICHARD GARNETT, C.B. THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

SILAS MARNER. By GEORGE ELIOT.

HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THOMAS MORE.

By ANNE MANNING.

NEW VOLUME IN THE LIBRARY OF LITURGOLOGY.

ECCLESIOLOGICAL ESSAYS.

By J. WICKHAM LEGG, F.R.C.P., F.S.A. With many Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. (Ready.)

LOGIC, DEDUCTIVE AND INDUCTIVE.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College. Third Edition, revised and enlarged. Demy 8vo, 6s.

A complete Catalogue will be sent on application.

ALEXANDER MORING,

32 George Street, Hanover Square, W.

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS

NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS BY THE AUTHOR OF "OBITER DICTA."

In square crown 8vo, appropriately bound, 5s. net.

IN THE NAME OF THE BODLEIAN,
AND OTHER ESSAYS,

By the Rt. Hon. AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, M.P.,
Honorary Fellow of Trinity Hall, Cambridge.

"Mr. Birrell can discourse with edifying gaiety on a trite matter like epitaphs, and sympathise with such a derelict set as the Non-Jurors. He is, perhaps, at his best when writing about the eighteenth century, but the modern barbarian and book collector also come in for happy treatment from his pen."—ATHENÆUM.

Crown 4to, suitably bound, and embellished by many Illustrations of the Locality, price 15s. net.

NOTES ON THE EARLIER HISTORY OF THE TOWN OF BARTON-ON-HUMBER. By ROBERT BROWN, F.S.A. Illustrated by Views, Plans and Maps.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s. net.

SCHOOL AND SPORT: a Record of Work and Leisure. By TOM COLLINS, late Head Master of the Newport, Salop, Grammar School, formerly Assistant Master King Edward's School, Birmingham.

NEW NOVELS

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s. net.

BARR AND SON. The Story of a Modern Knight Errant. By EDWIN ELLIOTT, Author of "Who is My Brother?" "Denys Forsyth's Romance," "Curse of Xicotil," "Master of Culver," "Netta," "United," etc.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

RUTH FIELDING: a Double Love Story. By Mrs. F. A. FARRAR.

"The writer treats familiar elements in a newly interesting way, making her characters distinctly attractive."—DUNDAS ADVERTISER.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62 PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON

BROWN, LANGHAM'S
NEW BOOKS

Indian Reminiscences.

Here and There

Memories, Indian and Others, by H. G. KEENE, C.I.E. With Portrait. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

* Mr. Keene is one of the few survivors of the old regime in India, and author of "A Servant of John Company." This interesting book of reminiscences deals with old Haileybury, India before and after the Mutiny, and later recollections of a returned exile in London and elsewhere.

School and College Life.

Christopher Deane

By E. H. LACON WATSON. A new and cheaper edition of this story of Winchester and Cambridge. With Frontispiece, crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

"A charming book."—SPECTATOR.

Four Popular Novels.

A Daughter of Thor

By HELEN MAXWELL. 6s.

* The first edition of this successful novel being nearly exhausted, a second is in preparation, and will be ready in a few days.

The Lady Navigators

By EDWARD NOBLE. 6s.

"A most excellent piece of nautical fooling." PALL MALL GAZETTE.

The Benefactor

By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER. 6s.

"One of the few recent novels which suggest points worth discussing." SATURDAY REVIEW.

Lieut. Cullivar Jones

By EDWIN LESTER ARNOLD. 6s.

"Reaches a standard of excellence high above the average romance."—WORLD.

Essays and General Literature.

Reflections of a Householder

By E. H. LACON WATSON. 3s. 6d.

* The BOOKMAN for February says: "Here are eighteen essays written with a rare grace of style, an easy, familiar charm that weaves so gradual and subtle a spell upon you that you open the volume merely with the intention of glancing through the first one before you go to bed, and find you have forgotten your intention and got nearly half through the book before you remember it again; you decide to read no further than the next one, and go on making it the next one and the next, until you have read them all."

Thumbnail Essays

By K. C. 3s. 6d. net.

* The LITERARY WORLD says: "Excellent examples of the art of writing on things in general as it was known and cultivated in a more leisurely age."

Litanies of Life

By KATHLEEN WATSON. Third Edition. 2s. 6d. net.

* Mr. W. T. Stead writes: "A little book containing five short stories, but every one of them is worth reading, and the note of all sounds sweet and true. The reader will lay down the book, as I did, with a feeling of profound sympathy and gratitude to the writer."

How to deal with the Unemployed

By MARY HIGGS. 2s.

(Cheaper Edition, paper covers, 6d.)

Three Little Gardeners

By L. AGNES TALBOT. Second Edition. 2s. 6d. net.

"This book should be given to every little girl or boy who has a garden, and who is anxious to do things properly."—EXAMINER.

BROWN LANGHAM & Co., 78 New Bond Street, W.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	131	The Drama :
Literature :		His House in perfect Order . . . . .	140
The Old Critic and the New . . . . .	133	Court Theatre . . . . .	141
A Dull People . . . . .	134	The New Royalty Theatre . . . . .	142
Around Charing Cross . . . . .	135	Fine Art :
As Others see us . . . . .	136	Turner in and out of Limbo . . . . .	142
The Founder of the Modern		Mr. A. L. Coburn's Photo-
Papacy . . . . .	137	graphs . . . . .	143
Papa Bourgeois . . . . .	137	Music :
At Tomi . . . . .	138	Don Quixote . . . . .	143
A Literary Causerie :		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	144
The Endings of Novels . . . . .	138	Correspondence . . . . .	146
Fiction . . . . .	139	Books Received . . . . .	147
The Bookshelf . . . . .	149

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE writer who contributes to the Cornhill Magazine a disquisition called "From a College Window," in the February number gives what might very well have appeared as a Literary Causerie in our own columns. In his chatty way he tells us that he is himself engaged in literary occupations and that he once went out shooting with a country gentleman who was engaged in writing a novel the chapters of which were read regularly after dinner, the conclusion being that to have to listen to this twaddle was a high price to pay even for the excellent shooting which was enjoyed. The experience seems to have left behind it an undying hatred of what our essayist calls "the amateur."

It would be easy to break a lance with him over some of the propositions he advances, because some of the most delightful books in the English language have been composed by those whose main vocation was not literary; but some of the practical advice which the writer offers is more worthy of comment. "My one belief," he says, "is that in writing one cannot do much by correction." Of course, that is a matter of temperament. One man achieves his purpose by a single attempt, or fails altogether; another is like Balzac, who wrote out the idea of much of his novel first on a small sheet of paper, then expanded and expanded it until, after he had gone over it many times, it had grown into a complete novel. Between the extremes there is every sort and kind of variation. We are told that Shakespeare never blotted a line, but then we know of many thousands of lines that he ought to have blotted. Thus it is simply impossible for one writer to tell another what his practice should be in a matter of this kind.

Two suggestions, nevertheless, are worthy of consideration. One is that everybody who wishes to write should keep a full diary, and the other that he should practise the art of writing poetry. Such advice is more easily given than carried out. In a sense anybody can keep a diary, but not one person in a million has that perfect knowledge of self combined with the requisite moral courage to face the day frankly and write of it truly. The first and the second and the third qualities in a great writer are sincerity, and what sincerity is—to quote a phrase beloved of one who was himself a great editor—"neither you nor I know, but I only." It means something more than what we generally regard as mere truthfulness. It means the power to put away all that does not belong to the individual, all that has been gathered at second hand from other writers and thinkers, and it means also truth, not so much with regard to the paltry happening of to-day, as to the eternal fact that lies at the back of some million or so of such happenings. Diaries in abundance have been kept and written and published, but how few are worthy of the paper and ink required to publish them!

So, too, with the practice of writing poetry. The advice to attempt it is, in a sense, admirable. A command of rhyme and rhythm does indeed mean a command of language as a whole, yet we are sure that no true and devoted lover of poetry would prostitute it to the acquisition of a prose style. That is to say, no one with a spark of genuine poetry in his composition would care to practise verse-writing merely for the purpose of learning proficiency in it. He sings but as the linnet sings, and whoever has observed the young linnet knows that its earliest and most feeble effort at song is as much inspired as the finished carol. No doubt skill comes with practice, but the practice is not that of an athlete preparing for a race, but a series of efforts, each of which it is hoped at the time will result in a masterpiece.

Our writer quotes a good saying of Professor Seeley's: "Don't be afraid of letting the bones show," and that was getting near the true theory of composition. It must have struck many a one as strange that people who cultivate simple habits, and whose subject demands a most direct communication of intelligence, when they sit down to write become dignified and formal and full of thought about their periods. There are, in point of fact, very few writers in the English language who can get rid of this. Fielding did, and Laurence Sterne, and Dean Swift, but some of those authors who are cited as examples by the essayist only aped the real thing. Stevenson aped it quite consciously, and Ruskin, to whom we are particularly recommended, was ever a slave to the resonant syllable and the long rhythm. His simplicity was always that of the Professor. Thus we cannot call ourselves very strongly in agreement with the eyes that look out "From a College Window." Yet it is a point gained that an author writing on a subject like this makes a remark that causes one to take the trouble to dissent from it.

A decision which, if sustained on appeal, must prove of the most momentous importance to British authors has just been pronounced by Judge Kohlsaas of the Circuit Court, Illinois, in the case of the Merriam Co. v. United Dictionary Co. According to the report in the New York Publishers' Weekly, Judge Kohlsaas has most reluctantly decided that a bill to restrain the publication of "Webster's High School Dictionary" and "Webster's International Dictionary" from plates made from photographs of the English edition—which did not contain the notice of copyright under the Chace Act—must be dismissed. The owners of the American copyright edition are therefore left without remedy. If a copy of any work which is protected in the United States comes rightfully into the possession of any one, and does not contain the notice in the form provided, that work is, under this decision, thrown into the public domain and becomes common property.

It has long been suspected by experts that this is the only logical interpretation of Section 4962 of the American Statute, but this is the first clear pronouncement upon the point. Hundreds of English works not bearing any copyright notice in the English edition are thus thrown open to the American pirate. Judge Kohlsaas admitted that the equities of the situation were with the complainant—who had duly copyrighted the work in the United States, and from American plates manufactured in England an edition with the copyright notice intentionally omitted—but affirmed that "the remedy rests with Congress, not with the Courts."

It is to be hoped that advantage will be taken of the opportunity presented by the Copyright Bill now being prepared, to limit the force and effect of Section 4962 to the United States. It is contrary to the spirit of International Law that a country should impose duties upon the citizens of another country outside its own territory. In this case the penalty falls upon American citizens who might be presumed to know American law, but in the case of a British author, who can hardly be expected to understand the British Copyright Code, it is adding insult to injury to require him to know the force and effect of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. Ernest Mayer, Managing Director of the International Copyright Bureau, Ltd., Oswaldestre House, 34 and 35, Norfolk Street, Strand, writes to us as follows: "Russia, being outside the Berne Convention, there are not, of course, any legal means to prevent the appropriation of the best work of English authors on the part of Russian publishers and editors. I am, however, inclined to think that I have hit upon a scheme whereby this wholesale robbery can effectively be put a stop to. I should, therefore, be glad if you would draw your readers' attention thereto, and advise them to communicate with us. I venture to request you for this favour chiefly in the interest of short-story writers."

On the 13th inst. and three following days Messrs. Sotheby will sell the general library of the late Mr. Edwin Truman, M.R.C.S. Mr. Truman was for fifty years Dentist to the Royal Household, from 1853 to the time of his death in 1904, but it was in connection with the first Atlantic Cable that he became famous and made a fortune. He succeeded in completely purifying gutta-percha—the covering material—in any quantity and without injuring the material, and so overcame the difficulty which caused the failure in 1853.

Mr. Truman was a great collector of books and especially of everything illustrated by George Cruikshank. His collections of engravings, drawings and caricatures are to be sold in March and April, and the Cruikshank collections in May. The present sale contains some very fine books. Amongst them we notice a very rare series of the forty-eight woodcuts of "The Cries of London, 1808;" Bacon's "Advancement of Learning," first edition; a fine collection of first editions of Bewicks, forming no less than fifty items in the catalogue; the very rare first edition of Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy"; Cunningham's "Story of Nell Gwyn," a book that brings an inflated price in consequence of the mania for extra-illustrating it; many first editions of Dickens, fifty-seven items; the genuine first issue of the first edition of "Tom Jones"; a large paper copy of Granger's "Biographical History of England" (the book which led to extra-illustrating, or Grangerising, as it is often called); a special large paper copy of Lysons' "Environs of London," Lysons' own copy, and probably the only one coloured; the original manuscript and designs of Northcote's Fables; a considerable collection of Rowlandsons, and a large collection of rare editions of Thackeray.

On the last day several books which will excite keen interest. These are, first and foremost, two copies of the first edition of Scott's "Waverley" (one copy unfortunately imperfect). Book-buyers will be curious to note how much the first copy will bring on this occasion. Next in interest is a copy of the third quarto edition of the Shakespeare Pericles. This is extremely rare. On February 19 Messrs. Sotheby will dispose of the second portion of the gathering of autograph letters and documents, the property of the late Mr. Frederick Barker. These mostly relate to Napoleon Buonaparte and his family and to the French Generals.

The libraries of the famous Orientalists and ethnographers, Dr. Y. L. A. Brandes, of Batavia, and Prof. G. K. Niemann, of the Indian Institute at Delft, will be dispersed by public auction from February 21 to March 1. Catalogues may be had on application to Martinus Nijhoff, The Hague.

To Mr. Tree belongs the credit of having, in the spring of 1904, founded the Academy of Dramatic Art as it at present exists. The object was to provide a thorough general training for the English Stage in the hope that, if success attended the scheme, the Academy might eventually become one of the national institutions of Great Britain. It is encouraging to be able to state that the number of students who have attended the Academy has been remarkable, and that the usefulness of the institution has been widely recognised. Many of these students have already won positions upon the professional stage—a result largely due to the public performance given by the Academy at His Majesty's Theatre in February 1905.

Up to the present time Mr. Tree has borne all the pecuniary risk connected with the Academy: but it is considered by some that, in an undertaking which is designed to benefit the English Stage as a whole, the burden of responsibility should not rest upon one person, however willing and anxious he may be to continue to bear it. It has therefore been suggested to Mr. Tree that a Corporate Body, embracing many of the principal members of the Dramatic Profession, should be formed to share with him the responsibility which he has hitherto so cheerfully undertaken, and at the same time to establish a wider system of control and so extend the scope of usefulness of the institution. This suggestion Mr. Tree has cordially expressed himself willing to agree to. It is, therefore, proposed that the work of the Academy of Dramatic Art shall, from the commencement of the term beginning at the end of April next, be continued under the direct superintendence of an Executive Council consisting of Sir Squire Bancroft, Mr. John Hare, Mr. Tree, Mr. George Alexander, Mr. Forbes Robertson, Mr. Cyril Maude, Mr. Arthur Bouchier, Mr. Pinero and Mr. J. M. Barrie. Sir Squire Bancroft has been elected the President of the Council.

Mr. George P. Bancroft who, since the opening of the institution, has been responsible on Mr. Tree's behalf for its management, has been asked by the Council to retain that position and will, they are glad to say, continue to do so. Further details concerning the Easter Term will be announced shortly, and meanwhile all communications should be addressed to Mr. George P. Bancroft, The Academy of Dramatic Art, 62 Gower Street, W.C.

It is exactly a quarter of a century since the Oxford University Dramatic Society, as it is now named, was first started by Mr. W. L. Courtney, Mr. Arthur Bouchier, and others. From time to time it has sent many valuable recruits to the stage (Messrs. H. B. Irving, James Hearn, Holman Clarke, and Nigel Playfair, to mention only a few), and other names connected with the club include Mr. Max Beerbohm and Mr. Paul Rubens. This year the society makes what is perhaps its most daring venture. Measure for Measure (which, we believe, has not been seen since it was produced by Miss Lilian Neilson exactly thirty years ago at the Haymarket) is to be played on Wednesday the 21st inst. and five following days. Mr. G. R. Foss has undertaken the production, and Miss Maud Hoffman is to be in the cast. All the incidental music has been written by Mr. Robert Cox, of St. John's College, who is getting together an orchestra. It is satisfactory to hear that there is again in the University an undergraduate capable of undertaking such work, which, since Lord Herschell and Mr. Monck's day, has had to be done by others.

Mr. H. H. Johnson, of the Faculté des Lettres, Rennes University, asks us to make it known that he will be grateful to any one who can send him any books, papers or information on the Counties and Towns of North Wales—folklore, history, topography, etc. Address, Rennes University, Ille-et-Vilaine, France, or Amlwch, North Wales.

The Fiscal Problem is undoubtedly the topic of the hour, and it will certainly continue to be discussed for some time. Since it is a question of such vital importance—upon the solution of which the prosperity of the nation so much depends—it is the duty of every intelligent citizen to be conversant with every available fact. Messrs. George Newnes, Limited, recognising the necessity of a work which gives a graphic summary of the trade of the world, with statistics of our exports and imports, announce their intention of publishing an atlas, "The Atlas of the World's Commerce," the maps and diagrams of which will show at a glance the animal, vegetable or mineral products we import or ship to other countries. The work, which will be published in twenty-two parts, will be edited by Mr. J. G. Bartholomew, F.R.G.S., who has been engaged on its compilation for several years.

The same firm intend to include in their Sixpenny Series Mr. H. Rider Haggard's most popular novels; the first, which is almost ready, will be "Nada the Lily," illustrated by Mr. Cyrus Cuneo.

Royal Institution. A General Monthly Meeting of the Members of the Royal Institution was held on the 5th instant, Sir James Crichton-Browne, M.D., F.R.S., Treasurer and Vice-President, in the Chair. Miss Ruddle Browne, Dr. G. L. Findlay, Miss M. H. Pam, Mr. A. Sutton, Mr. L. C. Wallach, and Miss I. K. Young were elected Members. The special thanks of the Members was returned to Dr. Hugo Müller, F.R.S., for a Donation of £100, to Professor J. A. Fleming, F.R.S., for a Donation of £25, and to the Rev. J. H. Ellis, M.A., for a Donation of £25 to the Fund for the Promotion of Experimental Research at Low Temperatures.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi. Arrangements for week ending February 17: Monday, February 12, at 8 P.M., Cantor Lectures: "Modern Warships," by Sir William White, K.C.B., F.R.S. (five lectures); Lecture III.—Armaments—Progress in the design and manufacture of guns, mountings and machinery for working heavy guns—Improvements in projectiles and explosives. Wednesday, February 14, at 8 P.M.: Ordinary meeting—"The Horseless Carriage, 1885-1905," by Claude Johnson. Colonel H. C. L. Holden, R.A., F.R.S., will preside. Thursday, February 15, at 4.30 P.M.: Indian Section—"The Navigable Waterways of India," by Robert Burton Buckley, C.S.I. The Right Hon. John Morley will preside.

Royal Geographical Society. Evening meeting, Monday, February 12, 8.30 P.M., at the Theatre, Burlington Gardens, W. Paper to be read: "The Geography of the Spanish Armada," by the Rev. W. Spotswood Green, Chief Inspector of Irish Fisheries.

Linnean Society of London. At the evening meeting, Thursday, February 15, at 8 P.M., the following papers will be read: "The structure of Isis hippuris (Linnæus)" by J. J. Simpson; "Note on the Geographical Distribution of the Genus Shortia, Torr and Gray," by B. Daydon Jackson, Gen. Sec. L.S. Exhibitions: Dr. H. Charlton Bastian, F.R.S., F.L.S., Developmental Changes in Zoogloea (with lantern slides).

At the London Institution, Finsbury Circus, Mr. Harry Furniss will deliver an illustrated lecture on "Charles Dickens and To-day," on Monday, February 12, at 5 P.M.

LITERATURE

THE OLD CRITIC AND THE NEW

Johnson's Lives of the English Poets. Edited by G. BIRKBECK HILL. In three volumes. Vol. i. (Clarendon Press, 34s. and 42s. net.)

THIS edition of Johnson's "Lives," if not the final one, is at least likely to be the best during the lifetime of the present generation. It possesses an additional interest in the fact that it is prefixed by a memoir of Birkbeck Hill, the learned and industrious editor who was himself a critic of no mean order, and it would be interesting to draw a comparison between his work and that of the master to whom he was so loyal. For Dr. Birkbeck Hill belonged emphatically to the modern school; he was born in 1835, and belonged to a family of Radicals, Free Traders, condemners of the penal code, great advocates of religious equality, and supporters of the anti-slavery cause. At first sight there might be a temptation to dub them faddists and fanatics, but the success that attended several of the brothers more than justifies the opinions they held. Rowland Hill's name will for ever be favourably known in English history through his connection with postal reform; Matthew Davenport Hill became Recorder of Birmingham, and Arthur Hill left his mark on education. Birkbeck Hill himself was a schoolmaster. At the beginning, he worked with his father at Bruce Castle School, but in 1868 he became headmaster, and remained so until 1877. It is, however, with his connection with literature that we are chiefly concerned here. It may be said to have begun in 1869, when he became a contributor to the Saturday Review, under the editorship of his friend, Philip Harwood. His biographer, Mr. H. S. Scott, considers those the palmy days of that journal, among the contributors being E. A. Freeman, J. R. Green, Sir Henry Maine, Lord Justice Bowen, Sir James Stephen, and Professor Owen; but in reality the great journal had begun to decline; Harwood was one of the most laborious and conscientious of editors, but he had not the discernment and brilliancy of Douglas Cook, who was really responsible for guiding so many able men, and who could make the best use of them. It was Birkbeck Hill who wrote the humorous articles on novels, which were at the time the delight of the readers. He himself said:

To read a novel became so inseparably connected in my mind with three pounds ten shillings, the usual payment for a Saturday Review article, that without the one I could not undertake the other. All in vain have friends urged me to read the works of Black, Blackmore, Hardy, Howells, Henry James, Stevenson, and Kipling. Not a single story of any one of these writers have I ever read or am I ever likely to read.

We can understand the circle he was in from the fact that at the same time he contributed to the Cornhill, the Pall Mall Gazette, and the Times, which is as much as to say, in so many words, that he was highly thought of by Mr. Frederick Greenwood. It was about 1869 that he became interested in Johnson, through buying a second-hand copy of an early edition of the "Life." During his boyhood he had scarcely opened Boswell, a statement we can very well believe, because it is only in mature years that one can see the merits of that immortal biography. He kept on reading everything connected with Boswell or Johnson for many years, and it was not until 1875 that he definitely resolved to prepare a new edition of the "Life." Unfortunately, just about the same time ill-health came upon him, and the work was done under very considerable difficulties. He was obliged to spend his winters abroad, gave up the school, and went to live at Burghfield, near Reading. In the autumn of 1877 he had to nurse himself in many ways in order to get on with his work. Nor was it permitted to him to concentrate, even then, all his attention upon Johnson; on the death of his uncle, Sir Rowland Hill, he was called upon to edit his "History of Penny Postage," and to write his life.

In 1880 General Gordon's brother, Sir Henry Gordon, asked him to edit the letters which General Gordon had written to his sister during his government of the Soudan. Everything connected with General Gordon had a character of its own, and it was so with the publication of his letters :

The book appeared under somewhat unusual conditions, for though General Gordon had given his consent to the publication of the letters he refused to take any direct part in it. Whatever information was needed had to be obtained through Sir Henry Gordon, his brother. Birkbeck Hill's admiration for the "rare genius, the wise and pure enthusiasm, and the exalted beneficence of that great man" was conspicuous. The strong religious utterances occurring in the letters expressed thoughts which were not Birkbeck Hill's, but he saw in Gordon—it may be with longing—one who "by manifold struggles feels his feet on the Everlasting Rock." The labour given to these works, as regards the main purpose, was not thrown away. He would often say that he was trained by it in the duties of an editor, and strengthened in his hatred of carelessness and error.

Birkbeck Hill did not live to be a very old man ; he died in his daughter's home at Hampstead on February 27, 1903, at the age of sixty-seven, leaving behind him as his best memorial this edition of "The Lives of the Poets," and the other volumes to which it is allied. The amusing critic of the Saturday Review must have found much of his pleasure in the study of Johnson to lie in a matter of contrast. His own style, alike in writing and thinking, formed an antithesis to that of Johnson.

In looking over the "Lives of the Poets," we are struck by the melancholy reflection that so many of these people, who were of importance in their day, have, in reality, passed out of existence, although here and there a man of letters may fish up something about one or other of them. If we take the first volume, we find that Milton and Dryden are the only well-known authors. Cowley, Butler, and Waller still enjoy the shadow of great reputations ; Rochester, Roscommon, Stepney, Dorset, Pomfret and Walsh are mere names to all but the specialist in English literature. We read of Denham's "Cooper's Hill," that it had "such reputation as to excite the common artifice by which envy degrades excellence" ; a most excellent example, by the way, of Johnsonian phrase. It was reported that Denham had not written it but bought it of a vicar for £40 ; but who reads "Cooper's Hill" to-day ? If we go over the quotations made by Johnson, we find it difficult to select one that would be recognised as worthy of a great poet. There is one exception to this general condemnation, perhaps, the well-known lines :

O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
My great example, as it is my theme !
Though deep, yet clear ; though gentle, yet not dull ;
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

It has always struck us that one of the most amusing prefaces written by Johnson was that to the poems of John Philips. Johnson thought it worth while to copy out the long Latin epitaph at Hereford, which commemorates the virtues of this poet. Philips is known as "Cider" Philips, because the only revival of his poetry that has taken place of recent years has been among the admirers of that wholesome but somewhat thin beverage. We are told by Johnson that on its appearance the poem called "Cider" "was received with loud praises, and continued long to be read, as an imitation of Virgil's Georgick, which needed not shun the presence of the original." We are told by the Editor that it was published in 1707-8 and that Tonson gave forty guineas for it. To the poem on "Cider," Johnson says, "may be given this peculiar praise, that it is grounded in truth ; that the precepts which it contains are exact and just, and that it is therefore at once a book of entertainment and of science." He somewhat naively adds that he was told this by Miller, the great gardener and botanist, who remarked that "there were many books written on the same subject in prose, which do not contain so much truth as that poem." Johnson goes on to quote from Edmund Smith's criticism of Philips a passage in illustration of what Smith calls the "contrariety of style to the subject" :

My Galligaskins, which [that] have long withstood
The winter's fury and encroaching frosts,
By time subdued (what will not time subdue !).

According to that critic, this is "admirably pathetic, and shows very well the vicissitudes of sublunary things." We are afraid that the critic of to-day would have a very different comment to make on it.

A DULL PEOPLE

The Religion of Numa. By JESSE BENEDICT CARTER. (Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.)

THE Romans, like the Greeks and Hebrews, were a peculiar people, to whom posterity has been vastly indebted. But, unlike the Greeks, the Romans were born dull, and we may even suspect that, like a gentleman spoken of by Dr. Johnson, they sedulously cultivated their gift of dullness. One regards them with little more favour than the boys at Dr. Blimber's Academy did, and in their religion the Romans were more studiously uninteresting than in almost anything else. Mr. Jesse Benedict Carter has written a little book on five stages in Roman religion, which gives, perhaps, as clear a general view as the reading public either desires or deserves. The work is entirely destitute of reference to authorities : the writer knows, and the reader must listen. The dignity of history is here very nobly exemplified, but if a reader is curious enough to want to know Mr. Carter's grounds for his statements, he must inquire elsewhere, namely by turning to "Georg Wissowa, whose Religion und Cultur der Römer is the best systematic presentation of the subject . . . Much that is in this book is directly owing to him," Mr. Carter informs us. British students of classical religion have, till recently, abstained from Roman religion, perhaps because it is so purely practical, so uninspired, so unadorned with myth, and so second-hand. Not much about it is known before the Romans borrowed deities and myths from Greece, and spoiled them in the borrowing. The Romans had no Homer, and nothing in their native or imported creeds can rival the Homeric Olympians, and the temple legends, in vivacity, charm, and beauty.

Mr. Carter begins by throwing over the popular philological interpretations of Aryan creeds, which owed so much of their vogue to the genius of Max Müller. He looks to the ideas of unprogressive races historically known to us, for analogies explanatory of the early religion of Rome. The difficulty in this case is that, though there were many survivals of savage ways of thought in Roman religion, the earliest Romans of whom we can guess anything were already an advanced agricultural and civic people, and had given their own formal stamp and uninteresting colour to the notions of their remote ancestors. Mr. Carter says that "primitive peoples" supposed that a spirit resided in every conceivable thing "material and immaterial." But what is an "immaterial thing" if not a spiritual thing, and do primitive peoples hold that a spirit "resides" in a spirit ? When the spirit is thought of as distinct from a thing, "it is supposed to have the form of the thing, to be in a word its double." Did the Romans, or anybody else, suppose that the spirit residing in an oak tree was shaped like an oak tree ? The Greeks thought that it was shaped like a Dryad, a pretty girl. These "doubles," at all events, were presumed to exercise an influence, often evil, over the thing—the ghostly double of the oak tree, it seems, was likely to injure the oak tree. One is entirely unfamiliar with notions at all like these among "primitive peoples." Spirits, of various sorts, some ancestral, some not, haunt Mingah and Nanja trees in Australia. They are not, in shape, like the trees, and do the trees no harm, quite the reverse. Mr. Carter begins at a beginning which we cannot pretend to understand or to have encountered in any early beliefs, and he gives not a single example in proof of his assertions. His difficult scientific subject cannot be treated profitably in this dignified way; we at once ask the author for his proofs and authorities. These "doubles" (about which we are quite sceptical) develop into gods, he says, after each gets a name, take on personal characteristics and "are finally represented under the form of men."

In Rome, when our knowledge of Roman religion begins, these doubles, we learn, are seldom more than names for powers, "they are none of them personal enough to be connected together in myths." Why not? We know people as primitive as the naked houseless Australian black, and the powers in which he believes are all connected together in myths, very like Greek myths. If the Romans did not advance so far as the black fellows, that must have been because they were more dull, more devoid of fancy and poetry than a Huron, an Euahlayi, a Mincopie, or any other rather backward savage—not that the Hurons were very backward. The goddess Vesta was "not so much the goddess of the hearth as the goddess Hearth," and Janus was "the god Door." To possess such a thing as a door implies advancement: the Romans, we are to believe, were too stupid to have myths about Hearth, as the Greeks had myths about Hestia. One cannot believe that any people was born so dull as the Romans were on this showing. They must have taken great pains to arrive at such an unnatural perfection of dulness. In fact, they did, and their jus divinum was the fine flower of their anxious efforts to banish such poetry as nature cannot but have implanted even in them. Their religion was based on their precocious legalism, as Scottish Calvinism was a reflection of the Scottish law of Contract, and Scottish divines wrangled about "the personal property of the Father." The Gods, Hearth and Door, and so on, had their rights; these paid, there was no more to be said or done.

Coming from spirits which are not human ghosts, but "doubles" of material and immaterial things, to ancestor worship, Mr. Carter says that "in the most primitive ideas of life after death it is the family which has immortality, not the individual." Again we ask for evidence and for authorities. In the most primitive people extant all sorts of various ideas of the future of the individual soul co-exist. Now it is reincarnated from one generation to another eternally: now it migrates into an animal; now (and the case is very common) it enters the abode of the good, or of the evil; now it haunts the place of burial, or an adjacent rock or tree, and we must remember that often each individual has several souls, which have various fortunes. Quisque suos patimur manes. Sometimes the soul is thrown into a lake and drowned for good, sometimes it inhabits a star, or departs to a land beyond the horizon. There is no end to the savage views of what occurs to the individual soul, but individual it remains while it continues to exist. We never heard that the family of a given black or red man "has immortality, not the individual." "The centre, therefore, of early religious life is the family," we are told, and we ask, of how early life? The most backward people, not being ancestor-worshippers, have no common religious life, except in the religion of the tribe, the belief in Baïame or Nooreli, or Pirmeneal. Even the totemic customs, if they are religious, are not common to the family, the mother and children have one set of usages, the father has another set, or vice versa, where descent is reckoned through males. The Lares, we learn, were "the group of gods who looked after the various farms." We much suspect them of having been Brownies, anonymous as Brownies usually are. But Mr. Carter simply tells us what he thinks true and good for us, no evidence is exhibited, and we need not further discuss his work, beyond saying that the later chapters deal with the importation of ready-made gods, mainly from Greek colonies in Italy, and later, from Greece itself, and from the East. These chapters present a useful brief abstract of what is known about the extensions of the Roman pantheon.

ANDREW LANG.

AROUND CHARING CROSS

The Story of Charing Cross, and its Immediate Neighbourhood. By J. HOLDEN MACMICHAEL. (Chatto & Windus, 7s. 6d. net.)

ABOUT a century ago an antiquarian correspondence was adorned by a letter which began with the exclamation: "Ho! ho!" The writer had warmed to his work, and there is life in his language yet. We are half sorry that the "Ho! ho!" style of reviewing has gone out, where topography is concerned. But so it is; the topographer's licence to call any other topographer a blockhead is now absurdly questioned. One is no longer permitted to dot an i with a flail. In moments of depression, brought on by the loving-kindness of modern criticism, it cheers us to turn to the old topographical manner. Were we at liberty to adopt it here, our review would naturally open in terms like these: "Mr. Macmichael exhibits uncommon boldness in submitting to the public a dissertation on the plan of the learned Stow. It is our intention to examine his performance, and to acquaint the candid reader how far it evinces a fitness to indulge this species of composition, and in what degree it merits the approbation of the polite world, and can be instructive to the ingenuous youth of both sexes; or whether, by an unhappy diffusion of error and rash hypotheses, it invokes condemnation from the judicious part of mankind."

Before such sentences the modern author would go down like a nine-pin. But the Georgian topographers lost nothing by the stately vacuity of their periods, or the elephantine weight of their objections. The material of topography being minute, as well as remote from everyday life, it was seen that the surest way to draw attention to it was to raise a small difference of opinion into an unholy shindy. Nor did any harm come of attacks which were delivered on port wine, and were read in the coffee-house amid cannonades of snuff. To-day, the instinct remains, though the weapons are put away. The challenge of a book like Mr. Macmichael's is undoubtedly to the discovery of errors and omissions; yet if we may not involve our sentences in thunder, or pickle them in sarcasm, the reviewer's task becomes necessarily a little tame. This cannot be helped and we are sure that Mr. Macmichael, as a true topographer, will pardon our degenerate civility.

Why does he tell us that the archway in Duncannon Street, at the back of the Golden Cross Hotel, is the one through which the Pickwick coach trundled on the occasion when Mr. Jingle took the party under his protection? This is an alluring statement, for we doubt whether there is any bit of Dickens's London on which our eye would rest with a moister affection. "Terrible place—dangerous work—other day—fine children—mother—tall lady, eating sandwiches—forgot the arch—crash—knock—children look round—mother's head off—shocking, shocking!" Now the Golden Cross Hotel of Pickwick stood a good many yards west of the present establishment, a fact of which Mr. Macmichael is well aware. It stood near the south-east corner of what is now Trafalgar Square, and our author himself recalls the circumstance that Hogarth placed himself at one of its windows to sketch the heralds and Yeoman of the Guard proclaiming, at Charing Cross, the accession of George III. The present site would not have served him for this purpose. Mr. Macmichael's reference to the archway in Duncannon Street must be due to a momentary forgetfulness of the fact that the Pickwickians passed under the arch of Golden Cross Hotel on the morning of May 13, 1827, nine years before Duncannon Street existed. If he will turn to page 127 of the three volumes of Walford and Thornbury's "Old and New London," he will find on it an excellent view of the old Golden Cross Hotel, together with the true archway in the Strand which must have witnessed the tragedy that broke Mr. Jingle's voice.

But time does not always leave the topographer high and dry. Mr. Macmichael finds in Cockspur Street a most singular and interesting survival. The name of this street has usually been connected with the Cock Tavern and with the Royal Mews opposite, with their suggestion of spurs. But Mr. Macmichael offers quite another explanation. He connects the name with "the constant demand that must have been created by the frequenters of the cockpits in Whitehall and St. James's Park," adding this statement: "Further reason for thinking that this is so exists in the remarkable fact that steel cockspurs are at the present time being sold by old-established cutlers in the neighbourhood of Cockspur Street, as I have ascertained by personal inquiry." This is eloquent of London's secrets, of her amazing variety and her family privacies. Her face may change, but on it you may still find a seventeenth-century wart. We should not wonder if our topographer is quite right about the street name. He is clearly right in his inference that London still supplies cockspurs for the "sport of kings." He tells us that mains are fought to-day in the Cumberland mountains, though the principal trade is with India. We may add that if he had sought documentary evidence of the survival of cock-fighting in England to-day, he need not have gone far. Only last year a new work on "Cocking and its Votaries," published for private circulation, made it clear that the law is still defied.

Mr. Macmichael refers to the interesting fact that George Street, Villiers Street, Duke Street, Of Alley, and Buckingham Street, preserve every word in the name of George Villiers, the last Duke of Buckingham; but he allows the reader to infer that Of Alley still exists, in fact he describes its position. It no longer exists in name—a circumstance of some importance to the collectors of London curiosities. But as "York Place" the purlieu does survive.

Dealing with the same neighbourhood, Mr. Macmichael accepts without modification the statement that Hew Hewson, who was keeper of York Terrace in the Adelphi, and who died in 1809, was the original of Smollett's "Strap" in "Roderick Random." He may have been, but it is very doubtful. Faulkner, in his "Chelsea," finds the real Strap in one William Lewis, a bookbinder, who died in 1785. Faulkner declares that Smollett persuaded Lewis to set up business in Chelsea, and adds on his own account that he resided seven years in the same house with the widow, who often confirmed Smollett's anecdotes of her husband. It is remarkable that no fewer than four men claimed the honour of having sat to the novelist for "Strap."

Mr. Macmichael's industry in collecting details about every street and alley he surveys is beyond praise. He has trawled every source of information, and one feels, therefore, as little hesitation in offering him a local fact as Forster's friends did in the matter of Goldsmith. Lancaster Court, near St. Martin's Church, has long disappeared, and although Mr. Macmichael is able to devote a couple of pages to this single small purlieu, he does not mention one interesting character who died there. This was Delpini, the clown, who was a boon companion of George IV. when Prince of Wales, and arranged the masquerade at the Pantheon in honour of his coming of age. Delpini died in Lancaster Court in 1828, at the age of eighty-eight, after having held the fixed idea that his death and the figure 8 would be associated.

In mentioning that the walls of the vestry room in St. Martin's Church are adorned with half-length portraits of former vicars, it might have been added that this room contains a portrait which is probably worth all these—that of the murdered Sir Edmund Berry Godfrey, who was a parishioner of St. Martin's, and whose remains were laid in the church. But a more remarkable omission is that of one of the most striking necrological incidents in London's history. We refer to Frank Buckland's sixteen days' search in the terribly crowded vaults of St. Martin's for the coffin of John Hunter, which, when found, was solemnly borne to Westminster Abbey by the greatest physicians of the day, in 1859. An interesting description of the search will be found in Buckland's "Curiosities of Natural History."

True to our original intent, we have tried to correct and add. But we hope we have long ago made it clear that Mr. Macmichael has made a very valuable contribution to London's local history. It is, indeed, difficult to convey a notion of the extent of his labours and the multitude of curious facts and asseverations he has brought together in these three hundred pages.

AS OTHERS SEE US

The Champagne Standard. By Mrs. LANE. (Lane, 6s.)

THESE charming little chapters come at a most appropriate time, and help to brighten the two worst of the winter months. Mrs. Lane is a versatile and amusing writer. Whether she is discussing the extravagance of modern living, the sales lists or the effect of eye-glasses, servants or the proper building of a house, she is always full of quaint ideas, and is not diffident in poking fun either at her own countrymen and women in America, or at her English neighbours in the land of her adoption. Her ideas are as bright and crisp as the American mind and the American fashions, and she rushes on to dangerous ground with a temerity only known to people of her race.

We can certainly sympathise with her over the dust-traps of the cupboards and the repulsive domestic beetles which are peculiar to the English house of a century back, and we quite approve of her idea of the free gift of a tooth-brush to each attendant of a board school. In fact, we would go further and suggest that the tooth-brush should be de rigueur and the piano "taboo"; then we might have hopes of a return of those excellent domestic classes which existed in England before Mrs. Lane had ever seen this country—indeed, before she was born. Again, we quite agree with her idea that women would be the best architects for dwelling-houses. How can the mere male understand the importance of the kitchen arrangements, the exactly suitable place for the linen cupboard; or, indeed, how can he gauge the woman's mind as to the fittest shape of room to show off her furniture and her treasures of china and bijouterie? But we venture to assert that there are still firms to be found, in London, who have genuine old furniture to sell: from personal experience we know of one firm which goes so far as to tell you the exact age of the piece of furniture in question, whether it is frankly modern and "faked" or the "genuine antique." Reluctantly we admit that American machine-made furniture may be cheaper; but then America is the palace of machinery. American literature, however, is certainly not machine made, and Mrs. Lane's book is a case in point.

It is refreshing to read Mrs. Lane's remarks on modern extravagance of living, which come as rather a surprise from the lips of an American lady, for American ladies are, as a rule, the pioneers of luxury. But she is absolutely in the right about it, and we can only hope that a severe lesson will not be brought home to us some day in these democratic times. "Woman's little economies" have for long amused the scornful male, and her lunch on a bun and a cup of coffee in the middle of a long day's shopping has often raised wonder in the masculine breast. But a woman's notions of economy are matched sometimes by a man's. Who is it that, carefully eschewing the best firms for hose and gloves, seeks out a small and unpretending shop and buys something which lasts half as long as the article supplied by the more expensive but better stocked firm in a good neighbourhood? How often will the happy father of a large and growing family make the mistake of standing about in the pouring rain, in his best clothes and with possibly a heavy cold coming on, to catch a 'bus in order to save a cab-fare? Instead of the cabman the doctor gets his fee, and the wife has to see to the renovating of those best clothes and to the drying of those excellent boots, which will never look the same again.

Mrs. Lane has not spent her time in England for nothing. There is little that escapes her vigilant eye and her capable and amusing pen. She is evidently home-sick, as every one must be who is living out of his own land, and that, perhaps, is why she is so hard on some of our English ways. We have all heard children criticising their parents, and we smile indulgently. So we smile indulgently, and perhaps a little uneasily too, when clever Americans, like Mrs. Lane, come back, as rebellious grandchildren, to scoff at England's stiff, old-fashioned methods, her unsympathetic climate, her soot, her fogs—and her dignity and grandeur which, after all, no western country can match.

Mrs. Lane exemplifies the idea of how easy it is to spoil even the appearance of a heroine of fiction with eye-glasses donned at the supreme moment of her life. But then, if any one sets up to be peerlessly beautiful, the use of any artificial aid to that end is ruled out. We have known ordinary women look quite pleasant in eye-glasses; but their minds were not given up entirely to beauty as personified in themselves. We cannot imagine the Greek women in eye-glasses, but neither can we imagine them in a picture hat or high-heeled boots. We often wonder, indeed, whether the divine women depicted in those marble forms were really as beautiful as that, or whether, as in the fashionable portraits of to-day, a little has been given and much taken away.

Mrs. Lane may congratulate herself on having that blessed sense of humour which is one of the most valuable possessions in life. In any case Englishwomen should be grateful to her for writing them this delightful, candid book, which is full of original and bright ideas.

THE FOUNDER OF THE MODERN PAPACY

Gregory the Great: His Place in History and Thought. By F. HOMES DUDDEN, B.D. 2 vols. (Longmans, 30s. net.)

AMONGST the few Popes that have made history none has had a greater influence on the Church and the world than the man from whom the English race received Christianity. Not only was Gregory the Great in large measure responsible for the form which the evolution of Christianity took in the Middle Ages, but he was also in a true sense the founder of the modern Roman system; his work was a chief factor in securing ultimately for the Papacy the succession to the Empire. The fact that no adequate biography of Gregory has yet appeared in English is but one more evidence of the backwardness of English historical studies. We are still compelled to go to France or Germany for the best information about Celtic Christianity in Britain; but Mr. Dudden has wiped out our reproach so far as Gregory is concerned. His book is a solid piece of genuine historical work which bears witness to conscientious and laborious research. So thorough is his method that he scarcely leaves room for a future writer to add anything to what will be henceforth the standard work on the subject.

The author apologises for the length of the book, and it is to be feared that some readers will be deterred by its portentous dimensions. But a considerable portion of the work is taken up by an account of the general conditions of the time, which even the casual reader will find extremely interesting. There is perhaps no period of history with which most people are less familiar, and Mr. Dudden's graphic descriptions give an excellent idea of the Roman world of the sixth century. These chapters hardly need the apology that the author makes for them, but perhaps the book as a whole suffers from the German tendency to prolixity and excessive detail; possibly the value of the work would not have been impaired by more selection and compression. But it would seem that only French writers have the gift of putting the largest possible amount of information into the smallest compass; and we may be grateful for a book which will do something to restore the somewhat tarnished reputation of the Oxford school of history.

Many readers will confine themselves to Books i. and ii., which contain the biography proper, and leave alone the account of Gregory's theology which follows. The theology of the sixth century is much further away from the modern mind than that of the first. What would be more intolerably wearisome than the scriptural exegesis of Gregory's "Magna Moralia," with its thirty-five books of far-fetched allegorising and fanciful interpretation of the Book of Job? Yet its popularity in the Middle Ages was enormous, and was only equalled by that of the "Dialogues," a collection of legends showing a superstitious credulity incomprehensible to most of us in a man of Gregory's powers, but equalled within the last few years by the eminent Cardinals and prelates who were duped by "Léo Taxil" and "Diana Vaughan." Gregory, as Mr. Dudden remarks, was not an original thinker; his theology was mainly a popularising of Augustine. But it had so great an influence on mediæval thought and on the evolution of theology that adequate treatment of it was essential in a work like this, and students will find Mr. Dudden's account invaluable.

Gregory was a link, so to say, between the old world which was falling about his ears and the Middle Ages, but he belonged rather to the latter; he had an essentially mediæval mind, and disliked "profane" culture as much as a modern Canadian Catholic bishop. His genius was practical rather than intellectual, and it was as a statesman and a man of action that he was great. His influence on ecclesiastical organisation can hardly be exaggerated. Although he did not believe himself to be infallible in any circumstances, although the suggestion that he should as Pope define a dogma would have seemed monstrous to him, although he expressly disclaimed the title of universal bishop, nevertheless the whole development of the Papacy down to the Vatican Definition of 1870 has been a logical and inevitable development of his teaching and claims. Unlike many of his successors, he enforced the claims of the Roman See with tact and moderation, but he never abated them, and he left the Papacy more powerful than it had ever been before.

The most interesting episode in Gregory's life to English readers is the mission to the English, and Mr. Dudden's account of it is a model of accuracy and impartiality. He protests with reason against the recent tendency in some quarters to minimise the work done by Augustine; and Augustine's fussiness and narrowness, which often come out in his correspondence with Gregory, do not blind him to the many sterling qualities of the Apostle of the English. In particular Mr. Dudden exonerates Augustine from the charge that he was entirely or even chiefly to blame for the failure of the negotiations with the Welsh bishops, who had not the least desire to convert the English, and who, since they had been cut off from the rest of the Western Church, had relapsed, as Mr. Willis Bund says, into "a strange amalgamation of Christianity and Paganism."

The author's impartiality is also shown in his treatment of certain unpleasant incidents in Gregory's life. The worst of these is the letter written to Phocas when that unredeemed villain succeeded to the imperial throne after murdering the Emperor Maurice and his family. In spite of Mr. Dudden's genuine enthusiasm for his hero, he does not attempt to justify that letter, which must remain a blot on Gregory's character, even when all allowances are made for the circumstances of the time and the low ethical standard that prevailed.

PAPA BOURGEOIS

Livre de mes fils. Par PAUL DOUMER. (Paris: Vuibert, 3 fr.)

ONLY one man stands between M. Doumer and the Presidency of the French Republic, and even after his failure to obtain this Grand Prix of democracy his career remains remarkable, distinguished, hopeful, and his position as President of the Chamber of Deputies a most important one to have been obtained by a man not yet fifty years of age. And how much more so when that man, the son of a navvy, has, by his own unaided powers and gifts, made his own way in the world!

Such a man must, one would say, be an exceptional and an interesting man; the book for his sons, the counsel he gives to young France, must be an interesting book. Alas! no. M. Doumer's contribution towards "la formation morale des jeunes hommes" takes rank with Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy as a supreme instance of the commonplace, the shallow, the well known.

In his preface M. Doumer hopes that "les jeunes gens" for whom he writes these pages:

éprouvent à les lire le sentiment profond de celui qui écrit pour les convaincre. . . . Le secours de ce livre exigü et modeste ne leur sera peut-être pas inutile. Peut-être contribuera-t-il à assurer pour eux la route de la vie, ou tout au moins à les aider à y entrer d'un pas résolu et alerte, en hommes maîtres de soi, équilibrés au moral comme au physique, acceptant virilement par avance les devoirs et les charges dont leur tâche en ce monde sera faite, sachant ce qu'il y a de noblesse, de beauté et de bonheur véritable dans une existence bien remplie.

One need read no further to divine that M. Doumer's mind is the very essence of the Nonconformist conscience, and no one who lives in France will deny that this type of mind is now as typical of Paris as of Clapham; it has raised M. Doumer to a foremost position in the State; it has placed M. Bourget in the front rank of novelists: it inspires half the articles of the Paris press, and is opposed, not by the frivolous and witty spirit, lax of moral, free of speech, that we are apt to dub "peculiarly French," but by an anti-militarist Socialism austere enough to condemn M. Doumer as belligerent, clerical, reactionary, a champion of War.

To do M. Doumer justice he is far from this: on war, as on all other subjects, his views are marked by commonplace. "La guerre est un terrible fléau . . . mais il est des maux pires:" this is just what we expected to read, and, indeed, the one surprise that our author has reserved for us, is that among all the texts, quotations and wise saws with which his volume teems he has not found place for a motto so apposite as "Philistia, be thou glad of me." Can it be that M. Doumer is enough of the typical Frenchman to be ignorant of the Psalms?

AT TOMI

TIME tames the beast and ripens
The fruit upon the bough;
Time wears the flint and lessens
The sharpness of the plough:
Time mitigates men's anger,
They say, and conquers woe;
But I am exiled full two years,
And still my torments grow.
Bulls bow their necks to labour,
And lions lose their ire,
And Indian monsters bend the knee,
And coursers drive for hire.
Big grapes break from their bunches,
Juice runs to purple waste,
And ears of corn grow ruddy
And apples sweet to taste:
But Time will never vanquish
The armour of my woe,
And every month more bitter
The pangs of exile grow.
Far distant is the city—
Home, wife and friends are far:
I hear but Scythian rabble
And watch an unknown star.

A. HUGH FISHER.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE ENDINGS OF NOVELS

I SUPPOSE there never was a novel reader who did not, when reading a story in which he was interested, turn to the last page before the courtship was quite over, and try to find out what was the end of the drama—who married who, it amounted to in the older novels. I doubt if the casual reader ever gave much attention to the pains bestowed upon the composition of those final paragraphs. Indeed, the older novelist had an instinctive tendency to slur them over, as he knew that the interest had begun to dwindle from the moment at which the difficulties of the inevitable lovers had been overcome. So in the end it usually happens that William marries Eliza and they are happy ever after. Yet there is proof enough that the true artist, who probably had come to love his work well, lingered over the last pages, as if reluctant to part from them. He had, if indeed he was a true artist, created a little world of his own with people and an atmosphere wherein he lived much more really and more intimately, in a sense, than he did with the members of his own household. For, as Henrik Ibsen pointed out in one of his recent letters, there is a certain isolation in the spirit of the artist, which leads him to understand all natures, but to be truly intimate with none. He lives his own life and cherishes his own thoughts, and only with the creatures of his imagination is he entirely unreserved and at his ease. The anxiety of the fine novelist, therefore, is to do nothing to break the continuity of his story. It is of the greatest moment that the last line should breathe the very spirit of the first line. Sir Walter Scott, who is the great example in matters of this kind, was so confident that the public lost interest towards the end that he was in the habit of finishing off his tale with almost indecent haste, even though it be equally true that he did not leave as many loose ends as does the more slovenly novelist of to-day. A good example of the manner in which he ended may be extracted from the "Fair Maid of Perth":

The names of the boy's sponsors are recorded, as "Ane Hie and Mighty Lord, Archibald Erl of Douglas, ane Honorabil and gude Knight, Schir Patrick Charteris of Kinfauns, and ane Gracious Princess, Marjory Dowaire of his Serene Highness David, umquhile Duke of Rothsay." Under such patronage a family rises fast, and several of the most respected houses in Scotland, but especially in Perthshire, and many individuals, distinguished both in arts and arms, record with pride their descent from the Good Chrom and the Fair Maid of Perth.

Here we have Sir Walter following his convention and, with a sense of humour which, to tell the truth, did not shine most brilliantly in cases of this kind, trying to leave in the memory of his reader that Scottish atmosphere which is reproduced with so much brilliant success in the novel. In this respect his example was closely followed by Thackeray, though, of course, Thackeray's atmosphere was always different from that of Scott, but the demure Henry Esmond is himself to the last particular in the final lines of the novel:

And the only jewel by which my wife sets any store, and from which she hath never parted, is that gold button she took from my arm on the day when she visited me in prison, and which she wore ever after, as she told me, on the tenderest heart in the world.

In the end of "Vanity Fair," I have sometimes thought that Thackeray made a mistake by referring to his puppets.

Ah! Vanitas Vanitatum! Which of us is happy in this world? Which of us has his desire? or, having it, is satisfied?—Come, children, let us shut up the box and the puppets, for our play is played out.

He makes us feel as though, during the whole of the time, he had not been really living in the world he was picturing but only peeping in at it through a window. To put the same statement in another way, it is as though his men and women were not really and truly imagined—imagined so as not only to throw an illusion over his readers but an illusion over himself. They are comic figures that he might have cut out of paper with a pair of scissors. We see the same thing in his caricatures and drawings, presentations often extremely clever and certainly amusing, but lacking that something of divine truth and perfection which comes from the efforts of a great artist.

I do not think it a very true instinct that seeks for the bizarre and extraordinary in an ending. To my mind the most striking example of this kind is to be found in Lord Beaconsfield's "Tancred," which ends with the statement: "The Duke and Duchess of Sidonia had arrived in Palestine," leaving the reader to form what conclusion he may as to the effect of this announcement. It is the trick of one who was by nature inclined to the glittering and theatrical, not the quiet and sure device by which the master of literary art would have gained the same effect. In this Disraeli was giving expression to that feature in his character which led him to say on a memorable occasion that it is the unexpected that happens. He was seeking too openly for the unexpected. Among recent novel endings one that has pleased me much was that of Mrs. Henry De La Pasture to her "Man from America." In this novel the dominant figure is not the man from America, nor is it any of the fair ladies who are pleasantly and often exquisitely drawn, nor is it one of their sweethearts, but it is the old French Count, the simple, kind, unintellectual uncle who is really out of the play, as far as the habits and interests of youth are concerned, before the curtain rises, and in a sense figures only as a kind of benevolent spectator; but the author with delicate and rare instinct recognises that his should be the last word, and it is a pleasure to quote the ending.

As the Vicomte's guests took their leave, and went away through the green door into the kitchen garden talking and laughing together, the glory faded from the grassy hills, which rose behind the thatched roof of Honeycott, crowned with golden gorse and ruddy bracken; the copper glint vanished from the reddening beeches, and the glow from the mellow crimson fruit upon the orchard boughs.

In other words, the sun set behind the woods and left the autumn world to the grey chill of the swift-rising mists of evening.

The Vicomte filled himself a bumper of the Madère sec, and drank it, standing alone at the table. "A la mémoire de ma jeunesse!" said old Patrick,—and reversed the glass.

It is curious how the old rules of rhetoric that were generally designed for oratory pure and simple apply to that longer composition, the English novel. It was an ancient and sound principle that the exordium or beginning should always be interesting, and perhaps this is the only rule that Sir Walter Scott thoroughly neglected. His introductions are almost proverbially long-winded, and yet whoever will have the patience to read them quietly and carefully will find that they are designed with ingenuity and serve to introduce the reader into that microcosm which the author is trying to create. Before he is done with the early chapters he is quite ready to be introduced to the personages who are to figure in the narrative. They belong naturally to the landscape which, in his gossip and apparently slovenly manner, Scott is trying to imprint on the mind of the reader. Having got the exordium, the orator was to put the matter of his exhortation into the middle and to wind up with the noblest peroration he could command. Instead of making oratorical effects, the novelist tries to strike a chord of interest, and, instead of perorating, what he tries to do is to prolong the note so that you can go away with the sound of it in your ears. If Shakespeare had not been a dramatist, he would, it is obvious, have shown himself a perfect master of the technique of the novel. What could be more likely to stir the curiosity of readers or hearers than the witch scene with which Macbeth opens? and the ideal ending is perhaps that of The Tempest. There is no novel, old or new, which ends so finely and so pathetically. The passage in the famous Epilogue has been quoted again and again, yet it never loses the pathos that is startling in its unexpectedness:

Gentle breath of yours my sails
Must fill, or else my project fails,
Which was to please.

P.

[Next week's Causerie will be on "De Quincey and the Grand Style," by H. Perry Robinson.]

FICTION

The Portreeve. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. (Methuen, 6s.)

DODD WOLFERSTAN was Portreeve of Bridgestowe, on the north of Dartmoor. He was young, capable and ambitious; he had dreams of climbing again to the position once occupied by the great Wolferstans, who might have been—probably were—his ancestors. But he loved a little beneath him: Ilet Yelland was not, like Dodd himself, a workhouse child, but she was a mere peasant. Each of the pair had had the misfortune to rouse fierce passion in others, Ilet in her peasant-cousin, Abel Pierce, Dodd in Primrose Horn, the rich daughter of his old employer. Pierce and Miss Horn, passionate and unscrupulous both, scheme together to separate the betrothed. They succeed. Pierce wins Ilet for himself; Dodd, after years of tarrying, has just been caught by Primrose—actually she is in his arms and the proposal on his lips—when he is summoned to the bedside of Pierce, dying from a quarry accident. There he learns something of the plots that robbed him of Ilet. After the decent interval he marries Ilet, leaving Primrose unconsoled.

And now Mr. Eden Phillpotts gets to work. Hitherto he has been doing little more than arrange his stage; and he has arranged it, to our thinking, a little too slowly and circumstantially. Primrose Horn, now as hot in hate as in love, marries a wealthy oaf, in order to win power and place, and devotes her life to the slow ruin—body, mind, and soul—of Dodd Wolferstan. Fiendish pertinacity, fiendish coolness, fiendish ingenuity are hers. She is miasmatic ice with a heart of malignant fire. She gives her victim law: he climbs; she strikes. A little more law, and another blow. He takes breath, and, though weakened and deteriorated, tries once again; and again she strikes, leaving him once again a little further from his ideal and from happiness. Finally, all but robbed of his livelihood, robbed of his hopes of children, robbed of the simple faith in God that was his dearest possession, he breaks. A raving lunatic, he all but murders the woman's foolish husband, and dies a horrible death in an attempt to murder the woman herself.

We are not of those who cry "melodrama!" when a modern author puts into the hearts of modern people those vast passions which we accept as fact in the ancient world. In this strange story there is nothing melodramatic, neither in the fierce desire of Pierce for Ilet, nor the fierce loves and hates of a farmer's daughter. In giving us something stronger than the lukewarm brew of the average of our day, Mr. Phillpotts gives us more than a taste of the old tragedy. We are lifted, excited, awe-struck: there is something of that purging by pity and terror that only great tragedy can accomplish. And yet, great as our modern author is in many ways, he just falls short.

We know of no instance in really great tragedy in which the process of purging is checked or nullified in the slightest degree by the feeling of hatred. We do not hate any of the great mischief-doers in tragedy, Greek or English; we do not even hate Iago. We do hate, with deadly hatred, this Primrose Horn, and that hatred rises and chokes the purer feelings which Mr. Phillpotts's tragedy arouses. She is great, we admit, great in her perverted passion, in her scheming and in its execution; but she is just not great enough. She lacks, in fact, that little more, which would have transformed her from a malignant fiend into an instrument of a wider destiny. And that is as much as to say that we disagree with Mr. Phillpotts on one of the cardinal points of his story, which is this. "Men," says the raisonneur of this novel, "ruin themselves—women can't ruin 'em. Men ruin themselves . . . by a thousand different ways; but the ruination comes from inside 'em." That Dodd Wolferstan, the genuinely religious, hard-working, honest man, bore his ruin within him, we fully believe; but where the weak spot lay remains still uncertain when we have finished the book. That being so, the story of the ruin of his pocket, his character and his mind, is not part, so to speak, of the universal story; it becomes the persecution of one man by one woman.

When all is said, this is a powerful, almost a great book. We should like to dwell on the delicious humours of the lowly folk, and in particular on those of Dicky Barkell, the raisonneur we have mentioned, a wise and witty village philosopher with a fine faith in human nature and none in revealed religion; the man who tells Dodd all the home-truths about himself, and is unable to make of his own life more than a feeble compromise. We should like to dwell on the development of Dodd's downfall, the gradual ruin of his faith and his character; and on the descriptions of Dartmoor, that great Presence that pervades and governs the whole story. Space forbids the discussion of these and a hundred other interesting points in a full, wise and glowing piece of work.

The Smiths of Surbilon. By KEBLE HOWARD. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

In this delightful comedy Mr. Keble Howard has taken up the cudgels for the middle classes. We have had "the annals of the poor" and the romances of the rich and great, but the life of the respectable middle-class married couple has been set aside by most writers as being too dull and commonplace for romance to touch. Enough that these good people are called the backbone of England. But Mr. Keble Howard sees more than this. He looks and finds out the secret places of their lives. He dives beneath that respectable exterior which the ordinary business man and his wife present to their respectable circles. In spite of the shortness and rather ample proportions of Mr. Smith, Mr. Keble Howard proves him to have an affectionate and kindly nature, to be as much a man of honour as the proudest peer in any society novel, and to "play the game" like a man. His wife shows still more delightful qualities. She is a model wife and mother, and we are even shown her as a model and most beneficent grandmother. And the romance is with her. Her husband is in her eyes the perfect man; other people may look upon him as a short and stout and decidedly uninteresting middle-class man. To her he is "the man" of her narrow horizon. Mr. Keble Howard takes the step from the ridiculous to the sublime in the last few lines of his charming and sympathetic book. Enid says:

"I was thinking how splendid it would be if that little baby could grow up and marry a man as good and as sweet as you."

"That would not be difficult, old girl."

Enid was quite grave. "It would be impossible," she said simply. Ralph laughed and turned his head away.

Mr. Keble Howard has shown us again his keen insight into ordinary human nature and with his sympathetic touch has brought to the surface valuable jewels from unsuspected sources.

The Ancient Landmarks. By ELIZABETH CHERRY WALTZ. (Methuen, 6s.)

THE prologue to this entertaining story is a mistake. To explain the admixture of Indian blood in her hero, the author begins with his great-great-grandfather and travels down a tedious and bewildering procession of births, marriages and deaths. But when at last she comes to the Lucien Beardsley, whose adventures in Kentucky it is her purpose to follow, she draws up the curtain on a drama that never flags; and it is one that will please a variety of readers. There is a lively plot and a real modern knight-errant for a hero, handsome, bold, rich, accomplished, everything the romantic fancy asks a hero to be. There is a beautiful young heroine to be rescued from a situation of extreme distress, and there are some unusually fresh minor characters. But the real interest and value of this novel for some readers will lie in the picture it gives of life in the country places of Kentucky. On the one hand obedience to the law is so ingrained and literal that, while the whole community will sorrow over a woman brutally maltreated by her drug-ridden husband, not one will stir to protect her: he is her husband, and the ancient landmark of marriage is not to be removed. On the other hand, one man will shoot another and feel both offended and surprised when his arrest and trial follow. To be sure, both proceedings are quite formal, and at the trial, though every soul in the room knows the truth, it never comes out. But Lucien Beardsley, in spite of his cosmopolitan upbringing, resented the interference of the law in an act of justice. The impression left on the European mind is that the law does not interfere often or overmuch in Kentucky.

A Supreme Moment. By MRS. HAMILTON SYNGE. (Unwin, 6s.)

It is a pity that the men in this story are shadows. Had they been drawn with such unerring and delicate skill as are the women, "A Supreme Moment" would have been a noteworthy book. Even as it is, it is remarkable. A study in temperaments, a delineation of the gradual awakening into life and living of a choked and strangled soul by contact with one that is free, that palpitates, that is a-quiver with the passion of humanity, it is a story that owes more to its writing than to its plot. Mrs. Synge has observed the characters of Agatha and Estelle with an understanding that betokens sympathy with both. Agatha, who has been housekeeper to her brother Bertram for years in a little country village, has grown set, and measures her life entirely by the requirements of her brother, the most exacting prig of a method-maniac that well could be. Into this family is introduced Estelle, a young girl. She does not proceed immediately to revolutionise the household. Only gradually does Agatha begin to see that there is, somewhere in life, an existence which has something more satisfying than this endless round of housekeeping, of church-going, and of visit-paying. Her awakening to a true understanding of herself is described with an art and delicacy that are most enjoyable. The book is one of the few novels of to-day which one feels inclined to keep and read again.

THE DRAMA

HIS HOUSE IN PERFECT ORDER

ARE dramatic critics any use? That question must often occur to actor-managers when distributing stalls for the first nights of their plays. Is Sir Fretful really worth ten-and-sixpence? It was asked and answered two years ago; I ask it again. Useful and in many cases delightful contributors to their respective papers, do they affect the success of a piece? I know they nearly always say the same thing, and you can guess pretty well what that is going to be at the first entr'acte when they meet at the bar. But most of them are mere stylists who use the drama as a pianola for giving expression to their views on life and occasionally on actors. I foresee a time coming—a time of revolution—when, instead of actors craving notices from eminent critics, as they are supposed to do, you will get the critics pressing champagne and chicken on dramatic authors [N.B.—Mr. Shaw is vegetarian and total abstainer] in order to get a "notice" from over the footlights. For instance, in a play by Mr. Shaw one of the characters will say: "I take in the Saturday Review because of Max. He always gets hold of the right end of the stick, but he generally soils it." If the play is by Mr. Henry Arthur Jones: "Don't you remember what William Archer says: 'The world, whether we regard it as a newspaper, or as a mere condition, is simply a stage to which our lives are contributions—leading parts.'" In one by Mr. Pinero: "Filmer's second wife may have her faults, my dear Cayley, I mean, my dear Hilary, but as Walkley says in the Times, 'c'est une femme.'" Many of the audience would, of course, order the papers at once and thereby increase their declining circulation. Mr. Hankin is the only dramatist with whom I am acquainted, and I would get him to give me a puff in his next play at the Court. A fee of two guineas should be charged for each gag or insertion.

Dramatic criticism in a weekly (hence the above remarks) is particularly futile, because by the time it appears the public has made up its mind about a play. You can, of course, review the daily critics; that is some consolation; but nothing you say can fill or empty a stall. Benedicts of journalism, however, we must still be talking. By the time these words appear in print some hundreds of people will have seen and enjoyed Mr. Pinero's new play. Every one interested in the drama will have read the story, retold with varying skill, by some of my colleagues. It merely remains for me to call on the inhabitants of the provinces and the denizens of the British Colonies to come to London, at their leisure, and see the best play in London and the best acting you can see anywhere. I use the term at leisure advisedly, because there seems little chance of my own play (accepted since last week by Mr. George Alexander) being put up at the St. James's for many months to come. And I urge every one to come to London, because unless Mr. Alexander in the fulness of time conveyed his whole cast on tour, I would dread the result of secondary actors in the provinces handling either Mr. Percy Macquoid's furniture or Mr. Pinero's more delicate art.

When Mr. Alexander went to crunch the porcine husks at Drury Lane, the quartier St. James's went into deep mourning; now the prodigal has returned and Mr. Pinero provides a fatted calf for his honour and our pleasure. The acting throughout is superb. Mr. Herbert Waring is seen, another Torvald Helmer, in a marvellous rendering of an unsympathetic part; Miss Irene Vanbrugh becomes, I have no hesitation in saying, the greatest actress on the English stage. Mr. George Alexander would seem to have forgotten the cares of management or left everything to Mr. Pinero, and conquers once again. He is never feverish where there are temptations, and makes his one unlikely speech perfectly probable. The minor parts—if they can be called minor parts: they are all essential—are presented in a flawless fashion, never allowed by the artists (or Mr. Prospero Pinero) to lapse into farce. A friend of mine once started the "Herod Guild" for the destruction of stage children: we went into liquidation on the appearance of Miss Iris Hawkins last week.

His House in Order is among other things remarkable for having no story at all, though its relation occupied long columns in the press. It is a psychological situation, such as could be found in one form or another in any English household. Its undramatic qualities are particularly striking; indeed, it is so actual that some people already find it unnatural. It is just as realistic and natural as Gorki's Out of the Depths. Even the exits and entrances are so adroitly contrived that they occasion no remark. By keeping the device of the letters till Act iii. Mr. Pinero with conscious art proved that it was not the keystone to the perfect architecture of his drama. The play is, indeed, a lesson for all of us. Given adequate interpretation, the most intense stimulation can be derived from a play where the dialogue is not particularly brilliant, and the situations not more sensational than any one may witness for himself at a family party in the country. Surprise has been expressed that Mr. Pinero should revert to discarded dramatic conventions, the aside and the long speech; but they have not been discarded in real life. All of us use asides and we listen, alas! to long speeches not quite so entertaining as those of Mr. George Alexander in the play. I confess that Hilary's parable in Act ii. seems to me out of note with the character. He would surely have presented a simpler and wittier fable. It appears to me to have caused the author qualms; to have been rewritten, omitted, then reset. Nor do I understand Hilary's language in communicating the first wife's infidelity to his brother. It is improbable: he seems to be breaking it gently to the audience (already in the secret) not Filmer: Nina's method was cruder and more lifelike. Several people have hazarded the politics of Filmer Jesson, M.P., and rally Mr. Pinero for not revealing them. It seems to me fairly obvious that he was a Liberal Unionist and a Tariff Reformer, with an open mind on Chinese Labour and strongly in favour of legislation for the suppression of Ritualism. I am sure he was defeated by a handsome majority at the recent election.

Dramatic tides have washed the London theatres from time to time; the waves of Ibsen, Maeterlinck and Mr. Bernard Shaw have beaten like passing bells against the financially successful dovescotes and cleared away many foolish and ancient traditions of the stupid English stage. When the flood has receded, secure and smiling Mr. Arthur Wing Pinero is found exactly in the same place, none the worse for the wetting, and with perhaps just a little salt sticking to his coat-tails. He, at all events, has not built upon sand; his house was in order long ago. Many would like to regard him as a pleasant reminiscence of their youth—the last of the Anglo-Saxon dramatists (I believe he is of Portuguese extraction), something that belonged to the old time before Irish and Norwegian and Belgian influence sapped our British sentiments. His House in Order will be a rude awakening. A very foolish book appeared in France not long ago (I think by M. Auguste Filon), in which we were complimented on the possession of an ornament not ours. For to talk of English drama is like talking of French cricket or Australian champagne. But, as the late Marquess of Bute was able to grow exquisite vintages on a specially cultivated soil in Wales, so Mr. Pinero and a few other isolated dramatists can produce the vine which ceased to flourish long before England became a Free Trade country, intellectually or otherwise.

ROBERT ROSS.

COURT THEATRE

WHEN the Stage Society produced Lady Inger of Østtraat last week, the critics—and the audience—complained sorrowfully that up to about the middle of the fourth act they were completely befogged as to what it was all about. The audience at the Court Theatre passed two acts and a half in a similar condition last Tuesday afternoon. But then the play had only three acts all told, whereas Ibsen's had five. The play was Mr. Robert Vernon Harcourt's A Question of Age. It is not a good play, but it seemed to me to have far more stuff in it, more brains behind it, than many far better ones. Mr. Harcourt is not yet master of his technique, which is the elusive, elliptical, obscure technique of the modern naturalistic drama at its obscurest. But I think his technique would not have smashed him if he had had a more interesting story to tell and had let us understand considerably earlier what that story was. A middle-aged lady has been left a widow by a South African millionaire. A callow youth in the Foreign Office conceives the magnificent idea of utilising her millions to promote a great scheme of colonial expansion, and incidentally to advance his own political prospects. He proposes to her and we (and everybody else except the lady) imagine that he wants to marry her. The lady, however, believes that he only wishes her to be his mistress—and greatly prefers him on those terms. As, however, she cannot make up her mind to say so, and he cannot understand what she is driving at, we have two and a half acts of mutual misunderstanding—and very little drama. It is a pity, for the character of the lady (admirably played by Miss Fanny Brough) is well observed and merits a better setting. The other item of the programme was a one-act play by Mr. Frederick Fenn, called The Convict on the Hearth, a clever piece of low-life naturalism, resembling Op o' my Thumb, which Mr. Fenn wrote for the Stage Society with Mr. Richard Pryce, but with a dash of sentimentalism which was missing from that brilliant little play. In this Mr. Edmund Gwenn played the convict with great art, and Mr. C. V. France a sturdy, practical parson: both first-rate performances.

ST. JOHN HANKIN.

THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

It would be easy to say—and even to seem to prove—that Un conseil judiciaire, played last week, is a bad play. It neither follows any old formula nor yet supplies a new one. Nobody loses anything, not even his trousers, the quest for which is so frequent a farcical motive in France. Nor is the fun got by any wild game of hide-and-seek such as that through which Pink Dominoes has maintained its popularity for a generation. The mechanism is not intricate, and is hardly even ingenious. There is nothing in the first act to suggest that there will be complications in the second; nothing in the second act promising further complications in the third. There are no surprises, no strokes of ingenuity, in the ultimate unravelling of the knot. But to say all this is only in effect to say that Un conseil judiciaire is expressly written so as to depend not on situations but on acting. That is how it differs from the farces to which the English playgoer is most accustomed. Such a farce as Pink Dominoes remains amusing even when the acting is bad. Good acting is an advantage, but not a necessity, since the difficulties in which the characters become entangled are ludicrous in themselves. This piece by MM. Moineaux and Bisson would fall absolutely flat if it were indifferently played. Such a play can be written and produced in France, because there it is possible to make sure of the acting. In England it is not possible. No doubt we could, at a pinch, cast the play adequately, if we could import Mr. James Welch from one theatre, Mr. Charles Hawtrey from another, etc. etc.; but it would never get itself adequately cast in the ordinary course of theatrical business. Our actors, take them for all in all, simply are not good enough to keep the laughing continuous, as it was on Monday night, through a farce in which nothing in particular happens.

Perhaps we need not be ashamed of the confession. Acting is not, after all, a particularly dignified accomplishment. The words which Plato, who did not want actors in his Republic, spoke on the subject were wise. Still, from the point of view of the spectator, good acting is better than bad acting; and honour should be paid where it is due. We have no comic actor who is comparable with M. Galipaux. He reminds one sometimes of Mr. Toole, and sometimes of Mr. Willie Edouin. Mr. Toole in The Don, or in Walker, London, would perhaps be the best parallel to cite; but M. Galipaux is better, being more of an artist and less of a clown. He gets the fun out of the character which he portrays, and not, as Mr. Toole used to do, out of the incongruity between that character and his own personality. He is not known to the British play-going public, as M. Coquelin is known, and therefore it is worth while to insist, pointing out that he has been the King of Farcical Comedy in France for about twenty years, and has even added a word to the French language. One says—or used to say—"faire des Galipettes"—meaning to go wildly "on the spree," taking one's risk of those embarrassing entanglements in which M. Galipaux displays his humour. The house was not so crowded as the actor deserved; but everybody ought to go to see him. He is the better worth seeing because he does not stand out conspicuously as a star, but is supported by a company that is good throughout. MM. Gabriel Frère and Lagrange were excellent in parts that recall Mr. Charles Hawtrey. The principal lady's part was admirably taken by Mlle. Thomassin, who quite recently carried off the First Prize at the Paris Conservatoire. Apart from her playing, her dresses were what ladies call "a dream"; and—what is more to the purpose—she wore them without self-consciousness, and not, as so many English actresses do, like a shop-girl in a show-room. Even Mlle. Irène Macnyll, whose rôle was that of a servant maid without a line to speak, deserves a special word of commendation. She had one point to make—to indicate respectful astonishment when she saw her dowdy mistress trying on a fashionable hat—and she made it perfectly, and got her laugh without a suspicion of over-emphasis.

FRANCIS GRIBBLE.

FINE ART

TURNER IN AND OUT OF LIMBO

WHILST the nation is to be congratulated on the recovery of the Turners now on exhibition at the Tate Gallery, the mode of that recovery is scarcely a matter of congratulation or complacency. No official statement has yet been issued, but we gather from Sir Charles Holroyd that until recently it was not thought proper to exhibit them, owing to their "slightness of execution, and more or less wrecked condition." The first conjecture that we made, on hearing of these Turners, that they had simply lain neglected, forgotten, and unrecorded in the cellars of the National Gallery, is one that is almost preferable, as it would merely show crass negligence, whereas, if these pictures have been known to successive authorities, they have been guilty of a deplorable lack of judgment and taste in not making them public. No doubt, in view of the national wealth of Turners, there was some justification for not exhibiting some of these sketches, the sea pieces No. 1987, Breakers on a Flat Beach; No. 1984, Margate, from the Sea; No. 1980, Storm off a Rocky Coast; No. 1990, Sunrise with a Sea Monster; No. 2002, Sunset with a Boat Between Headlands; and No. 1981, Norham Castle. All these productions, marvellous as they are, are merely sketches and hints of themes that have been carried out elsewhere. The Storm off a Rocky Coast looks like a sketch for the Wreckers in Mr. Byer's collection at Pittsburg.

As for No. 1988, no wonder the Directors shrank from exhibiting it under the title of Interior at Petworth; it looks like an illustration of the Turnerian lines:

Methought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks,
Ten thousand men that fishes gnawed upon,
Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl,
Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels,
All scatter'd in the bottom of the sea."

But little matters whether we call it "Interior at Petworth," or "Interior of the Sea;" it is chiefly wonderful as showing the interior of Turner's brain and its unique faculty for dealing with pure abstractions. There is no getting to the bottom or to the end of Turner. Even the National Gallery, with its three hundred and sixty-two oils and two thousand water-colours, is not fully representative. The sober perfection of his middle period in water-colours, like the Fawkes and Currie pictures in the Old Masters, is not to be seen there, and the Turner-Titian of the Adonis is unique. And now we have, if you please, a quite new Turner in the three exquisite little pictures of yacht racing in the Solent, Nos. 1993-1995. Turner's fairy-like lightness of touch, like that of a butterfly poisoning, is famous, and here we have it combined, as it not always is, with the swiftness of an eagle and the strength of a bull. Moreover, the harmony of colour is as perfect as the most perfect Whistler, and there are besides a life and sparkle, a brilliance and breeziness, and above all a virtuosity of handling far above Whistler. Throughout these pictures the palette knife is freely used and is sometimes quite obvious, but in these three with equal discretion and force. We cannot fathom the standard which would condemn such immortal works as these to the cellar or the store-room.

The name of Whistler again leaps to the lips in contemplating The Evening Star; indeed for a moment I descried his butterfly signature in the usual corner, but it proved, on inspection, to be a star-fish. It is a pleasing fancy to imagine Ruskin and Whistler poring over this picture, Whistler then inducing Ruskin to bottle it up again as being below the mark, subsequently by its inspiration, in 1865, painting the seascape of Mr. Alexander Young, and thereby alienating Ruskin for ever. Only some deliberate plot can rationally account for its neglect. Then there are the three pictures of Shipping on the Medway, Nos. 1997, 1998, 2000. We may call them sketches if we like, but, if Turner were alive again, would we ask him to touch them? There are passages of gradation in Rocky Bay, with classic Figures and Ships, that are so ineffably lovely that no improvement can be imagined on this sketch.

Since the exhibition of some of Turner's pictures is apparently at the discretion of the Director, it is not too much to hope that he will in future show a little more courage in his selection. Turner's wishes and Ruskin's opinion are to be respected, but the fact that certain of Turner's late pictures, such as the Angel standing in the Sun, Exile and Rock Limpet, and others, were exhibited at the Royal Academy during his lifetime should not weigh by a hair against the opinion, if it be held, that they represent only the decay of his genius. Against these we should consider the quantity of admirable sketches which are not seen or seen only by rotation among the twenty thousand in the basement of the National Gallery. A complete and final catalogue which, I understand, is in preparation, is much needed, but if it is not accompanied by a more complete exhibition, it will only be of use to students.

And here I would suggest that, to avoid in future appearing ridiculous in the eyes of the art directors of the rest of the world, we should set apart one day every year, say November 5, on which a solemn official procession should be made round the cellars of the National Gallery, the Tate Museum and the Wallace Gallery, headed by Sir Charles Holroyd, Mr. Claude Phillips, who has proved himself an adept in this kind of discovery, and Mr. Lionel Cust, girt with their insignia of office and accompanied by Mr. David Hogarth and Mr. Evans, armed with spade and mattock, for the purpose of pronouncing and declaring the secretion of explosive masterpieces. Otherwise our nerves will yield under the strain of perpetual apprehension.

B. S.

MR. A. L. COBURN'S PHOTOGRAPHS

MR. ALVIN LANGDON COBURN exhibits, in the Galleries of the Royal Photographic Society, a long hundred of photographs, the catalogue of which contains a clever and characteristic preface by Mr. George Bernard Shaw. Some of the pictures are equal to any we have seen, but, though we by no means agree with those who make the lens show more than is visible to the unaided human eye, we think Mr. Coburn carries the impressionist craze beyond reasonable limits, and the majority of his photographs seem to have been produced by a camera afflicted with astigmatism. No. 76, "Fog," is a clever piece of work, showing sundry objects looming through the atmosphere of a typical November day, but the title might have been used for many of the other items in the catalogue. However excusable this may be in landscape work, where a certain lack of definition is often desirable, we cannot appreciate it in the case of portraits, the object of which is, surely, to represent the sitter as he appears to the normal eye, and not as he would look through improperly constructed spectacles.

We do not wish to imply that the exhibition as a whole is disappointing, for there are many pleasing pictures on the walls. No. 26, Portrait of my Mother, shows a handsome and kindly lady, whose photograph is, speaking technically, quite satisfactory. Mr. Frank Brangwyn and Mr. Edward Carpenter are good, and so is young Mr. Andrew Lang. A Mother and Child is a delightful study taken in a very subdued light, and many of the landscapes will please the eye of the connoisseur. The Trafalgar Square Lion, however, gives us an impression of a beast as big as the Sphinx, which quite eclipses the National Gallery in the background.

In No. 57, A Decorative Study, the reversed swan is "a cute dodge," but the result is too symmetrical to be satisfactory. Princes Street Gardens, Edinburgh, gives a very fine view of a curved stone staircase, but little else: the title, we presume, is a joke, like that of The Cardinal's Breakfast of raw turnips and carrots!

On the other hand, the Portrait of George Meredith, Esq., is a magnificent piece of work, and this picture is in itself an ample recompense for a journey to 66 Russell Square, where any one interested in photographs will be welcomed on presenting a visiting card. The Royal Photographic Society makes no charge for admission to exhibitions in its own house.

MUSIC

DON QUIXOTE

It is now some time since Mr. Ernest Newman first undertook to play the arduous rôle of Sancho Panza to the Don Quixote of Richard Strauss, but from the time that he first espoused the fortunes of that eccentric genius he has followed him with a faithfulness, which, like that of the original Sancho, is by no means blind to the foibles of his chief. He has told us that neither "Tod und Verklärung" nor "Ein Heldenleben" are representative of the real Strauss, and he has impatiently dismissed the "Sinfonia Domestica" as the greatest of Quixotic errors; but in a work actually illustrative of Cervantes's romance, "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" he found the best characteristics of his hero and has championed its cause accordingly. Of it he says:

It is in the "Don Quixote" that Strauss is most really and truly himself and most thoroughly human. . . . I say nothing here of its technique, though that alone is sufficient to make one ask oneself whether it is possible for music to develop further than this. Nowhere, outside the work of glorious old Bach, is there such a combination in music of inexhaustible fertility of imagination and the most rigid austerity in choice of material.

This work has been neglected in England. It received one not very successful performance at the Strauss Festival at St. James's Hall in 1903, and was not heard again until Saturday, February 3, 1906, when the Queen's Hall Orchestra played it under Mr. Wood. I always want to hear Strauss, as, to judge from the audience, do most people, but this time, partly because the opportunity of hearing "Don Quixote" had been so long withheld, but chiefly because of the high praise bestowed on the work by Mr. Ernest Newman, I was particularly anxious to make its further acquaintance. Nor was I disappointed. There is everything in the work which, knowing Cervantes and Strauss, one would expect. In the introduction a beautiful upward figure, used as a duet in somewhat close imitation, creates an atmosphere of courtly grace which, through all the subsequent frenzy of Don Quixote's madness, Sancho's lumbering gait and talk, Dulcinea's frank vulgarity, is never lost sight of. Then, with the aid of a carefully written and suggestive programme, one may follow the development of the characters and their doings and sayings, and even without a programme one cannot miss the flock of sheep, the windmill, and the imaginary flight through the air. The grotesque realism of the sheep makes the whole audience roar with laughter, the pathos of Don Quixote's death might even make susceptible members of it weep; at any rate it enlists the whole-hearted sympathy of all. The one is, of course, just Strauss's cleverness, the other is his humanity, which is what makes us all tolerate his cleverness, which otherwise would be diabolical. For the sake of his genuine human feeling, which calls forth our sympathy whether we will or no, we willingly sit through the hideous passages in the middle of "Ein Heldenleben," we even listen to his wretched baby squalling in its bath. How much more readily, then, can we listen to a work in which every feature is a part of the development of a story which we already know and which interests us! When our ears were "dinn'd with uproar rude" in "Ein Heldenleben," we had to be content with the knowledge that a rather vague and shadowy Hero was doing battle against equally indefinite enemies, and the extreme domesticity of the very similar "uproar rude" in the later work was only painfully reminiscent. But when we can see in it the drolleries of Don Quixote's illusions, his tilting at windmills and flight through the air; when we can hear the voice of Sancho calling to him that this vast army, against which he advances so heroically, is but a flock of sheep upon the hillside; when we can actually hear noises in the orchestra which recall to us market day in a small country town, of course it is excellent fun and we all thoroughly enjoy ourselves, until Strauss is pleased, as he always is sooner or later, to give us something genuinely beautiful, which can arouse real emotion and sympathy. For my own part, I have not a fine enough sense to distinguish that "rigid austerity in the choice of material" which Mr. Ernest Newman finds to be akin to Bach. Rather I should say that, like most of Strauss's work, it is made up of a variety of material, good, bad and indifferent. There is the grace of the theme before alluded to. Then the vein of "Straussian" weirdness in the Don Quixote themes is, of course, appropriate, whereas in the "sulky" husband or the freakish wife of the "Sinfonia Domestica" it was just annoying. Strauss has a commonplace side to him which generally comes out when he allows himself, as even he must sometimes, to be plainly and simply diatonic. This feature, so unfortunate elsewhere, is, of course, turned to most happy account for the themes of Sancho Panza and Dulcinea. In fact, this subject, not in itself of the greatest, affords just the right material for the most happy display of Strauss's powers, and the result is a work which keeps an audience interested from start to finish by its successful blending of humour and pathos.

It is rather too late in the day to re-open the discussion of the methods of Richard Strauss. Mr. Ernest Newman thinks that in the main they are those of the Music of the Future; some of us believe that they are not, but this belief does not in the least preclude us from appreciating every work which reveals his extraordinary personality. A preliminary note, however, in the clever programme book of Messrs. Pitt and Kalisch on the "polyphony" of Richard Strauss cannot quite escape comment. The joint writers say:

It is almost a pity that we are obliged to call it polyphony, because it is something so very different from that which used to go by that name. Whereas in older composers the main object of polyphony was to build up an euphonious and symmetrical musical structure, its object in the hands of specifically "modern" writers is to illustrate, by the combination and the mutual interaction of themes, the relations between the things which the themes represent, and their effects on each other or on the souls of the persons with whom the music deals. And nowhere can this be seen better than in the dialogues between Don Quixote and Sancho Panza.

When one reads such a statement, one's chief wonder is that there is so much music in Richard Strauss's works as there is. One may go a step further than these writers and say that it is a pity that we are obliged to call these sound-constructions by the name of music, since, according to them, they are the outcome of a combination of ideas which are not connected by any tonal affinity, but only by their power to express their several non-musical ideas, which, for purposes of the story or development of character, have to be brought into close conjunction. Such a theory at once accounts for all the ugly passages in Strauss; but, if adopted, it places his work once and for all outside the pale of music. Interpret the word "euphony" as broadly as you will; show that it is possible to include every apparently harsh combination of sound within the bounds of an ultimate euphony, but once discard the idea of a sound combination on some euphonious basis and all link with the music of the past is gone, we plunge in a chaos of sound without form and void. I believe that most of Strauss's combinations can be justified on a broad principle of euphony and that many of his apparent vagaries sound on better acquaintance as euphonious as the polyphonic passage in the Meistersinger prelude to which in their next paragraph these writers refer. But, after hearing such a theory propounded, it is rather surprising to be told with reference to example 1c: "the strange harmonies in bars 2 and 4 suggest to commentators Don Quixote's tendency to mental aberration." These "strange" harmonies are in truth a succession of sevenths, which might be used as examples in the most orthodox harmony primer, and are among the simplest bars in the whole work. So the "whirligig of time brings in his revenges." Strauss's previous sanity has been so mad that his madness is quite commonplace, almost conventional.

To sum up, I find in "Don Quixote" one of the most delightful works of the most eccentric composer we have, but I conceive it to be successful, not as the mighty utterance of a prophet but because the subject exactly suited him. Strauss is Don Quixote, and perhaps he combines in himself something of Sancho Panza too, not to speak of Dulcinea. I have said nothing about the other delights of this concert, because this paper is not a concert report. I should like to write separately about the Mozart Haffner symphony, and the Brahms Double Concerto. In all, Mr. Wood's orchestra were at their very best, and Professor Hugo Becker's violoncello playing was masterly.

H. C. C.

[The second article on the "Oxford History of Music" will appear next week.]

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

A WORK entitled "Bossism and Monopoly," by Mr. J. C. Spelling, will be published by Mr. T. Fisher Unwin on February 12. This book is a luminous account, by a competent economist, of the system of trusts and monopolies. As the author shows, the Government of the United States, while nominally democratic, is really a plutocracy based on corruption and blackmail. Among the subjects dealt with in Mr. Spelling's chapters are the following: the general monopoly and trust situation; partnerships between party bossism and monopoly; how to overthrow party bosses; abuses of privilege by municipal service monopolies; the advantages of municipal ownership; abuses by railroads in private hands; remedies and proposed remedies, and the feasibility and advantages of Government ownership.

Mr. Unwin will publish on February 12 a book on "The Manors of Suffolk—their History and Devolution and their Several Lords," by Dr. W. A. Copinger, Professor of Law in the Victoria University of Manchester. While collecting particulars respecting the manuscript and other records relating to the county of Suffolk, with the object of preparing a record history, Dr. Copinger came across much information of an interesting character relating to the manors and their lords. The history of each manor starts with the Domesday entry, and many of the manors have been traced down, practically without a break, to the present day. An endeavour has been made to render the book as popular as was possible consistently with historical accuracy and permanent value. Views are given of several of the old manor houses. The present volume deals only with the Hundreds of Babergh and Blackbourn, but if its reception is satisfactory, Dr. Copinger hopes to treat the rest of the county in the same way.

Mr. Unwin is just issuing a second impression of Mrs. Bearn's "A Queen of Napoleon's Court—the Life Story of Desirée Bernadotte." He is also publishing a new impression of Dr. Jessopp's "The Coming of the Friars."

A new work is announced by Mr. Edwin Elliot, entitled "Barr and Son, a Story of a Modern Knight Errant," to be published by Mr. Elliot Stock. The story is founded on the efforts of a band of young Oxford idealists to improve the character and status of the working man, by practical life in industrial undertakings.

"Leabhar na h-Alba" (The Book of Scotland), by the Hon. Ruaidhri Erskine (Ruaidhri MacUilleim a dh' Arascain).—It is proposed to compile and to publish under this title, a Peerage of the Gaelic Nobility of Scotland. The basis of the work will be supplied by the Legend of the Seven Sons of Cruithne. The Seven Sons are named in the best Gaelic manuscripts as follows: Cait, Ce, Cirig, Fib, Fidach, Fotla, Fortrenn, which names correspond to the following principalities, Caithness, Mar, Mearns, Fife, Moray, Atholl, and Menteith. In all, however, the following dignities will be treated of, in addition to those named above, in order to render the work as representative of Gaelic Scotland as possible: Angus, Argyll, Buchan, Galloway, Lennox, Lorn, MacDonald (of the Isles), Ross, Sutherland, and the Kings of Scotland. It is intended strictly to confine this work to the Gaelic Nobility of Scotland, and to their descendants, whether direct or collateral. A few great families, not of Gaelic origin, will, however, receive briefer and less detailed mention by reason of their connection with Gaelic Scotland. Individuals and clans which cannot satisfactorily prove their descent from one or other of the above mentioned dignities, will not be treated of. In the case of a modern nobleman's holding an ancient Gaelic honour, neither the particulars nor the pedigree of his family will be given unless his original should be Gaelic. In the Preface to the work, it is intended to offer some observations touching the degrees of Rank amongst the Gaels, together with some remarks concerning the Seven Sons of Cruithne—the seven original Mór-mhaoir of Alba. The text of the work will be in the Gaelic language, and the illustrations to the book will be in the Gaelic manner. As the expense of so important and arduous an undertaking will necessarily be great, the author and publisher venture to appeal to the patriotism of their fellow countrymen, with a view to securing their practical support to their proposed undertaking. It is proposed to have two impressions of the work: one at £3 3s. (strictly limited to one hundred copies), and the other at £1 1s., whose number will depend upon the amount of support received. Orders for either of these impressions, which are not payable in advance of publication, can be sent at once to Mr. Eneas Mackay, Publisher, Stirling.

"The Integrative Action of the Nervous System." By Charles S. Sherrington, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Holt Professor of Physiology at the University of Liverpool, will be published in the early spring of 1906, by Messrs. Constable. The subject of this book formed ten lectures delivered at the Yale University in 1904 on the Silliman Foundation. Professor Sherrington's authority as a physiologist gives importance and distinction to this new volume of Silliman Memorial Lectures. In the multicellular animal the author holds, especially for those higher reactions which constitute its behaviour as a social unit, in the natural economy, it is nervous reaction which par excellence integrates it, welds it together from its components and constitutes it from a mere collection of organs an animal individual. This integrative action, in virtue of which the nervous system unifies from separate organs an animal possessing solidarity, an individual, is the problem which Professor Sherrington discusses in this book in a manner at once luminous and authoritative. The book is fully illustrated with diagrams, curves, etc.

"The Adventures of a Born Tramp," by Bart Kennedy.—In his new book, announced by Messrs. Cassell, Mr. Bart Kennedy, forsaking politics and polemics, goes back to the reminiscences of "A Man Adrift," and gives a further series of interesting personal experiences from his adventurous and romantic life in the States. The sketch which gives the title to the book shows Mr. Kennedy as one of the leaders in a great tramp settlement. Two out-of-the-common experiences are narrated in an oyster-piracy adventure, and fishing for stones, whilst the author also describes his life as strolling player, property man and circus assistant.

"Popular Modern Artists."—In a volume by Mrs. Lionel Birch, shortly to be published by Messrs. Cassell, the story of the "discovery" of Newlyn as a painting-ground is related authoritatively, and its development as an artistic colony is traced by those who assisted materially in the process. Mr. Stanhope Forbes's own experiences in the painting of his Newlyn pictures, his difficulties and successes, his stories of models—some of whom are celebrities of Newlyn—and of the colony, constitute an interesting chapter in contemporary art-history. Mrs. Forbes—who went to Newlyn as Miss Elizabeth Armstrong—has made a reputation as an artist which is equal to that of her husband. The story of her training and subsequent successes is also fully related, for the most part autobiographically. The illustrations in colour and in monochrome have been approved by Mr. and Mrs. Stanhope Forbes.

To acquaint himself with the causes of the recent outbreaks, as well as to study the life and habits of the people, Mr. Foster Fraser last autumn made an extensive journey in the Balkans. In a volume shortly to be published by Messrs. Cassell, he recounts his experiences. The author in his journey visited Servia and Bulgaria, crossed the Balkan Mountains into Turkey, and toured the vilayet of Adrianople, where there was much fighting between the Turks and Bulgarians. He then pursued his way through Macedonia into the disturbed regions, and pushed into the fastnesses of Albania. The volume is profusely illustrated from photographs by the author.

It will be of interest to librarians and writers to know that a Biographical Bibliography of "Celebrated Women" is shortly to be issued by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd., comprising a Dictionary of Women who for various reasons have made themselves remarkable at any period and in any country, with dates of birth and death, and index to portraits with names of engravers, the prices at which books, portraits and autographs have been sold at sales, etc. etc.

Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Ltd., have made arrangements to issue a new illustrated copyright edition of Miss Alcott's works to comprise eight of the best stories, commencing in March with "Eight Cousins," printed from entirely new type, with new illustrations and binding. The same firm are also issuing a reprint of Miss Alcott's "Work" and "Beginning Again" (the two books in one), in their 2s. series.

A revised edition of Mrs. Frewen Lord's "Tales from St. Paul's Cathedral," at the popular price of 1s., will shortly be ready. This book, together with the Tales of Westminster Abbey and Canterbury Cathedral, is widely adopted by teachers for school use. Messrs. Sampson Low are the publishers.

Mr. John Long is on the point of publishing Maxwell Gray's new novel "The Great Refusal." The story is concerned with the conflict of character and resolution between two men of diverse temperaments; the father, a man of money, and his only son, a man of mind. The "Great Refusal" is the refusal of the son to continue in the career mapped out for him by his father, preferring rather to devote himself to the service of humanity.

Mr. Neil Munro is to repeat his experiment of two years ago, Messrs. Blackwood including in their list of forthcoming books "The Vital Spark," by Hugh Foulis, the pseudonym by which Mr. Munro concealed his authorship of "Airchie."

"Fanny Lambert," a new story by Dr. H. de Vere Stacpoole, author of "The Lady Killer" and other stories, will be published by Mr. Unwin on February 12.

"My Cornish Neighbours" is the title of a volume of sketches by Mrs. Havelock Ellis to be published on Tuesday, the 13th inst., by Messrs. Alston Rivers, Ltd.

CORRESPONDENCE

IN MEMORIAM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Will you permit a lover of Tennyson's poetry to express disagreement with your reviewer's contention that section lxi. of In Memoriam is "radically obscure"?

If, in thy second state sublime

Thy ransomed reason change replies

With all the circle of the wise,

The perfect flower of human time—

Line two may cause perplexity for a moment, but a second glance shows the reader that "change" is a verb, and that "change replies" means "holds converse." The thought is now quite lucid. The poet's friend, who holds converse with the mighty dead, is conceived as realising by comparison the infirmities of his earthly comrade. And, surely, "forcible" is the very word one would choose for the poet's rejoinder:

I loved thee, Spirit, and love, nor can
The soul of Shakespeare love thee more.

M. C. H.

"JEWELS FIVE WORDS LONG"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—At the imminent risk of causing your correspondent "H. L. E." a severe nervous shock, I would, with peculiar diffidence, suggest that he read "all time" as a compound word, though I still plainly see an objection to "all." The last two words of the phrase "for ever"—I forbear to quote out of deference to "H. L. E.'s" heart-piercing supplication—refer to "jewels": Tennyson meaning, so I take it, jewels that would never lose their lustre, and more, that would "sparkle for ever," i.e., never yield place to lovelier gems.

"H. L. E.'s" reference to the suburban tea-table is scarcely kind—possibly your correspondent had in mind a few sweet enemies who do not read the columns of the ACADEMY. His tea-table simile hardly does Tennyson justice. I cannot see "absurdity" in the symbolism used by the great laureate. May we not conceive Time, as Tennyson probably here did, as some august presence, draped, as it were, with the abiding magnificence of the ages, standing with hand outstretched, and pointing into faint futurity to that "far-off divine event"? And is it too great a strain on an imagination, dominated by such a conception of Time, to picture the detail of the pointing finger—figuratively bright with gems cut and set by the great artificers, gems that startle with their lustrous beauty man's inward vision to-day, and that shall glisten to the spiritual eyes of centuries?

As to whether Tennyson had the "immortal" phrase in view when he wrote the lines in question is not for his readers to say. Certain it is that the sublime phrase is never attained by arduous labour alone. Such phrase, it would seem, results when the poet is least conscious of himself, when a power other and higher than the poet takes him, as it were, by surprise, and co-operates with his mind and heart to flash forth the inevitable consummate thought which is at once beauty and power.

JAMES A. MACKERETH.

THE ROKEBY VELASQUEZ

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I, as a regular reader, offer you my hearty congratulations on the reappearance of one of your best contributors, our friend "The Man in the Street." He has always something worth saying, and he always says it well. He is one of the few writers of to-day whom one feels any desire to "grasp by the hand" (to use a favourite phrase of a deceased dramatic critic).

If I were able, just now, to grasp him by the hand, I should probably look earnestly into his eyes and say: Now, my dear man, will you tell me, honestly, what is it at the bottom of your mind? Is there not just the least little suspicion of prudery? This "Venus and Cupid" (let us keep its usual title for a moment) represents a nude woman lying with her back towards the spectator. Whatever it is called, it obviously is the portrait of a real young woman, whose face, we may conclude, was not so fair as her form, and is therefore shown only in the blurred reflection in the mirror held up by a chubby nude child with wings. You, my dear Man in the Street, are sensible and agree with Mr. Robert Ross that "subject is an important factor in a picture or drawing." The subject of this drawing is a young nude woman looking at herself in the glass and showing us what she does not look at. If the young woman had been clothed, might she not still have looked at herself in the glass and not raised your ire? Come confess!

But, if you look into it, that is not the whole subject: there is another and a higher. And that is Beauty—the beauty of the human form. No matter who the young woman was, no matter what her character or morals, her beauty, stripped of all associations with the uses to which she may have put it, remains for us to admire so long as the picture lasts, set before us simply as beauty by a painter who here brought all his matchless skill to the expression of it. The critics have not satisfied you? With the exception of one or two cranks, they have all, we believe, bowed in reverence before the exquisite beauty of the human body thus seen and thus painted. That said, there was no more they could say; for unless they are even more blind than they appear to be, they must know that sheer beauty brings its own influence for good, and is a better subject for a picture than any amount of moral anecdote or moral quality. The idea of vanity only comes when we set about seeking for a label: for most of us it is enough to let the beauty influence and uplift us, without analysing as if we were Extension Lecturers. The label is as unimportant as the title. Who cares about Venus or Cupid? Who cares if Velasquez, in deference to the classicalism of his day (which was also Rubens's day) called it so, and worked the pattern of his composition to include a chubby child and a mirror? It is not Venus and Cupid any more than a news-sheet was a "Mercury," or history a "Muse." And I would add that the mirror means something—is, indeed, of the utmost importance. Suppose the young woman's face had been altogether hidden. What should we have said? "She is ashamed of posing nude and in this position"; and we never could have looked at the picture without a feeling of pain. To omit the mirror would have been to introduce the prurient.

No, my dear Man in the Street, the sheer beauty of this picture is its own justification, and the justification of the people who have demanded and secured £50,000 for it, and the people who have bought it and are going to put it where all the world can see.

ARTIUM AMATOR.

ARCHDEACON WRANGHAM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In these weeks one reads with reverence amounting to awe anything that appears over the signature C. B.; and can easily admire the simple device that by merely omitting the otherwise essential hyphen, secures a dignified and modest incognito. Dulce est desipere in loco, and even at times to condescend to the rôle of causeur or "agreeable Rattle," as it used to be called; but it is not necessary always to subscribe one's name in plain letters.

In the circumstances one sympathises all the more keenly with poor Archdeacon Wrangham (see ACADEMY, February 3, p. 115). Original all-father of walking encyclopædias, "ornament Wrangham," correspondent of Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt and Byron, is it come to this? That in the ACADEMY, inevitable and continuous supplement to the Encyclopædia, you should be spoken of as a person, "who apparently also dabbled in the making of guide-books and verses." Dabbled, quotha! Ever witness for him the thirty-six several monuments of learning, sacred eloquence, and poetry separately published by him and duly recorded in D. N. B. (where John Cole has also a very respectable niche)—not to speak of his innumerable contributions to the Gentleman's Magazine, Blackwood, Nichols's Anecdotes, and the rest. The Archdeacon it was who supplied the familiar English thunder to the Latin lightnings of Milton's Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio Secunda. We all nod, but C. B. shakes the spheres. Let us in conclusion hear the Rev. Sydney Smith when he says: "If I had a cause to gain, I would fee Wellbeloved to plead for me, and double-fee Wrangham to plead against me."

U. J. D.

Edinburgh, February 5.

WORDSWORTH AND SHELLEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I tender my warm thanks to a fellow Wordsworthian, Mr. Stanley Hutton, for his very kind remarks concerning my former letter.

By way of replying to Mr. J. H. Ingram, let me say that in touching quite incidentally, upon "the ratio of citation" and giving Wordsworth a place next after Shakespeare and Milton in this matter, I referred of course to quotations made nowadays and since Wordsworth wrote. The totals from Pope and Butler may possibly be higher; but they were in the field a century before the great Lakist! Nor did I conclude, from this frequency of allusion, that Wordsworth is the greater genius. I threw it out only as some indication of the hold our Poet has upon the leading writers and the best thought of the age, and the vast extent of his appeal to "all sorts and conditions of men." This latter fact it was which formed one of the reasons leading to the conclusion that Wordsworth's place is before Shelley's on the Roll of our Poets.

It seems to me that "A Student of Literature" helps our case far more than he knows it: his interesting letter suggests some additional "reasons" with which we might pelt your unfortunate readers.

"The proof from parody" is of little account. Indeed, it seems to tell in Wordsworth's favour; for, speaking generally, the nobler the poetry, the more effective the parody. Some of the cleverest parodies in the language are those that are based upon some of the finest poems. Not to labour this point—though it would suggest a thesis I am fully prepared to defend—I seriously question whether, after all, Wordsworth does really head the list of great poets effectively parodied. What is the result of the reading and investigation of your readers here? In my own case, to mention only a few names, the order of merit (or demerit?) plans out roughly somewhat as follows: Longfellow, Swinburne, Shakespeare, Browning, Wordsworth, Tennyson, Southey, etc. etc.

Again, is it true that Wordsworth has left such a huge quantity of "printed trash" behind him? Personally, like so eminent a critic as Matthew Arnold, I can read almost everything he has written with both pleasure and profit. Then, again, where is a fixed standard by which we may judge? Trash to one person may not be so to another: "one man's meat is another man's poison."

In any case, the position of a writer cannot be determined by the greater or less quantity of rubbish deposited by him: possibly the more shavings, sweepings and litter about the floor of the workshop, the more work of excellent quality has been done. As regards Wordsworth, however, it is maintained, that after all reasonable deductions have been made, he has left behind him a larger body of poetry of a very high order than any other poet after Shakespeare and Milton. And this was Arnold's contention confirmed and endorsed by others, some of whom go even further.

I cannot agree with "a student" that "there is not the faintest trace of dramatic power in Wordsworth." The existence of that early and certainly miniature tragedy of "The Borderers" is alone sufficient to refute so sweeping a statement. As poetry, this drama is inferior to Shelley's Hellas and The Cenci, but it is healthier and more human than either of these; and it contains one or two dramatic situations and a sense of the dramatic proprieties. The characterisation, though rather feeble, is, I think, at any rate equal, if not superior, to Shelley's.

In Wordsworth's mind there was this vein which he did not find opportunity to work further. Still, currents of intense dramatic feeling flow strongly through scores of his later poems. "Dion" and "Laodamia"—to name two only—are really concentrated dramas. It is true that Wordsworth did not write anything quite like "Adonais" and the "Ode to the West Wind." That, however, does not prove that he couldn't, if he had chosen. Suppose we grant that they were "out of his reach"—as, according to your correspondent, the "Ode to Duty," the "Intimations," etc., were out of Shelley's; there remains to remark, that the latter immortal pieces and a hundred others of which they are typical, are poems of a higher order than the majority of those in which the genius of Shelley habitually sought expression. The soul of Wordsworth lived and breathed in a loftier region; and for this reason what he has given to mankind is, in all vital things, of such immensely higher value than the ineffectual "beating in the void" of Shelley.

We enjoy poems of the "Skylark" sort, and admire their exquisite felicities, not condemning too severely their wretched pessimistic tone and their moody melancholy—and this tone and temper infect nearly everything that Shelley wrote; but we know that a richer and a better bouquet is spread before us by Wordsworth. He gives us strength and inspiration in daily life, "blessed consolations in distress," insists upon joy as a "paramount duty"—"joy in widest commonality spread"—and shows how we may attain it, and he strives with all the might of mind and heart to elevate and exalt the whole being. His main business is with "the things that belong unto our peace," and with those mighty spiritual passions which refine and purify and ennoble.

"The gift of converting the abstract into the concrete" is one of the easiest and most obvious, and thus surely not one of the highest poetical gifts: when indulged in to excess, as is often the case with Shelley, it may only irritate the reader and impoverish the poetry, because removing it too much from actual fact and life, giving it a spice of unreality and making it more remote and intangible than ever—a distinct defect.

Yet Wordsworth possessed this gift, too: witness "Yew Trees"; but he used it wisely, and held it in strict subservience to that more excellent and more difficult task, which he so magnificently discharged, of transfiguring the concrete and the common, fixing closest attention upon the ideal elements latent in the real, and throwing the powerful light of his fervent, penetrating and spiritualising imagination upon the characters, interests, concerns and habits of ordinary men and women and upon Nature with which humanity is linked by the presence and operation of the same Divine and Beneficent Power.

Hence, Wordsworth has become not so much mere Poet as Prophet, Priest and Seer of truths and splendours never hidden from those who seek with love, sympathy, purity and "lowliness of heart."

G. E. BIDDLE.

BURNS'S "TAM O' SHANTER"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Let me correct one mis-statement by Mr. C. S. Jerram in his second letter to you (ACADEMY, February 3, 1906). "Tam o' Shanter," he says, "appeared first in the Edinburgh Magazine of March 1791."

That was not the case. Mr. Jerram has taken his information from the Centenary Burns, which is in error on the point. The poem in question was first printed in Grose's Antiquities of Scotland, v. 2—for which it was "expressly wrote." That work was issued in numbers (beginning 1789), and the part containing the "pretty tale annexed to Alloway Church" was out in February 1791: not later—perhaps earlier.

J. C. EWING.

Glasgow, February 6.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Potter, Mary Knight. The Art of the Venice Academy, containing a Brief History of the Building and of its Collection of Paintings as well as Descriptions and Criticisms of many of the principal Pictures and the Artists. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xiii, 359. Bell, 6s. net.

[A worthy companion to Miss Knight's "Art of the Vatican" and "Art of the Louvre." Lavishly illustrated with a plan of the Galleries, a Bibliography (for the use of students—not experts) and an Index.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Broadley, A. M. and Bartolot, R. G. Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar: Thomas Masterman Hardy, Charles Bullen, Henry Digby. 9 x 6½. Pp. xxiv, 318. Illustrated. Murray, 15s. net.

Jeyes, Samuel Henry. The Earl of Rosebery. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 285. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[One of the series of "Prime Ministers of England," edited by Stuart J. Reid. The story is carried down to the present moment.]

CLASSICS.

Demosthenes against Midias. With critical and explanatory notes and an appendix by William Watson Goodwin. 8¼ x 5¼. Pp. viii, 188. Cambridge University Press, 9s.

[Dr. Goodwin is Eliot Professor of Greek Literature Emeritus at Harvard.]

C. Suetonii Tranquilli de vita Caesarum Libri VIII. recensuit Leo Preud'homme. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xii, 338. Groningen: J. B. Wolters. Fl. 2.25.

[A volume in the "Bibliotheca Batava Scriptorum Græcæ et Romæ." M. Preud'homme is well known as an authority and theorist on manuscripts of Suetonius, and in this volume he gives the text, with v. l. in footnotes.]

DRAMA.

Synge, J. M. The Well of the Saints. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xviii, 92. Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.

[Vol. iv. of "Plays for an Irish Theatre." This play was seen in London last year. Mr. W. B. Yeats contributes an introduction.]

EDUCATION.

Cambridge University Press. Pitt Press Series. Cicero pro S. Roscio Amerino, edited by J. C. Nicol. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xxxi, 150. 2s. 6d. Burke, Edmund. Speeches on American Taxation and Conciliation with America, edited by Arthur D. Innes. 7 x 4½. Pp. xxxiii, 200. 3s. Cambridge University Press.

Black's School Editions. The Abbot, by Sir Walter Scott. With Introduction and Notes by H. Corstorphine. With extracts from Scott's own preface and notes. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxiii, 471. 2s. Barnaby Rudge, by Charles Dickens. With Introduction and Notes by A. A. Barber. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxiv, 654. 2s. 6d. A. & C. Black.

Forbes, Avarly H. Essays and how to write them. 7½ x 5½. Pp. viii, 146. Ralph, Holland, 2s.

ETHNOLOGY.

Parker, K. Langloh. The Euahlayi Tribe, a study of aboriginal life in Australia. With an Introduction by Andrew Lang. 9½ x 6. Pp. xxviii, 150. Constable, 7s. 6d. net.

[A tribe that has hitherto been hardly mentioned by anthropologists; dwelling in north-western New South Wales. Mrs. Parker has been acquainted since childhood with the Australian natives, and Mr. Lang testifies to her close scientific observation throughout a number of years. She has had access, too, to the women and children to a degree impossible to men.]

FICTION.

White, F. M. The Weight of the Crown. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 319. Ward, Lock, 6s.

[A newspaper "serial" dignified by boards and a high price. The throne of the Kingdom of Asturia—two beautiful girls exactly like each other—stolen papers—a weakly king and a strong queen: these are some of the ingredients of a story that is exciting enough.]

Pearce J. H. The Dreamer's Book: being fantasies and drawbacks dealing mainly with the illusions and disillusion of life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 134. Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.

[Imaginative and often beautiful sketches selected from "Drols from Shadowland" (1893) and "Tales of the Masque" (1894) with a few of later date. Mr. Pearce is best known, perhaps, as the author of "Esther Pentreath."]

Onions, Oliver. The Drakestone. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 324. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Sims, George R. For Life and After. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 344. Chatto & Windus, 6s.

[The romance of an innocent woman condemned to penal servitude for life, and her difficulties and sufferings after release. Illustrating the peril of conviction on circumstantial evidence.]

Savile, Frank; and Watson, A. E. T. Fate's Intruder. 7½ x 5. Pp. 295. Heinemann, 6s.

Phillipotts, Eden. The Portreeve. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 364. Methuen, 6s. (See p. 139.)

Langbridge, Rosamond. The Ambush of Young Days. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 344. Duckworth, 6s.

Macdonald, Ronald. The Sea Maid. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 322. Methuen, 6s.

Drummond, Hamilton. The Chain of Seven Lives. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 308. White, 6s.

Roberts, Morley. The Blue Peter. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 248. Nash, 6s.

Carey, Wymond. "No. 101." 7½ x 5½. Pp. 332. Blackwood, 6s.

HISTORY.

The Political History of England. In twelve Volumes. Edited by William Hunt and Reginald L. Poole. Hodgkin, Thomas. The History of England from the Earliest Times to the Norman Conquest. 9x6½. Pp. xxii, 538. Longmans, 7s. 6d. net.

[This, the first in historical order of Dr. Hunt and Mr. Poole's great undertaking, is not the first volume to appear. The scope is sufficiently explained by the title. There are two maps: Roman Britain and Anglo-Saxon, and a good Index. For the scope of the History as a whole see the ACADEMY, December 2, 1905, p. 1270.]

Kennedy, Pringle. A History of the Great Moghuls, or a History of the Badshahate of Delhi from 1398 A.D. to 1739, with an Introduction concerning the Mongols and Moghuls of Central Asia. Vol. i. 9½x6½. Pp. vi, 319. Calcutta: Thacker, Spink. London: Thacker, 15s.

[Mr. Pringle's object has been to make a work "readable by the man in the street, the person who knows but little of Indian History but has an interest in India." The sub-title more truly expresses the nature of his book than the title. This volume carries us to the death of Akbar, and the work will be complete in two volumes. A good index.]

LITERATURE AND LANGUAGES.

Greenslet, Ferris. James Russell Lowell. His Life and Work. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 309. Constable, 6s. net.

[Mr. Greenslet has attempted, as good biographers do, to let Lowell tell his own story. He has had access to Lowell's commonplace-books and note-books in the possession of Professor C. E. Norton, and other unpublished sources of information. Lowell is considered only as a man of letters, abolitionist, professor, and diplomatist; and at the end come two critical chapters on his poetry and prose.]

Naish, Ethel M. Browning and Dogma. Seven lectures on Browning's attitude towards dogmatic religion. 7½x5½. Pp. 210. Bell, 4s. 6d. net.

[Miss Naish's lectures were delivered last autumn in Birmingham. They form a close and careful analysis of "Caliban upon Setebos," "Cleon," "Bishop Blougram's Apology," "Christmas Eve and Easter Day" and "La Saisiaz," with, of course, full reference to "A Death in the Desert" and other poems. Browning's Christianity seems to us very well and wisely defined in an interesting and scholarly book.]

Cary, Elizabeth Luther. The Novels of Henry James, a Study. 7½x5. Pp. 215. Putnam, 5s.

[Miss Cary's chapters are: Introductory: American Character: The Genius of Place: The Question of Wealth: Imagination: Philosophy. Mr. Frederick Allen King contributes a bibliography, which does not profess to include all the English editions.]

Magnus, Laurie. How to read English Literature. Chaucer to Milton. 6½x4½. Pp. xii, 207. Routledge, 2s. 6d.

[An attempt "first, to interest the reader . . . and, secondly, to divert his attention to the general unifying principles which govern the subject." The Board of Education recommends that the literature lesson be brought into connection with the history-teaching, and what Mr. Magnus calls the "impressionism" of his book is an attempt to fulfil this requirement.]

Publications of the S.P.C.K. The Psalms in the Language of Taveta. 6½x4½. Pp. 160, 1s. 6d.; The Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles in Chiswina, the language of Mashonaland. 6½x4½. Pp. 381, 1s. 4d.; The Book of Common Prayer in Spanish (revised edition). 5½x5½. Pp. 561, 9d.; Hymns in the Maori Language. 5½x3½. Pp. 159, 6d.; Norris's Manual of the Prayer-Book in Luganda. 6½x4½. Pp. 244; The Second Reader: Temne and English. 6½x4½. Pp. 38, 8d.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Tolstoy Leo. The End of the Age (on the approaching Revolution) preceded by The Crisis in Russia. Translated by V. Tchertkoff and Dr. I. F. Mayo: with a note by the latter. 9x5½. Pp. 88. Heinemann, 2s.

["The Crisis in Russia" appeared in the Times, March 11, 1905: "The End of the Age" in the Fortnightly Review for January and February 1906.]

Holyoake, George Jacob. The History of Co-operation. In two volumes, each 9x6½. Pp. xviii, 691. Unwin, 21s.

[Volume I., Pioneer Period, 1812 to 1844, was published in 1875; Volume II., Constructive Period, 1845 to 1878, in 1879. To the reissue is now added a new Part III., 1876-1904. Portraits and an Index.]

Northcote, Hugh. Christianity and Sex Problems. 8½x6½. Pp. x, 257. Philadelphia: F. A. Davis Co.

[A scientific and religious examination of sex difficulties.]

Dresser, Horatio W. Health and the Inner Life. An Analytical and Historical Study of Spiritual Healing Theories, with an account of the Life and Teachings of P. P. Quimby. 7½x5½. Pp. 255. The Inner Life Series. Putnam, 6s.

Miles, Eustace. Threepence a Day for Food. 6½x4½. Pp. 96. Constable, 1s. net.

[Mr. Eustace Miles, his chef and his secretary, shocked at their former extravagance, under which their meals cost fivepence a head for raw materials, lived for a week on meals which cost twopence a head daily. "It was not pleasant," but it taught them something. In this book Mr. Miles sets out fully and practically how to live on threepence a head daily. There are plenty of receipts given, and most of them sound delicious. But the cooking must be perfect.]

Fish, D. S. The Book of the Winter Garden. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 107. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.

[One of the "Handbooks of Practical Gardening," edited by Harry Roberts. Illustrated. Gives a full account of the principal winter-flowering plants and those plants valuable in the open for their fruit, foliage, or stem effect.]

The Wisdom of the East Series. The Wisdom of Israel, being extracts from the Babylonian Talmud and Midrash Rabbah. Translated from the Aramaic and Hebrew with an Introduction by Edwin Collins. 6½x5. Pp. 60. Murray, 1s. net.

[Few, if any, of those extracts have been translated into English before, and the little volume is packed with interest and wisdom.]

Karslake, Frank (edited by). Book-Auction Records. A Priced and Annotated Record of London Book Auctions. Vol. 3. Part 1. October 1, to December 31, 1905. Karslake.

[This new instalment of Mr. Karslake's invaluable and masterly work contains 4401 records, including those of the Cork, Irving, Hawley, Richards and Bacon Libraries and many others.]

The Borough of Gravesend Public Library. Catalogue of Books in the Lending Libraries, with descriptive notes and cross-references. Compiled by the Librarian, Alex. J. Philip. 9½x6½. Pp. xiv, 137. Gravesend Public Library, 9d.

The Public School Year-Book, 1906. With a general list of preparatory schools. 7½x5½. Pp. lxiv, 675. Swan Sonnenschein, 2s. 6d. net.

[This issue contains, in addition to its usual excellent features, a special article on "Military Efficiency in Public and Preparatory Schools," compiled from unique statistics obtained from Schools in reply to a series of Questions drawn up for the Editors by Lord Roberts.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

Guppy, H. B. Observations of a Naturalist in the Pacific between 1896 and 1899. Vol. ii. Plant-Dispersal. 9½x6½. Pp. xxviii, 627. Macmillan, 21s. net.

Ralfe, P. G. The Birds of the Isle of Man. 9½x6½. Pp. lvi, 321. Edinburgh: David Douglas, 18s.

[Introductory Chapters: a list of Manx Birds: Detailed account of species: Bibliography: Current acts of Tynwald affecting wild birds: Addenda and Index. The book is illustrated with photographs of scenery, bird-haunts and nests, but we find none of birds. There are two good maps.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Geikie, Sir Archibald. The Founders of Geology. Second Edition. 9½x6. Pp. xii, 486. Macmillan, 10s. net.

[The first edition, in the form of six lectures delivered at Johns Hopkins University, was published in 1897. This edition has departed from the lecture-form, is enlarged, and includes a new account of the earlier progress of geological ideas from Ancient Greece to the starting-point of the first edition.]

Weir, Archibald. A Student's Introduction to Critical Philosophy. 7½x4½. Pp. 122. Oxford: Thornton. London: Simpkin Marshall, 2s. 6d. net.

[A second and re-written edition of an Introduction to the Study of Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason."]

Hare, Augustus J. C. and Baddeley, St. Clair. Days near Rome. 6½x4½. Pp. viii, 310. Fourth Edition. Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net.

[Illustrations and a Map.]

Routledge's New Universal Library. The Life of St. Columba, by Saint Adamnan. Newly translated from the Latin with Notes and Illustrations, by Wentworth Huyshe. 6½x4½. Pp. lxx, 255. Routledge, 1s.

[St. Columba (Columb-Kille) A.D. 521-597, was founder of the Monastery of Iona and first Christian missionary to the Pagan tribes of North Britain. Saint Adamnan, his biographer (A.D. 679-704) was ninth Abbot of the Monastery of Iona. There have been three translations of the life before, and a classic edition by Dr. William Reeves, but Mr. Huyshe's aim has been to make a version more accurate than two of them, and better literature than the third. His excellent little volume includes a Summary of the Principal Events in the life of St. Columba, and a note on St. Adamnan. Illustrations (with notes) and an Index.]

Routledge's New Universal Library. Bates, Henry Walter. The Naturalist on the Amazons. Pp. x, 518. Fraser, Sir William, Bart. Words on Wellington. The Duke-Waterloo-The Ball. Pp. 268. Each 6½x4. Routledge, 1s. each.

Humphrey, Seth K. The Indian Dispossessed. Revised edition. Illustrated 8x5½. Pp. 298. Boston: Little, Brown. $1.50.

[A study of the United States Government's treatment of the Reservation Indians.]

The Waistcoat Pocket Classics. Sonnets of Keats. Pp. 49. The Not-Browne Mayd. Pp. 65. 2½x2½. Treherne, leather, 1s. net, cloth, 6d. net each.

[The binder of the latter volume is nervous about the antique spelling: he gives us the title as "The Nut-Brown Maid." The title-page gives it as above. We notice a very bad misprint on p. 36 of the Keats.]

The Cameo Classics. The Vicar of Wakefield. By Oliver Goldsmith. Pp. 190. The Story of a Feather. By Douglas Jerrold. Pp. 252. 6½x4. The Library Press, Sisleys Ltd., 6d. net each.

[The latter volume has a brief biographical introduction.]

SPORT.

Hubach, Theodore R. Elephant and Seladang Hunting in the Federated Malay States. 9x6½. Pp. xiv, 289. Rowland Ward, 10s. 6d. net.

[The seladang is generally and erroneously known as the Indian bison. Mr. Hubach's handsome book is illustrated from photographs.]

THEOLOGY.

Orr, James, D.D. The Problem of the Old Testament, considered with reference to recent Criticism. 9x6½. Pp. lii, 562. Nisbet, 10s. net.

[The Bross Prize, 1905. Vol. iii. of the Bross Library. The idea has been "to concentrate attention on really crucial points, and to make them the pivots on which the discussion of other questions turns." Full contents, tables, notes and indexes.]

Scott, Rev. J. J., Canon of Manchester. The Making of the Gospels. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 112. Murray, 1s. net.

[Six lectures delivered in Manchester last Lent, and to a great extent an expansion of Canon Scott's introduction to his "Life of Christ" (Murray). The principle is the relation between the speculative science of Higher Criticism and the exact science of Textual Criticism, which must correct and override the conclusions of the former.]

Christianity and the Working Classes. Edited by George Haw. 7½x5½. Pp. viii, 257. Macmillan, 3s. 6d. net.

[Contributions by Dean Kitchin, Mr. Will Crooks, Dr. Horton, Canon Barnett, Mr. Arthur Henderson, Mr. Silas Hocking, Mr. Bramwell Booth, Mr. George Lansbury, Mr. Ensor Walters, Mr. T. E. Harvey and Mr. Adderley. The question is: "What exactly are the present-day relationships between the Churches and Labour?"]

Parkes, A. Katharine. Small Lessons on Great Truths, a Book for Children. 7x4½. Pp. x, 92. Methuen, 1s. 6d.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Bruges and West Flanders. Painted by Amedee Forestier. Described by G. W. T. Omond. 9x7. Pp. x, 187. Black, 10s. net.

[One of Messrs. Black's colour books. Mr. Omond, despairing of telling the whole history of a country whose interest is mainly historical, takes a few leading incidents and describes them fully. Mr. Forestier's pictures are partly architectural and partly of modern life.]

Brassington, W. S. Picturesque Warwickshire. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  x 5 $\frac{3}{4}$ . Pp. xiv, 163. Dundee: Valentine, 2s. 6d. net.
[A "glorified guide-book" by the learned chief of the Shakespeare Memorial at Stratford-upon-Avon. Very handsomely got up and illustrated, and well written by an authority who knows his subject backwards.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Church Music (The Dolphin Press, Philadelphia, 2s. 6d.) is a spirited attempt to deal largely and effectively with the many questions opened up by the "Motu Proprio" on Church music of Pope Pius X. His Holiness has issued certain commands as to the exclusion of women from Liturgical choirs and the adoption of the use of "plain chant" and ancient polyphonic music, which it is extremely difficult for parish priests and organists to carry out. This paper, of which the first number is now before us, attempts to give both exhortation and instruction. The article "How shall the reform in Church music be effected?" by Rev. H. T. Henry puts the matter plainly and recognises that in the training of boys' voices much can be learned from the practice of "protestant" churches. Again, H. B. Gibbs's plea for congregational singing enunciates principles which outside the Roman Church are fairly widely recognised. Such papers as "The Neumatic Notation," "A Grammar of Plain Song," are full of instruction on a subject which musicians in general, whether of the Church or not, ought to study far more seriously. The paper contains liturgical notes as well as many reviews and comments which should be very useful to Church musicians. In point of style, both literary and as a publication, this paper offers a worthy example to both ecclesiastical and musical journalism. It is well printed on good paper and attractively produced, and as it has a variety of contributors, both clerical and lay, its subject should receive discussion from all points of view in due course. It displays one unfortunate tendency, that of pouring blame on organists and singers for abuses in Church music, which have been caused by carelessness and ignorance in general, not only by that of organists and singers. The reform in Roman Catholic Church music should be carried out on a principle of sympathetic co-operation between priests and musicians, in which case we may hope for important results, beneficial alike to art and religion.

Incunabula typographica. Pars II. (Munich: Jacques Rosenthal, 6s.)—Herr Jacques Rosenthal, the well-known Munich bookseller, has just published the second part of his splendid catalogue: Incunabula typographica. It contains a full description of two thousand books printed before 1500 A.D. by five hundred different printers in one hundred different towns. As in the former Part the greatest minuteness has been employed in describing the single items and the very newest literature on the subject has been referred to. This, by the bye, is the first time that we have seen an attempt to make practical use of Herr Konrad Haebler's "Typen Repertorium." Two hundred and ninety facsimiles of prints and numerous indexes make the catalogue very useful for the student as well as for the collector.

Mrs. Beeton's Book of Household Management. (Ward, Lock, 7s. 6d. net.)—It is nearly fifty years since "Mrs. Beeton" first appeared; she has been a household word ever since. Every one knows Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's remark in "A duet—with an occasional chorus": "Mrs. Beeton must have been the finest housekeeper in the world. Therefore Mr. Beeton must have been the happiest and most comfortable man." Good! But there is no reason why we should not all be, henceforth, the happiest and most comfortable men, and our wives the best housekeepers in the world, when 7s. 6d. will buy us 2004 $\frac{1}{2}$  pages packed with the soundest information, and fifty pages more of analytical index, by means of which you can turn up in half a second the latest and fullest instruction on the making of everything, from a Will to Celery Croquettes. Such a book as this is beyond praise. The new edition, as published by Messrs. Ward, Lock, has been brought right up to date; new features have been added, it is illustrated from start to finish, and the whole book is just four times as big as the first issue of the modest work of Isabella Beeton. Why is there no statue to the immortal Isabella? She deserves one better than many of the pompous nonentities who have them. And if Mrs. John Lane, in a recent amusing book, is able to heap scorn on English housekeeping, that is only because English housekeepers do not make sufficient use of the extraordinary stores of wisdom and practical advice which Messrs. Ward, Lock put within their reach.

Of all the dramatists of the seventeenth century, not one has received so little attention as Lodovick Carliell or Carliell. Till recently he was little more than a name, and biographical details were scanty. Now, thanks to an American scholar, Dr. Charles H. Gray, of Kansas University, he takes form and acquires a history. In Lodovick Carliell, his life, a discussion of his plays and "The Deserving Favourite" (University of Chicago Press), Dr. Gray proves that Carliell was born at Brydekirk, near Annan, in 1602, was the son of Robert Carliell, huntsman to King James I., was himself huntsman to the king and Groom of the Privy Chamber, became keeper of the deer park at Richmond (one of the walks in which was named after him), and lived in the lodge there; gave his fortune to Charles I. during the Civil War, but held his appointment under the Commonwealth, wrote one more play after the Restoration, died in 1672—probably in sore poverty—and is buried in Petersham. Dr. Gray has made a thorough study of Carliell's few plays, and in his close examination of the earliest, The Deserving Favourite (1629), proves it to have been inspired by Solozano's

La duquesa de Mantua. The text of The Deserving Favourite is given, and we hope that Dr. Gray will carry out his intention of following up this important and scholarly book with editions of the rest of Carliell's plays. It is long since Dr. Ward expressed a wish that Carliell should be reprinted, and we welcome the undertaking in such good hands as those of Dr. Gray.

It is good to be genial and sweet-tempered; to have a pleasant, courageous, mellow view of life; to see clearly, but kindly; to cherish a real love of letters, and to love a good joke. It is better, perhaps, to be thus than to be a great literary critic. At any rate, when men with such temperaments write, they write books that are always welcome in hours of relaxation, such books as those Interludes of Mr. Horace Smith, of which we have the Fourth Series (Three Essays and some verses) before us (Macmillan, 5s.) The Essays are on "Our Likes and Dislikes" (of things and persons), "In Extenuation of Poetry," and on "Discontent." All three show wide reading, sound taste, a good memory, a strong sense of humour, and a tolerant wisdom which comes in part, perhaps, from looking all day on the "seamy side" of life in a London police-court, and finding it not all seams. The verses, too, are the verses of one who is a scholar and a humorist. The hymns have a dignified simplicity that makes them welcome, by contrast with much that is forced or affected in devotional literature. Indeed, if we wished to characterise Mr. Horace Smith's work by a single word, the most appropriate would be, we believe, that word "simplicity"; a simplicity of soul that shines honestly forth in a book which, mélange as it is, is characteristic and charming from cover to cover.

Notes on the Life History of British Flowering Plants. By Lord Avebury, P.C., etc. (Macmillan, 15s. net.)—Lord Avebury points out that Bentham, Sowerby, Hooker, and his other predecessors confined themselves to technical details and such descriptions as enable the student to distinguish one plant from another. They treated flowers as if they were dead objects of science whose chief interest lay in their structural complexity. The special quality of Lord Avebury's book lies in the attention given to the economy and life history of plants; the usual descriptions, together with technical details irrelevant to this purpose, are absent. In an age when capable naturalists are ceasing to treat animals and birds as curious or merely decorative objects, it was only to be expected that a similar, though less generous, courtesy should be extended to flowers. Lord Avebury is not the man from whom we should look for anything revolutionary. But, as a reformer of the class of book to which Hooker belongs, he turns out to be excellent. We have looked with particular care at his accounts of climbing plants, and though they do not go beyond, nor even include, all that was formerly known of spirals, yet they are very significant. Thus, his five or six hundred words on the honeysuckle seem to lay down a challenge to all future readers of such books. What he has done for this and a number of other plants must in the end be done for every plant, and more also. He begins by giving the hour at which the first flowers expand and become strongly scented, and the exact attitude and expression of the flowers during their change from the virginal white and red, through a clear yellow, to a soiled orange, in the process of fertilisation. The insects most devoted to the flowers are mentioned here, as in the case of the common bryony, which is apparently honoured exclusively by the bee, Andrena florea. It is only just to point out, however, that, though the book is a challenge, it is also hardly more than an indication to the coming botanist, since many plants are still left quite unilluminated by any vital information.

The lighter side of a careful scientific expedition is told very vividly and well by Mr. C. William Beebe in Two Bird-lovers in Mexico (Constable, 10s. 6d. net). The backward development of the country, the unusual variety of soil and climate which is the result of the great differences in elevation; and, not least, the naturally enlightened attitude of the people towards bird life, all help to make the avi-fauna of the country one of great richness, and Mr. Beebe has described it in a simple, unforced and delightful narrative. The author and his wife spent four months of the Mexican winter mainly on a series of camping expeditions in varied surroundings, both on the central table-land and in the neighbourhood of the volcanoes of the Cordillera, as well as among the tropical vegetation of the Pacific coast-lands. In a final chapter, "How we did it," Mrs. Beebe describes the practical management of the trip. The spirit in which it was undertaken was that which commands enjoyment as well as success. "My theory is that all one has to do is to get on and ride," says Mrs. Beebe. "I had never ridden before, but I simply got on and rode off." But the whole tone of the book bears out the statement that the trip was "novel, delightful, and absolutely devoid of unpleasant features," while those who may feel the impulse to pitch a tent in the authors' track may be interested to see it described as, "on the whole, so responsive." It has to be remembered that the writers started from New York. The book is abundantly illustrated with good pictures of nature and Mexican life, and an appendix contains a list of the birds observed.

The Shilling Scientific Series (T. C. and E. C. Jack) is composed of popular works, and are written for a wide public. In Sociology the sections on Sex and Society are likely to ripple clerical circles, and not unlikely to increase the circulation of the book. The volume on Psychology deals ably with this wide subject in about a hundred pages. The works are not in any respect examination text-books, but simple presentations of scientific subjects for those who wish to have a wide general knowledge, accurate so far as it goes.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) ~~Over 450~~
Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net.
507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy —and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE. Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo, and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 500 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

WYCHERLEY (W.) Miscellany Poems, folio, 1704
Yachts, Large Prints of, especially coloured
Young (Arthur) any of His Travels
Yule (Col. H.) Marco Polo, 2 vols, 1875
Zastrozzi, a Romance, by P. B. S., 1810
Zoological Society of London, Proceedings and Transactions of Heath, British Cavalry, 1820
British Infantry, coloured plates
British Artillery, coloured plates
Miniature Books. Any not more than 3 inches high Tennyson, Welcome to Marie Alexandrovna, 1874
Falcon, 1879
The Cup, 1881
Promise of May, 1882
Trollope (Anthony) The Madermots, 3 vols, 1847
Kellys and The O'Kellys, 3 vols, 1848
La Vendee, 3 vols, 1850
The Warden, 1855
Dr. Thorne, 3 vols, 1858
The Three Clerks, 1859
Framley Parsonage, 3 vols, 1861
Belton Estate, 3 vols, 1866
Any First Editions
LIBRARIES PURCHASED.—Gentlemen, Executors and others will find it to their advantage to communicate with me before disposing in any other way of a Library or small collection of Books. Competent buyers sent any distance.
First editions of modern authors a speciality. I have the largest and choicest collection offered for sale in the world.
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

DINNIS v. HENNIKER HEATON, M.P.
Wanted a Copy of a Pamphlet, 16 pages 4to, addressed by R. Dinis to The Chairman of the Canterbury Conservative Association, July 1889.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

CAMBRIAN QUARTERLY MAGAZINE,
5 vols. Jones's History of Breconshire. Last Chronicles of Basset.—Lloyd & Townsend, Dillwyn Book Mart, Swansea.

Ask for the February Book Monthly 6d. net

The BOOK MONTHLY is a beautifully illustrated Record, Guide, and Magazine for everybody interested in books. It is a What's What and Who's Who of bookland, and it has already won a recognised position. It gives full information about coming books, and a careful, classified catalogue of those published during the previous month, besides a variety of articles on current books and literary subjects. To the General Reader, wishing guidance as to the new books of the day, the BOOK MONTHLY is especially valuable. It is published at the beginning of each month, price 6d. net, by Simpkin, Marshall, Hamilton, Kent and Co., 4 Stationers' Hall Court, E.C.

Back Numbers are still available, and a Specimen copy will be sent free on application.

MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST

THE POLITICAL HISTORY OF ENGLAND

Edited by the Rev. WILLIAM HUNT, D.Litt., President of the Royal Historical Society,
AND
REGINALD LANE POOLE, M.A., Ph.D., Editor of the "English Historical Review."

To be issued in 12 volumes. The price of each Volume is 7s. 6d. net, if sold separately, but COMPLETE SETS may be subscribed for through the Booksellers at the price of £4 net payment being made at the rate of 6s. 8d. net on the delivery of each Volume.

NEW VOLUME BY DR. THOMAS HODGKIN

FROM THE EARLIEST TIMES TO THE NORMAN CONQUEST

By THOMAS HODGKIN, D.C.L., Litt.D.

Fellow of University College, London, Fellow of the British Academy.

With 2 Maps.

[Just Published.]

Vol. II. FROM 1066-1216. By GEORGE BURTON ADAMS, Professor of History in Yale University. With 2 maps. [Ready.]

Vol. III. FROM 1216-1377. By T. F. TOUT, M.A., Professor of Mediaeval and Modern History in the University of Manchester. With 3 Maps. [Ready.]

Vol. X. FROM 1760-1801. By the Rev. WILLIAM HUNT, M.A., D.Litt., Trinity College, Oxford. With 3 Maps. [Ready.]

INDUSTRIAL EFFICIENCY: a Comparative Study of Industrial

Life in England, Germany, and America. By ARTHUR SHADWELL, M.A., M.D., Author of "Drink, Temperance, and Legislation." 2 vols. 8vo, 26s. net.

* * * The author is careful to explain that his new work has no connexion with the "fiscal controversy." It was planned, and the investigation on which it is based was carried out, he writes, before the present controversy arose. "But it was inspired by the same circumstances—namely, the growing pressure of international competition in industry, which is evidently going to be the warfare of the future. It essays to deal with the other side of that problem, and to examine the conditions under which industries are carried on in the three leading industrial countries, apart from tariffs."

COMMERCIAL SUPREMACY AND IMPERIALISM. By Victor

BERARD of the Revue de Paris. Translated from the French by H. W. FOSKETT, M.A., New College, Oxford. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [On Monday next.]

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION: a Critical and Speculative

Treatise of Man's Religious Experience and Development in the Light of Modern Science and Reflective Thinking. By GEORGE TRUMBULL LADD, Professor of Philosophy in Yale University. 2 vols. 8vo, 28s. net. [On Monday next.]

* * * This may be considered as the culmination of the psychological and philosophical works of Prof. Ladd. The first volume considers religion as an historical development and treats of the psychology of religious experience. In the second volume the problems proposed by the psychological and historical method are discussed under the general subjects of good as the object of religious faith, the relation of God and the world, and the destiny of the race from the point of view of religious experience.

NEW COLLECTED RHYMES. By Andrew Lang. Crown 8vo,

4s. 6d. net.

Loyal Lyrics—Cricket Rhymes—Jubilee Poems—Critical of Life, Art, and Literature—Folk Songs—Ballads.

THE HEALTH OF OUR CHILDREN IN THE COLONIES: a Book

for Mothers. By LILIAN AUSTIN ROBINSON, M.D. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

THE SILVER LIBRARY.

THREE NEW VOLUMES.

SELECTIONS FROM THE WRITINGS OF LORD MACAULAY:

Edited, with Occasional Notes, by the Right Hon. Sir G. O. TREVELYAN, Bart. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

A FARMER'S YEAR: being his Commonplace Book for 1898.

By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 36 Illustrations. Cheaper Reissue. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

STELLA FREGELIUS: a Tale of Three Destinies. By H. Rider

HAGGARD. Cheaper Reissue. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

LONG MANS, GREEN & CO., 39 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.; New York and Bombay.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of
Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with. Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements. Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland. Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Every Day is Publishers' Day in the

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.

TUDOR HOUSE, TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

L & C.
HARDTMUTH'S
KOH-I-NOOR

There are no better pencils made than L. & C. Hardtmuth's Koh-I-Noor. The merit lies in the lead, in the selected wood, and in the workmanship. Using a Koh-I-Noor is like drawing silk over the paper—so smooth.

KOH-I-NOOR PENCILS

are economical, reliable, and satisfactory. One Koh-I-Noor will outlast six ordinary pencils. Price 4d. each, 3s. 6d. per dozen, everywhere. Of Stationers, Photographic Dealers, etc. HARDTMUTH, 12 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

IS YOUR PENCIL A
KOH-I-NOOR OR ONLY AN IMITATION?

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

"J G" PENS.

Do you like a Stub Pen? The "J G." is perfect for all who use a broad-pointed pen. Far better than the ordinary "J" or any other broad-pointed pen. It has a smooth and easy action, due entirely to its special quality.

"J G's" are 2s. 6d. a gross black; 3s. 6d. a gross gth.

Joseph Gillott's Pens in Sixpenny or Gross Boxes, of Stationers etc. Sample Card of Pens free on receipt of address and penny stamp (postage). Sample Box of Thirty Pens, assorted for testing, Seven Stamps.—JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS, 37 Gracechurch Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

WITH ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1768

FEBRUARY 17, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING.
Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND ABROAD. SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

SPA, BELGIUM, PENSIONNAT DE DEMOISELLES; Principal, MADAME LECOQ. References in England. Pupil speaking English one hour daily can be received for half-fees.

OAKHAM SCHOOL (Rutland).

A small well-endowed Public School with numerous Exhibitions to the Universities.

The alterations and additions, which are now complete, make the buildings exceptionally good.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.
For particulars apply to the Headmaster.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—A. B., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

DR. K. FEYERABEND, PROFESSOR at the State College, Coethen (Germany), receives one or two English gentlemen. Refined home. Best German, Classics, etc. Polytechnic in the Town.

LADY SECRETARY (24) seeks situation, Literary Work; fully experienced; can control Correspondence. Good Writer and Shorthand Typist. Excellent references.—C.W., c/o ACADEMY Office.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. MOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BERTRAM DOBELL
SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,

77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.

A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

MURRAY'S HANDBOOK TO THE CATHEDRALS OF ENGLAND AND WALES, 7 vols., post 8vo, white cloth, profusely illustrated; published at £5 9s., for 50s., as new.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS.

All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London,

MORLEY, LIFE OF GLADSTONE, 1st edition, 3 vols., new and uncut, 30s.; Ruskin's Letters to M. and H. G., privately printed, 25s.—Apply Miss WARD, Belmont, Exeter.

SOWERBY'S BOTANY, Last Edition, with Supplement, Edited by Syme; Life-size Drawing, hand-coloured, of every British Plant. Bound in 1 morocco; published £29 net. for £16.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

Art

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water-colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

FAMILY PORTRAITS, PICTURES, and MINIATURES Copied in Oil or Water-Colours, or Etched on Copper.—H. GOFFEY, 3 The Studios, Melbourn Road, Bushey, Herts.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOR, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts), Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French. German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

AUTHORS' MSS., NOVELS, STORIES, PLAYS, ESSAYS TYPE-WRITTEN with complete accuracy, 9d. per 1000 words. References to well-known writers. Carbon copies a speciality.—M. STUART, Thirlbank, Roxborough Road, Harrow.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

DINNIS v. HENNIKER HEATON, M.P.
Wanted a Copy of a Pamphlet, 16 pages 4to, addressed by R. Dinns to the Chairman of the Canterbury Conservative Association, July 1889.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

CAMBRIAN QUARTERLY MAGAZINE, 5 vols. Jones's History of Breconshire. Last Chronicles of Basset.—Lloyd & Townsend, Dillwyn Book Mart, Swansea.

DR. WEYMOUTH'S NEW TESTAMENT, WITH NOTES.

Oxford India paper, gilt edges, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; blue leather (for presents), 5s. net. Ordinary paper, cloth, gilt top, 2s. 6d. net; blue leather, gilt edges, 4s. net.

THE NEW TESTAMENT IN MODERN SPEECH.

By the late

R. F. WEYMOUTH, M.A., D.Lit.

Edited by

E. HAMPDEN-COOK, M.A., Sandbach.

"By far the best of its kind."—PRINCIPAL SALMOND.
"Reverent, scholarly."—DR. CAMPBELL MORGAN.

LONDON: J. CLARKE & CO.
NEW YORK: BAKER & TAYLOR

MACMILLAN & Co's NEW BOOKS

MEMOIRS OF ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

By SEVEN FRIENDS.
Edited by E. G. SANDFORD,
Archdeacon of Exeter.
With Photogravure and other Illustrations.
In 2 vols., 8vo, 36s. net.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

BY
WINSTON SPENCER CHURCHILL, M.P.
With Portraits. In 2 vols. demy 8vo, 36s. net.

H. FIELDING HALL'S NEW BOOK.

A PEOPLE AT SCHOOL.

8vo, 10s. net.

VOLUME II. OF THE NEW EDITION. GROVE'S DICTIONARY of MUSIC and MUSICIANS.

Edited by
J. A. FULLER MAITLAND, M.A., F.S.A.
In Five Volumes, Vol. II., F—L, 8vo, 21s. net.
*.* Previously Published, Vol. I., A—E, 21s. net.

Second Part Now Ready.

THE DYNASTS.

A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars, in 3 Parts, 19 Acts, 130 Scenes.

By THOMAS HARDY.

PART SECOND. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

*.* Previously published, Part I. 4s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION.

THE FOUNDERS OF GEOLOGY.

BY
Sir ARCHIBALD GEIKIE, F.R.S., D.C.L., D.Sc.
8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LOGGAN.

CANTABRIGIA ILLUSTRATA.

By DAVID LOGGAN.
(First published in 1690.)

A Series of Views of the University and Colleges and of Eton College.

Edited, with a Life of Loggan, an Introduction and Historical and Descriptive Notes by

J. W. CLARK, M.A., F.S.A.,
Registrary of the University of Cambridge.

A Reproduction in Folio, the scarce Portrait of the Duke of Somerset in Photogravure, the Centre Section of Hamond's Map of 1592.

Price £2 2s. net; or in morocco extra, £5 5s. net.

The Provost of King's (Dr. M. R. JAMES) in the CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.—"What the Registrary has added from the treasure of his own knowledge is, like all his work, lucid, concise, relevant, and thoroughly helpful. . . . To sum up, we have nothing but praise for the book, pictures and text alike."

ATHENÆUM.—"Even the great task of giving to the world in 1885 the 'Architectural History of Cambridge' of his uncle, the late Prof. Willis, is scarcely a more important service than the publication of Loggan's 'Cantabrigia Illustrata.'"

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

T. Fisher Unwin's New Books.

RECREATIONS OF A NATURALIST.

By J. E. HARTING, Author of "Handbook of British Birds," etc. With 84 Illustrations.
Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Deals with Shooting, Fishing, Hawking, Deer-stalking, "The Migration of the Woodcock," "The Growth of Antlers,"
"The Ways of Grouse," "Decoys," "Deer-leaps,"
"Swan-upping" etc, etc.

THE HISTORY OF CO-OPERATION.

By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. Illustrated.
Two Volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s.

"A most valuable contribution, not merely to the history of an economic movement, but to an understanding of the wider spirit of English Radicalism in the nineteenth century."
DAILY CHRONICLE.

BOSSISM AND MONOPOLY.

By T. C. SPELLING.

Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A luminous account, by a competent economist, of that system of trusts and monopolies which forms one of the most pressing public dangers in the United States and threatens to invade European countries.

THE CITY: THE HOPE OF DEMOCRACY.

By FREDERIC C. HOWE.

Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

A survey of the whole field of municipal life, based upon personal administrative experience and a thorough study of the conditions which prevail in the large towns of Great Britain and the United States.

"ASKING FOR MORE."

Fanny
Lambert.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. 6s.

"The characters are at once so comic and so natural and there are so many strokes of a light and lively humour by the way, that the book seems over almost as soon as begun. It will leave most readers asking for more."—SCOTSMAN.

A Dazzling Reprobate.

By W. R. H. TROWBRIDGE. 6s.

"We move in an atmosphere of 'dazzling' social distinction.
We listen to brilliant epigram and rhetorical talk, and the illusion starts with the very first sentence."—TIMES.

"A SAFE CURE."

Lady Noggs
Peeress.

By EDGAR JEPSON. 6s. (Second Impression.)

"The book is full of real humour, laid on with a light and skilful touch, and may be recommended as a safe cure for the heaviest depression that even fogs or elections can bring about."—EVENING STANDARD.

The Threshing Floor.

By J. S. FLETCHER. 6s. [Just out.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi-terrace, W.C.

SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & CO.

NOW READY.

The Public Schools Yearbook for 1906.

SEVENTEENTH YEAR OF ISSUE.

2s. 6d. net; post free, 2s. 10d.

Greatly Enlarged. It contains an important article on "Military Efficiency in Public and Preparatory Schools," with an Introductory Letter from Field-Marshal Earl Roberts, V.C., K.G. The article is based on special questions drawn up for the Editor of "The Public Schools Yearbook" by Lord Roberts. Revised General List of Preparatory Schools, rearranged in Geographical order.

Special Articles: "HOW TO BECOME A BARRISTER OR SOLICITOR" and "HOW TO ENTER HOLY ORDERS."

The Oxford Yearbook and Directory.

5s. net.

The Cambridge Year- book and Directory.

5s. net.

FOURTH ANNUAL ISSUE, 1906.

The Schoolmasters' Yearbook.

6s. net.

A FEW SPECIAL FEATURES OF THE FOURTH ISSUE.

Review of the Year. Directory of Secondary Schoolmasters. Full Information of Education
Committees. List of Secondary Schools.
Many Reviews of Educational Books of the Year.

DICTIONARY OF INDIAN BIO-

GRAPHY. From 1750 to the Present Day. Containing Short Lives of more than 2000 European, Persian, European and Native—connected with India. By C. E. BUCK-LAND, C.I.E. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d.

THE FUNCTION OF WORDS.

A Guide to Analysis and Parsing. By M. C. CARMAN,
B.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

NEW VOLUME OF THE NEW CAMPAIGN
SERIES. NOW READY.

THE RUSSO-TURKISH CAM-

PAIGN, 1877. By Major F. MAURICE, P.S.C. (the Sherwood Foresters). Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE RESTORATION OF THE

GILD SYSTEM. By ARTHUR J. PENNY. Crown 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.

THE STUDENT'S HYGIENE.

By ERNEST EVANS, of the Technical School, Burnley.
Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

TEKEL: a Study of Educational

PROBLEMS OF THE DAY. By FRANK J. ADKINS,
M.A. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

"The book will be found well worthy of perusal by the special class for whom it is intended."—SCOTSMAN.

"Contains much useful matter."—SPEAKER.

PRACTICAL HOUSEWIFERY.

By C. F. PICTON-GADSDEN, Domestic Economy Teacher
L.C.C. School. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

By RAMSDEN BALMFORTH,
Author of "Some Social and Political Pioneers," etc.

THE BIBLE

IN THE LIGHT OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM.

Vol. I.—THE OLD TESTAMENT.

Vol. II.—THE NEW TESTAMENT.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

NEW NOVELS.

THE STORY OF STELLA. By

S. B. McLEAN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

OAK FARM. By GEORGIE MARTIN.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & CO., Ltd, London.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . . . .	155	Fiction . . . . .	160
Literature:		Fine Art:
Archbishop Temple . . . . .	157	The French Primitives . . . . .	161
The First Gentleman of Greece . . . . .	158	Music:
Patelin . . . . .	158	The Oxford History of
Literary Causerie:		Music—II. . . . .	162
De Quincey and the "Grand		Forthcoming Books . . . . .	163
Style" . . . . .	159	Correspondence . . . . .	163
Heinrich Heine . . . . .	160	Books Received . . . . .	164
The Bookshelf . . . . .	165

This Number contains an Illustrated Supplement

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

MR. J. W. MACKAIL, who succeeds to the Oxford Professorship of poetry, resembles Matthew Arnold, the most illustrious of his predecessors in the chair, in being a Balliol man and a Civil Servant in the Education Department, in which he is Senior Examiner. He was the third of a remarkable trio of Newdigate prize-winners, his two immediate predecessors in the honour being Oscar Wilde and Sir Rennel Rodd, whose early verses may be compared with his in the back numbers of the defunct "Waifs and Strays." Wilde, of course, was much more a wit than a poet, much more clever than inspired. Rodd and Mackail were far more spontaneous singers, though the former imitated Swinburne, while the latter modelled himself on William Morris. The influence of Matthew Arnold, afterwards to reappear in the work of Mr. Laurence Binyon, was just then in abeyance among Oxford poets.

Mr. Mackail's published works are: a translation of the "Aeneid," the "Eclogues" and "Georgics" into Prose; an edition with translation of select Epigrams from the Greek Anthology; "Biblia Innocentium," in which he told for children the story of the Chosen People before and after the coming of Christ; "The Sayings of the Lord Jesus Christ as recorded by His Four Evangelists"; a University Extension Manual on Latin Literature; a much discussed and not altogether successful Life of William Morris, and a translation of the "Odyssey." He was also one of the three poets who together published two volumes of original poetry, called "Love in Idleness" and "Love's Looking Glass."

No doubt it is largely his duties at the Education Office that have prevented Mr. Mackail from quite fulfilling the high expectations which his Oxford contemporaries formed of him. To them it is a disappointment that he gave up to the translation, whether of Homer, Virgil, or Maeterlinck, talents that seemed destined to win distinction, through work of a more original kind. His translations, however, have always been admirable, though, in reproducing the "Odyssey" in the metre of Omar Khayyam, he was making an experiment fore-ordained to comparative failure, the form not being much more suitable to its purpose than the form of, say, "In Memoriam" or a "Bab Ballad." This matter, however, has already been dealt with in our columns. Mr. Mackail's functions, as professor, will be critical, not constructive, and we can trust him to perform them well, even if it is too much to expect him to be as amusing as Matthew Arnold was when he reviewed the poetical excursions of Francis Newman.

The Professorship was founded in 1708 with the proceeds of a legacy bequeathed for that purpose by Henry Birkhead, who, though he first saw the light near St. Paul's, is perhaps best described as a Latin poet. The Professor is elected for five years, and at the end of that period he may be elected for another five, but no one may occupy the chair for more than a decade. The first successful candidate was the Rev. Joseph Trapp, the supposed author of the epigram about the King, who sent a troop of horse to Oxford but books to Cambridge, and till 1857 all the Professors of Poetry were clergymen. In that year, however, Matthew Arnold was appointed, and it is curious to note that since then they have all been laymen. The duties are not onerous. There is a lecture to be given three times a year, the task of looking over University prize essays, and the delivery of a Latin speech biennially. Residence at Oxford is not compulsory, but on the other hand the emoluments of the Professorship are not great.

In the list of twenty-four professors there are many well-known names. Thus, for instance, among the clergymen we find Thomas Warton, Edward Copleston, Milman and Keble. Matthew Arnold, who objected to being called a Professor and to looking over the poems for the "Newdigate," abandoned the post with regret, and was anxious that Browning should take his place. But Browning, with all his virtues, had this fatal defect, that he was not an Oxford man, although the authorities gave him an honorary degree and did all they could to make him one.

So to Arnold succeeded Sir Francis Doyle, author of perhaps the best description of a horse-race that has ever been written in English verse. After Doyle came Shairp. Shairp, whose voice was weak, was by no means an ideal lecturer, but he could keep his temper, as he showed once when he was delivering his Latin speech at the Encaenia. A group of tormentors proved especially active, until the Professor turned round and shook his fist at them, whereupon they cheered him and relapsed into silence. Shairp was succeeded by Palgrave, and Palgrave by Courthope, Courthope by Bradley, and Bradley is succeeded by Mackail.

One of the Professor's duties is to suggest textual improvements to the winner of the Newdigate. The amendments proposed are usually accepted with gratitude; but there have been exceptions to the rule. Shairp suggested many improvements in Oscar Wilde's "Ravenna." Wilde listened to all the suggestions with courtesy and even took notes of them, but he went away and printed the poem without making a single alteration in it.

Two or three tiny booklets, not too large to go into the waistcoat pocket, are lying on the table before us at this moment; they are issued by Mr. George Allen, the publisher of the works of Ruskin, and are called "Ruskin Treasuries," the object apparently being to divide up the wisdom of the revered prophet into homœopathic doses. To glance over them sets the mind wondering what the real place of Ruskin is likely to be in literary history. As far as we can judge, much of what he wrote is dead already; on architecture, for instance, he would not nowadays be quoted as an authority. In literature, though he made many shrewd and piercing observations, the general trend of his thought is not in sympathy with the best thinking of our own day, and even on art he speaks to a much divided audience. Perhaps what he is most read for is the study of the exquisite, yet concealed art by which he could string words into sentences that were like pearls.

Yet those who dismiss Ruskin on these grounds are unjust to one who did a great work in his day. It cannot be forgotten that he came to manhood at a time when England, slowly recovering from the effects of a prolonged continental war, was, it is true, full of virility and energy, but was utterly disregarding of those things concerning which it is said they are more than bread. The early Victorian men and women possessed very little taste in dress, in manner, or in anything else. They were, in the words of a mediæval writer, "a rude people," and Ruskin came to them exactly at the right time. He preached to no small purpose the folly of a continued search after money, and the innumerable beauties that lie neglected around us. The little "Treasury," for instance, dealing with women and dress, is full of the wisest advice, and even that which is devoted to wealth contains fewer paradoxes than might have been expected, though far more than the superficial observer would believe is mere paraphrase of "The Wealth of Nations." Take for instance, this passage :

Money is only the written or coined sign of the relative quantities of wealth in each person's possession. All money is a divisible title-deed, of immense importance as an expression of right to property; but absolutely valueless, as property itself.

It would be quite easy to take another side of Ruskin and show how his beliefs, carried to an extreme, lead him into the merest paradox. For example, the well-known peroration to one of the lectures included in "Sesame and Lilies," consists of a question about our young men. He says we send them to College, and teach them to hit a ball with a bat, and to row with an oar, but, he asks, can they plough, can they build, and so forth? At the time the lecture was delivered experiments were being conducted in road-making with the undergraduates, and a great deal of absurdity was being talked about manual labour. It is curious that an intellect so keen as Ruskin's was in some directions should have been so easily imposed upon in others. What earthly good would it do to teach men, whose province in life must be mainly intellectual, to perform the duties of a mason's labourer or a farm-servant?

After more than a quarter of a century, Sir Francis Burnand retires from the editorship of Punch, full of years, honour—and fun. In those twenty-five years he made great changes in the paper. The most important was this, that whereas under his predecessor Punch definitely took sides in politics, under Sir Francis it regarded all parties and persons as subject to the criticism of the little philosopher with the big nose and the hump. That is not to say that the balance was always equally held, and that there were no periods when predilections were noticeable; but, taken as a whole, Punch has not been under Sir Francis Burnand a political partisan. Another great reform he introduced was in the character of the famous Wednesday dinner. Under his rule it lost none of its humour, but the old Bohemianism of the days which Sir Francis himself can remember has given place to temperate jollity and hard work combined.

At the first Punch dinner Sir Francis ever attended—it must be more than forty years ago now—it was Thackeray who proposed the health of "The New Boy"; and his Reminiscences are full of good stories of the paper he has worthily captained for so long. In 1843 "Mokeanna" (with Sir John Gilbert's illustrations) so aptly burlesqued the popular stories in the London Journal that, though Fun made the mistake of refusing it, Mark Lemon was delighted to have it for Punch, and it was followed by the brilliant "Strapmore" (after "Ouida's" "Strathmore") and the "Happy Thoughts," things which may be read with as much delight to-day as when they were new. Sir Francis Burnand was writing farces and burlesques fifty years ago, and he took a large share in the composition of this year's Drury Lane Pantomime. His is truly a green old age.

He has succeeded in the chair by Mr. Owen Seaman, who has a hard task before him to follow in the footsteps of so judicious, energetic and able an editor. The new chief has had practice, however, for he has taken a large share in the conduct of the paper for some time. Mr. Seaman, as his Cambridge record testifies, is a brilliant scholar, and he has a great deal of that cold, Cambridge wit which has made Cambridge always ahead of Oxford in her parodists. He has been a schoolmaster and a Professor of Literature; has written for the National Observer, and been called to Bar. Of his contributions to Punch there is no need to speak.

The death of Mr. Paul Laurence Dunbar, the negro poet, in his thirty-third year, is a real loss, because he had the gift, so rare in his race, of expressing in literary form its simple emotions and its characteristic humour. Both his parents had been slaves, and he did a good deal of work for Eastern editors before they found out that he was black. Then Mr. W. D. Howells discovered him. "Mr. Dunbar," said the great critic, "is the first black man to feel the life of the negro æsthetically and to express it lyrically." No one could call it great poetry, but it is simple and sincere, and it illustrates both the negro's narrative gift and his delight in verbal melody. Mr. Dunbar's long novel, "The Uncalled," which first appeared in Lippincott, exhibits a certain power of character-drawing; it is the story of a man who is compelled to become a clergyman against his will by his adoptive mother. The sadness of the story is relieved by much rich and quaint negro humour. In 1897 Mr. Dunbar was given a post in the National Library at Washington, and in the following year he married Miss Alice Ruth Moore, a school teacher of Brooklyn. He died of consumption, the scourge of his race, who have themselves the most reason to regret him, for he would undoubtedly, if he had lived, played an important, perhaps a decisive, part in interpreting the soul of the negro to the white man.

The Clarendon Press proposes to publish in the autumn the literary remains of the late Professor York Powell, prefaced by a selection from his letters and a memoir. A final appeal for biographical material, and for the loan of letters, is made by the editor, Professor Oliver Elton, to whom communications should be addressed at 35 Parkfield Road, Liverpool.

Society of Arts, John Street, Adelphi. Arrangements for week ending February 24: Monday, February 19, at 8 P.M., Cantor Lectures: "Modern Warships," by Sir William White, K.C.B., F.R.S. (five lectures); Lecture IV. —Recent types of warships, British and Foreign—Battle-ships—Armoured and protected cruisers—Scouts—Torpedo-boats and destroyers—Submarines. Tuesday, February 20, at 8 P.M.: Applied Art Section: "Illuminated Manuscripts." By H. Yates Thompson, F.S.A. The Hon. John Fortescue, King's Librarian at Windsor Castle, will preside. Wednesday, February 21, at 8 P.M.: Ordinary meeting—"The Fisheries of the North Sea," by Walter Garstang, M.A. Edwin Ray Lankester, M.A., LL.D., F.R.S., will preside.

The Musical Association. The fourth meeting will be held at 5.15 P.M., on Monday, February 19, at the King's Hall, Messrs. Broadwood and Son's, Conduit Street, W., when a paper will be read by Edward J. Dent, Esq., M.A., Mus.B., on "Leonardo Leo." Visitors can be admitted personally or by order.

The Institution of Electrical Engineers. Meeting at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W. On Thursday, February 22, Ordinary General Meeting at 8 P.M. "Crane Motors and Controllers," by Claude W. Hill, Member.

LITERATURE

ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE

Memoirs of Archbishop Temple. By Seven Friends. Edited by E. G. SANDFORD. In two volumes. (Macmillan, 36s. net.)

ON the first blush it would not appear that biography by syndicate is likely to be very successful. When a great man dies it is of the utmost advantage that information concerning him should be collected from a variety of sources, so that the light may ultimately beat upon him from every side. Yet it cannot be too strongly stated that the collection of documents and evidence is not biography. After a hearing has been given to any one who has anything to say, the final portrait must, if it is to be a work of art, be done by a single pair of hands and show the figure as conceived in an individual mind. Another line of thought to which this book naturally gives rise, refers to the part in public life played by a great churchman. Within the circle of his friends it must inevitably seem greater and more important than it is to that larger public which has no intimate bonds with him but already has affixed to his character and work their historical value. The largest circle of friends (and few could have exceeded that which belonged to the late Archbishop Temple) is ever a dwindling quantity, and the new generations that arise must perforce look at a character from a distance. That detached view comes somewhat into antagonism with the very intimate view presented in this biography. The seven contributors, as well as the editor, have perhaps been too industrious. They have, no doubt, given the salient features of Archbishop Temple's life, but they have also added many that are insignificant, and the two large volumes would, if they had been boiled down into one, have presented a biography more likely to endure. Archbishop Temple's life was certainly noble and a fine one to write. Truth, honour, and integrity are stamped on every act of it, yet the final result is a somewhat surprising one, causing us to wonder less that the Church of England for the last generation or two has somewhat lagged behind the thought of the day. In an inimitable passage Thomas Carlyle has shown the worth and sterling character of her bishops, yet he felt as keenly as any one of his generation that they followed and administered rather than led, and we feel somehow that Archbishop Temple was never in the depths of the national wave. Thought, during his lifetime, in the very regions wherein he dwelt, was struggling to expand, but his own temperament prevented him from getting into full sympathy with it. This is a kind of statement that can only be established by a study of his character somewhat more judicious than could be expected from his intimate friends. Besides, they pay more attention to events in his history than to the apparently trivial but vivid details that are most eloquent of character.

The biography opens with that "ell of pedigree" which Sir Walter Scott said was essential to biography. The stock from which Temple came might very well have yielded anything. On his paternal side he came from the Temple family who figure in the annals of Berwick-on-Tweed. One of them became a friend and crony of Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson. Says the Rev. J. H. Wilson:

Over the portico of the Town Hall of Berwick-on-Tweed still appear the words, "Finished 1754, William Temple, Esq., Mayor."

These Temples had been strong Presbyterians in the eighteenth century. When it was said that Temple might be described as "granite on fire," "it is," says one of his biographers, "in his father's family that we shall find the 'fire,' and in the mother's the 'granite.'" His mother was a Miss Dorcas Carveth, a Cornish lady. She lived until 1866 and died at the schoolhouse at Rugby, a beautiful and interesting old lady if we may judge from the charming picture called "Mother and Son" which serves as a frontispiece to the biography. The marriage of Dorcas to young Temple was not an alliance very pleasing to the Western family, who did not like soldiers. "I will have no soldiers in my family" is a saying attributed to Mr. Carveth.

Frederick Temple was born in the Ionian Isles and was the thirteenth of fifteen children, of whom eight grew up. We cannot examine all the minute details of this biography, but here and there we get a glimpse that helps us in the end to form a trustworthy picture of Frederick Temple. At the age of twelve he was sent to Blundell's school at Tiverton, where he had as companion Richard Blackmore, afterwards the author of "Lorna Doone." The various letters describing his life at this period mostly refer to him as the best of good boys, but the following passage gives a clue to a welcome element of boyishness in his character:

We get the impression of a thorough schoolboy, a delightful companion, most loyal to his school, absolutely trustworthy in all great matters, but not above, or shall we say below, getting into small scrapes. On one occasion the headmaster said to him, "Temple, I do believe you are the most impudent boy that ever lived. I really must teach you to restrain your spirits."

For the rest, the biographer of this part of his life seems too intent upon using it as a means of casting a light upon educational problems that later were to come under discussion. From school Temple passed on to Balliol College, Oxford, where he formed many early friendships, while among others was that of Jowett. In a communication from the Master of Balliol we get the following passage which helps us to picture him as an undergraduate:

I have seldom, if ever, known any one like him. He came up to Oxford a lad from the country who had very little experience of life; but he at once made his mark and won the respect of his fellows. His perseverance and self-denial were extraordinary. That he might not be a burden to his friends, he used to practise a rather severe economy. He would sit without a fire in the depth of winter. No one laughed at this; his kind and genial ways gained the good-will of us all. I remember a jest of some Balliol men, which shows what was thought of him. They made a Tripos of the men in the College who were distinguished, not for their learning, but for their good manners; your brother was unanimously voted a first-class. He was always liberal and generous, as he continued to be through life. It could not be said of him that he had not got the chill of poverty out of his bones, for he never had it in him.

Jowett can scarcely fail to be interesting under any circumstances, yet it seems to us that the following very simple account of Temple's home-coming in vacation time tells us more than almost anything else that is narrated in the volume:

In the vacations he used to come home, sometimes arriving by the coach at two o'clock in the morning, wheeling his portmanteau in a wheel-barrow. He roused us with extraordinary calls, and I can still see him sitting on his mother's bed and having some supper, and telling her all that had been done and said. It was like some one coming from an enchanted world, bringing some new book, and talk of men of interest and intellect; it was to us like a taste of Paradise. He had a little slit of a bedroom, with no fire-place, and there he used to study. I remember him swinging on the chair till he wore the carpet into holes, marching up and down the little room till he wore out a track on the carpet. We all respected the study, and heard from below the swing and the stride—a sort of exuberance of strength. He was full of life and vigour and joyousness, and came among us like a fresh breeze.

Passing on in a career that seems scarcely to have had a check, we find a little later that Temple has become a Fellow of Balliol. What sort of teacher he was may perhaps be gleaned from the following anecdote, which would seem to show, amongst other things, that in olden times examiners at Oxford were something of a fraud.

Matthew Arnold got leave, at the last moment, to take in Logic for Responsions, instead of Euclid, which he could never master. The day before the examination he went to Jowett, who was his tutor, and asked how he could learn the subject in time, as he was wholly ignorant of it. Jowett said his only chance was to go to Temple, and see if he would try to teach him in one day. Temple consented; and, starting about nine o'clock in the morning, talked continuously, allowing two pauses of half an hour each for meals, till past two o'clock the next morning. Arnold had been provided with paper, but took no notes. He lay back in his chair with the tips of his fingers together, saying, from time to time, "What wonderful fellows they were!" Soon after two o'clock A.M. Temple sent Arnold away to get some sleep; after which he satisfied the examiners in Logic. He answered every question.

After Balliol, that is to say from 1848-1857, we find Temple employed under the Committee of Council, first as an Examiner in the Education Office, then as Principal of Kneller Hall, and lastly an Inspector of training-schools. Here as elsewhere his life was fine and exemplary, and his work of the solid and useful type. A new phase of existence opened when in 1857 he was appointed Head Master of Rugby, where he was at first met by disapprobation, which was gradually overcome partly by the innate dignity of the man, and partly by his prowess as an athlete, which sometimes expressed itself in very curious acts.

Benson was very fond of taking his guests to see it [a magnificent beech-tree at Wellington College] and took an early opportunity of showing it to Temple. Temple admired it very much, and, after looking at it for some time close at hand and at a distance, cried out to Benson, "I can't resist the temptation—look out!" and before Benson could turn round, Temple had made a rush and a leap, and was scrambling up the bole of the tree. In a few seconds Temple had succeeded in reaching the first stage whence the magnificent limbs diverge in all directions, and was grinning with delight at his success.

From Rugby he passed to the See of Exeter. Gladstone offered him the See in 1869, and the very full account given of his work in the bishopric will be read with keen attention by those interested in ecclesiastical history. Our space is running so short, however, that we can do little more than extract a delicious passage giving an account of the interview between the Bishop and the Prime Minister of the day:

On May 28, 1875, Mr. Disraeli received it [a deputation]. His manner and words were gracious; but an incident which in later years Dr. Temple used to recall with amusement, showed where, for the time, the difficulty lay. The Bishop had travelled up from the neighbourhood of the Land's End, and in order to give some point to his remarks, began as follows:—

"It may give you some idea, sir, of the need for this change if I state that the extremity of my diocese is 140 miles distant from its centre, Exeter, and that, in order to have the opportunity of meeting you this morning, being at present engaged in work near Penzance, I found it necessary to travel all night."

More was to follow; but at once and with great politeness came the remark, "You must be very tired; won't you sit down?" It stopped the flow of the Bishop's eloquence, and, whether intentionally or not, took the wind out of the sails. "I never felt so exquisitely snubbed in my life," the Bishop used to say in telling the story.

How he passed from Exeter to London and then to Canterbury is all recent and familiar history. We think the clue to the character of Temple is given in a letter which Jowett wrote to Miss Temple:

He was quite free from vanity, and never seemed to think about himself: a little brusque perhaps, and not always understanding what a friend felt or said, because he had no similar susceptibilities himself. I remember nothing which he said or did during his undergraduate career at Oxford which was foolish or weak or wrong.

The blamelessness and beauty and purity of his life are beyond all question, yet his appears to have been a self-concentrated mind that did not readily go out to the streams of tendency of his contemporaries. He was a force in the Church, but his biography causes us to wonder whether ever again in the history of England it will be found that an Archbishop has taken such a prominent part in moulding and leading thought as did Carlyle in one region, Darwin in another, and Gladstone in politics during his lifetime.

THE FIRST GENTLEMAN OF GREECE

Alcibiades: a Tale of the Great Athenian War. By C. H. BROMBY. (Clifton: Baker.)

THIS remarkable book is not ornamented or defaced by any references, foot-notes, appendices or indices, but runs on from the first paragraph to the last, placid and drowsy as a summer's day. Happy is the historian who is so confident of the justice and finality of his point of view, that he can offer to the public his own opinion in a form as self-sufficient and in a style as light-hearted as if he were writing a novel of contemporary life. The author's intention was not, we presume, to appeal to scholars and specialists, but to that portion of the reading world which derives pleasure from the perusal of "Popular Educators" and handbooks of literature—to sentimental and half-educated readers, who rejoice to see a subject for experts treated in the style of a halfpenny novelette by a writer who is not above their heads, and is not sufficiently careful to be dull. Mr. Bromby lays great stress on those incidents in the life of Alcibiades which to the historian are unimportant, to the philosopher trivial, and therefore supremely attractive to the man in the street. The figure of Alcibiades, as it has passed into history, is not that of a handsome youth with a purple robe and carefully curled locks; it is that of a leader of the people who exercised a paramount influence upon Athens at the most critical time of her existence. Yet it is precisely the purple robe, the gentility of his hero, which has made the greatest impression on our author.

We are first introduced to Alcibiades as a boy, leaning out of the window of "one of the noblest houses in Athens." Nothing really depends upon his being in this attitude; he leans out of the window that we may see him and reflect that "his earliest memory was of a high-born gentleman," his father Clinias. During his boyhood he gave abundant proof of his gentility: he was "impatient at the stupidity of other boys . . . and apt to show a proud contempt for those he held to be the meaner sort" (the sentiment deserves the "blank verse"); and we are expressly told that, as he grew up, his expression became "more disdainful." By the time he reached maturity he had contracted all the polite vices of his class to an eminent degree; but "he lived so long ago, you see"—and this side of his life is passed over in decorous haste. And that is as it should be; for one of the differences between a gentleman and a common man is that the vices of the latter are exposed in the police-court and punished by law, while those of his betters are paid for, either by the offender or by his relations, and hushed up. It was this aristocratic bearing, combined with his "prescient foresight" (probably the most useful kind of foresight) of how the course of events would run, which carried Alcibiades triumphantly through the first part of his active life, until that day on which his nobility was insulted by the unexpected arrival of the Salaminia in the harbour of Catane. His manners in the trying interview which then took place were, as usual, perfect. But although he bowed politely, "something in the Eastern fashion," when the captain "with something strange about his manner" had delivered the message from the Athenians, he was naturally not going to give himself up to a democracy which was not worthy of him. At a port of call on the homeward voyage he made his escape, in the most gentlemanly manner possible, by stealing away with his friends from a banquet at which all those who were not "in the know" had been made drunk. It now remained to be found out what state was worthy of him. The quest, though consisting largely in a series of splendid receptions, gorgeous entertainments and intellectual and warlike victories, entailed a good many hardships and ended unsatisfactorily. He tried first Sparta, then again Athens, then various tribes of Northern savages. Last of all he determined on offering himself to the Great King, and, while resting in a small village in Phrygia on his way to the Persian capital, he was ingloriously murdered. Yet to the last his gentility did not desert him; for his biographer definitely states that on his face after death "the old exceeding loveliness, the high-bred dignity remained, and was as splendidly conspicuous as ever."

PATELIN

The Farce of Master Pierre Patelin. Englished by RICHARD HOLBROOK. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin; Cambridge, U.S.A.: The Riverside Press, $2 net.)

SOME months ago we criticised a feeble translation of an early eighteenth-century adaptation—Brueys's L'Avocat Patelin—of the oldest and most famous farce in the world.

We have now the pleasure of calling attention to a scholarly and vigorous translation of the original farce, Maitre Pierre Patelin. Dr. Holbrook writes from the Department of Romance Languages, Columbia University, and his book is a fine specimen of the scholarship of his country. It is not long since Professor Tyrrell, reviewing in the ACADEMY Mr. Lowe's "Cena Trimalchionis," called attention to the spirited translation of Petronius's work by Professor Peek, a member of the same University as Dr. Holbrook; and a like commendation would apply to the book before us. The translation is, like the original, idiomatic and rollicking. Its author catches the lights and shades; he sees and renders all the humour. He is, at times, it is true, a little stilted. "With whom do you fancy you are playing?" says Patelin to the shepherd. . . . "By the way he mutters," says Guillemette, "one might suppose he was losing his mind:" when "Who d'you think you're playing with?" and "you'd think he was going off his head" are the phrases which Dr. Holbrook, had he drawn a little further from his first thoughts, would undoubtedly have used. He has overcome (or evaded?) the difficulty of translating Patelin's ravings in Norman, Breton, and other dialects, by leaving them untranslated, pleading with some justice that they will mean quite or very nearly as much to the modern reader as they did to the original hearers, and that the translation of them into English dialects would have necessitated the writing of the whole farce in an English setting.

The translation, as a whole, justifies us in saying that now, at last, and for the first time, English readers have an opportunity of gaining a just idea of what this famous play was like. The difficulties of the task only one who has attempted it could fairly realise. Slangy fifteenth-century French is not the easiest of tongues to translate, and often the rendering of one little sentence must have meant hours of searching among the (mainly useless) dictionaries, and among the commentators, Génin, Nyrop, Lacroix and others. For his text Dr. Holbrook has gone straight to the Le Roy edition of (?) 1486, adopting one reading from the only fifteenth-century manuscript in existence. He has studied the actuality of the play, as a play, by seeing Fournier's version performed at the Française, and he has most appropriately adorned his handsome book with reproductions of the six wood-cuts made for Levet's edition of (?) 1490.

It is usual to describe Maitre Pierre Patelin as the first farce; but the nomenclature is difficult. If this play is a farce at all, then it cannot be denied, we think, that Adam de la Halle's two plays are earlier farces than this. Thus, by calling it a farce, we distinguish it both from the moralities and from the satirical and political sotties, but we fail to mark its distinctive features. It would be better, perhaps, to drop the clumsy mediæval nomenclature and call the play boldly the first Comedy. For that is what it is. Patelin is the first comedy of manners, and its influence can be traced right away through such plays as Les précieuses ridicules, the plays of Dancourt, of Picart and of Labiche, down to the modern French comedy of manners. Farces proper in the fifteenth century were much shorter than this; they were merely anecdotal, and motive was not carefully studied; the anonymous, unprofessional author of Patelin threw off a play, a comedy of manners, which, with some exaggeration and some absurdity, but with the vivid verisimilitude that only genius could give, showed the people of the day their own life, and so established a type which remained unaffected by the classical revival and perseveres to the present time.

There was never, perhaps, so popular a story as this of the rogue lawyer who cheats the draper of six ells of cloth, shams ill—with a mad-scene—to avoid payment, turns up smiling to defend the draper's thieving shepherd in court, to the draper's utter bewilderment, and finally himself gets cheated of his fee by his simple client. It is a tale of rogues. Every character in it is a rogue, and the morality of the play is of the lowest. But it is a storehouse of information on the manners and customs of the day; it is packed with phrases that have become proverbial. Rabelais loved it and quoted it over and over again; but it was not Rabelais who introduced it to England. An attempt has been made to derive it from what Mr. Alfred Pollard has called the first English comedy, the story of Mak in the Towneley Mysteries ("Secunda Pastorum"); but the stories bear very little resemblance to each other, and sheep-stealing must have been too common in both countries for an English origin to be demanded. Early in the sixteenth century we find the story in "A Hundred Merry Tales and Quick Answers." Lyons's version of it, produced at the Haymarket in 1787, under the title of The Village Lawyer was referred to in these columns (ACADEMY, April 22, 1905) on a previous occasion; and Dr. Holbrook mentions the amusing case of an American version by Maffitt played by a "negro" minstrel troupe in New York in 1863.

Dr. Holbrook's notes are full of interesting matter elucidating the references to daily life in the play, and we offer him our congratulations on an important and difficult piece of work well done.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

DE QUINCEY AND THE "GRAND STYLE"

"If once a man indulges himself in murder, very soon he comes to think little of robbing; and from robbing he comes next to drinking and sabbath-breaking, and from that to incivility and procrastination." I think I would rather be able to spend a day in the company of the man who wrote that sentence than in the company of any other man who ever lived; and I should want to find him in just the mood that he was in when he wrote it—to provoke him to further discussion of that "unfinished design of Thurtell's for the murder of a man with a pair of dumb-bells, which I admired greatly," that same Thurtell whose "style" (as a murderer) was "as harsh as Albert Dürer and as coarse as Fuseli"—to tempt him on to enlargement on the kind of "a murder that you can recommend to a friend"!

A contemporary biographer has left it on record that "an evening with De Quincey" was counted by each of those few who were ever admitted to that delight as "the highest possible pleasure," not the less enjoyable doubtless because of the difficulty of procuring it; for it could only be arrived at by strategy and subterfuge and carefully premeditated accident.

None the less, though the statement—even the thought—verges close on the sacrilegious, there were times at which one can imagine that he, De Quincey himself, might almost have been a bore. The mere idea is so nearly criminal that one hesitates to put it down in black and white. Let it be printed, if possible, in invisible ink; but the fact remains that De Quincey as a political economist—De Quincey lost in the mazes of speculative philosophy or so nearly lost that none but he himself could follow his trail—De Quincey elucidating and re-elucidating and elucidating again some subtle and half imaginary distinction in the shadow of a shade of difference of meaning between two words—that De Quincey, however he might compel our admiration by the flexibility of his intellect and the inexhaustible resources of his vocabulary, none the less, it is conceivable, as a companion in a tête-à-tête, might have palled. Like all "shy, solitary" thinkers, moreover, he had supreme confidence in his own opinions, which must at times have made him didactic in conversation. Perhaps no other writer was ever quite so cocksure. "The greatest scholar by far that this island ever produced (viz., Richard Bentley) published (as is well known) a quarto volume that in some respects is the very worst quarto volume now extant in the world." Was ever so controversial a statement—a statement controversial in every phrase—placed so immediately and serenely, by mere cocksureness, beyond the bounds of controversy? And he was equally dogmatic, equally certain of himself, whether he laid down the law upon Paley's literary style, upon the policy of the Cæsars or upon the under-vesture of a Hebrew lady. Yet was his judgment not always infallible. "The honours of Coleridge are perennial and will annually grow more verdant; whilst from those of Goethe every generation will see something fall away, until posterity will wonder at the subverted idol whose basis, being hollow and unsound, will leave the worship of their fathers an enigma to their descendants:" a sentence which, by the way, apart from its matter, is in form, perhaps, about the worst that De Quincey ever wrote. Even when one's judgment jumps with his, it is impossible at times not to recoil from his superlatives. We all love Charles Lamb, and with something more of intimate and personal tenderness than we choose to—or perhaps than we dare—extend to any other writer: but was he in truth "the very noblest of human beings"?

And it has always seemed to me one of the incomprehensible tragedies of literature that though De Quincey felt thus towards Charles Lamb (for he undoubtedly means what he says) the two should, at least on two occasions, have failed to "hit it off." But what Ambrosian Night (and Professor Wilson was, De Quincey says, "the only very intimate male friend I have had") could have compared with the encounters between those two (and there must have been many such with none but the gentle Mary Lamb to hear) when each was in the proper vein, De Quincey brimming with whimsicality, and paradox, and lore, and Lamb "chasing syllables with the agility of a cat pursuing its own tail"?

But it is chiefly for the mere splendour of his diction that the masters of language still turn, and for many generations yet will turn, to Thomas De Quincey and call him Master. Some time ago we read not a little in the ACADEMY of "absolute simplicity" as being the one thing most essential to the grand style, "the complete absence of any apparent desire to make an effect." De Quincey stands as a perpetual disproof, not of the truth, but of the adequacy, of that doctrine. In music the very heights of grandeur may be touched by the simplest of themes treated in all simplicity; but is there not also grandeur, if not higher at least equally sublime, in music of another kind, wherein the composer consciously and deliberately in his "desire to make an effect" calls into requisition all his powers of orchestration, combining, blending, harmonising, contrasting, proclaiming with the tongue of every instrument, in every point and phrase, that it is his "desire" to do the thing that he does—to lift his hearers up to heights beyond heights, to pinnacles to which the soul of man can mount only on the wings of music and music the loftiest and most grand? So it is in literature. There are two "grand styles." De Quincey loved "our noble language," as he called it—loved it for its rugged Saxon and still more for the sonorous "dictionary words" (the phrase is his) which were grafted on it from the Norman stock. From youth, almost from infancy, he was peculiarly sensible to the beauty of mere combinations of words, and he has told us how he was affected as a child by "the crashing overture to the grand chapter of Daniel:

Belshazzar the King made a great feast to a thousand of his lords."

It is easy to call them "purple patches;" but the purple is the true Imperial. Read that marvellous vision in the concluding movement of "The English Mail-Coach," or that page of the Opium Dreams which commences: "Then suddenly would come a dream of a far different character—a tumultuous dream—commencing with a music such as I now often heard in sleep—music of preparation and awakening suspense . . . The morning was come of a mighty day—a day of crisis and ultimate hope for human nature, then suffering some mysterious eclipse and labouring in some dread extremity . . . Then like a chorus the passion deepened. Some greater interest was at stake, some mightier cause than ever yet the sword had pleaded or trumpet had proclaimed . . ." but the passage is too well known, and, were it not, it were useless to quote it in fragments. The page must be taken and read. And so long as it remains to be read, I doubt if the doctrine will ever win the acceptance of the majority of good critics that "the absence of any apparent desire to make an effect" is an essential of the grand style in literature any more than it is in music or in painting.

H. PERRY ROBINSON.

[Next week's Causerie will be on "The Endings of Poems," by P.]

HEINRICH HEINE

Died February 17, 1856

POESY'S Proteus and bright paradox,
Whose soul was as the strange, chameleon sea:
A child, a leaping faun, a Titan free,
Dawn, day and sunset shining from thy locks;
Illimitable smile, ruffled with shocks
Of jarring storm, then flash of demon glee,
The light'ning of wit's vivid archery,
Making more black the very black it mocks:

Across thy soul incessantly there swirled
The multitudinous tides of Life—of pain,
Of joy, of tears and laughter, love and hate,
Singing in unison a wild refrain,
The sob of an unalterable fate,
The eternal Dance of Death of the mad world.

HORACE B. SAMUEL.

FICTION

The Healers. By MAARTEN MAARTENS. (Constable, 6s.)

MR. MAARTEN MAARTENS has deserted his sentimental studies for a much graver and wider subject—nothing less than the healing of mind and body. In the book before us he tells, with all his charm of style, his subtle, graceful wit and his astonishing command of our language, a story which suggests all sorts of very deep and important questions. Of the two great schools of medicine, the bacteriological and the hypnotic, the schools of Pasteur and of Charcot, which is the more likely to heal the evils of our body? Has man a soul? If he has, what is it and what relation does it bear to his body? Is there "anything in" spiritism, second sight, table-turning and planchet? Of the two leading forms of Christian faith, the Catholic and the Protestant, which brings the more comfort and support to men and women in their troubles? What is heredity? What, if anything, is hereditary madness, and how can it be affected by logical evidence? Those are some of the questions raised by this very original novel. But we must not give the impression that this is a very dull and learned work. Far from it: the "human interest" is strong, and all the characters are defined and elaborated with the author's old skill. But, after reflection, it is not the human interest that will hold the first place in the minds of readers who have ideas on the questions raised, though they will love most, or all, of Mr. Maartens's people: the learned old Professor Baron Lisse, of Leyden, a kind-hearted vivisectionist, his quaint, feckless poet of a wife, Sir James Graye, the poor idiot boy, who is restored to partial reason only to meet a terrible and pathetic end, and many another in a fine gallery of portraits. "The Healers" is a striking, interesting book, not altogether satisfactory, but one that all should read.

THE ACADEMY

FEBRUARY 17, 1906

ILLUSTRATED SUPPLEMENT

FOUR CENTURIES OF ENGLISH BOOKBINDING

SINCE the exhibition of bookbindings at the Burlington Fine Arts Club fifteen years ago there has been a marked revival of interest in the study of bindings, and several finely illustrated books on the subject have appeared within the last few years. Recently a more practical interest in the subject has resulted in the valuable Report of the Committee of the Society of Arts on Leather for Book-binding (edited for the Society of Arts and the Worshipful Company of Leather-sellers by the Right Hon. Viscount Cobham, Chairman of the Committee, and Sir Henry Truman Wood, M.A., Secretary of the Society; published for the Society of Arts by George Bell and Sons), which will be essential for every craftsman who cares about the durability of his work. Moreover, Miss Maude Nathan has just translated into English M. de Récy's book on the "Decoration of Leather," and has illustrated it with some excellent specimens of old leather-work preserved at South Kensington, and with the beautiful twelfth-century English binding on the Winchester Domesday Book. It is particularly gratifying to note this demand in England for good materials and good models, because no other country in Europe can show a finer series of stamped bindings, the most beautiful of which belong to the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries, a period remarkable for the perfection of its architecture and for the renaissance of the minor arts. Three of the chief centres of binding were at Durham, Winchester, and London. In the Chapter Library at Durham are still preserved some of the magnificently bound manuscripts which once belonged to Hugh Pudsey, the princely baron-bishop and builder of the famous Galilee chapel. On the covers of the Winchester Domesday Book the binders of Winchester have left sufficient record of their skill, and the merit of the London work may be judged from the binding on the Petri Lombardi Sententiae reproduced in the first illustration. If in actual technical execution these bindings are not perfect, the designs are nevertheless nearly always beautiful, especially, as in the present example, where a circular form of decoration is introduced. But it is in the delicacy of the stamps themselves that the early bindings are really pre-eminent. All the stamps on the binding of the Sententiae will repay close study, and will not suffer even if compared with similar designs on Greek coins and gems. Some of the designs on large cathedrals must have been well acquainted with the embroidered fabrics and precious works of art brought back from the East by the Crusaders.

PETRI LOMBARDI SENTENTIAE. A LONDON LATE TWELFTH-CENTURY BINDING

AN OXFORD FIFTEENTH-CENTURY BINDING, BY THEODORIC ROOD AND THOMAS HUNT

these early book-stamps are almost certainly due to foreign influence, and Mr. Weale has supposed that a few are direct imitations of Saracenic work, which is indeed not improbable when it is remembered that workmen in the

The high standard which was reached in the late twelfth and early thirteenth centuries was not long maintained, later binders being content to use inferior copies of the beautiful dies of their predecessors. From the middle of the thirteenth century until the fifteenth very few good stamped bindings were produced. For some reason the growth of monasticism seems, from an artistic point of view, to have been unfavourable to the craft of binding. Monastic manuscripts generally have covers of white leather without any decoration, the plainness being relieved only by an occasional head-band worked in silks of various colours. It is not until the fifteenth century that any really interesting stamped bindings are again met with, and among the best may be placed those of Oxford binders. Mention of binders in Oxford deeds and charters is very frequent from about 1180, so, if mere names count for anything, the demand there for bindings must have been very considerable. No example of an Oxford binding prior to the fifteenth century has up to the present been identified, but the style of decoration on the later bindings is so like twelfth-century work that it is reasonable to assume it to be a direct survival of an older manner, and this view is strengthened by the reappearance of some of the twelfth-century stamps, not perhaps the actual stamps but fairly good copies. These Oxford bindings are more particularly interesting as there happens to be an easy method of identifying them. If a fifteenth-century binding appears to be English and has a number of little pellet-like marks tooled about the borders, especially if arranged in series of three, then it is almost certain that it was executed at Oxford. The three pellets are generally tooled on the leather, but sometimes they are found engraved on the stamps themselves, as on the binding of the Osney Cartulary preserved in the Public Record Office. These same characteristic marks also occurred on a small piece of tooled leather found in Oxford a few years ago by some workmen who were making excavations near the site of the old City Ditch. The fragment was discovered about twelve feet beneath the surface among a quantity of leather chips and tools, which had the appearance of being the rubbish-heap of a fifteenth-century worker in leather. The best known class of Oxford fifteenth-century bindings is that associated with the names of Theodoric Rood and Thomas Hunt, an example of which is given in the second illustration. The stamps on these bindings are all foreign in character, and were almost certainly introduced by Rood, who describes himself as a native of Cologne, in the colophon to Alexander de Hales's Commentary on the De Anima, printed at Oxford in 1481. The arrangement of the stamps, however, in parallel rows is far more English than Continental in style.

From about the year 1500 the history of bookbinding in England is largely a story of foreign influence, Nether-

A SIXTEENTH-CENTURY BINDING EXECUTED FOR THOMAS WOTTON: SHOWING THE INFLUENCE OF GROLIER

landish, Italian, and French styles succeeding each other in turn. The most important contribution of Holland to the craft of bookbinding was the panel-stamp, a large stamp generally measuring about four inches by three, which was particularly suitable for decorating the covers of smaller books. Although panel-stamps had been in use in Holland some years before 1450, they were not common in England until the beginning of the next century. Most of those used by English binders are extremely decorative; a frequent design being some adaptation of the Royal Arms and Tudor rose, while interesting variations are found in John Reynes's ingenious panel, with all the emblems of the Passion represented; Frederick Egmont's device of the wild man, and the Cambridge to have been introduced into England by Thomas Berthelet, who was appointed King's Printer in 1530. Most of these bindings are very Italian in character, and in one of Berthelet's accounts it is specially mentioned that certain books have been bound in the Italian and Venetian manners. On the whole the execution of the so-called "Berthelet" bindings is very unequal: doubtless many are to be attributed to his workmen, some of whom may have been Frenchmen. At this period, while English binders were merely experimenting with foreign styles, bookbinding in Italy and France was in its perfection. In France were being produced for Jean Grolier, perhaps by Italian workmen, those remarkable bindings, excellent alike in design and execution, which have made Grolier's name more famous than any other in the annals of book-collecting. Such bindings naturally found many imitators, nor have they yet ceased to be an influence (and a snare) to binders of the present day. In England the counterpart of Grolier's bindings is to be found in those executed for Thomas Wotton, the father of Sir Henry Wotton, a man well known for his modesty and hospitality, as Isaak Walton tells us. Thomas Wotton probably employed foreign workmen, who showed themselves, however, far less skilful than their French contemporaries. As a matter of fact the binding here reproduced looks much better in the illustration than in the original, owing to the unequal quality of the gilding. In one class of binding, namely the embroidered variety, England was far ahead of foreign countries. Some of the finest examples are on books presented to Queen Elizabeth, notable specimens being the copy of Bishop Parker's "De antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ" in the British Museum, and the far more beautiful Bible presented to the Queen on New Year's Day 1584, now in the Bodleian Library.

Queen Elizabeth showed a marked preference for these sumptuously embroidered book-covers. There are two or three in existence which have been thought, with some probability, to be the work of her own hands. One such binding in the Bodleian, which has long been attributed to the Queen, is of black velvet decorated with a design worked in a kind of silver cord.

The last illustration carries us somewhat beyond the four centuries, but the binding is given because it shows one of the styles which finally obtained in England at the close of the sixteenth century, and also because it is one of the few known bindings which bear the crest of Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam. This particular volume is preserved in the Selden collection at Oxford, and was probably a gift to John Selden from Bacon himself, who, in his later and troublous years, sought the great jurist's friendship and advice.

STRICKLAND GIBSON.

A LATE SIXTEENTH-CENTURY BINDING IN THE SELDEN COLLECTION AT OXFORD: BEARING THE CREST OF LORD BACON

binder Speryng's panel with St. Nicholas raising to life the three pickled children.

The art of tooling in gold reached England rather late. By the end of the fifteenth century Italian binders had already attained considerable proficiency in this art, the style gradually spreading northwards through France to England. The earliest known English binding in gilt is on the copy of Whitinton's Epigrams presented by the author to Cardinal Wolsey, the decoration consisting of three large narrow panels entirely worked in gold. The art of decorating a book-cover in gold with small tools seems

COLOPHONS

ONE among several points for which the managers of the Doves Press deserve special praise is that they have restored the use of the Colophon without (as Morris did) reducing the title-page to a mere label. Their fine Bible ("The English Bible containing the Old Testament & the New," The Doves Press, No. 1, The Terrace, Hammersmith) —one of the very finest pieces of printing ever executed—

By this combination of title-page and colophon the reader gets all the information he needs at both ends of the book, while the colophon performs its proper function of expressing the printer's pride in his work and desire to be remembered by it. How much personal feeling can be put into a colophon (and what decorative effect, we must add, may be obtained from the use of a printer's device,

¶ Here ben endyd the Cronycles of the Reame of Englonde with their apperteignances. Enprentyd in the Duchye of Braband in the towne of Andewarpe in the yere of our lord .M.cccc.xciij. By maistir Gerard de leew. a man of grete wysedom in all maner of künynge: whych nowe is come from lyfe vnto the deth/which is grete harme for many a poure man. On whos soule god almyghty for hys hygh grace haue mercy

H M E A

COLOPHON TO "THE CHRONICLES OF ENGLAND," PRINTED BY GERARD LEEU, OF ANTWERP, 1493

bears on the front of its volumes the title-page, part of which we give below. But it also has the full colophon:

Printed by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson and Emery Walker at the Doves Press No. 1 The Terrace Hammersmith from the Text of the late Dr. Scrivener's Paragraph Bible by permission of the Syndics of the University Press Cambridge. The verse has been divided into stanzas by T. J. Cobden-Sanderson and the proofs have been read by The University Press. Compositors: J. H. Mason, J. Guttridge, C. F. Greengrass. Pressmen: H. Gage-Cole, J. Ryan, T. Waller, A. Beaumont. Finished October 19 1904. Sold at the Doves Press, and by C. J. Clay and Sons, The Cambridge University Press Warehouse, London.

which the Doves Press eschews) can be seen from the end of the last of the four books printed by Gerard Leeu of Antwerp for the English market. While it was in progress Leeu was killed in a quarrel with one of his workmen. His other men finished the book, and when the last page was reached added the Colophon with Leeu's mark to it, which we give on this page:

Here ben endyd the Cronycles of the Reame of Englonde with their apperteignances. Enprentyd in the Duchye of Braband in the towne of Andewarpe in the yere of our Lord M. cccc. xciij. By Maistir

Gerard de leew, a man of grete wysedome in all maner of kunnyng : whych nowe is come from lyfe unto the deth, which is grete harme for many a poure man. On whos sowle God almyghty for hys hygh grace haue mercy. Amen.

Had such an accident happened even a hundred years later it would have left no mark on the book, save that the imprint might have run with formal correctness "Printed in the house late Gerard Leeu's" or "by the Heirs of Gerard Leeu." Had it chanced in our own day even the style of the firm would probably have remained unaltered in the single line of type, hidden away on the back of the title-page or of the last leaf, with which the modern printer, however proud of his work, has mostly to be content. In the fifteenth century, even towards the close of it, the printer was a personality, entitled by custom, and often willing, to take readers into his confidence.

The right to speak for himself in the book he had printed was derived by the fifteenth-century printer from a similar privilege of the mediæval scribes, though these availed themselves of it with no very great frequency, and, as a rule, only in the form of a line or couplet of very bad Latin verse. In his "Books in Manuscript" Mr. Falconer draws attention to this, as in the colophon to the Breslau missal (see plate, p. 7), which may be translated :

The present missal to the praise and honour of God, in the noble city of Mainz, inventress and first perfectress of this art of printing, by the favour of the God of glory, was printed and finished by Peter Schoeffer of Gernsheim, with his shields as a signature, in the year of the Lord 1483, on the vigil of S. James the Apostle.

In the hands of Johann Schoeffer the glorification of Mainz expands into an epitome of the invention of printing in the form which the Fust and Schoeffer tradition gave to it. It is at the end of his 1515 edition of the Chronicle of Johann Trithem that the younger Schoeffer dilates thus telling us how his grandfather, Johann Fust, in the year 1450 by his own genius began to think out and investigate the art of printing, and two years later with the help of his workman and adoptive son, Peter Schoeffer, and the many necessary developments he made, brought it to the test of practice, and rewarded Schoeffer with the hand of his daughter Christina for his aid.

Obviously this is one-sided history, since all mention of Gutenberg is sedulously suppressed, but it is history which

THE FIRST PRINTED COLOPHON. FROM THE LITURGICAL PSALTER PRINTED AT MAINZ, 1457

Madan classifies such written colophons into expressions of weariness (Hic scriptor cesso scribendo pollice fesso), religious feeling (Sit laus scribenti, sit vita salusque legenti), expectancy (Nunc finem feci: da mihi quod merui), and humour (Nunc scripsi totum: pro Christo da mihi potum), with a single, doubtfully grammatical, expression of malignancy: "Finito libro frangamus ossa magistro"—now the book's done, let us break his bones for the master! The feelings of the first printers, when they ventured to express them, required a much more elaborate form.

The present copy of the Psalms, adorned with the beauty of capital letters and sufficiently marked out with rubrics, has been thus fashioned by an ingenious development of printing and stamping, without any ploughing of the pen. And to the worship of God has been diligently brought to completion by Johann Fust, a citizen of Mainz, and Peter Schoeffer of Gernsheim, in the year of the Lord 1457 on the vigil of the Assumption.

This is the best translation I can give of the first printed colophon (see plate), that from the great liturgical Psalter printed at Mainz in 1457, the first book which gives us any information as to when, where and by whom it was produced. From 1457 onwards comparatively few of Schoeffer's books (Fust seems to have died in 1466) lack a colophon, to mark his pride in his work and in the share which he and his father-in-law had taken in the invention of printing.

In 1462 the partners began to add their printer's device at the end of their colophons, and Schoeffer sometimes has to be reckoned with all the same, and much of our knowledge of the early spread of printing, more especially in Italy, is due to similar confidences on the part of the early printers. Thus when John of Speier died the year after he had introduced the art into Venice, his brother Wendelin contrived in eight hexameters not only to inform his readers that he had taken over the business, but to give the names of the books which John had printed and the size of the editions—one hundred copies. To print some Latin verses in their own praise in the first book they issued seems to have become a kind of etiquette among printers in Italy, and the praise was naturally loudest when the printer could claim that he had introduced the art into a new city, Gerard de Lisa makes this boast in the edition of the "Manuale" of S. Augustine which he printed at Treviso in 1471.

Gloria debetur Girardo maxima Lixae,
Quem genuit campis Flandria picta suis,
Hic Tarvisina nam primus coepit in urbe
Artifici raros aere notare libros.
Quoque magis faueant excelsi numina regis
Aurelii sacrum nunc manuale dedit.

In 1472 we find Petrus Adam glorifying himself on the same ground at Mantua; in 1473 Joannes de Sidriano takes up the tale at Pavia, and the custom continued. These pioneers of printing must sometimes have had no easy time of it. In 1493 one whose very name is lost to us tried to set up a press at Acqui, and used the colophon to his first book to explain that it had been printed "sat incommode," amid enough inconveniences, because the plague that was raging in neighbouring cities prevented him from improving his appliances. Now, however, he had obtained new type and new workmen, and his future books will possess every merit. Alas, that it should have to be recorded that (as far as we know) these future books were never issued.

Pestilence was not the only foe the early printers had to fight. Hardly less obnoxious to them must have been the Unscrupulous Competitor, more especially in the early 'seventies, when half the printers in Italy were turning out editions of the Latin classics as if they possessed a monopoly of them. In 1473 Stephanus Corallus of Lyons was at work at Parma on an edition of the Achilleis of Statius, when news that some rascals were publishing the same book caused him to finish off his text, "citius quam asparagi coquantur" (quicker than asparagus are cooked), editions which they abuse. In a late colophon (1580) an angry musician prays connoisseurs to excuse omissions, on the ground that the first printer of the book "being made unreasonably capricious by ill-health" would not carry out his intentions. The poor man had died, like Gerard Leeu, as the work was in the press, but the composer's wrath pursues him to the grave. In a volume of law lectures, Henricus Brunonis is concerned with his own ill-health, not that of his printer. To lecture all day and compile a text-book of an evening had been too much for him, and he appeals to his readers: "cogitate quantis laboribus quantisque capitis vexationibus hoc opusculum compleuerim"—consider with how great toils and headaches I have brought my little book to an end. In a more serious vein and with deeper reason did Sir Thomas Malory end his "Morte d'Arthur," probably written in prison, with the entreaty:

Presens missale Ad dei laudem et honorem per petrum schoffer de gernsheim In indita civitate Maguntina huius artis Impressoie inuentrice atq; elimatrice prima glorioso deo fauen-te suis consignando scutis Im-pressum et finitum Anno dñi
M.ccc.lxxxiii. In vigilia sancti Jacobi apostoli.

COLOPHON TO THE BRESLAU MISSAL, PRINTED BY SCHOEFFER AT MAINZ, 1483

a feat which he had the hardihood to offer as an excuse for misprints. Later publishers sought protection from rivalry by obtaining privileges which gave them a monopoly for a term of years, ten being, as a rule, the maximum. Some of the colophons in which these privileges are embodied parade the number of ducats payable on every piratical volume circulated; others prefer to leave the penalty vague, and refer the would-be thief to the document itself. One monopolist takes a lofty tone. "Ne in poenam non paruum imprudenter incurras, o bibliopola audissime," he begins—to save you from rashly incurring no small penalty, most greedy bookseller, I would have you know that the most wise prince of Milan has given this book a privilege for ten years!

Authors and editors often wrote colophons as well as printers and publishers. As a rule the editors were content to say nothing less for themselves than that now for the first time their author really had a fair chance, previous texts having been so incredibly mangled that he would not have recognised them. Advertisements written without any regard to facts being not entirely a modern invention, it is not surprising to find these protestations in books which are little more than reprints of the earlier

"I pray you all, gentle men and gentle women that readeth this book of Arthur and his knights from the beginning to the ending, pray for me while I am on live that God send me good deliverance, and when I am dead I pray you all pray for my soul."

But then Malory was one of the great authors of the fifteenth century, and it must be confessed that the writers of colophons were mostly rather little men.

Colophons, which were the expression of the printer's pride in his art, are found most frequently in learned Latin works. The printers and publishers of the fifteenth century, for all their professions, were at least as ready to save themselves trouble as those of any subsequent period, and not all journeymen printers were good enough scholars to understand the Latin which they were setting up. Hence, in using some earlier edition as copy, a printer sometimes inadvertently reprinted the colophon as well as the text, more especially if it chanced to be in verse, and thus a book which explicitly states, for instance, that it was printed by Valdarfer at Milan may really be a reprint from Strasburg or some other German town.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

BLACKWOODS' New Books

MR. WHIBLEY'S BRILLIANT STUDY OF THE "SAVIOUR OF EUROPE."

WILLIAM PITT.

By CHARLES WHIBLEY.

With Portraits and Caricatures.

6s. net.

"We cannot too warmly commend Mr. Whibley's work to our readers. To read it is to be braced as by a tonic at the memory of a great and glorious past."—Mr. W. H. WILSON in the DAILY MAIL.

"Without forgetting Lord Rosebery's excellent monograph, it may be safely said it has been left to Mr. Charles Whibley, whose 'William Pitt' has been published this week, to do full justice to the memory of the man who may accurately be said to have founded the British Empire."—DAILY EXPRESS.

WILL BE PUBLISHED ON TUESDAY.

THE AUTHOR'S PROGRESS.

By ADAM LORIMER.

5s. net.

This work is designed to provide instruction judiciously mingled with amusement to all who are interested in the Literary Career.

It traces the Progress of the Author from the first arising of the divine flame in his mind to his felicitous arrival in the City of Fame.

To those who have arrived the Book will still be a Memento, and it will prove a Comfort to such as falter or seem like to fail.

AN INTERESTING LIFE STORY.

LIFE of JOHN COLLINGWOOD BRUCE,

LL.D., D.C.L.,

By his Son, the Right Hon. Sir GAINSFORD BRUCE, D.C.L.

10s. 6d. net.

All interested in the furtherance of antiquarian research in England, and those who hold cherished memories of Bruce's Academy in its height of popularity, will welcome Sir Gainsford Bruce's book of the life and letters of his father, the distinguished scholar and archaeologist and practical philanthropist, John Collingwood Bruce.

WARREN HASTINGS AS A HUSBAND.

THE LETTERS of WARREN HASTINGS TO HIS WIFE.

Introduced and Annotated by

SYDNEY C. GRIER,

Author of "The Great Proconsul," "In Furthest Ind," etc.

15s. net.

"A distinctly interesting volume, and quite free from the prosings and trivialities in which compilations of this nature not infrequently abound. The letters themselves extend over the period of Hastings's sojourn in India, and they show their author in a light which has been almost wholly ignored by the historian. Mr. Grier is to be congratulated on having produced a volume which no person interested in the history of India can afford to neglect."

ENGLISH REVIEW.

A Remarkable Record of Public Service in India from about 1765 to 1865.

THE HEARSEYS:

Five Generations of an Anglo-Indian Family.

By Colonel HUGH PEARSE, D.S.O.,

Author of "Memoirs of Alexander Gardner, Colonel of Artillery in the Service of Maharaja Ranjit Singh."

With Portraits, 15s. net.

"Colonel Pearse has had a congenial task in relating the adventures of this soldier family and has produced a work which will prove of special value to every student of Indian history, and over which the general reader may pass many a pleasant and profitable hour."

GLASGOW FREE PRESS.

SUCCESSFUL SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

"No. 101." By WYMOND CAREY

VROUW GROBELAAR'S LEADING CASES. By PERCEVAL GIBBON

RICHARD HARTLEY, PROSPECTOR. By DOUGLAS BLACKBURN

HIS INDOLENCE OF ARRAS. By W. J. ECCOTT

MADAME, WILL YOU WALK? By BETH ELLIS

WHERE ANGELS FEAR TO TREAD. By E. M. FORSTER

IN THE HANDS OF THE CZAR. By GARRETT MILL

MISS LOMAX: MILLIONAIRE. By BESSIE PARKER

WM. BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

MESSRS. BELL'S BOOKS

Miniature Illustrated Catalogue post free on application.

Royal 4to, £2 2s. net.

DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE IN ENGLAND IN

THE 17th and 18th CENTURIES: a Selection of Examples Drawn and Photographed for the Use of Architects, By HORACE FIELD and MICHAEL BUNNEY. With Introduction and Notes.

VARIORUM EDITION OF BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER.

THE WORKS OF

FRANCIS BEAUMONT & JOHN FLETCHER.

Edited by A. H. BULLEN.

In twelve vols. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net each.

[Vols. I. and II. now ready.]

"There could be no better tribute than this new Bell-and-Bullen monument to our English Damon and Pythias. Their modernness of thought and phrase is undeniable; their hold upon their age has passed into literary history . . . in that enduring fame this fine edition certainly deserves an honoured place."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

* * Prospectus sent post free on application.

JUST PUBLISHED. Small 4to, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ITINERARY OF JOHN LELAND IN WALES,

in or about the Years 1536-1539. Extracted from his MSS., Arranged and Edited by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH. With a Map.

The remainder of the work, "The Itinerary in England," is in the press.

"Better company than this Tudor itinerant one could not wish for in Wales; and he could hardly be better edited."—TRIBUNE.

THE ART GALLERIES OF EUROPE.

With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s. net each.

NEW VOLUMES.

THE ART OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY. By

JULIA DE W. ADDISON.

THE ART OF THE VENICE ACADEMY. By

MARY KNIGHT POTTER.

NEW EDITION OF SCRIVENER'S GREEK TESTAMENT.

NOVUM TESTAMENTUM GRAECE. Edited, with

Various Readings, Parallel Passages, etc., by F. H. A. SCRIVENER, M.A., D.C.L., LL.D. Fourth Edition, Revised and Corrected by Prof. Dr. E. B. NESTLE.

Printed on India Paper, limp cloth, 6s. net; limp leather, 7s. 6d. net; or interleaved with writing paper, limp leather, 10s. 6d. net.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

STUDIES IN POETRY AND CRITICISM.

By J. CHURTON COLLINS.

CONTENTS.—The Poetry and Poets of America—The Collected Works of Lord Byron—The Collected Poems of William Watson—The Poetry of Mr. Gerald Massey—Miltonic Myths and their Authors—Longinus and Greek Criticism—The True Functions of Poetry.

With numerous Full-page Plates and other Illustrations.

Post 8vo, 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT BOOKS. By J. HERBERT

SLATER, Editor of "Book-Prices Current," Author of "The Romance of Book Collecting," etc.

"Well deserves the attention of connoisseurs as well as those mere beginners to whose special needs it has been the writer's avowed object to minister."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

London: GEORGE BELL & SONS,
Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.

The Bishop's Apron. A Study in the Origin of a Great Family. By W. S. MAUGHAM. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

IN "The Bishop's Apron" Mr. Maugham presents a perfect and very entertaining study of a type of character which most people can number among their acquaintances: the vain, selfish man of charming manners and an eye always fixed on the main chance. The Hon. and Rev. Theodore Spratte, Canon of Tercanbury and vicar of a London parish, is the son of the first earl, the insolent, overbearing Lord Chancellor of evil memory, who was a terror alike to his party and his family. For all his bold friendliness with all men, his studied urbanity and surface good-nature, the Canon has inherited something of the ruthlessness of the late Chancellor, and always contrives to get his own way by hook or by crook. He is proof against the ridicule and sarcasm of his brother, Lord Spratte, and his sister, Lady Sophia, who cannot forget the "beastly job" that placed their father upon the woolsack and regard Theodore's pride in the family honours and the family tree as vulgar and pretentious. The Canon sets his heart upon becoming Bishop of Barchester; upon marrying his daughter to a peer, his son into a wealthy brewer's family, and himself to an old love, widowed and of comfortable estate. But all his well-laid schemes go wrong; and the story of his conquest of fate and adverse circumstances provides delightful reading. The author is ingenious and has a light, skilful touch at critical moments, while the Canon himself is so thoroughly alive and human that the interest increases at every stage of his progress. He is a humbug, he is mediocre and pushing, he can be mean and cruel; all the characters are subordinated to him, revolve round him, contribute to his glory, yet he always retains a firm hold upon the reader's attention. The chapter descriptive of his dismay and humiliation at the loss of Barchester, when he sees himself for a few moments as some others see him, is perhaps the most striking in a book that offers a rapid succession of admirable and varied scenes. Finally the Canon triumphs all along the line; he has, as usual, the last word; Lord Spratte and Lady Sophia ruefully agree that in future they will have to eat the dust before their brother, the Lord Bishop, and the reader regretfully turns the last page of a thoroughly amusing and enjoyable book.

The Hātanee. By ARTHUR EGGAR. (Murray, 6s.)

It is a delight to read a novel which takes one so far off the beaten track as "The Hātanee," Mr. Arthur Eggar's story of Burmese superstition and beliefs. It is unusual in a book about foreign parts to get such thrills, and really to enter into the feelings and customs of the natives as you may in this interesting story. The simple but graphic descriptions of the life and surroundings of these Burmese villages are most sympathetically put before us, and we feel that we have missed much in life, never to have stayed up all night in the upper branches of a tree waiting for the Hātanee, never to have experienced the inside of a Burmese hut, chiefly composed of bamboo and matting, never to have met so interesting a set of people as this. It is the poetry of life, the "grand simplicity" which men go far to seek after being disgusted with the meaner tricks of civilisation. A great deal of the story is grim, but the characters chiefly concerned in it have the devotion, the courage and the kindness of heart which are supposed to be found more often among civilised nations than among the "poor heathen." What is the Hātanee? It is a fearsome beast . . . but we leave our readers to solve the mystery, which is well kept up until the last pages. The two Englishmen are very fine specimens of the race, and we feel sorry to think that anything untoward should happen to such a fine fellow as Jackson, who thoroughly deserves his luck at the end. Mr. Eggar evidently loves and understands his subject, and is as free of the jungle as the birds and the beasts. "The Hātanee" is a book to be read.

FINE ART

THE FRENCH PRIMITIVES

Les Primitifs Français, 1292-1500. By HENRI BOUCHOT. (Paris, Librairie de l'Art ancien et moderne, 1904.)

To state clearly the thesis which the author of this book sets forth to maintain, it is necessary to indicate briefly the main outlines of European art history in the middle ages. Every one knows that from the twelfth to the end of the fourteenth centuries the style of art called Gothic reigned throughout the western world, replacing more or less completely the Romanesque-Byzantine styles which had preceded it. The centre of Gothic creation was the Ile de France. The influences of that centre radiated from Assisi to Glasgow and from Trondhjem to Portugal. The governing art of the whole period was architecture, the great masters were master-builders. Local schools had their individual characteristics. English Gothic, Italian Gothic, German Gothic, differed one from another, and each had merits of its own, not necessarily borrowed from France; but the style of the Ile de France was the supreme style, and the other styles were lesser satellites.

Gothic everywhere ran through the usual stages of growth, culmination, and decline; each period producing fine works of its kind—massive and dignified in the twelfth century, splendid and logical in the thirteenth, elaborate and delicate in the fourteenth. By the end of the fourteenth century the style had run through all its stages. The ideal had been fully expressed and was outworn. The world was ready for something new; and, as always, the new ideal arose in a new country, not on the soil sterilised by the splendid crop it had been producing for three centuries. Within a decade or two of the year 1400, the new spirit began to manifest itself. In Italy, Brunelleschi, Donatello and Masaccio, at Florence, were inspired by it. North of the Alps it animated Claas Sluter, the Dutch sculptor of Dijon, the brothers van Limburg, probably Guelderlanders, working at Bourges for John, Duke of Berry, and the brothers Van Eyck, likewise in the employment of princely patrons. All these men were artists trained in the old traditions, which may be broadly called French, and owing all their technical skill to that training, but applying that skill to the expression of a wholly new ideal which was not French and which never took firm root in France. Whereas from the twelfth to the fourteenth century France led the way and French ideas ruled, from the fifteenth century till the time of Louis XIV. France fell behind and was dependent upon foreign inspiration for ideas, and largely upon foreign artists for the best craft to express them.

Such are the facts, universally accepted in all places where art history is studied, except in the study of M. Henri Bouchot. For him the great change that took place in European art about 1400 either did not happen or was as much the result of French initiative as all that had gone before. If he does not ascribe a French impulse to the art of the originating Florentines, it is probably because he forgot to do so. As for the rest, they are all Frenchmen from his point of view. The Van Eycks—artists whose position in art history is as certain as that of Masaccio or of Donatello, and on precisely similar evidence—are for him the creation of inventive historians. He doubts their signed pictures, he ignores archives that mention them, he laughs at the old writers who recorded what was known of them in their day. He has no serious arguments to raise against the universal consensus of students who have devoted their lives to the impartial investigation of art-history. He merely flouts their conclusions as legends, and declares that he is not satisfied, as though that mattered. On the other hand, when he proceeds to set up the imaginary creations of his own brain in their place, it seems to him that the statement, j'ai lieu de croire, ought almost to settle the matter.

It is the same with the brothers Van Limburg. The Duke de Berry's inventory states beyond all question that the splendid manuscript, now at Chantilly, was illuminated in the first instance by them. The scribe, says M. Bouchot, may have made a mistake, written down the wrong name—who knows? Yet he bases his own shaky hypothesis on far more exiguous foundations. It is only fair to add that in all this our author does not speak as the mouth-piece of any French school of savants, but is as much at variance with his colleagues as with any kind of foreigners.

Shall we, then, conclude that this book is valueless? Far from it. It is an admirable and stimulating piece of writing, all the more attractive for the wrongheadedness with which it maintains an impossible thesis. From start to finish it is written with vivacity and spirit. The reader, to M. Bouchot, is a man who has already contradicted each of his pet propositions. He proceeds, therefore, to refute him. The chapters are one long series of refutations. They do not convince, but they entertain. The false thesis apart, the materials used are valuable, well stated and important, though they are seldom original. Several of the chapters seem familiar; some of them have certainly appeared before in the pages of French art magazines. Perhaps that is why the title-page bears the date 1904. Or is that date chosen to enable the writer to disregard the disembowelling of his chimera at the hands of Mr. Weale in a recent number of the Burlington Magazine? The author has wisely chosen not to cumber his pages with cheap reproductions of works of art already reproduced ad nauseam since the French Primitives Exhibition. The book, therefore, can be, and is, printed on excellent paper, pleasant to handle. It is also provided with a thorough index, an accompaniment far too seldom appended to French books on Art History.

MARTIN CONWAY.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—II

THE transformation of the crude art of the thirteenth century—depending for its harmonic unity upon hollow-sounding, perfect concords at accented points, and for its rhythmic unity upon highly artificial rules of measurement, both expressed by a clumsy notation—into the polished beauty of that of the sixteenth century, as exemplified in Palestrina, is the subject of Professor Wooldridge's second volume of this work. While popular feeling for the beauty of thirds and sixths, the imperfect concords, expressed in popular music existing outside of that acknowledged by the theorists, was the ultimate cause of the overthrow of the old system, it is interesting to note that the dynamic cause was a papal edict of Pope John XXII. in 1322, restraining the artistic efforts of church musicians, and a ruse, called "Faulx Bourdon," which the musicians adopted to evade the Papal law. Before we proceed to a discussion of this, however, secular influences upon the strict art of the Church are to be noted in the reintroduction of duple rhythm, that is to say the division of the "long" note into two instead of three "breves," and the use of canon or imitation, which apparently came through the Italian secular forms, the "Ballata," "Madrigale," "Cassia." The works of the French poet-musician Machault and the Italian Francesco Landini, both in secular music and in the composition of the Mass, which composers now began to attempt, is also important. It was, indeed, the composition of the liturgical service, which not only embroidered the plainsong with discant till the original was unrecognisable but even introduced secular tunes and, more surprising still, their secular words with them, which led to the above-mentioned edict which forbade all elaboration of the plainsong save the most simple "Organum."

It is not our intention to forbid, occasionally—and especially upon feast days or in the solemn celebration of the Mass and in the afore-said divine offices—the use of some consonances, for example the eighth, fifth, and fourth, which heighten the beauty of the melody; such intervals therefore may be sung above the plain Cantus Ecclesiasticus, yet so that the integrity of the cantus itself may remain intact, and that nothing in the authoritative music be changed.

It was not to be supposed, however, that ecclesiastical authority could really check the impulse towards artistic creation; it could only render a service to the art by bringing these erring devotees back to a consideration of first principles. Compelled to use again the old "organum," the educated musicians became aware of the crude effect, and relieved its baldness by the insertion of a part in thirds between the two notes of plainsong and organum, thus producing a series of triads. Next, the fifth was altogether avoided by the transposition of the lowest part an octave higher, when, the triads becoming first inversions, this system of "Faulx Bourdon," or False Bass, established the imperfect concords as the groundwork of the new harmonic scheme. Dr. Adler and Professor Riemann believe in the existence of a much older practice of "Faulx Bourdon" in the popular music of England, but Professor Wooldridge is unable to find sufficient evidence for this theory. With the general recognition of this new principle, together with the greater elasticity of rhythm occasioned by the use of either duple or triple measure, or, as it was called, imperfect and perfect, it will be evident that the materials for building up the great era of polyphonic music lay ready to hand.

From this time forward names of numerous composers come prominently to the front, and the formation of schools occupies the latter half of the volume. First amongst these comes the English school of the fifteenth century. The work of this school is illustrated by valuable manuscripts in the Bodleian library and that of St. Edmund's College, Old Hall, near Ware, but, besides these, collections of English compositions, notably those of John Dunstable, are preserved at Vienna, Modena and Bologna. From the wide recognition of Dunstable's genius on the Continent, as well as the fact that the few specimens of his work in the English manuscripts are given anonymously, and having regard to the advanced position of his work as compared with that of his insular contemporaries, Professor Wooldridge concludes that Dunstable spent his life abroad, and that, though he was English, his music was not native, nor did it much influence native art. This will be rather disappointing to the English enthusiast, but the evidence is too strong to be neglected, the more so as Professor Wooldridge is not slow to do justice to the claims of English music when a century later it became of real importance in the school of Tye, Tallis and Byrd. But whatever facility the English people may show in assimilating and reproducing with certain characteristics of their own the artistic achievements of others, this period with many later ones shows that the pioneer work was not to be done in England. The Gallo-Belgic School of Dufay, Otrecht, Okeghem and Josquin des Prés took the initiative in the development of the resources gained in the past and especially in the possibilities of Canon and such devices. Amidst the dry technicalities of this time the efforts of Josquin towards genuine expression are refreshing, and are well illustrated in this volume by the quotation of his two motetts, "Absalon" and "Laudati Pueri."

The great Netherlandish school, which follows upon this, shows further development of the harmonic principle, and this, be it noted, was specially in connection with secular music as exemplified in the Madrigal. In the great specimens of this form by Willaert, Verdelot, Arcadelt, there is a tendency to treat the voices en bloc, as together representing different chords instead of individual melodies, which was to bear conspicuous fruit in the seventeenth century, but which, even during the reign of pure choral art, had a marked effect in making progressions definite, grouping the portions of a work into phrases concluded by cadences. While these methods were being pursued on the continent, English composers apparently continued to compose in the manner of their forefathers, and it was not until Flemish principles had been introduced into England, by what means it is not clearly known, that the school of English Church music, of which Tye and Tallis were the most noteworthy exponents, could come into existence. And now, when these men had arrived at maturity, the untoward circumstance of the Reformation came to thwart, or at any rate deflect, their energies. It is true that the change was so mercifully gradual as to allow of the adaptation of the old music to the needs of the reformed Church, but there can be little doubt that the new tone towards religion was responsible for the lack of successors to the founders of the school, and for the general bending of energies towards the secular music of the Madrigal.

In his final chapter, "The Perfection of the Method," Professor Wooldridge discusses and illustrates the works of Orlando Lassus and Palestrina. With regard to the latter he shows that in any art each school presents a partial view of the possibilities of its material, but withal the highest that a partial view can attain, while it generally falls to the lot of one man of unusual talent to gather "the incomplete and personal ideals of the various members, antecedent as well as contemporary, into one supreme method, in which is displayed the actual end towards which all efforts were unconsciously directed." Palestrina did for the music of this time what Raphael had already done for painting. He selected and so summed up the best from among the resources of his predecessors that no further art drawn from those resources alone was possible to those who were to come after. With the beginning of the seventeenth century a new era begins, the story of which is recounted in the third volume of this work by Sir Hubert Parry. Professor Wooldridge's work stops here, and, in leaving it, it is necessary to pay a tribute to the accurate care and patience with which it is evident that his researches have been made and the lucid manner of his descriptions. Throughout, his attitude is that of the historian pure and simple; he rarely comments upon the developments which he describes, but the logical sequence of events is made clear. This is particularly a great achievement in dealing with a phase of art where so much must necessarily be inferred rather than known directly, and where an author given to conjecture would inevitably lead his readers into a maze of theory, from which it would be well-nigh impossible to find the path of truth.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

A NEW work by Miss J. E. Harrison, of Newnham College, Cambridge, on "Primitive Athens as described by Thucydides," will be published very shortly by the Cambridge University Press. Miss Harrison does not accept the view generally held in this country of the character and limits of the ancient city, which she regards as disproved by the recent excavations of the German Archaeological Institute. In her new book she endeavours, therefore, to state as simply as may be what seems to her the ascertained truth about primitive Athens, both on the ancient literary evidence and on that added by excavation. Many plans and drawings are given to illustrate evidence and argument.

Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have now in the press, and hope to publish about Easter, a new edition of Evelyn's "Diary" in three volumes. The format will be that of the "Diary and Letters" of Madame D'Arblay recently issued by the same firm. The text, the spelling of which has been modernised, will follow Bray and Forster; but many minor rectifications have been made and some unsuspected errors corrected. The book will contain the notes of the earlier editors, carefully revised; and it will include a large number of additional notes by the present editor, Mr. Austin Dobson, who has been engaged on this task for some months past. As in the case of the D'Arblay Diary, the new issue will be illustrated by photogravure portraits, contemporary views of localities, maps and facsimile title-pages; and there will be a Preface, Introduction and a full Index.

Next week Dr. J. Butler Burke's "The Origin of Life, its physical basis and definition," will be published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. The same firm promise an interesting historical monograph—"A Friend of Marie Antoinette" (Lady Atkyns), by Frederick Barbey—by the end of the month; and early in March a book which will appeal to Shakespeareans: "The Shakespeare Symphony," by Harold Bayley.

Under the title "The Spurgeon Family, being an account of the Descent and Family of Charles Haddon Spurgeon," a new genealogical work will be published shortly. It will contain many portraits, facsimiles, pedigrees and extracts from parish registers; among the latter may be mentioned a facsimile of an extract from the marriage register of one Elizabeth Spurgeon at Burnham, one of the witnesses to which was Lord Nelson. The work is compiled by Mr. W. H. Higgs, and will be published by Mr. Elliot Stock.

A new book, entitled "The Unlucky Number," by Mr. Eden Phillpotts, will be published immediately in Messrs. Newnes's Series of Sixpenny Novels. The series hitherto has been devoted to reprints of books published at a more expensive price. The inclusion of a new work, by an author of Mr. Phillpotts's reputation, at so moderate a price is therefore an entirely new departure, and is an interesting experiment for everybody concerned.

CORRESPONDENCE

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING'S CENTENARY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In response to a suggestion for a national memorial to Mrs. Elizabeth Barrett Browning, in Westminster Abbey, to commemorate the centenary of her birth on March 6, I have had numerous communications from all parts of the United Kingdom; the idea has also been favourably accepted by the Press, not only in our own country, but in America, France and Italy. Unfortunately my correspondents assume that I will undertake the promotion of the movement, as I have been associated with the inception and accomplishment of numerous memorials to national and local celebrities—the last being that to the Venerable Bede, at Monkwearmouth.

A national memorial to Mrs. Browning, will, however, be much more easily and fittingly promoted in London, the centre of the intellectual life of the nation. Already Royal Academicians and sculptors have offered their services to supply allegorical designs and models of busts for memorials in bronze or marble; while the general belief has been expressed that such a movement would meet with a liberal response if a small representative executive committee were to be formed which would undertake the control of the movement.

It would be invidious at present to suggest representative names in Literature and Letters whose influence would command speedy success to a national memorial to Mrs. Browning. The committees which are arranging for local celebrations of the centenary in numerous cities and towns in Europe and America could be branches of a central executive in London, and thus connect the whole of the empire and other countries.

Personally, I shall be pleased to assist, in a humble way, in the formation of such a movement, and appeal to the numerous admirers of Mrs. Browning's great service to the literature of our English language to bring about the formation of an executive committee, with an hon. secretary whose name will carry weight in the best circles of society, and who has leisure and zeal that will enable him to approach the cultured and wealthy members of our people.

There is no need to plead the merits of Mrs. Browning as a poet, a representative Englishwoman and a humanitarian; her place in the roll of fame is acknowledged; and on the centenary of her birth, which took place at Coxhoe Hall, Durham, on March 6, 1806, it is fitting that her memory be publicly commemorated.

JOHN ROBINSON

Delaval House, Sunderland, February 10.

THE ROKEBY VELASQUEZ

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I do not think that the gently quizzing writer of the letter over the signature "Artium Amator" means what he says, for if what his words imply be true, then many of our cherished ideas of the meaning of Art, with all the pleasant memories of the dawning of these ideas upon our intelligence, must be sunk in the sea of oblivion. Clearly, as one may conclude he admits, the object of the artist must be beauty in one form or another, but it must be beauty that ennobles: that appeals to the higher faculties; for indeed when it ceases to do this, it ceases to be beauty and becomes parody. When beauty is adulterated with ignoble conditions, its only attraction is sensual. In the Rokeby Velasquez the perfect reclining form and the Cupid would in themselves make a great work of art, whatever the title, but the introduction of the mirror brings before the mind a mean human trait which not only condemns the picture as "Venus and Cupid," but causes an impression quite at variance with our conception of beauty that is ennobling. In fact what would appeal to the intellect without the mirror appeals only to the senses with it. I do not think it at all necessary that the face should be shown. It has been emphasised by German critics that Homer did not feel it necessary to describe the beauty of Helen, but allowed it to be inferred by references to its effect, and a beautiful form expressed by the painter would not be a less powerful handle to the imagination than the effect expressed by the poet.

It might be possible to support my position by referring to the smile on the face, the character of which is a flaw in the invention; but first it seems to me clear that the face has been overworked by a French artist, and secondly it is scarcely necessary to call special attention to a loose brick when the whole wall is insecure. "Artium Amator" appears to suggest that we need not consider the mirror. Possibly, observers of that remarkable picture by Whistler lately bought, would not be very much surprised if they were asked to imagine the presence of features which are absent; but it would scarcely do to request those who look at the Velasquez to imagine the absence of features which are present. The only way to withdraw the mirror from the mind is to paint it out. It is related of Protogenes, who painted the portrait of Aristotle, that he executed a picture of a Satyr leaning against the stump of a tree on which a partridge had alighted. The main object of the work was apparently to exhibit the artist's conception of a resting Satyr, but the partridge was so wonderfully well done that it formed the special feature of attraction for observers, who scarcely paid attention to the Satyr. The artist thereupon deliberately painted out the bird. Yet the partridge was less out of place than is the mirror, for while the bird only hindered the appreciation of the invention, the mirror alters its whole character.

I do not mean to suggest that the picture is likely to injure the public morals, but I certainly fail to see that it is a great and ennobling work of art such as one would expect from the expenditure for a public gallery of so large a sum as that paid for it.

MAN IN THE STREET.

Florence, February 12.

"THE LIFE OF GREGORY THE GREAT"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your review of Mr. Dudden's "Gregory the Great" recalls to my recollection the period 1875 or 1876, when John Richard Green, the historian, was in Italy, generally accompanied by his faithful friend and companion the Rev. William Halcombe, who was busy in Rome for two or three years in collecting material for a biography of the great Pope. His literary labours took him to the old Theological Library (Casanatensis), situated on one side of the Piazza della Minerva, near the Pantheon, where an obelisk stands in the centre supported by an Elephant.

Surely his long task must have resulted in many notes and memoranda, that would be useful to any future writer on the same subject. Has Mr. Dudden any knowledge of this predecessor and his efforts? or do these manuscripts lie useless and neglected?

Halcombe was with Green in Capri, and we spent much time on the island together in the Hotel Quisisana. After Green's death and burial in Mentone, Halcombe was taken ill in Florence, and carried by the Misericordia brethren to the railway en route to the Baths of Lucca. His doctor there (Gason) summoned me in haste on his arrival, as he said I was his only acquaintance near at hand. Presently he was able to move on to Mentone, and soon after died, and was buried close by his friend, John Richard Green. This is in brief all I remember of Mr. Halcombe, but possibly his relatives may possess the manuscripts he wrote concerning Pope Gregory.

While on the subject, let me state I am one of the few strangers who have visited the birthplace of Hildebrand—or Aldobrandino, if of that noble family—said to be Sovana, a city of the Tuscan Maremma. But I gathered from local manuscripts at the neighbouring city of Pitigliano that it seemed doubtful whether Gregory was of the noble house of Aldobrandino, or the son of a poor joiner of the same city.

Sovana is a ruined and desolate place since its siege by the Senesi two or three hundred years ago, and fever stricken; it is a serious risk indeed to pass two or three hours now within its circumference. I wrote a detailed description of it twenty years ago, but like much else of mine it is forgotten or derelict.

WILLIAM MERCER.

[Owing to pressure on our space a number of letters are held over.]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY.

Amelung, Walther; and Holtzinger, Heinrich. The Museums and Ruins of Rome. English edition revised by the authors and Mrs. S. Arthur Strong, L.L.D. 6½ × 5½. Two vols. pp. xxiv, 326 + xii, 183. Duckworth, 10s. net.

[Vol. i. The Museums, by Walther Amelung, with 170 illustrations: vol. ii., The Ruins, by Heinrich Holtzinger, with plans and 98 illustrations. The German edition of the book forms part of "The Modern Cicerone" series. Mrs. Strong, who is partly responsible for the translation, adds a short and useful bibliography to each volume. Indexes to both.]

ART.

Jenner, Mrs. Henry. Christ in Art. Little Books on Art Library. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 186. Methuen, 2s. 6d. net.

[Mrs. Jenner's object is to try to follow the gradual development of the delineation of Christ in art, "from the faded frescoes of the catacombs to the easels of modern artists."

Cust, Robert H. Hobart. Giovanni Antonio Bassi (hitherto usually styled "Sodoma"): The Man and the Painter, 1477-1549. 9½ × 7. Pp. xviii, 442. Murray, 21s. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Memoirs of Archbishop Temple. By Seven Friends. Edited by E. G. Sandford. 2 vols. 8½ × 5½. Pp. xvi. + 1323. Macmillan, 36s. net. (See p. 157.)

Experiences of Mack. By Himself. 4½ × 7½. Pp. 155. Drane, 3s. 6d. [The exciting experiences in various parts of Europe, mainly in 1869 and 1870, of an engineer.]

Collins, Tom. School and Sport: a record of work and leisure. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 267. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.

[Mainly autobiographical. Mr. Collins was well known in his University days, was a member of the Cambridge eleven, and played both the single and double matches at billiards for his University. He was for eight years Assistant Master at King Edward's School, Birmingham, and for thirty-three Headmaster of Newport (Salop) Grammar School. Sportsmen will enjoy his book.]

Hullah, Annette. Theodor Leschetizky. Living Masters of Music series. 7½ × 5. Pp. 85. Lane, 2s. 6d. net.

CLASSICS.

The Æneid of Virgil. With a translation by Charles J. Billson, M.A. 2 vols. 10½ × 7½. Pp. 644. Arnold, 30s. net.

DRAMA.

Hardy, Thomas. The Dynasts. A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars, in three parts, nineteen acts, and one hundred and thirty scenes. Part Second. 7½ × 5½. Pp. xiii, 302. Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.

EDUCATION.

Allbutt, T. Clifford. On Professional Education, with special reference to medicine. 7½ × 5. Pp. 80. Macmillan, 2s. net.

[An Address delivered at King's College Hospital, under the title "Medical Education in London," on October 3, 1905, the opening of the session.]

Britain's Sea Story, B.C. 55-A.D. 1805. Edited by E. E. Speight and R. Morton Nance. Illustrated from paintings by R. Morton Nance. 7½ × 5. Pp. 427. Hodder & Stoughton, 2s. 6d. net.

[The story of British heroism in voyaging and sea-fight from the time of Alfred to the Battle of Trafalgar. With an introduction tracing the development of the structure of sailing-ships from the earliest times.]

Methuen's Junior School Books. The Gospel according to St. Luke. Edited with introduction and notes by William Williamson, B.A. 7 × 5. Pp. 240. Methuen, 2s.

[The text is A. V. The Introduction is sound and scholarly, and the notes and appendices full. Maps of The Holy Land, The Sea of Galilee, and Jerusalem.]

Black's Picture Lessons in English. Book I. With fifteen full-page illustrations in colours. 8 × 5½. Pp. 33. Black, 6d.

[For teaching composition to very young children.]

Marchand d'Allumettes. Par A. Gennevraye. Edited by Cloudeley Brereton. 7 × 4½. Pp. 128. Siepmann's French Series (Elementary). Macmillan, 2s. net.

Loney, S. L.; and Grenville, L. W. A Shilling Arithmetic. With answers. 6½ × 4½. Pp. 186, xxiv. Macmillan, 1s. 6d.

FICTION.

Bartram, George. Lads of the Fancy. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 310. Duckworth, 6s.

Fletcher, J. S. The Threshing-floor. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 312. Unwin, 6s.

Gray, Maxwell. The Great Refusal. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 381. Long, 6s.

Maartens, Maarten. The Healers. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 379. Constable, 6s. (See p. 160.)

Stacpoole, H. de Vere. Fanny Lambert. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 312. Unwin, 6s.

Eggar, Arthur. The Hitanee. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 244. Murray, 6s. (See p. 161.)

Vance, Louis J. Terence O'Rourke, Gentleman Adventurer. 7½ × 5. Pp. 323. E. Grant Richards, 6s.

London, Jack. Tales of the Fish Patrol. 7½ × 5. Pp. 243. Heinemann, 6s.

Ellis, Mrs. Havelock. My Cornish Neighbours. 7½ × 5. Pp. 197. Alston Rivers, 3s. 6d.

Blyth, James. The Same Clay. 7½ × 5. Pp. 312. E. Grant Richards, 6s.

Chambers, Robert W. A Young Man in a Hurry. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 311. Constable, 6s.

Campbell, Frances. The Measure of Life. 7½ × 5½. Pp. 265. Chapman & Hall, 6s.

Maugham, W. Somerset. The Bishop's Apron. 7½ × 5. Pp. 311. Chapman & Hall, 6s. (See p. 161.)

Barr, A. E. The Belle of Bowling Green. 7½ × 5. Pp. 314. Long, 6s.

Yorke, Curtis. Irresponsible Kitty. 7½ × 5. Pp. 316. Long, 6s.

"North Country Rambler." A Summer Nosegay. 7½ × 4½. Pp. 151. Drane, 3s. 6d.

E. V. A. Wha-oo-oo! 7½ × 5. Pp. 152. Drane, 3s. 6d.

Ellis, Appleton. The Door on the Latch. 7½ × 5. Pp. 221. Drane, 3s. 6d.

Gould, Nat. The Lady Trainer. 7 × 4½. Pp. 279. Long, 2s.

HISTORY.

Hardy, E. G. Studies in Roman History. 7½ × 5. Pp. 349. Sonnenschein, 6s.

[A reprint of Dr. Hardy's "Christianity and the Roman Government," revised, with some additions.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Wall, Dr. A. A Forty-six Years' Fight. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 43. "The Animals' Guardian," rs.
 [The fight against vivisection, by the Hon. Treasurer of the London Anti-Vivisection Society.]
 Glasgow Archaeological Society. Report by the Council for Session 1904-5, with abstract of Treasurer's accounts and list of members. 8½ x 7. Pp. 31. Glasgow: MacLehose.
 Wisdom of the East series. The Instruction of Ptah-Hotep and The Instruction of Kégemni. Translated from the Egyptian, with an introduction and appendix, by Battiscombe G. Gunn. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 75. Murray, rs. net.
 [The author claims that the two books here translated were composed respectively four thousand and three thousand five hundred and fifty years before Christ, and are therefore the oldest in existence.]
 Armistead, J. J. Piloted: being a series of notes and experiences from the author's life. 7½ x 5. Pp. 208. Headley, 3s. 6d.

NATURAL HISTORY.

- Harting, James Edmund. Recreations of a Naturalist. With eighty-one illustrations. 8½ x 6½. Pp. xvi. 433. Unwin, 15s. net.
 [In the nature of a second series of the same author's "Essays on Sport and Natural History." Reprinted mainly from the Field. The illustrations are excellent, and there is a good index.]

ORIENTAL.

- The Religion and Philosophy of India: The Philosophy of the Upanishads. By Paul Drussen. Authorised English translation by the Rev. A. S. Geden. 9½ x 6. Pp. xiv, 429. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 10s. 6d.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Everyman's Library. Edited by Ernest Rhys.—Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson (2 vols., pp. 1263); the Lamb's Tales from Shakespeare (pp. 327); Jane Austen's Sense and Sensibility (pp. 381); Macaulay's History of England (3 vols., pp. 2407); The Golden Book of Coleridge (pp. 289); Malory's Le Morte D'Arthur (2 vols., pp. 812); White's Natural History of Selborne (pp. 279); Borrow's Wild Wales (pp. 617); Coleridge's Biographia Literaria (pp. 390). Each 6½ x 5½. Dent, 1s. net cloth; 2s. net leather. (See p. 165.)
Selections from the writings of Benjamin Franklin. Edited by U. Waldo Cutler. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xviii, 366. Harrap, 1s. 6d. net.
 [Mr. Cutler contributes an introduction.]
 Ruskin Treasures: Women and Dress. 4½ x 2½. Pp. 47. Allen, 6d. net.
 Sir John Suckling: Ballads and other Poems; Sir Charles Sedley: Lyrics; John Wilmot: Poems and Songs. In one vol. Pembroke Booklets. 7 x 4½. Pp. 64. Hull: Tutin, 6d. net.
 [The fourth of a capital little series of booklets, each of which gives selections from three of the old poets.]
 Browning's Pippa Passes. 6½ x 4. Pp. 83. Favourite Classics. Heinemann, 6d. net.
 Watts-Dunton, Theodore. The Coming of Love, Rhona Boswell's Story, and other Poems. Seventh edition. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxxix, 302. Lane, 5s. net.
 [Mr. Watts-Dunton has added to "The Coming of Love" certain matter omitted from the earlier editions, but afterwards published in the Saturday Review and the Athenaeum.]
 Watson, E. H. Lacon. Christopher Deane: a character-study at school and college. Brown, Langham, 3s. 6d.
 Newnes's Sixpenny Novels, Illustrated. Sladen, Douglas. Trincolox (and other stories). Illustrated by Max Cowper. Pp. 184. Marriott, Charles. The Column. Illustrated by A. S. Hartrick. Pp. 118. Each 8½ x 5½. Newnes, 6d. each.

SCIENCE.

- Saleeby, C. W. Evolution the Master-Key. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 364. Harpers.
 [A discussion of the principle of Evolution as illustrated in atoms, stars, organic species, mind, society, and morals.]
 Mann, Gustav. Chemistry of the Proteids. 9 x 6. Pp. xviii, 606. Macmillan, 15s. net.
 [Dr. Gustav Mann, University Demonstrator of Physiology, Oxford, has based his book on Dr. Otto Cohnheim's "Chemie der Eiweisskörper." It was his original intention to publish merely a translation, but extension, and disagreements with Dr. Cohnheim, have induced the author to accept responsibility for the whole book.]

SOCIOLOGY.

- Hall, H. Fielding. A People at School. 9½ x 5½. Pp. 282. Macmillan, 10s. net.
 [In "The Soul of a People" Mr. Hall dealt with the emotions, the ideals, the inner life, of the Burmese; in "A People at School" he writes of the outer life of the Burmese as a nation—of their progress and their retrogression.]

SPORT.

- Winans, Walter. Practical Rifle-Shooting. 7½ x 5. Pp. 97. Putnams, 1s. net.
 [Designed to furnish the beginner with a series of hints, by the use of which he may be enabled to put himself through a course of continuous and graduated training, and keep himself free of the tricks which impede progress. Mr. Winans inveighs against the teaching which enables a man to hit a target, but does not help him when face to face with a charging animal.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Everyman's Library (J. M. Dent and Co.).—We have before us thirteen selected volumes out of the fifty with which Messrs. Dent have started this enterprise. "Everyman's Library" is to be "the completest library of great literature that has yet been issued," and is to be published at a price (1s. net cloth, 2s. net leather, each volume), which will bring it within the reach of all. There have been schemes of the kind before: one, which is something of the same in nature, is now being successfully conducted by another firm of publishers; others have failed through want of organisation and principle, and others, though good, are conducted at a price a little too high for the modern purse. We know of nothing quite like this scheme of Messrs. Dent's, and, having examined the volumes before us, we can only hope that "Everyman's Library" may be carried through at the promised rate of 100 volumes a year—or quicker, if possible—to its completion—"a library universal in character, and including not one but all departments of literature, in which the classic writers . . . of all countries will be represented." The foreign literature will, of course, be translated into English.

The Library is divided into eleven sections (1) Biography and Autobiography; (2) Children's Books—illustrated whenever possible; (3) Greek and Latin Classics in translations; (4) Essays and Belles Lettres, in which the historical development of the Essay will be exemplified—this section will also include French and German Essays; (5) Fiction, Miscellaneous, Historical, and Foreign, with a special series showing the rise and development of the English Novel, on the lines of Professor Walter Raleigh's essay; (6) History, including Latin and Greek; (7) Oratory; (8) Philosophy and Theology; (9) Poetry and Drama—occasionally in selections from prolific poets; here again the development of English Poetry from Cynewulf to Tennyson and of English Drama from the Miracles downwards being exemplified; (10) Romance, which includes Legends and Folk-lore; (11) Science, Natural History and Political Economy; (12) Travel, from Mandeville onwards. Each section is bound in cloth or leather of a distinctive colour.

The word "Classical" is, wisely, to be interpreted with width enough to include the "books attaining hardly to classic rank which the world would not willingly let die." It is obvious, too, that the scheme of publication in sections will help greatly to emphasise the connection between different works, and to show in a practical manner the history of the development of literature. The gain of reading a good book is doubled when the reader learns also its place in the history of literature, its derivation, its kinship, its descendants; and this is a benefit that should accrue from the plan of "Everyman's Library." Of another feature we are not so sure of the wisdom. We object, on principle, to the literary introduction, which dulls the direct effect of the book on the reader's mind by filling it first with the thoughts raised in some one else's mind, and is too apt to lessen his receptivity and deaden, instead of quicken, his powers of using his own judgment. The book that does not speak direct, does not speak at all. Still, Messrs. Dent have taken every care that, since there are to be introductions, they shall be written by the people most fitted to write them; and the reader who will keep the introduction to the last will undoubtedly be the better for comparing his own impressions with those of other critics.

There is nothing more to say than that the volumes before us (Boswell's Johnson; Lamb's Tales; Coleridge's Biographia Literaria; Jane Austen's Sense and Sensibility; Macaulay's History; a selection from Coleridge's Poems; The Morte d'Arthur; White's Selborne; and Borrow's Wild Wales) are admirably produced. The paper is at once thin and quite opaque; the type clear and pleasant, the spacing perfect. There are ornamental end-papers, frontispiece, and title-page, designed by Mr. R. L. Knowles; the bindings are neat and the books light and agreeable to handle. We can only wish complete success to a scheme that has clearly been planned by men who are at once scholars and men of business.

Giordano Bruno, in Memoriam of the 17th February, 1600 (Foulis) is a translation by Miss Agnes Fay from the German of Alois Riehl. The Essay was originally published in 1889, and revised for February 17, 1900, the three hundredth anniversary of Bruno's execution. We know of no account of Bruno which gives so concisely, clearly and so temperately (no bad recommendation that last in view of the nature of the subject) the facts of Bruno's life, character and teaching, as this, and Miss Agnes Fay is to be congratulated both on the work and on the way she has performed it.

MESSRS. W. H. SMITH & SON
 EXECUTE ORDERS FOR ALL STYLES OF BOOKBINDING
 IN THEIR OWN WORKSHOPS
 DOUGLAS COCKERELL, Controller

THEY ARE MAKING A SPECIALITY OF CARRYING OUT EXACTLY THE RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE SOCIETY OF ARTS ON LEATHER FOR BOOKBINDING

BOOKS FOR BINDING MAY BE HANDED IN AT ANY OF W. H. SMITH AND SON'S BOOKSTALLS OR BRANCHES OR SENT DIRECT TO THEIR BINDING DEPARTMENT

PAMPHLET & PRICE LIST
 SENT ON APPLICATION

GOLDSMITH ST.
 DRURY LANE,
 LONDON, W.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations. 21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net. 507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies, and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc. Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO
Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-page Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

THE AUTOTYPE Co.

74 NEW OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.C.

Reproductions in Monochrome of Famous Works of Art

By the AUTOTYPE Permanent Process.

Amongst the numerous publications may be mentioned :—

Selections from the National Gallery, London, the Wallace Collection, the Tate Gallery, the Walker Art Gallery (Liverpool).

Drawings by Holbein from the Royal Collection, Windsor Castle.

Selected Examples of Sacred Art from various Collections. Etchings by Rembrandt.

Drawings by Albert Durer.

Pictures from the Louvre, Luxembourg, Paris.

Prospectus of above issues will be sent free on application. Full particulars of all the Company's publications are given in

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART CATALOGUE. — Now Ready. New Edition. With upwards of 150 Miniature Photographs of Notable Autotypes, and 23 Tint-Block Illustrations. For convenience of reference the publications are arranged alphabetically under Names. Post free, One Shilling.

A Visit of Inspection is invited to

THE AUTOTYPE FINE ART GALLERY,

74 NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE LIVERPOOL COURIER.

ESTABLISHED 1808.

DAILY AND WEEKLY.

"The Liverpool Courier" is a first-class newspaper having a very large circulation in Lancashire, Cheshire, and North Wales.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

The University and the Nation

The "Saturday Westminster Gazette" this week contains the first three of a series of eight articles upon Oxford, entitled "The University and the Nation." These will discuss briefly the resources at the disposal of Oxford, the use which is made at present of college emoluments, and the possibility of rendering the humane education of our older Universities, their distinctive and inestimable gift, more easily accessible to the increasing number of men in all classes who are fitted alike by previous training and future responsibilities to pursue University studies.

They will appear in the following order:

1. THE CASE FOR INQUIRY.
2. THE RESOURCES OF OXFORD.
3. THE UNIVERSITY AND THE COLLEGES
4. THE SCHOLARSHIP SYSTEM.
5. THE ENTRANCE EXAMINATION.
6. THE LIMITATIONS OF THE COLLEGE SYSTEM.
7. PRIZE FELLOWSHIPS AND RESEARCH.
8. WHAT A NEW COMMISSION MIGHT DO.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

February 17

One Penny

OFFICES: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED

DRINK THE

WHITE

DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER.

&

BLUE

In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Some Recent Books Published by GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

JUST READY.

Golf Faults, Illustrated

By G. W. BELDAM and J. H. TAYLOR. New and enlarged Edition. 7s. 6d. net.

Giovanni Bellini

With an Introduction by EVERARD MEYNELL. With 65 Full-page Plates, including Photogravure Frontispiece. 3s. 6d. net. [Newnes' Art Library.]

The Drawings of David Cox

With an Introduction by A. J. FINBERG. 7s. 6d. net. [Modern Master Draughtsmen.]

French Pottery

By HENRI FRANTZ. With 86 Full-page Plates, of which several are in colour. 7s. 6d. net. [Library of Applied Arts.]

This volume also contains a comprehensive list of marks and monograms on faience and porcelain, and a list of the prices realised at auction since 1882.

The Spoilers

By EDWIN PUGH. Illustrated by C. E. BROCK. 6s.

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"The story has an air of strength about it, even of brutality."

SCOTSMAN.—"It is a story revealing a good deal of knowledge of the life of people who prey upon others. It is a picture of a not very pleasing phase of life, but it is painted by a man who has evidently studied closely the ways of burglars and resellers, and gives an account of their doings in a manner which suggests an atmosphere of reality."

HASTINGS AND ST. LEONARDS ADVERTISER.—"The story is an admirable sketch of the low life of to-day, while there is also plenty of comedy."

The Chinese at Home

Adapted from the French of EMILE BARD. By H. TWITCHELL. With numerous Illustrations. 7s. 6d. net.

STANDARD.—"M. Bard's pictures of this singular people are bright, entertaining, and at the same time instructive; they help us to see the Chinese at home, and appreciate their better qualities."

SCOTSMAN.—"The book as a whole is both an attractive and instructive one for any reader curious as to the present state of China."

Old Pewter

By MALCOLM BELL. The Illustrations comprise reproductions of over 400 objects and include 16 special plates printed in silver and grey. 7s. 6d. net. [Library of Applied Arts.]

QUEEN.—"The well-chosen illustrations are very fully supplemented by the concise and accurate letterpress; a good handbook on the subject is just what is much needed. The value of the book is completed by a good index."

The GLOBE.—"His text is very usefully informing and provides a popular manual on a fascinating variety of English and foreign artistic craftsmanship."

WESTERN MAIL.—"The author writes with much knowledge upon a subject which is of interest not only to the collector of Pewter, but to the public generally. . . . Profusely and beautifully illustrated with sketches of many of the finest articles in Pewter extant."

The Etchings of Charles Meryon

With an Introduction by HUGH STOKES. 7s. 6d. net.

[Great Etchers.]

ABERDEEN JOURNAL.—"The book will undoubtedly be added to the library of every lover of this fascinating department of art. To the student of etching it will be of immense value."

SCOTSMAN.—"These plates should readily make any sympathetic spectator sensible of the touch of the artist's hand."

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.—"Messrs. Newnes have lived up to the contents of their volume by making it one of their most artistic productions which is saying a good deal."

Fra Angelico

With an Introduction by EDGCUMBE STALEY. 64 Full-page Reproductions and a Frontispiece in Photogravure. 3s. 6d. net. [Newnes' Art Library.]

CORK CONSTITUTION.—"To those who know the painters' work this volume will be delightfully reminiscent and a pleasant possession."

Australian Life in Town and Country

By E. C. BULEY. 3s. 6d. net.

[Our Empire Series.]

The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood

By J. ERNEST PHYTHIAN. 3s. 6d. net.

[Newnes' Art Library.]

DARLINGTON TIMES.—"The latest addition to the series, 'The Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood,' by J. Ernest Pythian, deserves to be ranked with the very best of its predecessors, alike for the interest and importance of the pictures, and for the knowledge and sympathy with which Mr. Pythian has done justice to a difficult and fascinating subject."

Puvis de Chavannes

By ARSENE ALEXANDRE. 3s. 6d. net.

[Newnes' Art Library.]

LIVERPOOL COURIER.—"The care that marks these renderings, and the tact that guides their selection, gives this series of Messrs. Newnes a peculiarly high value."

The Later Work of Titian

By HENRY MILES. 3s. 6d. net. [Newnes' Art Library.]

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"The book gives a good idea of Titian's power and versatility, which should be useful both to the student and to the collector."

Greek Life in Town and Country

By W. MILLER. Illustrated. 3s. 6d. net.

[Our Neighbours Series.]

CHRISTIAN COMMONWEALTH.—"The author knows Greece intimately. No more attractive work on the subject has ever appeared in our language."

Spenser's Faerie Queene

Two vols., cloth, 6s. net. Limp lambskin, 7s. net.

[Newnes' Thin Paper Classics.]

 Complete Illustrated Book List post free on application.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 3 to 12 Southampton Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Printed for the Proprietors by BALLANTYNE & Co. LIMITED, London, and Published at the Offices of COUNTRY LIFE, Tavistock Street, Covent Garden, and GEO. NEWNES, LTD. Southampton Street, Strand.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1764

FEBRUARY 24, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Distinctive System of Assurance.

LOW PREMIUMS. LOW EXPENSES.

Scottish Provident Institution

LONDON: 17 KING WILLIAM STREET, E.C.
WEST END: 17 PAUL MALL, S.W.
HEAD OFFICE: 6 ST. ANDREW SQUARE, EDINBURGH.

BRITISH MUSEUM.

THE Reading Rooms will be closed from Thursday, March 1, to Monday, March 5, inclusive.
E. MAUNDE THOMPSON,
Director and Principal Librarian.
British Museum,
February 20, 1906.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS,
All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.
School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

JUSTIN MCCARTHY'S PORTRAITS OF THE SIXTIES. 53 illustrations. 8vo, cloth, 15s. net for 4s. PEMBERTON'S LIFE OF BRIT HART. Illustrated, thick 8vo, cloth, 16s. for 3s. 3d., both new and post free.—Walker, 37, Briggate, Leeds

MORLEY, LIFE OF GLADSTONE, 1st edition, 3 vols., new and uncut, 30s.; Ruskin's Letters to M. and H. G., privately printed, 25s.—Apply Miss WARD, Belmont, Exeter.

Sale by Auction

The valuable Library of the late S. George Holland, Esq. MESSRS. SOTHEBY, WILKINSON, and HODGE will SELL by AUCTION (by order of the Executor), at their House, No. 13 Wellington Street, Strand, W.C., on Wednesday, February 28, and two following days, at 1 o'clock precisely, the valuable LIBRARY of the late S. George Holland, Esq. (of 22a Sussex Square), comprising first editions of modern authors, including the following writers:—A Beckett, Ainsworth, M. Arnold, Barham, Blackmore, Brontë, the Brownings, Dickens, Dodgson, George Eliot, Hardy, Leigh Hunt, Lady Jackson, G. P. R. James, Rich. Jefferies, Douglas Jerrold, J. H. Jesse, Charles Lamb, Andrew Lang, Chas. Lever, Capt. Marryat, Ruskin, Sir W. Scott, Shelley, R. L. Stevenson, R. S. Surtees, Swinburne, Lord Tennyson, Thackeray, etc. Special and Rare Works illustrated by Geo. and R. Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Leech, H. K. Brown, Doyle, etc., and Collection of Caricatures; fine sporting books by Alken, Orme, Millais, Grimble, Crealock, Apperley, Scrope, Taunton, etc.; Annals of Sporting and Fancy Gazette; Badminton Library, large paper; Fur and Feather Series, etc.; Ackermann's Publications, Goupil's Historical Monographs, extra-illustrated books, books on birds (including Gould's Birds of Great Britain); works on costume, Shakespeare's plays (20 vols.) printed upon vellum, Scholey, 1803-4, etc., the whole being in the choicest condition, in original parts or cloth uncut, or bound by the best binders. May be viewed two days prior. Catalogues may be had.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

DINNIS v. HENNIKER HEATON, M.P. Wanted a Copy of a Pamphlet, 16 pages 4to, addressed by R. Dinns to The Chairman of the Canterbury Conservative Association, July 1889.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

CAMBRIAN QUARTERLY MAGAZINE, 5 vols. Jones's History of Breconshire. Last Chronicles of Basset.—Lloyd & Townsend, Dillwyn Book Mart, Swansea.

BOOKS BOUGHT OR EXCHANGED. List of 3000 wanted, sent free. Entire Libraries Purchased for Cash. Good Prices paid for anything rare, curious, first editions, etc. Rare Books supplied. State Wants. JUCKES, Booksellers, Birmingham.

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING. Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings, Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. NOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W. Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W. Thursday next, March 1, at 5 o'clock, FRANCIS DARWIN, Esq., M.A., M.B., For. Sec. R. S. First of Three Lectures on "The Physiology of Plants." Half a Guinea the Course.

Saturday, March 3, at 3 o'clock, Professor JOSEPH JOHN THOMSON, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. First of Six Lectures on "The Corpuscular Theory of Matter." One Guinea. Subscription for all the Courses in the Season Two Guineas.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF WALES, ABERYSTWYTH (A Constituent College of the University of Wales).

PROFESSORSHIP OF ENGLISH.

The Council invite Applications for the post of Professor of English at the above College, at a Salary of £300 a year.

Applications, together with 75 printed copies of Testimonials, must reach the Registrar not later than Tuesday, March 13, 1906.

Full particulars may be obtained from the undersigned.

J. H. DAVIES, M.A.,
Registrar.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

ASSISTANT EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE, (20-25) April 5. The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

EDUCATION SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

OAKHAM SCHOOL (Rutland).

A small well-endowed Public School with numerous Exhibitions to the Universities.

The alterations and additions, which are now complete, make the buildings exceptionally good.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH. For particulars apply to the Headmaster.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL

for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—A. B., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

Continued on page 170

DR. K. FEYERABEND, PROFESSOR at the State College, Coethen (Germany), receives one or two English gentlemen. Refined home. Best German, Classics, etc. Polytechnic in the Town.

Art

OLD ENGRAVINGS WANTED of Oxford and Cambridge Colleges, large size, not from Almanacks. Also of public schools; particularly Eton with boys bathing by Silvester, Ackermann's, coloured, of Eton, Harrow, and Westminster; any of Shrewsbury and Tonbridge. Prices must be moderate.—E. A. A., 12E Oxford and Cambridge Mansions, N.W.

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water-colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts), Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French. German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING. AUTHORS' MSS., 10d. 1000 all descriptions: neat, prompt, accurate; duplicating a speciality. Shorthand, translations. References. MICHEL, 23, Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S. W.

FOR THE FIRST TIME IN ENGLISH.

L'AVOCAT PATELIN

The Popular Version of the Famous Fifteenth-Century Farce.

By the ABBÉ BRUEYS

Translated by SAMUEL F. G. WHITAKER.
Crown 8vo. Price 2s.

"Accurate without being too literal."

MORNING POST.

"Well put into English."

EVENING STANDARD & ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

"An attractive edition. Reads freshly."

MORNING LEADER.

"A translation was wanted and Mr. Whitaker has notably achieved that difficult task."

WESTMINSTER REVIEW.

"The present lively and readable version makes less of the play's historical interest than of its entertaining qualities as a piece of fun still fresh. It is well made, and will prove welcome to many who have not access to the heavier work."—SCOTSMAN.

"Reads smoothly and preserves the fun of the piece."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

T, FISHER UNWIN, 1 ADELPHI TERRACE, W.C.

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW BOOKS

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

NATURE'S VAGABOND, etc. By COSMO HAMILTON, Author of "Duke's Son," etc.

CASTE AND CREED. By F. E. PENNY, Author of "The Sanyasi," "Dilys," etc.

HUGO: A Fantasia on Modern Themes. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

FOR LIFE—AND AFTER. By GEORGE R. SIMS (Dagonet).

IN THE ROARING FIFTIES. By EDWARD DYSON, Author of "The Gold-Stealers." [March 8.]

MARA: AN UNCONVENTIONAL WOMAN. By CHRIS HEALY, Author of "Heirs of Reuben." [March 15.]

A MENDER OF NETS. By WILLIAM MACKAY, Author of "The Popular Idol." [March 22.]

LOVE AND LORDSHIP. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh." [March 29.]

THE POCKET GEORGE MACDONALD. Being a Choice of Passages from his Works made by ALFRED H. HYATT. Uniform with The Pocket R.L.S. and The Pocket Richard Jefferies. 16mo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

LIFE IN MOROCCO. By BUDGETT MEAKIN, Author of "The Land of the Moors." With 24 full-page Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 12s. 6d. net.

CHARING CROSS AND ITS NEIGHBOURHOOD. By J. HOLDEN MACMICHAEL, With 3 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF THE SOUTH SEAS. By CLEMENT L. WRAGGE, F.R.G.S. With 84 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net. [March 1.]

LITERARY RAMBLES IN THE WEST OF ENGLAND. By ARTHUR L. SALMON. With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net. [March 8.]

CHEAPER EDITIONS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. each.

COLONEL THORNDYKE'S SECRET. By G. A. HENTY. With a Frontispiece by STANLEY L. WOOD.

THE CRUISE OF THE "BLACK PRINCE" PRIVATEER. By Commander CAMERON. With 2 Illustrations by P. MACNAB.

A CRIMSON CRIME. By G. MANVILLE FENN.

MR. VERDANT GREEN. By CUTHBERT BEDE. With 65 Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth, 1s. net. [Shortly.]

POPULAR SIXPENNY COPYRIGHT NOVELS.

The following are in course of publication:

The Grand Babylon Hotel, By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Madame Sans-Gene. By E. LEPELLETIER.

Ariadne. By OUIDA.

Beyond the Pale. By B. M. CROKER.

Eve. By S. BARING-GOULD.

The Double Marriage. By CHARLES READE.

Fettered for Life. By FRANK BARRETT.

The Monks of Thelema. By BESANT and RICE.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS,
111 St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

Publishers' Media.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE

10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes.

Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events.

Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fullest Reports of All Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE SPHERE

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week.

Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE

10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily.

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books.

Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS

The Morning Newspaper for Aberdeen

AND THE

Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

Special enlarged issues on SATURDAYS, which appeal particularly to the reading public on account of their interesting literary contents.

Tudor House, Tudor Street, London, E.C.

Applications for above spaces should be made to Messrs. Crossley & Co.,
57A Coleman Street, London, E.C.
Special Rates for a Series will be quoted.

"THE ACADEMY" is POSTED FREE
(52 issues at 3d.) to every ANNUAL SUB-
SCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying
15s. FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PRE-
PAYMENT of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy. Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or News vendor, or direct to the Publisher, 5-7 Southampton Street, Strand,
W.C.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week . . .	171	Fiction . . .	181
Literature:		The Drama:
Rich and Poor . . .	173	"Le Detour" at the New
Demosthenes . . .	174	Royalty Theatre . . .	182
The Literature of Ireland . . .	175	Fine Art:
Three Dorset Sailors . . .	176	Canossa . . .	183
The Happy Garden-tate . . .	177	Music:
Sympathy and Antipathy . . .	178	The Oxford History of Music—
The Warfare of Science . . .	178	III . . .	184
In the Val d'Arno . . .	179	Forthcoming Books . . .	185
Literary Causerie:		Correspondence . . .	187
The Endings of Poems . . .	180	Books Received . . .	188
The Bookshelf . . .	189

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

MR. W. D. HOWELLS, in his reflections from the Easy Chair in the current Harper's on Mr. Henry Holt's recent Atlantic Monthly essay on the "Commercialisation of Literature," thinks that Mr. Holt has miscalled his present essay, and that he has really written on the demoralisation of the book trade. "He has written of this," characteristically avers Mr. Howells, "very knowledgeably, of course, and very justly, but, upon the whole, we feel not hopefully enough. . . . The relation of the author to his publisher is altogether of a gracefulest and sincerest friendship than the relation of patron and client in which literature lived before it was at all 'commercialised.'" Publication is, and always has been, says Mr. Howells, commercialised; but literature can be commercialised only when it aims to sell, or aims in unworthy ways to please. The corruption of literature can be wrought only through the authors of it.

Publishers' relations with the author, according to Mr. Howells, are very intimate, very tender; and "they are more so than other business relations because they (the publishers) somehow feel his helplessness, his generic haplessness." "It may be," Mr. Howells continues slyly, "that there is something peculiarly winning in the literary temperament; we would like to think so; or it may be that publishers are of exceptionally affectionate natures, or that their business is one which singularly softens and subdues the asperities of the mercantile relation." Delicious! But is it true?

The publisher of the sixteenth century was, nine times out of ten, a rogue and a thief. When we come to the eighteenth century we find bad publishers, in whom the asperities of the mercantile relation were very asperous indeed, and fatherly, benevolent publishers, who took their risks, advanced money to the dissolute, spendthrift children who worked for them (when they felt inclined), and have been unjustly handed down to execration because they took those risks into consideration, and remembered that, after all, they were men of business and not charitable institutions.

We imagine that publishers were quite at their best in the early days of the nineteenth century. There are many stories in literary history which show their paternal kindness and their long-suffering consideration for these wayward, tiresome children of genius; and if the annals of the House of Murray, for instance, or the house of Smith, Elder, were all told, we should probably find a hundred more such cases. But can we follow Mr. Howells into his delightful aperçu of the position of to-day?

We believe that there is no class of business men nowadays so just, so considerate, and so idealistic as the publishers. Harassed by competition that grows stronger every day, worried by a swarm of authors and robbed of much of their profits by a chaotic law of copyright, they preserve (most of them) their patience and their sense of humour. It cannot be the nature of their business that softens the asperities. No position—not even that of an Editor—can be more full of anxiety and disappointment. And the modern writer is certainly not helpless. As to his being winning, that is a personal matter; there can be no question that the publisher is too often losing.

Still, the intimate and tender relations go on. Only the other day the lions and the lambs (which class is which, let the reader decide for himself) met over the hospitable board of that energetic body, the Lyceum Club. The Literary Board of the Bureau invited Mr. Reginald Smith, President of the Publishers' Association, Mr. John Murray, Mr. Adam Black and others to meet Mr. Halliwell Sutcliffe, Mrs. Steel, Mrs. Blundell, Miss Mitton and a great many more, and the talk was all of Jane Austen and the Brontës, and not at all, we understand, of rights, royalties, commission, and half-profits. Perhaps that came next day in the offices. But it looks as if one part of Mr. Howells's contention were true.

We can sympathise with The Times in its fall before the very strong temptation to reproduce passages from the instalment of news sent it by a Dutch news agency as an example of its work. "Netherland and the Conference in Algieras.—With an eye upon the speedily expected dividing of the attorneys in two parties, after the occasion of the French-German difference, outed the Dutch press the wish, that now is explained which standing point the Dutch attorneys will take in this." Foreign news expressed in the manner of Mr. Anstey in Punch would add to the gaiety of breakfast-tables, if resulting in the bewilderment of nations. But the oddest thing about it is that it is a Dutch agency from which this comes. The Dutch are exceptionally good linguists. We have heard Mr. "Maarten Maartens" declare the reason to be that his countrymen have such a distressing language of their own (readers of Mr. Lucas's "Wanderer in Holland" will remember what the Dutch for "motor-car" is) that they are forced in self-defence to learn others. Mr. Maartens himself is a fair example; and only last year we saw a Dutch actor, Mr. Henri de Vries, master English in three months. The bulb-catalogue of Mr. J. J. Thoolen used to be a yearly source of hilarity; partly from the command of our language (we remember a tulip described as "blotched, spotted, streaked, speckled and flushed"), and partly from the ignorance of it which was displayed. Then came a change for the better (or worse) in its English, and we read it now without a smile. Perhaps the same will happen to this news agency, if The Times will give it encouragement.

Mr. Seaman is the third Cambridge man in succession to be called to the editorship of Punch. Tom Taylor was a Fellow of Trinity, Sir Francis Burnand was an undergraduate of the same College, the new editor is of Clare, and a Porson University prizeman. Another Clare man on the staff is the Reverend A. C. Deane, while Mr. Anstey Guthrie is of Trinity. It is a triumph for the Universities to be able to compel the world to acknowledge that, even at wit and humour, University men do better work than others. The competition between Punch and Fun, at one time keen, was, in a way, a contest in which the Universities were matched against All England. Fun was, in those days, very well represented; its contributors including Tom Hood, Henry Sampson, the founder of the Referee, Ambrose Bierce, the author of "In the midst of Life," Mr. George R. Sims, and Mr. W. S. Gilbert, whose "Bab Ballads" appeared in its columns; but the result of the competition was never seriously in doubt. The Punch men were bound to win, because they moved on a higher plane of ideas. They might be just as frivolous as the Fun men, but they knew more both of books and of the world.

We have commented before on the inferiority of Oxford to Cambridge in the art in which the great names are those of Calverley, J. K. Stephen, Mr. Owen Seaman, and Mr. Adrian Ross. The difference is one which does not show itself, as a rule, until after the undergraduate days are over. The undergraduate wits of Oxford are just as witty, and just as frivolous, as the undergraduate wits of Cambridge. The Oxford Spectator was quite as clever as the Granta and to our contemporary, The Isis, wittiest and jolliest of University journals, we turn with avidity every week. The parodies of Browning and Whittman which Mr. Quiller-Couch wrote for the Oxford Magazine were quite as good as anything of the kind ever produced at the other University. But the Oxford wit has, far more noticeably than the Cambridge wit, a tendency to grow more serious as he grows older—to turn from the quip and crank to the serious criticism of life. Of the jesters of the Oxford Spectator for instance, one became a Bishop and another is the present art critic of the Times; while Mr. Quiller-Couch, who began like Mr. Seaman, is now trying to do for Cornwall what R. D. Blackmore did for Devonshire.

No doubt the cause may be found in the curriculum. The Cambridge men study the classics as linguists, and excel in the verbal felicities. Their best writers of English verse have been, like Calverley, equally good as writers of Latin verse. They have often, also like Calverley, had nothing to say, and have said it excellently well. The Oxford man is far less of a linguist; but his mind bears the additional burden of Mill's "Logic" and Kant's "Critique of Pure Reason." Language, therefore, bears a closer relation to thought at the older University, and the Oxonian, when he leaves Oxford, puts away what he considers childish things. One can see even Mr. Andrew Lang and Mr. Chesterton trying to do it week after week in the causerie columns of the Illustrated London News. There remains, of course, Mr. Godley on the other side; but he ought to have been at Cambridge, where he would have been discouraged from rhyming "Magrath" with "star" after the manner of the Cockneys.

We notice with some dismay a growing fancifulness in end-papers. We have a book before us in which the end-papers are imitations of the striped skin of some jungle-beast; and the design, as a stamp in the corner proves, has been registered. We sincerely hope that was an unnecessary precaution, and that no one would wish to imitate it. Some travel-works we have lately seen have shown brilliant green end-papers with maps on them—useful, no doubt, but exceedingly ugly. We have no complaint to make against such comic end-papers as may be found, for instance, in the Westminster Gazette Office Boy's "Political Parables," in which Mr. Francis Brown depicts the members of the late Administration swimming about in life-belts after shipwreck in a stormy sea; nor, of course, to the graceful and delicate designs that decorate the end-papers of Messrs. Dent's and Messrs. Newnes's reprints. It is, indeed, the knowledge of how beautiful end-papers can be—the recollection of the lovely things which Morleys of Oxford used to allow one to choose for oneself—that moves us to a protest against the pursuit of the bizarre at the expense of the beautiful.

In the Nineteenth Century Miss Florence B. Low relates the result of some inquiries into the question: What girls read? One wonders if people will ever cease professing to be shocked because such inquiries show that girls are not specially devoted to the classical writers, whether living or dead. Girls, like the rest of us, read chiefly for their amusement; and it is a poor compliment to a great writer to suggest that his work is specially suitable for the pupils of an Academy for Young Ladies. It does not follow that because Shakespeare is a greater writer than Edna Lyall, boarding-school misses will derive greater advantage from his writings. Just as it is necessary for them to study spelling books before they make any use of dictionaries, and to practise five-finger exercises before they can play sonatas, so a course of Edna Lyall may be a very proper prelude to a course of the literature which makes heavier demands on the experience and the intelligence. Hamlet must necessarily be "words, words, words," to the average school-girl: and she is likely to be too young even to understand Cordelia, because she is too young to understand King Lear. She may, or may not, grow up to feel the real greatness of Shakespeare; but to cry out because she does not feel it while she is at school is as unreasonable as to cry out because she does not read Hegel or John Stuart Mill.

An American lady, Miss Myrtle Reed, has made an ingenious proposal. She has dared to attack man, the novelist, on the ground that he breaks down whenever he attempts to describe a woman's dress. To remedy this defect, she suggests a course of lectures on feminine attire at the School of Journalism at the University of Columbia. Perhaps Anglo-Saxon authors are to seek in this respect; but in France, where everything that relates to woman is appreciated at its true value, the reverse is the case. M. Paul Bourget, in particular, is evidently a diligent student of the fashion plates, while M. George Ohnet pays hardly less attention to their teaching.

The three days' sale at Messrs. Sotheby's on February 28 and March 1 and 2, will deal with the library of the late Mr. S. George Holland of Sussex Square, Hyde Park. The collection is especially strong in first editions of nineteenth-century writers, mainly novelists and poets, illustrators such as Cruikshank, Rowlandson, Leech, H. K. Browne, and Doyle, and sporting books by Alken, Orme, Grimble, Crealock, Apperley, Scrope, works on Costume, and works on Birds.

Amongst the first editions are Ainsworth's "Jack Sheppard," "The Tower of London," "Old St. Paul's," "The Miser's Daughter," and the "Lord Mayor of London"; Matthew Arnold's "Strayed Reveller"; Barham's "Ingoldsby Legends"; Blackmore's "Lorna Doone"; all the works of the Brontës, the Brownings, Dickens, Thomas Hardy, Leigh Hunt, Richard Jefferies, Douglas Jerrold, Jesse, Charles Lever, Lord Lytton, Capt. Marryat, Shelley (including "Queen Mab"), R. L. Stevenson, Swinburne, Tennyson and Thackeray. Among the larger books are a set of Goupil's Illustrated Historical Monographs and Gould's "Birds of Great Britain," five volumes, 1873, bound by Zaehnsdorf, the Duke of Buccleuch's original subscription copy. An unusual feature of the sale is a copy of Shakespeare's Works printed on vellum. All the books are in perfect condition.

The following is the dedication of Mrs. Marriott Watson's new book, "The Heart of a Garden":

TO LADY NORTHCLIFFE

Birds in your garden once again—
(The old-time garden that you love)—
Wake to the touch of silver rain,
Sing while the gold sun mounts above.

So runs it still, the ancient tale,
Through immemorial years foretold—
The dreaming bride behind the veil,
The conquering Prince with spurs of gold.

And those that say and those that sing
 (As thousands dead have said and sung),
 Do but enregister the spring,
 But praise that world where all is young,
 O, many a dream it fades and dies,
 And many a hope it lives in vain,
 But never dream of April skies,
 And never hope of soft spring rain.
 Then for your ancient pleasaunce' sake,
 With all its fair sequestered ways,
 Dear Lady of the Garden, take
 This book of garden dreams and days.

The Literary Theatre Society, Limited, is a new body formed for the occasional performance of what for want of a better word we must call "literary" plays. The members at present are: Mr. Laurence Binyon, Miss Gwendolen Bishop, Miss Florence Farr, Mr. T. Sturge Moore, Mr. W. A. Pye, Mr. C. S. Ricketts and Mr. C. H. Shannon. The first performance will take place on Sunday, March 25, the play chosen being a somewhat enlarged and altered version of Mr. Sturge Moore's Aphrodite against Artemis, with scenery and costumes designed by Mr. C. S. Ricketts. We hope shortly to publish the terms of subscription and further details: meanwhile application should be made to the secretary of the Literary Theatre Society, Limited, at 20 St. James's Square, Holland Park, W.

On Sunday, February 25, at the New Royalty Theatre, by the courtesy of Mr. Gaston Mayer, the dramatic section of the Dramatic Debaters will produce, under the direction of Mr. Nugent Monck, the following one-act plays: Miss Vere D'Arsay, by F. M. Meyer; The Death of a Soul, by Robert Kelso; and Treasure Trove, by Edith A. Browne. Applications for membership will be received by the Hon. Treasurer, Mr. F. D. Bone, 6 Bolingbroke Mansions, Wandsworth Common, S.W.

An open competitive examination for not fewer than twelve situations as assistant examiner in the Patent Office will be held by the Civil Service Commissioners in April next. The examination will commence on the 23rd of the month, and forms of application for admission to it are now ready for issue and may be obtained on request addressed by letter to the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens, London, W.

Society of Arts: Arrangements for week ending March 3. Monday, February 26, at 8 P.M., Cantor Lectures—"Modern Warships," by Sir William White, K.C.B., F.R.S. (five lectures). Lecture V.—Recent types of warships, British and foreign—Battleships—Armoured and protected cruisers—Scouts—Torpedo-boats and destroyers—Submarines. Wednesday, February 28, at 8 P.M. Ordinary Meeting: "London Traffic," by Captain G. S. C. Swinton, L.C.C. Sir John Wolfe-Barry, K.C.B., LL.D., F.R.S., will preside.

Physical Society of London. A meeting of the Society will be held at 5 P.M. on Friday, February 23, 1906, at the Royal College of Science, Exhibition Road, South Kensington. Agenda: (1) A Note on Talbot's Bands, by Mr. James Walker; (2) Secondary Röntgen Radiation, by Mr. Chas. G. Barkla; (3) Records of the Difference of Potential between Railway Lines, and a suggested Method for the Observation of Earth-Currents and Magnetic Variations, by Messrs. C. W. S. Crawley and F. B. O. Hawes. Council Meeting at 4.45 P.M.

Linnean Society of London. Evening meeting, Thursday, March 1, at 8 P.M., when the following papers will be read: Dr. D. H. Scott, F.R.S., F.L.S., "On a type of Stem from the Coal Measures"; Dr. H. C. Sorby, F.R.S., F.L.S., "Notes on some species of Nereis in the District of the Thames Estuary."

The usual Spring Announcements Supplement to the ACADEMY will be issued with the number of March 10.

LITERATURE

RICH AND POOR

The Great Refusal. By MAXWELL GRAY. (Long, 6s.)

It would be gross flattery if we were to say that this book is anything like so good as "The Silence of Dean Maitland," an earlier novel by the same writer. It is more garish and flamboyant; and yet there is much in it that deserves more than a passing notice. Evidently the author began with the intention of giving expression to that current of thought in our own time that rebels against the excessive luxury indulged in by some of the richer people. Very likely she would object to the use of the word "some," because, as is the way of social reformers, she makes her indictment sweeping and writes as though all were equally guilty. We can easily fancy that, in laying down the lines of this book, the writer took a careful and detailed survey of the situation. She saw that it was necessary to paint the evils against which the protest was directed. We are, therefore, presented with a lurid picture of the more or less Babylonish society of the twentieth century. The story opens at Oxford University amid athletics and gaiety and the poetry and charm which are combined in that home of "lost causes." Beneath the surface, however, there is already growing in the mind of the young student, Adrian Bassett, a belief that the supreme gift of life was not bestowed for the mere purpose of devoting it to self-gratification. He evidently begins to think even then that there must be a purpose behind it all and that there is some truth in the ancient biblical saying that one day "thy soul shall be required of thee." In other words, when the supreme test comes to be applied, it will not be asked what a man has done to push himself forward or to satisfy his own lusts and desires, but how the world has benefited by his existence. So one of the earliest incidents in this novel shows the hero of it in an act of protest. His moral earnestness, or what some would scathingly call his "yearnerness," sends him to a Settlement in the East End where he is tortured by the spectacle of the brutality and hunger and wretchedness prevalent there. Indeed, he is a little feminine and emotional through all this, and is moved, as the old books say, to the point of tears. He murmurs again and again, in something like the madness of despair: "after two thousand years, after two thousand years." Meantime society is pursuing its usual course in the wealthy quarters of the city. The fascination of Bridge, which seems to be career enough for some women of quality, the excitement of mere gambling, the still greater excitement of strong drink indulged in by some of the fashionable beauties of the day—these are all depicted in glaring colours. The author has, in fact, tried her utmost to reflect the amusements of the wealthy. A caustic reviewer would probably add that it would have been well if she had made herself more familiar with them, as the descriptions, even when they are not absolutely inaccurate, verge closely upon caricature. Polo at Ranelagh is a case in point, though the description of it is not so absolutely fatuous as that of golf at St. Andrews. The writer is evidently under the hallucination that the last drive at the last hole decides the match, for, when it is made, the hero of the moment turns proudly away and walks towards the club-house, while "Who has it?" was echoed on all hands." There is a reference to chess also which shows a profound ignorance of the first elements of the game. When describing a dinner at the Carlton Restaurant and the dresses worn there, the author is much more at home. To a fine nature all this sort of thing is naturally repugnant; and, if it had been well presented, we could easily have understood Adrian's action in refusing the wealth that ought to have been his by inheritance and choosing in preference the hard and difficult life of the unskilled labourer in the East End; but the touch of reality that would have ensured this is absent, and we are compelled to pursue the idea through ranks of shadowy figures, which the author in vain tries to enwrap with the outward signs of humanity. In fairness, however, it must be said that this criticism applies much more to the earlier chapters of the book than to the end, where the writer's style improves and her grip and handling are more admirable. It is scarcely our business to follow these simulacra and the manœuvres which they are compelled to execute in order to bring about the predestined result, which is the establishment of a Brotherhood in East Africa. It is to be a kind of happy valley of oblivion where "falls not hail, or rain, or any snow," or, in other words, where "the still, sad music of humanity" is not heard, but where life will go on without the pangs and struggles and brutalities that deface it in this old and decadent empire. It is not a great ending to the story, nor is the moral of it as patent as the writer imagines. Adrian Bassett and his fellows must have learned what a Latin author indicated some two thousand years ago. They could change their land but not the human heart. That they carry with them, and the reader in the end feels that the hero's dream is all moonshine and his hopes a fallacy; that away in that colony he is going to found, rage and passion and licence will break out, just as they did at home. It would have been a manlier part to face the music and try to the utmost to do what could be done to remedy some of the flagrant evils of which there is so keen a consciousness.

But the author fails chiefly because she has not defined exactly what she would be at. In regard to the condition of the poor, her hero is an ignoramus. He knows nothing of that achievement in the past of which, in Tennysonian language, we may say that that which they have done is but earnest of the things that they shall do. Amid the clamour raised by the social reformers of to-day we must not allow it to be forgotten that labour during the last half-century has made a mighty advance. It is better housed, better fed, better clothed and better educated than it was in the old time. The generation of Englishmen of to-day is the healthiest and the strongest that ever existed, and the brutality which was common a hundred years ago is now a far rarer occurrence. Take such an offence as wife-beating, for instance. We know that it used to be quite usual, and nobody was alarmed at it; whereas to-day a man found guilty of it would not only be punished at law, but would be branded by public opinion. This is a great advance to have made; and, far from deterring the young enthusiast, it might have given him hope of greater achievements in the time to come. For the luxury for which he has a great distaste, it is not easy to say anything apologetic, and the author would have scored much more effectually if she had confined herself to this theme. No doubt, as is pointed out in the book, the American millionaire is a good deal to blame. He it was who started giving those luxurious banquets which previously, if not unknown, had at least been very uncommon in English society. He was followed by the self-made nouveau riche, and the latter, from the very nature of the case, is bound to have friends at both ends of the social scale, so that the influence swept downward till the honest and homely dinner of our ancestors has too often become a luxurious feast. This is not an argument in favour of the simple life. There is a certain want of candour on the part of those who are continually declaiming against the taste for fine things. As a matter of fact, if we speak plainly, most of us have a hearty enjoyment of them. In themselves they are not evil, and if the man who has his hard work to do in this world finds that they yield him rest and refreshment and recreation, they are justified so far as he is concerned. It is not against those who work however, that this sermon should be directed, but against those with whom the be-all and end-all of existence is luxury and amusement. The author should have concentrated her attention there; but in no circumstances would a novel written so unashamedly with a purpose "be worth dignifying with the name of art."

DEMOSTHENES

Demosthenes against Midias. By WILLIAM W. GOODWIN, Ph.D., Hon. LL.D. and D.C.L. (Cambridge University Press, 9s.)

THE speech against Midias is interesting in many ways. It gives us some insight (like most of the private orations) into the social life of an Athenian citizen of the Demosthenic age. We learn how a wealthy citizen of Athens could make such large use of his influence as to enable him to pass furtive remarks to the jury while they were being sworn, and to block the passage of the chorus from their dressing-room through the proscenium to the orchestra, to both of which vexatious acts Midias resorted in his eagerness to insult and injure Demosthenes. We read with satisfaction that when the same pretentious plutocrat arrived in Euboea, where he was to serve as a cavalry officer, riding on a saddle with silver trappings, and furnished with many woollen cloaks, drinking-cups and wine jars, the customs officers seized these articles as not being a natural part of a cavalry officer's equipment. The speech, moreover, is full of interesting points in Attic procedure, and is the only extant argument in a case of προβολή, which was a preliminary appeal to the public Assembly, who could not try or punish the offender themselves, but could advise his dismissal or pass him on for trial by a regularly constituted court of law, just as our Grand Jury can find, or not find, a true bill against a person brought before it. The Ecclesia found a true bill against Midias for an assault on Demosthenes when officiating as choregus in the theatre of Dionysus at the great Dionysiac festival. The extant speech, like that brilliant ignoratio elenchi, the pro Milone of Cicero, was never delivered, Demosthenes having dropped the prosecution in consideration of a sum of thirty minae (three thousand drachmae, a little more than one hundred and twenty pounds sterling) paid to him by the wealthy Midias. This introduces the third and highest source of interest in the speech, as constituting valuable evidence in the question of the moral and political character of Demosthenes.

Plutarch made a hero of Demosthenes, as he did of Brutus in Roman history, and it is only in quite recent times that the high reputation of either has been impugned. Dr. Goodwin is on the side of Plutarch. Touching the bribe he writes :

There were other influences at that time which were stronger in the mind of Demosthenes than the fear of a defeat in his lawsuit. The year 349 B.C. in which the suit was dropped was an eventful period in the early public life of Demosthenes. His ambition was then set on far higher matters than avenging his private wrongs. He had recently delivered the first Philippic and the Olynthiacs were already in his mind, while the threatening movements of Philip in the North were doubtless of far greater concern to him than the assault of Midias. A defeat would have been a heavy blow to his private hopes, and even a victory would have left behind it animosities which might have seriously endangered his political success. His first and greatest struggle was to unite the people of Athens at once in opposition to Philip, and he could not afford to alienate any men of influence at this critical moment.

This is, of course, a pleasing and generous view, but it has not commended itself to the majority of German historians, and we must not forget that the Athenian State regarded the act of Demosthenes as we do misprision of felony, though the consequences in Athens were far less serious, being a trifling fine of a thousand drachmae which was not always exacted.

The amazing force of his greatest public speeches, those on The Crown and the Paraprosbeia, the Olynthiacs and the Philippics, and his unrivalled power of clear narrative must not blind us to the fact that he is often sophistical and sometimes self-contradictory. "Every great statesman must be both idealist and realist" observes a modern historian of Greece, Dr. Adolf Holms, "but Demosthenes is so within the limits of a single speech." In a Philippic oration (ii. 13) he acknowledges the right of Sparta to Messene in the year B.C. 344; in the same context he contests the right of Thebes to Orchomenos; in B.C. 338 he gives it and all Boeotia to Thebes. In Parapresbeia § 78, when it is urged that the Phocians are ruined but Athens has retained the Chersonese, he exclaims: "do not for Heaven's sake let it be said that to protect your own possessions you sacrificed the interests of your allies." In § 79 he says: "you have never hurt even Lacedaemon nor the cursed Euboea, except when the interests of Athens demanded it." In De Corona § 199, he declares that Athens would have taken the field against Philip on behalf of Greece even though she knew that she was destined to succumb; in § 301 he boasts of the policy of making Euboea and Boeotia buffers (προβάλλεσθαι) for Athens. What would have been the result if he had propounded this view to Thebes when he sought to enlist her against Philip? In 352-350 Demosthenes spoke for Phormio against Apollodorus and for Apollodorus against Stephanus, one of Phormio's witnesses; hence defenders of Demosthenes insist that the speech against Stephanus is spurious, and certainly if it is genuine there is some ground for the sneer of the enemies of Demosthenes recorded by Plutarch. In allusion to his father's business as a sword-maker, they said that the orator supplied daggers to both combatants from the same warehouse. Professor Blass defends the action of Demosthenes in defending Apollodorus as a return for the latter's kindness in introducing a motion for the better administration of the Theoric Fund in place of Demosthenes, who feared a γραφὴ παρανόμων, or public impeachment for an unconstitutional act. If so, Apollodorus would be like an editor who should take on himself the consequences of a libel uttered by a contributor; but can we believe that an important public motion would be entrusted by Demosthenes to the son of the ruined money-changer Pasion? After all, Demosthenes was a logographos and he could not pick and choose among his briefs. Demosthenes branded as a perjurer in the contra Stephanum the same man whom he invoked as a witness in the contra Apollodorum; but it was all in the way of business and could probably be paralleled in our own courts. Contrast Cicero's view of Rome's duty to the provinces put forth in the Verrines with that urged in the pro Fonteio.

The Demosthenic epoch was one in which second-class Greek states began to assert themselves. The Thebans and Thessalians managed to get the control of the Amphictyonic Council and to induce them to impose on the Phocians a heavy fine. Athens helped Phocis by sending a fleet to the neighbourhood of Thermopylae, which prevented the Thessalians from invading Phocis. It was a success of Phocis against Thessaly which first brought Philip to interfere in the affairs of Greece at the instance of the Aleuadae, the great noble family of Thessaly. Philip defeated Onomarchus, captured Pagasae and pushed on to Thermopylae. It was then (B.C. 352) that the Athenian fleet under Eubulus checked Philip and postponed for some six years his conquest of Greece. The year before this Megalopolis asked Athens for aid against Sparta, which was eager to destroy the new city that was the sign and head of the Arcadian confederation. Demosthenes advised Athens to comply—his first appearance in a case involving an important political question. Demosthenes laid down as the condition of Athenian support of Megalopolis the latter's abandonment of Thebes, his main political principle being that both Sparta and Thebes must be kept in a weak state. But such a policy is sound only when no enemy threatens Greece from without. The mistake of Demosthenes was that he encouraged Athens to think that she could still be arbitress of Hellas, and offended Sparta so much that she would not make common cause against Philip. Moreover, as we have observed above, Demosthenes changed his mind on this very question in the second Philippic. It is not true that Hellas was threatened with servitude by Philip, who, however, certainly had Hegemony in view. The policy of Demosthenes resulted in the exploitation of Hellas by Persia. The Macedonian rule had no influence in broadening the narrow and petty life of the Greek States. A voluntary alliance with Macedonia would have had a salutary effect. If the Greeks had honestly thrown in their lot with Philip and Alexander in the spirit of Isocrates, they would have reaped the advantage of the conquest of Asia without the evils which Macedonian rule entailed: for in that case there would have been no occasion for Macedonian garrisons in Greek territory. The election of Philip before Chaeronea as commander-in-chief of Hellas against Persia would have secured Greek independence. Demosthenes deceived Athens in two ways: he absurdly underrated the military capacity of Philip, and he persuaded Athens that Philip desired to destroy her utterly (δῶς ἀνελεῖν). Had Philip been defeated at Chaeronea, the Greek republics would have continued hiring out their generals and soldiers to Persia, instead of confronting her in the field.

Though there is perhaps nowhere in Demosthenes such a splendid piece of pure eloquence as the speech of Pericles over the earliest victims of the Peloponnesian war in the second book of Thucydides, his earnestness is unsurpassed, and he is never diffuse. When Demosthenes called Phocion the κοπὴς of his periods he did not mean "pruner," as the phrase is usually translated. There is in Demosthenes no redundancy to prune. He meant by the term the sound, sincere, unadorned common sense of Phocion, which he likens to a cleaver or kitchen knife, which was more effective against his passionate appeals to the Athenian mob than the rapier-play of those who practised rhetoric and dialectic like his own. A mis-translation of an expression in Plutarch has fathered on Demosthenes an absurd observation which he never would have made. The story is that Demosthenes, being asked the three chief requisites of oratory, replied: "Action, action, action." This has been understood to mean gesture, and thus oratory is confounded with a graceful though not essential appanage of it. What he said was "acting" (ὑπόκρισις is Plutarch's word), the art of the actor, who assumes the emotions which he wishes to excite, obeying the Horatian rule:

*Si vis me flere dolendum est
Primum ipsi tibi.*

It is superfluous to add that the scholarship of the notes, both critical and explanatory, is of the first order. The Appendix is full of learned and lucid explanation of Attic procedure. Whoever enjoys a nice piece of grammatical analysis should read Appendix vii., "On certain supposed Cases of the Nominative with the Infinitive."

R. Y. TYRRELL.

THE LITERATURE OF IRELAND

Heroic Romances of Ireland. Translated by A. H. LEAHY.
(Nutt, vol. i. 5s. net; vol. ii. 3s. net.)

In the collection of Heroic Romances before us—the second and third volumes of the Irish Saga Library—Mr. Leahy has given to English readers some of the oldest romances, in literary forms which seem to him to correspond to the literary forms of the Irish; and so far as the actual rendering is concerned, we have nothing but praise for his industry and his scholarship. His translation is almost always faithful, his style is clear and free from affectation, and he has succeeded admirably in preserving the effect of the original versions. The first volume contains five stories, all of which are in the customary form of prose and verse. It has been argued by some that the prose, by others that the verse was the original form, but we need not stop to discuss the many theories which have been advanced to account for this blending, which makes its appearance in all old Irish legends. The verses occur at the points needing particular emphasis, and we think there is little doubt that the stories were told in simple, direct prose, the verses being added to arouse in the listeners the instincts of patriotism and so on. Many translations of the romances (e.g., Miss Faraday's translation of the Leabhar na h-Uidhri version of the Great Tain) omit the rhetoric—exhortations, challenges, and songs of triumph—entirely, with a result similar, as Mr. Leahy remarks, to that which would be produced by the omission of all the choruses from a Greek tragedy. In the whole of the present collection there are not more than a score of rhetorical passages, but these, as well as the regular verse, Mr. Leahy has rendered with a fidelity which, in view of the difficulty which former translators have experienced, it would be hard to praise too highly.

Of the five stories in vol. i., two versions are given of the first, "The Courtship of Etain," one from the Egerton manuscript, 1782, the other from the Leabhar na h-Uidhri, the oldest Irish manuscript of romance. There are other authorities: the Yellow Book of Lecan, the Book of Leinster, and references in different copies of the "Dindshenchas" under Rath Esa, Rath Croghan, and Bri Leith; but they add little to the two versions here printed, and we think Mr. Leahy chose wisely. True, the Leabhar na h-Uidhri version is imperfect, but the translator has filled in the three gaps, and, though he has been unable to complete the description of the chess match, the ending of the tale—based on a passage in O'Curry's "Manners and Customs" in reference to a hitherto untranslated manuscript source, and on the "Dindshenchas" of Rath Esa—is adequate. The Egerton version is undoubtedly superior from a literary standpoint: it is more human, and the supernatural element is subordinate. In the Leabhar na h-Uidhri version the human interest is subordinated to the supernatural: the love interest is hurried over, while the scene in fairyland with which the story opens, and the ending, where Mider again appears, are dwelt on in a prose which is often touched by poetic imagery. So unequal is it that one is forced to the conclusion that the central part was inserted by the compiler of the manuscript, who may, as Mr. Leahy suggests, have pieced together two romances founded on the same legend by different authors, as he undoubtedly did in the "Sick-bed of Cuchulain." It is not, indeed, improbable that he condensed the version now known as the Egerton; but the poem which describes Mider's invitation to Etain makes the Leabhar na h-Uidhri rendering of the story a valuable addition to Irish literature. Mr. Leahy might, we think, have corrected an obvious mistake in the Egerton manuscript (vol. i. p. 17 of the present collection), where "Eochu Fedlech" appears instead of Eochaid Airemm.

The second story, "Mac Dathó's Boar," is from the Book of Leinster, and Mr. Leahy has inserted two verses from the Rawlinson manuscript. The third, "The Sick-bed of Cuchulain," is preserved in the Leabhar na h-Uidhri, and in a fifteenth-century manuscript in Trinity College. Mr. Leahy has translated the older version, transcribed from the lost Yellow Book of Slane by Maelmuiri mac Ceileachair in the eleventh century. It is obvious that the compiler of the Yellow Book had two very different forms of the story to draw upon, and combined them in the version transcribed into the Leabhar na h-Uidhri, with the result that we have endless repetitions, and one paragraph frequently contradicts another. Instead of selecting the better form of each incident and making a continuous whole, Mr. Leahy has translated the manuscript as it stands, and the story, as a story, is unreadable. He has, we notice, omitted the account of the election of Lugaid and the exhortation of Cuchulain to the new king: we fail to see why he did not continue his excision. The idea of giving the Leinster version of the fourth story, "The Exile of the Sons of Usnach," and following it by two snippets from the Glenn Masain manuscript of the same tale for purposes of comparison is hardly to be commended in a series which purports to consist purely of translations of particular versions of heroic romances.

In "The Combat at the Ford," an episode of the Cattle Spoil of Cualnge, Mr. Leahy is at his best. The Leabhar na h-Uidhri and Yellow Book of Lecan manuscripts betray signs of the same attempt to weld together several versions of the tale which is perceptible in the "Sick-bed of Cuchulain," and the translator has done well to select the Book of Leinster version. The combat between Cuchulain and Ferdia at the ford was the chief incident of the foray of Queen Medb, and is perhaps the best known of the heroic romances which Mr. Leahy has collected. His reference to that part of Aubrey de Vere's "Foray of Queen Meave" which deals with Cuchulain's prowess takes us back to a delightful poem and suggests the question whether, after all, Mr. Leahy's scholarship has not been wasted. He has translated all the romances in the first book literally, and his translations will attract few beyond a limited number of Irish scholars. A free translation would have enabled him to correct many errors and conflicting statements, and the stories would have been read for their interest as stories. Fine though his rendering of the speeches of Ferdia and Cuchulain and the battle between the two friends is, he never reaches the heights of many descriptive passages in de Vere's account. There is nothing so good even as the reference to the bursting from every wound of the life-blood of a heart athirst

For victory or for death, or the picture of Cuchulain after the fray.

In the second volume—consisting of five of the lesser tains which were probably recited immediately before the Great Tain, the central story of the Irish Heroic age—Mr. Leahy has adopted a different course from that followed in the first. Miss Hull gives, in her "Cuchullin Saga," fourteen of these lesser tains, eleven of which are preserved: the Tain bo Aingen, Dartada, Flidais, Fraich, Munad, Regamon, Regamna, Ros, Ruanadh, Sailin, and Erc. Only five—the Tain bo Fraich, Dartada, Regamon, Flidais and Regamna—have been edited, and Mr. Leahy gives them all, re-naming them, for no apparent reason, respectively: The Tain bo Fraich, The Raid for Dartada's Cattle, The Raid for the Cattle of Regamon, the Driving of the Cattle of Flidais, and the Apparition of the Great Queen to Cuchulain. The last four are expressly named as remscéla, or preludes, to the story of the great war of Cualnge, and, being designed for rapid recitation, do not, thinks Mr. Leahy, lend themselves to translation into English prose. He has, therefore, rendered them in verse, giving on opposite pages the literal translation; but whilst we admit that his second plan is more pleasing than the first, it is contrary to the aim of the series, and to our thinking robs the Irish Saga Library of the value it might have possessed for scholars. It involves departures from the text as marked as:

Then they played: sweet and sad was the playing,
Twelve of Ailill's men died, as they heard;
It was Boand who foretold them that slaying,
And right well was accomplished her word;

for

They play for them then so that twelve of the people of Ailill and Medb die with weeping and sadness.

Poor though Mr. Leahy's verse introduction is, he shows himself a poet in this second volume, and he would have done well to translate all the tales as he has the remscéla. Our quarrel is not with his scholarship, but with his inconsistency.

THREE DORSET SAILORS

The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar: Thomas Masterman Hardy, Charles Bullen, Henry Digby. By A. M. BROADLEY and R. G. BARTELOT. (Murray, 15s. net.)

There were three sailors of Dorset county,
At Traffygar they fought these three;
There was Digby of the Africa, and Britannia's Buller,
And Hardy, who commanded Nelson's Victoriee.

THUS a local bard has celebrated in deathless doggerel the memorable fact, and now two other Dorset men have combined to pay literary homage to the memory of these Dorsetshire heroes. In the British fleet on that day there must have been many men from Dorset, but among these none more famous than Thomas Masterman Hardy, the flag-captain of the Victory, the well beloved of the great Admiral; Bullen, who was flag-captain to Lord Northesk; and Digby, the most fortunate of all the fortunate frigate captains of those spacious times. Of this trio, Bullen and Digby do not, indeed, fill a large place in our naval annals. Nor do their respective biographical sketches occupy more than a small but an adequate portion of this book. Both of these officers had seen plenty of service before Trafalgar, and in their ways are characteristic specimens of the naval man of the period. Bullen, whose family is as good as any in Dorset, lived to be a G.C.B., and an Admiral of the Blue in the reign of Queen Victoria. At the battle of Trafalgar he took the Britannia into action in his own way, engaging three of the enemy's ships, and afterwards brought home three prizes, received the king's gold medal, and as prize-money more than £3000. It is not generally known that Bullen was a skilled draughtsman, and that some of his sketches are still in existence, although all his letters seems to have disappeared. Digby was a gallant sailor, who not only exhibited his pluck on many occasions, as well as in that crowning victory, where the Africa played so brilliant a part, but will be remembered for ever as one of the most remarkable prize-winners of the period. In October 1799, when captain of the Alcmene and in company with three other frigates, he had the good fortune to capture two Spanish vessels on their way home from Vera Cruz. These vessels were carrying three million dollars, besides valuable merchandise, and the prize-money of each of the English captains amounted to more than £40,730. This was not the only good fortune that fell to the brilliant young officer, who before he was five and thirty years of age appears to have added to his bank balance many more thousand pounds. He was commander-in-chief at the Nore when Queen Victoria came to the throne, and lived for several years after that.

It is, however, with Hardy, Nelson's closest friend, the most interesting and attractive personality among those who were associated with the immortal hero in his last and greatest triumph, that this book is chiefly concerned. The entertaining story of his life as told by his own letters has become accessible through the recent discovery of those documents, and we have now for the first time a biography worthy of the man. It is strange indeed how little has hitherto been known of the life of the captain of the Victory, the one man among all Nelson's professional associates with whom he was most intimate. It is an interesting, a delightful story which Messrs. Broadley and Bartelot have to tell. It not only brings out most clearly the kind and manly personality of the Dorset seaman, but it throws much greatly needed light upon the social side of naval history during the first half or more of the century which has just passed. Hardy was not, indeed, a great letter-writer, but there is that in this correspondence which enables us to understand and appreciate the affectionate friendship which existed between Nelson and his captain, while it reveals Hardy's independence of character, the largeness of his heart, and the strong ties which linked him with his native county. These letters present an interesting picture of town and county society at the period in which they were written, while the value of the book and its entertaining character have been largely augmented by the topographical notes and much delightful gossip which the writers have interwoven with the biography itself.

There is very much more in the volume than the Hardy letters. From these we get an idea of the invaluable services which the captain of the Victory rendered to the country during a career extending over nearly sixty years, but the writers have extended their sources of information and have been able to clear up such doubtful matters as the places of his birth and baptism, and to add much that possesses an interest quite apart from the more important subject of their labours. They have discovered the "Remark book" of Richard Francis Roberts, one of Hardy's midshipmen on board the Victory at the battle of Trafalgar, and they have also been able to compile a complete and accurate muster-roll of the Victory on October 21, 1805. Among many other curious items too, which they have unearthed, is a manuscript copy, words and music, of the song of the "Loyal volunteers of Burton Bradstock" written on a folio sheet of paper bearing the watermark 1801, which from its discovery among the papers of a midshipman of the Victory appears to have been a favourite with the sons of Dorset, whether they were serving the king on the land or on the ocean. The first verse and the chorus of this old-world martial song run thus:

Come my lads of courage true,
Ripe for martial glory,
See the standard waves for you,
And leads the way before ye. . . .

Lives are lent for Laws and King,
When that they may need 'em,
Let us, then, in chorus sing,
Give us death or freedom.

The volume is attractively produced, and its interest is not a little increased by the admirable portraits, pictures, and facsimiles it contains.

THE HAPPY GARDEN-STATE

The Heart of a Garden. By ROSAMUND MARRIOTT WATSON.
(The De la More Press, 7s 6d. net.)

OF the many books breathing a love of flowers and the woodland not the least readable is Mrs. Marriott Watson's "Heart of a Garden." It has this commendable characteristic—the writer really does know something of flowers and their ways, and has certainly the gift of singing sweetly of even the most prosaic friends of the border and parterre. And how welcome this knowledge is in these days of trashy gardening books, when to recognise a pæony as a pæony a foot away, or a cowslip in the mead, is sufficient excuse for perpetrating execrable prose and vaunting ill-concealed ignorance! The descriptions of the seasons are faithful and happily expressed, and we are quite in accord with the writer in her opinion of the Star Narcissi now spearing through the grass:

Every succeeding spring makes the heart grow fonder of them, and every autumn one buys more. Apart from their frail and dream-like loveliness and their infinite variety—and I could not, for the life of me, say which kind I should choose if choice were narrowed down—they have other most admirable virtues. You may buy them mixed and not "to name," and still fare every jot as well as though you had searched the florist's price-list with all the diligence in the world: and, thus purchased, their price—which is decoratively speaking far above rubies—condescends with a rare graciousness to even the shallowest purse. Then, again, where the year before last you found, say, two or three starry blossoms, this year a whole constellation shines from the grateful grass. They have the charming habit, so rare in things desirable, of free and bounteous increase. My gardener, naturally, views them with approval so grudging as to neighbour closely on contempt.

But the Star Narcissi, although increasing abundantly in cool loamy meadows, are very refractory in lighter upland soils, where they condescend to flower well once, then fitfully, and in three years fade away.

We have contended for years that the great flower of the early summer is the tulip, which opens its chalice of crimson and gold to the sun when the last of the Star Narcissi have gleamed in mead and orchard, and rejoice that they are the pride of the author's heart. It is to be hoped that the indifference of the average gardener to their wonderful beauty of form and colour will give place to a greater appreciation of their worth in linking late spring with early summer. As the author points out:

It is but rarely that one finds them in the average garden; and yet one would think that their tall and graceful stature, their infinite and rare variety of hue, together with their genius for multiplying, should combine to give the entire May-flowering group a large and ibera space in the flower-grower's affection and borders to boot.

Scattered throughout the pages are many pretty verses and the following are very happy lines :

Poised on the summit of the deodar
A song-thrush sings, this mid-winter day ;
Sings of the Spring, although the Spring is far
And far away.

So, too, are these :

You may remember how the skies were dim
And all the air was full of floating shadows,
Tall pine-trees stood upon the broad hill's rim
And deep woods loomed beyond the water-meadows.

The book shows most careful preparation for press. Technical words have been naturally avoided as much as possible, but where they are used the spelling is commendably accurate. A little slip occurs on p. 110, where the name of the Pear Beurre Bosc appears as Busc. Unfortunately, we have not the same good opinion of the illustrations as of the text. They add nothing to the charm of the volume and are for the most part quite commonplace, especially "Sun and Shade" facing p. 106, and a "Bed of Tulips" facing p. 41. The author has dedicated the book to Lady Northcliffe in a prettily conceived fancy. We hope "The Heart of the Garden" will be read and re-read not only by the lover of garden literature, but for the very practical thoughts and suggestions it contains.

SYMPATHY AND ANTIPATHY

The Letters of Warren Hastings to His Wife. Introduced and annotated by SYDNEY C. GRIER. (Blackwood, 15s. net.)

Too much sympathy is bad for a man when he is alive and for his memory when he is dead; but to a hero-worshipper (and if ever there was one it is "Sydney C. Grier") this fact has no significance. All will agree that charges of corruption have been brought by no more incongruous trio than Burke, Fox and Sheridan, but it will not be so readily conceded that Macaulay was "in reality defending Burke" when he attacked Hastings. A "journalist in a hurry" is, after all, on a higher plane than a ruined gambler like Fox: his libel was not so gross as that on British officers from the pen of Burke in the Annual Register: at any rate, he acted up to his doctrines, and did not, like Sheridan, cajole his washerwoman into lending him a guinea while he raved in golden eloquence about the spoliation of Indian princesses. Even antipathy, the suppression of facts, the magnifying of petty incidents, and the other offences of Macaulay are excusable when his doctrinaire standpoint is understood. Sydney C. Grier is on the other side. Her introduction and notes, a mine of information, help to make out a good case for her hero, and she takes care that there shall be no reverse to the picture which she paints.

The letters themselves were written in 1780, 1781, 1784-85, and it may as well be said at once that they are for the most part wonderfully dull. In stilted phraseology, full of detail which has no interest at the present time, and of moralising which can never have had any, the letters show Hastings to have been a loving husband and an indifferent writer. Macaulay thought that they were tender but a little too ceremonious, and suggests that they remind one of Sir Charles Grandison bowing over Miss Byron's hand in the cedar parlour; but he owned that they were very characteristic. It would be easy to find letters more illustrative of a man's character than these, but in this case the letters do light up the character of a strange man in giving evidence of the tenacity with which he carried on the curious and protracted love-affair which ended only with his long life. The tenacity displayed in that love-affair was shown also in all that Hastings did; when a bold dreamer has a determined will and a superhuman power of organisation the result of his labours is sure to be remarkable. Then arises the question of the means justifying the ends in national, if not in personal morals. Our author does well to avoid so thorny a question, for, woman like, she shows more than once how illogical she can be. Macaulay thought Hastings fairly entitled to the benefit of the distinction between crimes which originate in an inordinate zeal for the commonwealth and crimes which originate in selfish cupidity; but the acquittal of Hastings does not settle the question of morals, as must have been felt by those who accepted the benefits but disliked the ways of his "too masterly activity." Sydney C. Grier, in her wrath with the offending Macaulay, would like to forget that Hastings achieved success by methods not always within the letter of the law. His action towards Cheyt Singh shows that his idea of the British rule in India was not the same as that recently expounded by Lord Curzon in his farewell speech. Hastings did not recognise that an English Government in Asia cannot be administered on the Asiatic system. To say so much is by no means to agree with the great quartette of accusers, as the editor of this book appears to think. The most unprejudiced of biographers of Hastings says that he "was undoubtedly cast in the type, so constantly recurrent in political history, of the sons of Zeruiah, and he very nearly earned their historical reward." Macaulay wrote that his principles were somewhat lax, deficient in the two great elements of all social virtue—respect for the rights of others and sympathy for the sufferings of others, but then Macaulay considered that Gladstone's "The State in its relations with the Church" would be a "capital shrove-tide cock to throw at," and dearly loved to abuse a bad book like the Army Chaplain's life of Hastings. There is a wide gap between Macaulay's estimate of Hastings and Sir Alfred Lyall's, but we doubt whether it is so great as the difference between the latter's measured judgment and the adulation bestowed upon her hero, as well by what she has published as by what she has left unsaid, by Sydney C. Grier.

THE WARFARE OF SCIENCE

THE long-protracted strife between the legions of Science, Philosophy and Religion shows no sign of abatement: though one at least of the contending factions is fighting with obsolete weapons and under generals who lack the training necessary to ensure even a moderate hope of final victory, even though, from time to time, succour is brought by recruits from the opposing forces.

The warfare to-day, as in the past, is largely kept alive by border raids. After every swoop the marauders return convinced that they have discovered the dispositions and weak places of the enemy, wherein breaches may be made in future.

Nor is there complete harmony within the different camps. Among the scientific combatants, for example, bickerings not seldom arise between those who fight under the banner of biology, and those who bear arms under the banners of physics and chemistry, though all three at times may join in common cause against the remaining factions.

Some years ago Professor Haeckel, a warrior of great and deserved renown in the biological camp, made, single-handed, bold sallies into the domains of the philosophers on the one side, and the religionists on the other, and returning in triumph, and much pleased with his exploits, wrote a book thereon—at the wisdom thereof many cavil. Hard words have followed him from the camp of the faithful because he sought to restore in their midst a temple which they had condemned as being unsafe, while from among his own people he has earned censure on account of his love of the ornamental and his wanderings from home, whereby he has caused himself to fall behind the times, offering us for new the things of yesterday. The latest of his assailants is a David from the ranks of the physicists, who steps forth to champion the cause of the faithful and the philosophers. He is by way of being something of both himself, but a physicist first.

This champion is Professor Sir Oliver Lodge, who enters the tilt-yard, not in his own armour, and with borrowed weapons. He commences his onslaught by crossing the frontier into the territory of the philosophers, and with the assumed air of a native thereof proceeds to harangue those of the scientific camp in general and the biological legions in particular. Those who will may read his speech at length ("Life and Matter," Williams and Norgate, 2s. 6d. net), but herewith we give a summary of his contentions.

He is good enough to admit that it is permissible for a man of science occasionally to look over into the philosophic region and survey the territory on that side also—"so far as his means permit." "And if philosophers object to this procedure it must be because they have found by experience that men of science who have once transcended or transgressed the boundary are apt to lose all sense of reasonable constraint, and to disport themselves as if they had at length escaped into a region free from scientific trammels—a region where confident assertions might be freely made, where speculative hypothesis might rank as theory, and where verification was both unnecessary and impossible."

He then proceeds to name Professor Haeckel as "the most striking instance of a scientific man who on entering philosophic territory has exhibited signs of exhilaration and emancipation." The accusing witness is, of course, Professor Haeckel's book, "The Riddle of the Universe." This work is of so dangerous a character in Sir Oliver's opinion that he has gone to the trouble of providing an antidote.

With such a task we confess we have some sympathy. There is a blatancy about the "Riddle" that is irritating, a one-sidedness that is misleading; while the tone of the argument against Christianity is offensive. That the attitude of the theologians towards Science has in the past been one of ignorant prejudice and intolerance is only too painfully evident, and, though by force of circumstances the spirit of intolerance is now less obvious, a covert hostility is no less traceable; while on occasions a note of authority is sounded for which no warranty can be found. Yet this can be no excuse for criticism and comment such as that levelled by Professor Haeckel. The man of Science, it seems to us, may deem honour satisfied and his duty to the thinking public done, if he carries the war into the enemy's country no further than is sufficient to demolish the arguments directly intended to harass him. Meanwhile the theologian might be better employed than in endeavouring to fight the scientists with weapons which, so far, he has shown but little ability to wield.

We should have felt more sympathy with Sir Oliver Lodge in his task if he had been a little less patronising, a little less arrogant, and a little less wild in his own speculations. In offering his book as an antidote he has, to our thinking, only substituted another and more subtle form of mental poison; inasmuch as, though he has not, in so many words, bidden his readers to seek a key to the mysteries of life and what may be beyond, through the divinations of the witch of Endor, he has come somewhere very near to this, as we shall show presently.

The author's knowledge of biology is superficial, notoriously so, and his views on the question of vitalism are not those which find currency among biologists, though they are by no means so universally wedded to the physico-chemical theory of the origin of life as he would seem to suppose.

The use of the word "life" in this book cannot be too strongly condemned. For him "the narrowest of its legitimate meanings" is "limited to certain metabolic processes in protoplasm." For these processes he would substitute the term "vitality," while "life" is to denominate something apart from matter. "It is neither matter nor energy, nor even a function of matter or of energy, but is something belonging to a different category." He conceives it possible that "life has an existence apart from its material manifestations as we know them at present." And these vague guesses he supports by fanciful illustrations.

The countenance which the author has given to the so-called phenomena of spiritualism is notorious; and in this book his tender regard for these very shady shades is manifest in more places than one. Thus he asserts: "I would not too blatantly [we like the qualification "too blatantly"] assert that even a doll on which much affection had been lavished was wholly inert and immaterial in the inorganic sense."

I have reason [he continues] to believe that a trace of individuality can cling about terrestrial objects in a vague and almost imperceptible fashion, but to a degree sufficient to enable these traces to be detected by persons with suitable faculties. . . . There are grades of incarnation. Some of the personality of an Old Master is locked up in a painting: and whoever wilfully destroys a great picture is guilty of something akin to murder, namely, the premature and violent separation of soul and body [!]

With such stuff as this Sir Oliver Lodge hopes to counteract the materialism of Professor Haeckel!

In places Sir Oliver Lodge puzzles us: as when he speaks of portions of Haeckel's book which "are unhappily accompanied by over-confident negatives and supercilious denials of facts [italics ours] at present outside the range of orthodox science." Surely to contend that any facts are outside the range of Science—orthodox or otherwise—is to put Science in a strait-jacket. This attitude is rather hard on Haeckel. Sir Oliver would have him warned off the philosophical territory, and then proceeds to hamper him further in what he seems to regard as his legitimate rôle as a man of Science, by declaring certain of his counters to belong to another system of coinage. He tells us in one breath that the man of Science should confine himself to facts, and then proceeds to qualify this by fencing off some facts as beyond his sphere.

But Professor Haeckel has at least one champion! For some time past he has been disturbing our quiet with the cry: "Haeckel is great, and Mr. McCabe is his prophet!" He hastens forward, filled with consternation, to warn all whom it may concern against Sir Oliver Lodge's antidote, offering as a talisman a little work labelled "The Origin of Life" (Watts and Co., 6d.), which contains a defence of Haeckel and all his works.

In controversy Mr. McCabe shows some skill, but his knowledge of biology is evidently derived entirely at second-hand, and from his master, Haeckel, for whom he evinces a quite hysterical devotion. Thus, then, though he discusses the origin of life and many other biological problems, it is not surprising that his speculations are crude and of no value. He is a little "previous" in his reference to Sir William Thiselton-Dyer as "unfortunately since dead," and he is also aggressively dogmatic. "The first living things," he tells us, "were, of course [italics ours], of a purely vegetal character." Yet we find Dr. Ray Lankester making exactly the opposite statement, though less dogmatically.

We cannot feel that Mr. McCabe has either greatly helped the one or materially injured the other of the two scientists who form the subject of his book.

W. P. PYCRAFT.

IN THE VAL D'ARNO

A RHYTHM of song is in the breeze;
Out comes the Moon, and at her side,
Upon a shadowy floor and wide
I watch the dancing of the trees:
Slowly they move, all hand in hand,
Young maples, virgin mulberries;
The shadows flow about their knees
Obedient to the song's command:
Were ever dancers fair as these
Under the moonlight, garlanded
From hill to hill together, led
By the dim music of the breeze?

HENRY BRYAN BINNS.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE ENDINGS OF POEMS

SOMETIMES on a rainy day in the country it has been an amusement to me, when imprisoned in the library, to consider the endings of the most familiar poems and compare one with another. One result of this has been to show that a great man, like a woman, seldom knows when to stop, and it is curious that the most artistic of poets are no better than the rest. Even Tennyson erred in the way of carelessness and of going on after he ought to have finished. An apt illustration of this will be found in the poem addressed to Edward FitzGerald. It will be remembered that "old Fitz" died before receiving it, and Tennyson adds a postscript beginning with those beautiful lines, the first of which is an echo of the last line of "Tiresias," the original poem sent to FitzGerald with the letter in rhyme :

"One height and one far-shining fire"
And while I fancied that my friend
For this brief idyll would require
A less diffuse and opulent end,
And would defend his judgment well,
If I should deem it over nice—
The tolling of his funeral bell
Broke on my Pagan Paradise,
And mixt the dream of classic times
And all the phantoms of the dream,
With present grief, and made the rhymes,
That miss'd his living welcome, seem
Like would-be guests an hour too late,
Who down the highway moving on
With easy laughter find the gate
Is bolted, and the master gone.

What an exquisite ending this would have been had the poet made up his mind to stop there; but, alas! tempted by some desultory demon he goes on with a considerable number of lines which never rise above mediocrity, and the fine simile which we have quoted lies buried among sand. Nor was this an exceptional case. Even in the greatest of all his idylls, "The Passing of Arthur," he does not know when to stop, though he is more successful in "Guinevere," which closes with that memorable line :

To where beyond these voices there is peace.

Often, however, his endings were pure bathos, as in "Enoch Arden."

In this disregard of the finish he somewhat resembles his predecessor in the laureateship. The end of "Peter Bell" is told in these lines :

And, after ten months' melancholy,
Became a good and honest man.

The close of "Ruth" is not much happier :

And all the congregation sing
A Christian psalm for thee.

But William Wordsworth, who strewed his purple patches without method, just as they came into his mind, has one of his most beautiful passages in the end of "The Sparrow's Nest" :

She gave me eyes, she gave me ears;
And humble cares, and delicate fears;
A heart, the fountain of sweet tears;
And love, and thought, and joy.

Probably the greatest artist among poets of any time or age was John Milton, and in him too we find astonishing examples alike of beauty and of what one can scarcely call other than carelessness. "Paradise Lost" ends with a simple majesty well worthy of the great text that had gone before :

They hand in hand with wandering steps and slow,
Through Eden took their solitary way.

But the end of "Paradise Regained" might have come from Wordsworth at his least inspired moment.

He, unobserve
Home to his mother's house private returned.

The end of "Lycidas" has always struck me as possessing the most beautiful unexpectedness of any ending in literature. After all the mourning and sorrow of that immortal lament the poet at the end seems to say: "Let that now be in the past. It is an act written and finished. Having given vent to grief, let us shut down the door on it"; and thus he ends with the well-worn quotation :

To-morrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.

Many of the most familiar lines in Milton come as the end and climax of the poem. Thus,

They also serve who only stand and wait is the last line of the famous sonnet on his blindness. It has been said, however, that no great credit is due to a poet for rising to his best at the end of a sonnet, because that belongs to the very scheme of this kind of composition. We have an illustration of that in Wordsworth, where on Westminster Bridge on a summer morning he says :

Dear God! the very houses seem asleep;
And all that mighty heart is lying still!

Some poets have deliberately attempted to finish on a strong and resonant note, often a sonorous proper name. The end of Keats's sonnet "On first looking into Chapman's Homer" will be thought of at once in this connection :

—and all his men
Look'd at each other with a wild surmise—
Silent, upon a peak in Darien.

But of course the most striking ending produced by Keats was one that he never intended. As George Gilfillan wrote, "Shrieking celestial the fair youth died" and few passages have produced more poetry than that ending rendered pathetic by the circumstances with which it is associated :

At length
Apollo shriek'd; and lo! from all his limbs
Celestial . . . . .

Perhaps the most noteworthy example of the fascination of a name is to be found in Yarrow. On looking over a book in which are collected poems written about this famous stream, it seems to me that no poet can versify about Yarrow without introducing the name into his last line. There is of course a good example of this in the old ballad :

A fairer rose did never bloom
Than now lies cropp'd on Yarrow.

But, speaking of ballads, I like that ending which seems to have done duty for all those that had a tragical intent.

The tane was buried in Marie's kirk,
The tother in Marie's quair;
And out o' the tane there sprang a birk,
And out o' the tother a brier.

And thae twa met, and thae twa plat,
The birk but and the brier;
And by that ye may very weel ken
They were twa lovers dear.

But the ballad often has a stern and grim ending like those relentless lines from Sir Patrick Spens :

Half ower, half ower to Aberdour,
It's fifty fathoms deep,
And there lies gude Sir Patrick Spens
Wi' the Scots lords at his feet.

Among modern poets I think Browning perpetrated more weak endings than any one else, though I forbear comment on such well-known lines as :

Who fished the murex up?
What porridge had John Keats?

But even in his best poems he staggers home with a limp, as if distressed by the lingual acrobatics that he had performed on the way, and in this he betrayed his kinship with the minor poet.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Song of the Siren," by Edward Wright.]

FICTION

The Gambler. By KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON. (Hutchinson, 6s.)

OWING to the striking but yet uncertain character of her previous stories the announcement of a new book by Mrs. Thurston arouses more than ordinary expectation and curiosity. "John Chilcote" had a vogue to which the whole world of novel readers contributed, yet many of them felt uneasily, as they turned its pages, that they could not fully justify, nor even understand, the interest with which they followed that extraordinary story. "The Circle" had much of the same character, but with far less magic than the other book, and with more to confuse the reader's idea of the writer's capability as a novelist. Both stories were out of the way of real life. What Mrs. Thurston might be able to make of the more common and more proper material of the novel writer's art remained unknown: the announcement of a new story was a promise of an attempt in that direction. "The Gambler" appears, and the promise is fulfilled beyond our expectations. Though this story cannot be awarded the full compliment of "modernity" it is of the world as we have known and do know it. It is well worked out upon consistent lines, always in full tide of movement and emotion. It is a story of heredity, of the life of an Irish girl who for all her consciousness and even her passionate reprobation of the faults and failings which have ruined successive generations of her family, is herself drawn into them, and narrowly misses the common fate. As no Asshlin ever put off a debt of honour, Clodagh marries her father's oldest friend, older than herself by a generation, in requital of his generosity, with the usual results of such a marriage. After a few years of seclusion spent with the dull, good Milbanke, whose love for her is hardly more fervent than his devotion to archæology, Clodagh finds her way into a smart set whose ways of life are celebrated in the journals of to-day. Little by little they draw out the vices of gambling latent in her blood, and under their influence she drifts on from folly to folly—impulsive, incautious but always innocent. She goes far; yet has character enough to save her from absolute destruction. Clodagh's admirers and lovers include an old Lord Deerehurst, a roué of a type that flourished in the novels of a past time, but is now almost extinct; his nephew, a vicious decadent who devotes his energies to the eternal search after pleasure; and a distinctly conventional Sir Galahad, in Sir Walter Gore. The early chapters, descriptive of Clodagh's old home in Ireland, are by far the most praiseworthy part of the book; nowhere else does Mrs. Thurston show so much originality, or such firm and vivid powers of description. Every page brings out more clearly the fallen grandeur of the Asshlins, their hospitality, their pride, and we do not often meet a more impressive picture than the fifteen-year-old Clodagh and her sister Nance, the children of a father who, like too many of his race, is dissipated, a gambler, a spendthrift, with none but the most conventional ideas of right and wrong, yet dominating those around him by the half-barbaric superiority of the natural aristocrat. Elsewhere, as we have said, there is no originality of either observation or thought. The author throws herself too ardently into the thick of the fight to judge the relative importance of scenes and incidents. But the story is told with warm sympathy and with much insight into motive and character. From first to last we are borne along upon a swift stream of words persuasive or emphatic which is always attractive, though it often runs into an excess of purposeless detail.

The Drakestone. By OLIVER ONIONS. (Hurst & Blackett, 6s.)

IN the far beginnings of this tale of a feud and at the root of it all lay the "Intake." In a bygone century a Drake had hardly reclaimed a breadth of barren Yorkshire moorland. Rush and bog and gorse and heather he had fought and prevailed against, and generations of Drakes had lived and flourished in the sturdy house of Blackboys which he had builded him ere he was buried upright in the earth he had conquered. But at last one Martha Drake had left Blackboys and the Blackboys' lands to a Yewdale, who had promptly entailed it. Over the business there lingered in the eighteen-twenties a legend of a blue-bottle set buzzing in a dead woman's mouth and of a dead hand guided to scrawl a last will and testament. Be that as it might, the Yewdales had become the lords of the manors of Undercliffe and Hebden and Turle, while the Drakes had sunk to a race of shepherds and hirelings. None the less they were a watchful, tenacious breed, saying little but biding their time against the supplanting family—men who lacked stamina and stability and always died, as if under a curse, at forty, but always left a heir to the Hall, though they had well nigh forgotten the feud. When the tale opens they are represented by a shy, vague, delicate, star-gazing dreamer, an absentee and a widower with an only son, a lovable impressionable boy, on whose account (in order that he may live an outdoor life) he comes to live at Blackboys. He is unaware of an enemy in the world, least of all that a grim old religionist among his shepherds (who except for his young grandson, who tells the tale, is the only surviving Drake) has bent his whole life to the winning of power and opportunity to recover possession. The main point of attack, since Yewdale's own days appear to be numbered, is young Master Walter—gallant despite his delicacy—who after winning a horse-race becomes the spoil darling of the district; and the subtle way in which the old schemer first removes the obstacle to courses likely to prove dangerous and then edges him towards a repentance involving a breaking of the entail, reflects as much credit upon the author's powers of conception and execution as discredit upon Pongo Drake's dour "religion." The legal rights and wrongs of it all are a little vague in the hands of young John Drake (the most honest of honest Johns), and perhaps Mr. Onions occasionally allows a little too much rope to this somewhat prosaic romancist. We do not quite understand the passivity of his resistance to the schemes which result in his occupying his friend Walter's position. But at any rate a very dainty Yewdale shares it with him. Mr. Onions's canvas is crowded with well-drawn characters and the whole presents a particularly lively and clever study of Yorkshire life and manners eighty years ago.

The Lapse of Vivien Eady. By CHARLES MARRIOTT. (Nash, 6s.)

THE reader will come away from this story with a sense of having been in Cornwall, and with a strong desire to go there again as soon as possible. No picture could give a more vivid impression of the Cornish sea-coast between Penzance and the Land's End, and no picture could tell you all that Mr. Marriott does about the Cornish people, the people who travel to the uttermost ends of the earth from their remote villages, and who entertain in the narrow streets of their coast towns men of all the nations who go down to the sea in ships. He takes you with him to breathe the mild air of a Cornish winter morning, scented by gorse and sea, gay in sunshine. You look at the little sailing-boats, like "brown butterflies" on the water; the larks are singing, and you walk in gardens where roses blow from January to June. In this delectable corner of our country Mr. Marriott places his characters, following their fortunes with a restraint and strength that harmonise with the sober beauty of his landscape. One of his "heroes" says, when he is gardening: "Can you do it easily? If anything you do is an awful bother, it is nearly certain that you are going the wrong way about it," and with this opinion Mr. Stott's creator seems to agree. But it is impossible to believe that a novel so finely held in check, so well proportioned, so sincere in all its tones, was written "easily." If it had been, Mr. Stott and Mrs. Fleming would have talked and talked in their great scene towards the end. The man hardly says a word; at the most critical moment he does not speaking at all, but the emotion conveyed is as tense and strong as an actual experience. That is true art, and nothing will convince us that it is "easy."

The Scholar's Daughter. By BEATRICE HARRADEN. (Methuen, 6s.)

WE venture to think that this story would do better as a light play than as a novel. The humour in it would tell better over the footlights, and three good comedians might get good laughs out of the characters of the professor's three secretaries. We cannot help agreeing with the professor's wife, that she was quite unsuited to be the help-mate of such a learned and dry-as-dust man, although in the days when she shared his life we presume he was less forbidding. Miss Harraden leaves us in doubt at the end as to what happens to the ill-matched pair who are so strangely brought together again, but we hope for the sake of both that they do not take up their old life, even in that beautiful old house with the wonderful oak panelling in the study. She, being a successful actress, could never leave her profession: he could never leave his books and live her life. The scholar's daughter is a charming girl, fresh and delightful, and the book has a great deal of fun in it; but it lacks conviction. Miss Harraden can do better work than this, and stronger. Professor Grant's secretaries, by the way, may set their minds at rest on the derivation of "Aroynt" by turning to the ACADEMY of December 30 last, in which Professor Skeat settled it.

The Lady Noggs, Peeress. By EDGAR JEPSON. (Unwin, 6s.)

MR. JEPSON'S latest book, "The Lady Noggs, Peeress", is a piece of excellent fooling. True, the author may not have even a bowing acquaintance with the circle of society in which it has pleased him to make his characters move—the title by itself justifies this surmise—but these stories are amusing. They depict doings of delightful children with considerable insight into their ways of thought and make-believe, and whether it be Noggs's open admiration for the sailor's stentorian rendering of a song as the hansom drove up Fleet Street, or the refusal of all three imps to take "Tiger Jake" in any way seriously at his niece's wedding, which so enrages him that he perpetrates the exact atrocity on his hat that they had been eager to see, it can hardly fail to provoke many a laugh and a wish to have assisted at some of these dramatic occurrences. Only one thing is disquieting: Are there many "frail and fair children," of an age to believe in kidnapping and ransoming here in England, careering about our country lanes in sole charge of a motor-car? We trust not.

The Ambush of Young Days. By ROSAMOND LANGBRIDGE (Duckworth, 6s.)

THIS book is quite out of the ordinary run of novels. It is clever, and worth reading for certain good points; but the story itself is not pleasant. From the first page to the last the reader is shut in, as it were, in Mrs. Hanrahan's squalid "Select Private Temperance Hotel," somewhere in a back street in an Irish town, where the atmosphere actually and morally is stuffy and oppressive. There are incidents and confessions that call for the highest discretion in their treatment, and we hasten to add that they might have been far more disagreeable in less capable hands. Readers who find Ireland's talk on love and innocence unnatural and hysterical, can turn from it to the real strength of the book, which lies in the portraits of Mrs. Hanrahan, Miss O'Shaughnessy, and the boy Jamsie: Mrs. Hanrahan, with her typical Celtic mind, handsome, seductive, "one of them big red flowers that the bees of temptation settles on," with the wonderful flow of speech that never fails to delight the ear with its variety and richness; Miss O'Shaughnessy, the little dressmaker, content with her hard lot and the company of the Enchanted Cat, full of tact and understanding of human nature;

Jamsie, doomed to an early death, with a fierce animal desire to live, know, and experience all that a long life might give him. Myrtle, Mrs. Hanrahan's daughter, half-child, half-woman, is the only figure of no importance, vague and shadowy, useful only as an object for experiments in emotions. That Miss Langbridge is observant and has the courage of her opinions is evident; that she can also portray character with unusual freedom and boldness none can doubt who read this curious story, "The Ambush of Young Days."

THE DRAMA

"LE DETOUR" AT THE NEW ROYALTY THEATRE

THOSE who do not consider that Mme. Simone le Bargy can act will not, of course, go to the New Royalty Theatre this week. By staying away they will deprive themselves of a great artistic treat. For Mme. le Bargy is an actress whose playing is a delight to watch, for the very reason that she does not act. So natural is she, indeed, that some of her gestures by a paradox appear theatrical, because they are so seldom seen on the stage.

In Le Detour, moreover, Mme. le Bargy has a part which she is eminently qualified to play. The piece is not a great work of art; it has neither the virility nor the truth to life of La Rafale, and the atmosphere of the play is rather German than French. Jacqueline, the heroine, without being actually neurotic, is highly strung. Her father was killed in an accident a few months before she was born, and before he had been legally married to her mother. The knowledge of this blot upon the family history is not viewed morbidly by Jacqueline, though she holds it to bar her from marriage. Her scruples are overcome by Armande Rousseau, a young provincial, of Protestant family. They are married and go to live with Armande's parents, highly estimable and by no means unbearable people; but their view of life and would-be kindness to her are so antagonistic to Jacqueline that she is soon in open rebellion and flies from the house. Her husband rejoins her and for a short time they live away from the parental roof. At last, however, Armande insists on a return to it; he refuses to permit Jacqueline any further communication with her mother, and is generally violent as only a French husband in a French play can be. Then there reappears upon the scene an old friend of Jacqueline's, Cyril, who had formerly been refused because he was poor, but who has subsequently inherited a small portion of the estate of a rich cousin. Cyril counsels flight, and Jacqueline, at the end of her resources, consents. She sits down to write a note to her husband, but can only write the word "Armande." She pulls off her wedding-ring and places it on the sheet of paper, et c'est la fin.

Here, again, we have one of those curiously inconclusive endings which are so characteristic of a certain school of French playwrights to-day, and which are, if we only knew it, the truest reflection of real life. There are always jagged edges and unfinished strands to our little comedies and tragedies, and we cannot get the great play of life to finish off sharp and short.

Of the acting of Le Detour it would be impossible to speak too highly. As Cyril, M. Pierre Magnier was courtly, polished and persuasive to the highest degree, and it is not paying Mlle. Feriel too high a compliment to say that her acting in the part of the mother was equal to that of Miss Marion Terry in Lady Windermere's Fan. The smaller parts were admirably filled, and it is by comparing such performances with the acting in the minor rôles at our own theatres that we get some idea of the crudeness and the inability to delineate character which mark the English actor of the second rank.

FINE ART

CANOSSA

I WISH that the Rokeby Velasquez now firmly secured for the British nation could have been allowed to remain in Bond Street for a short while; not to tantalise the foreign countries so eagerly competing for its acquisition nor to emphasise the patriotism of its former owners, but as a contrast to "Some Examples of the Independent art of to-day." Perhaps not as a contrast even, but as a complement. I do not mean to place all the pictures on the same level with the Venus, though with some I should prefer to live; yet the juxtaposition would have asserted the tradition of the younger painters and the modernity of the older master. "We are all going to—Agnew's, and Velasquez will be of the company," or something like Gainsborough's dying words would have occurred sooner or later. I am persuaded that we look at the ancient pictures with frosted magnifying glasses, and stare at the younger men from the wrong end of the binoculars. It was ever thus; it always will be so. Most of us suspect our contemporaries; Whigs in art, we are fearful of the future, as Morris says somewhere. And they—les jeunes féroces—are impatient of their immediate predecessors. Nos pères ont toujours tort, but grandpapa is sometimes quite picturesque; his waistcoat and odd buttons suit us very well. "Your Raphael is not even divine," said Velasquez when he left Rome and that wonderful p.p.c. card on the Doria. "Your Academicians are not even academic," some of the painters and their champions are saying to-day. In the ship which sailed with Professor Holmes to Dornach in search of those wonderful Blue Hills, Constable was at the prow (in the foreground) and Watts at the helm (in the background). Mr. D. S. MacColl in his beautiful little water-colour took Cotman as a point of departure; Mr. Rich, Peter de Wint, not Mrs. Allingham or William Hunt. In the lovely Lost Path, with its wind and sun, Mr. Tonks has found some footsteps of Claude Monet, not those of Marcus Stone. Litera scripta monet, or is it Manet? my Latin is a little shaky. I do not suggest that these fascinating pictures are unoriginal, but they are derivative, as Velasquez is a derivative of Caravaggio.

I find, moreover, the epithet "independent," to qualify an entertaining and significant exhibition, misleading. For many of the items here can only be so classified in the sense that they are independent of Messrs. Agnew and the Royal Academy. Mr. Tonks and Professor Brown are official instructors at the Slade School in London; Mr. C. J. Holmes is Slade Professor at Oxford; Mr. Gerald Choune is or was a professor at Liverpool. Mr. Fry is now an official at New York, and the majority of the painters belong to two distinctive and dependent groups, the Glasgow School and the New English Art Club. Intense individualism is not incompatible with militant collectivism. The only independent artists, if you except Mr. Nicholson, are Mr. C. H. Shannon and Mr. Charles Ricketts, who have always stood apart, being neither for the Royal Academy nor its enemies, and their choice is in their pictures. The Betrayal of Mr. Ricketts (there is a curious symbolism for me in the title) is a sophisticated painting with which you could compare none of the other works in the room. I can hardly imagine an embarrassed purchaser, who had suffered a sea change and wanted to buy something rich and strange, hesitating between this work and, say, Grandmother's Stocking, by Mr. T. Austin Brown. There would be no trembling of the balances as in the case of Mr. C. H. Shannon, Mr. Steer and Mr. Conder, all of whom contribute two splendid examples of their art. To use a terrible American expression, Mr. Ricketts's work is the brainiest of the fifty-two pictures. I suppose it will appear pedantic to some people, with its echoes of Daumier, Delacroix, and the painter's painters by excellence, for Mr. Ricketts himself is a connoisseur's painter, appealing to many who have little appreciation of or interest in modern art. The Betrayal is a scholar's daringly original essay, on whose author you would confer not R.A., but a University degree, D.D., D.C.L., or D.S.M. Having been rallied for my comparison of Mr. Shannon with Titian, I hesitate to express the coldest admiration for the Mill and Tibullus in the House of Delia, a composition which the artist has used before in one of his beautiful lithographs. But at least I can mention Rossetti, who, English and more familiar, has haunted many of the painters to-day for good and for evil. In the rich accessories and what Ruskin called "cramming the canvas" Mr. Shannon has much, not in common, but in rarity with the elder master, who was far the greatest English artist (I do not say painter) in the last half of the last century.

At the final spring exhibition of the old Grosvenor Gallery (where the Scotch were first seen in London), in adaptation of an old proverb, it became a sort of tradition north of the Tweed "that those who live in Glasgow must not imitate Burne-Jones." The distinguished paulo-post-Raphaelite, it will be remembered, had withdrawn his support from Sir Coutts Lindsay, who sought oblivion in the northern Thebes. The two painters I remember best were Messrs. Henry and Hornel. What has become of the Druids and Among the Wild Hyacinths? They were promises for which I have been waiting the fulfilment. Since a picture of Shepherds, shown at the New English during a brief entente cordiale between the two schools, I have heard nothing—I have seen nothing—to equal those early works. Mr. Henry's picture, now shown by Messrs. Agnew and appositely called The Locket, is the only item in which, as a rival dealer, I was not pleasurably disappointed. For Mr. Croal Thompson has obviously selected with tact and knowledge the best examples of each artist, and, moreover, the general effect of the exhibition (I sorrowfully admit) is particularly pleasing and stimulating, though I resent Mr. Walter Sickert being put on the staircase as if to break things gently to some of the older clients.

I feel it difficult to write of the other painters for whom I have acted as showman so long. I confess that when I heard they were going to Bond Street my pangs were akin to those of the owner of a small country circus on learning that his troupe of performing dogs has been engaged by Mr. Imre Kiralfy or the Hippodrome. A quondam dealer in ultramontanes, I become an Othello of the trade. Truly Mr. Augustus John, that Ravachol of painting, is absent. Superb anarchist, he has been the Achilles dans le mouvement and in painting Patroclus on the tent, or Cassandra en plein air, I dare not accuse him of fidelity to myself, for I would gladly have supplied Messrs. Agnew with some bombs warranted not to explode during the exhibition. Mr. William Orpen (future President of the Academy) is, however, adequately represented. And in their grander quarters (I grieve to say) he and the others look better than ever, though I would have chosen another background, the old green of Ryder and Bury Street. Yes, they all go through their hoops gracefully. With one exception I have never seen finer Wilson Steers; the Sunset might well be hung beside the new Turners; where the gulf between ancient and modern art would be almost imperceptible. The Aliens of Mr. Rothenstein in the cosmopolitan society of a public picture-gallery would hardly appear foreigners because they belong to a country where the inhabitants are racy of every one else's soil. When time has given an added dignity (if that were possible) to this magnificent work, I can realise how our descendants will laugh at our lachrymose observations on the decadence of art. For mere painting this is the picture of all others to study, not so much as a striking example of an artist, but as a type of the art so misunderstood and neglected. The background against which the stately Hebrew figures are silhouetted is in itself a liberal education for the aged and those who ask their friends what these modern fellows mean.

Among dealers, the ancient firm of Messrs. P. and D. Colnaghi, of which Thackeray writes, is the doyen. That of Messrs. Agnew is the douane. Here it is that the official seal must be set before modern paintings can pass onwards to the Midlands and the middle classes. You must all become Agnewstics in art before the public will believe in you. Well, I felicitate the august officials on removing a tariff of prejudice; I felicitate the young artists who, released from the bondage of the Egyptian Hall, can now enjoy the lighter air, the larger day, the pasturage and the patronage of Palestine. I compliment the fearless collectors such as Mr. C. K. Butler, Mr. Herbert Trench, Mr. Daniel, His Honour Judge Evans, the Leylands and the Leathearts of a latter day for ignoring contemporary ridicule and anticipating, not the verdict of passing fashion but of posterity. As the servant spoke well of his master while wearing his clothes which were far too big for him, let me congratulate the Chrysostom of critics, the Origen who has scourged our heresies, Mr. D. S. MacColl; because the Greeks have entered Troy or the barbarians the senate-house. Dissolve frigus ligna super foco large reponens, and let us mix our metaphors. What has been Mr. MacColl's Waterloo is a Canossa for Messrs. Agnew.

ROBERT ROSS.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—III

THE problems with which Sir Hubert Parry deals in "The Music of the Seventeenth Century" are very different from those with which Professor Wooldridge grappled successfully in the first volume. There is just this much analogy between the music of the seventeenth and the thirteenth centuries, that each laid the foundations of a phase of art so entirely new as to bear but the faintest resemblance to what had gone before; but there the likeness ceases. The thirteenth century dealt with problems of one kind only, directed towards the achievement of one form of art—the combination of voices and vocal melodies so as to be at once consonant and independent; but by the seventeenth century, instruments of all sorts, organs, viols, lutes, and virginals, had arrived at such maturity as to demand special treatment, both individually and in various combinations. Consequently we have a number of different schools of composition, differing not only with the special characteristics of their members, as induced by nationality and other special circumstances, but dealing with a totally different material; such as the English School of lutenists, the German school of organists, and a little later the Italian violinists. Such a complex situation could only be successfully elucidated by one of two methods, the rigorous application of a system of division, which should present the whole period in a more or less tabulated form, or the establishment in the mind of the reader of a unity of purpose underlying the wide divergences of procedure. It is needless to say that the latter is Sir Hubert Parry's method. He cares little for formal arrangement—too little, perhaps, for the ease of the general reader—but he drives home with all the force of his own strong insight what was the real trend of this new musical chaos, which followed immediately on the death of Palestrina. Sometimes he puzzles the reader unlearned in musical history by explaining motives and tendencies in a composer's work before clearly stating what the work was, but he does not long leave him in difficulty, and the apt quotation of typical passages of composition is a great help.

First he is careful to show that the change of standpoint from that of the sixteenth century was not so sudden as at first sight appears. Instrumental art had developed unofficially, so to speak, and unrecognised by the Church, which held sway over what was deemed the serious art of music, and even in choral art itself there was a distinct tendency towards an harmonic rather than a contrapuntal view, especially in the Madrigal, as we saw in discussing volume ii. But with the dawn of the seventeenth century, music received an entirely new impulse from a strong influence quite outside that of the Church, which affected it in common with all other artistic and literary thought all over Europe, in the movement known as the Renaissance. Its immediate effect upon music was in the direction of dramatic expression in the works of a small coterie of musicians and poets, who attempted to unite solo music with poetry after the manner of Greek drama. In this attempt may be seen a return to the music which preceded that of the early Church, with this exception—that these innovators supported the voice with a rude harmonic accompaniment for instruments. The first experiment of Vincentio Galilei, one of the foremost of this new school of composers, is reported to have been "a setting of the scene of Ugolino from Dante's 'Inferno,' which he sang to the accompaniment of a 'viol'." Doni reports that "some people were pleased and that some laughed." Indeed, cultivated musicians must have either laughed or wept at the childish appearance of this "Ars Nova"; nevertheless, from this sprang the Opera, and what is more important, the power of appropriate expression in all music. For to the cultivation of this one quality of expression all art was for the time being sacrificed, as the specimens of dramatic composers till Monteverde show. While these early efforts at expression were in the direction of solo singing of a wandering, recitative-like type, composers were not slow to perceive that the various tones of instruments might be made to serve the ends of expression and that the new principles might even be applied to choral singing. It was inevitable that with this new acquisition of untried possibilities composers should wallow in effects and impressions as wild in their way as those of certain twentieth-century composers, who have come into the new inheritance of orchestral colour as left them by Wagner; but the genius soon arrived, in the person of Monteverde, who should show the legitimate direction of these new efforts. Sir Hubert Parry's pages on the work of Monteverde are of exceptional interest, showing clearly his development of harmonic resources in his unconventional treatment of the seventh and other discords, as well as his instrumental technique in accompaniments, the incipient Overture as exemplified in his works, and his strength of dramatic expression.

But along with this movement, and exerting a parallel influence with it upon musical thought in general, went another experimental one in the direction of instrumental music pure and simple. This, as we have seen, took innumerable forms differing with the types both of the instruments and of the men who cultivated them. The English lute and virginal music of Dowland, Byrd, Bull, fascinating though it is as an antiquarian study, is of little consequence to the art, since, like so many other insular types, it led nowhere. Much more important are the great organ schools of North and South Germany, in which we see the development of the technique of the organ in the hands of such masters as Froberger, Muffat, Pachelbel, Buxtehude, from the first copying, often direct transcription, of choral works to the noble style of the last named, which was inherited by the greatest of all organists, J. S. Bach. A quotation as to the methods of development in instrumental music will be useful here.

There were three possible lines upon which music in instrumental style might be achieved. One was to continue working on the ground-work supplied by many centuries of choral writing, and to manipulate "voice parts" so as to be more suited to instruments and more conducive to instrumental effect. The second was to develop and expand the dance forms, and to find out how the various instruments could be best used to enforce the rhythmic and melodic elements in such music; and to discover how to dispose several dance movements so as to set off one another by contrasts and affinities. The third was to experiment in season and out of season in the unexplored regions of virtuosity, and to make a coherent whole out of passages of brilliant effect.

Speaking roughly, it appears that organ music was the result of a combination of the first and third methods; music for other keyed instruments, the virginal, harpsichord, etc., was arrived at through the first and second methods, especially the second, and that for strings, sets of viols and the later violin school, through the second and third. For the last of these the Italians were mainly responsible, as the Germans were for organ music, and the growth of the great Italian school of violinists, which found maturity in Corelli, is an important feature of this period. Naturally, at this time the development of musical forms plays an important part in the history of the art, for where instruments are used without voices this is a consideration of paramount importance. In organ music the most important form is the fugue, and in Germany the various forms resulting from the treatment of the chorale; but in other departments, where these severe forms would be either not acceptable or unsuited to the technique of the instruments, forms tracing their descent from primitive dance tunes make their appearance as suites of various types, and ultimately the Sonatas of Corelli in the two forms, "Da Chiesa" and "Da Camera." All these are of almost equal importance as leading up to the instrumental works of Bach; of almost equal importance in preparing the way for Handel are the later developments of opera and oratorio of which we have noted the beginnings.

After Monteverde Italian opera sank gradually into conventional methods, and tended more and more to become a mere string of formal recitatives succeeded by even more formal arias. Fatal as it was to this particular branch of the art, this very decadence had its use in establishing certain much needed principles of form. The "Aria" form which ruined the works of Alessandro Scarlatti, was the foundation of some of the most beautiful solos of both Bach and Handel, as the tentative oratorio of Carissimi was the parent of that of Handel and afforded certain precedents to Bach. But this, though hinted at by Sir Hubert Parry, is properly matter for volume iv. French opera as represented by Lulli is another factor of great importance to later history, and is discussed at great length.

Sir Hubert Parry, as is natural, deals very fully with English music both before and after the Commonwealth. The post-Restoration period of course culminates in the works of Purcell, and is necessarily of great interest to Englishmen. It is almost pitiful, however, to be made to realise how abundant has been the effort towards musical expression in this country, and how totally without effect upon the course of the art in general it has been. In spite of a bias, which one respects, in favour of the music of his country, Sir Hubert Parry makes no attempt to disguise the facts. The spring of the "Ars Nova" was in Italy, and it communicated itself to other countries, exemplified in the opera of France and the organ music of Germany. While Englishmen shared in the general activity occasioned by the new impulse, they were not destined to surpass their fellows in other countries in any one particular, and, as we shall see, they were only too ready to abandon their own efforts, in order to worship at the shrine of the great German when he arrived.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE second volume of the Cambridge "Beaumont and Fletcher" will be ready on March 7, and two others are in the press, and will be published in April. It has now been decided to follow the ten volumes of text with an eleventh containing explanatory notes, a glossary and other material of use both to the student and the general reader. Considerable interest attaches to the volume now appearing by reason of the rediscovery by the editors of the 1625 manuscript of "The Humorous Lieutenant," or "Demetrius and Enanthe," as the manuscript names it, which Dyce purported to print "verbatim et literatim" in 1830. The manuscript itself having passed into obscurity, Dyce's reprint has hitherto been relied on, and on occasions later editors have recorded readings from his text as manuscript readings. How far they have been justified in fact will now appear.—Mr. Waller has followed up his volume of Prior's "Poems on Several Occasions" by a second: "Prose Dialogues and other works," which will be published very shortly. It will contain the remainder of Prior's writings in prose and verse, the poems published before the folio of 1718 but not included therein, the poems published between 1718 and 1721, the date of Prior's death, and those posthumously published, together with the Prose Dialogues of Prior, hitherto unpublished, from the Longleat manuscripts.—The second volume of Cowley will also be published in April, and the second volume of Crabbe, which contains hitherto unpublished material, is promised early in the same month.

Professor J. Churton Collins has edited for the Oxford University Press Matthew Arnold's "Merope," to which is appended the "Electra" of Sophocles, translated by Mr. R. Whitelaw. In this volume, which will be ready immediately, an attempt is made to introduce and to bring home to modern readers who are not Greek scholars, Attic tragedy in its most perfect form. If the book is favourably received it is intended to follow it with a series of small volumes each containing some leading Greek tragedy in an acknowledged masterpiece of translation, edited in the same manner.—The Clarendon Press also announces a small work by Professor S. R. Driver, "The Book of Job in the Revised Version," edited with introductions and brief annotations. The aim of this volume is to make the poem intelligible to the ordinary educated reader, and the editor maintains that, if care be taken to adopt the right marginal readings, the Revised Version gives correctly the general sense of the Book of Job.

At the end of the month Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co. will publish the first of the genealogical volumes which are issued as part of the scheme of the Victoria History of the Counties of England. There will be one such volume for each county. The first deals with, and is entitled, "Northamptonshire Families," and besides dealing generally with the Landed Houses of the County, treats very fully the most important families, giving elaborate chart pedigrees, portrait illustrations, etc. There are also included lists of Members of Parliament elected for the county and the boroughs of Northampton, Peterborough, Brackley and Higham Ferrers, and a list of Sheriffs of the county. The next volume of this series will deal with Hertfordshire Families, and other volumes will appear shortly.

The centenary of Mrs. Browning's birth will bring two new books on the Brownings from Messrs. Smith, Elder: "Elizabeth Barrett Browning in Her Letters," by Percy Lubbock; and "Robert Browning and Alfred Domett," edited by Frederic G. Kenyon. The second volume contains an interesting correspondence between Robert Browning, Alfred Domett and Sir Joseph Arnould. Domett, subsequently the first Premier of New Zealand, was the Waring of Browning's famous poem, "What's become of Waring," and Sir Joseph Arnould was afterwards Chief Justice of Bombay.—The same publisher announces "Voltaire's Fellow-Workers," by S. G. Tallentyre—a companion volume to the "Life of Voltaire"—and four interesting novels: Mr. Percy Dearmer's "Brownjohn's," which will be published on the 26th; "If Youth But Knew," by Agnes and Egerton Castle, promised on April 2; Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Fenwick's Career," some time in May; and a new book by Mr. Horace Hutchinson—"We and the Doctor"—now in the press.

Messrs. Alston Rivers announce for publication early in March, "The Heart of the Country," by Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer—a companion volume to "The Soul of London"—and two novels: Mr. Hueffer's "The Fifth Queen" (Catherine Howard) and "Richard Baldock," by Archibald Marshall, the author of "The House of Merrilees."

On the first of March Messrs. Methuen will publish an interesting work on "Macedonia," by H. N. Brailsford. The book is the fruit of some five journeys in the Near East, and of a winter spent among the villages of Macedonia after the general rising of 1903. It aims at presenting a careful account of the political and social life of Macedonia, and deals with such topical subjects as the Bulgarian insurgent organisation and the little-studied Albanian national revival, and also with the daily life of the peasantry.—On the same day Messrs. Methuen will publish "The Mayor of Troy," by "Q"—a novel which has achieved a very considerable success in America—and on the 8th they will issue a new novel by Bernard Capes: "Loaves and Fishes."

Messrs. Longmans have in the press an important book, "The Art of Garden Design in Italy," illustrating the planning and arrangement, the architectural features and accessories of the old Italian gardens of the best periods, with an historical essay and descriptive and critical accounts of the principal gardens in Italy, by H. Inigo Triggs, A.R.I.B.A. The work comprises one hundred and twenty-eight plates, of which seventy-three are reproduced in collotype from photographs specially taken by Mrs. Aubrey le Blond. The remaining plates consist of complete surveys of many of the most important villa gardens in Italy, and half-tone reproductions from photographs specially taken for the work and from old engravings dealing with the subject. The text consists of an historical introduction tracing the development of garden planning, and historical and critical accounts of the subjects depicted, plentifully illustrated by plans, sketches, and measured drawings of garden detail in fountains and ponds, terraces, balustrades, stairways, vases, and all garden accessories.

On March 1 Messrs. Chatto and Windus will publish Mr. Clement L. Wragge's "The Romance of the South Seas." The book is in two sections, the first comprising "The Prison of the Pacific," as New Caledonia, with its convict element, may well be called: and the second "A Trip to Tahiti via Rarotonga and Raiatea." Botanists, conchologists, geologists, and students of tropical fish will all find much to interest them. The numerous illustrations are from unique photographs of island scenery and native life.—On March 8 the same publishers will issue "Literary Rambles in the West of England," by Arthur L. Salmon. This book is an attempt at topography chiefly on its literary side. Mr. Salmon accompanies Borrow to Cornwall, Keats to Teignmouth, Wordsworth to the Quantocks, Coleridge and Tennyson to Clevedon. He sojourns with Herrick at Dean Prior, and with Hawker at Morwenstow; he tries to interpret the message that Richard Jefferies gave to the world from his Wiltshire home. One chapter follows the ramblings of Celtic saints about the West Country.

Of even greater interest is Messrs. Chatto and Windus's announcement, for publication early in the spring, of Mr. Henry Saxe Wyndham's "Annals of Covent Garden Theatre, 1732." There are few figures in theatrical or any other history that are more eccentric than was that of John Rich, the founder of the theatre and for almost thirty years its manager. Unfortunately, but little is known of him, in spite of the fact that he was for many years the principal theatrical magnate of his time. It is surely more than a little curious that of a man who was a friend of Pope, the patron of Gay and Garrick, an intimate of Handel and Hogarth, and, in spite of his fine country-house, a thorough Bohemian of the best type—to say nothing of being owner of the largest theatre in the kingdom—there is absolutely no personal trace to be found in the National Portrait Gallery, nor, excepting a few caricatures, in the print-room at the British Museum. His successors are many of them better remembered; John Beard the singer, George Colman the dramatist, the Kembles—John and Charles—Macready, Charles Mathews, and Madame Vestris—all these have been more immediately in the public eye, and their names will be recognised.

The announcement that the Library Supply Company will publish shortly a "Manual of Descriptive Annotation for Library Catalogues" is a further indication of the desire of library authorities to improve their catalogues in respect of fulness and clearness. The manual will fully describe present practice in adding descriptive notes to catalogue entries, and will formulate a code of rules for the systematic analysis of the contents of books. The author is Mr. E. A. Savage, borough librarian, Bromley, Kent; Mr. E. A. Baker, M.A., author of "Guide to Best Fiction," contributes a chapter on evaluation and a historical note.

The second volume of The Chapbooks, entitled "Essays, Moral and Polite, 1660-1714," and edited by Mr. and Mrs. John Masefield, is to appear immediately. "We have given," say the editors in their Introduction, "specimens of nearly every kind of prose writing for which the age is famed"—the period between the Restoration and the death of Queen Anne, selections from such authors as Jeremy Collier and Steele being taken from their less familiar works. Among other writers represented are Evelyn, Cowley, Dryden, L'Estrange, Addison and Berkeley.

Dr. Richard Garnett has just completed a biography of W. J. Fox, and the book will be issued by Messrs. Smith, Elder. South Place Chapel, which has always had as much of a literary as a religious philosophical atmosphere, was built for Fox in 1824, and in that year he had the distinction of writing the initial article—"Men and Thought in 1824"—in the newly established Westminster Review. He was one of the earliest appreciators of Browning's genius, and praised "Pauline" in his Monthly Repository. The address to the nation in 1840 from the Anti-Corn Law League was written at Cobden's request by W. J. Fox; and he was M.P. for Oldham from 1847 till 1863, the year before his death.

Messrs. Adam and Charles Black are adding "The Blackmore Country" to their "Pilgrimage Series." It is written by Mr. F. J. Snell and is illustrated from photographs specially taken by C. W. Barnes Ward. The writer has been at some disadvantage compared with the authors of preceding volumes in the series owing to the fact that Mr. Blackmore left particular instructions that no life of him was to be attempted, but compensation is found in the exceptional attractions of the district itself, which embraces tracts of Devonshire and Somerset.—Wessex, that portion of the southern and south-western England which Thomas Hardy has so vividly described, is to form the subject of a colour book which Messrs. Black are about to publish. The illustrations are from a series of seventy-five water-colour drawings by Mr. Walter Tynedale, whose selection of subjects is so typical that any one not conversant with the district may obtain from them a very accurate idea of what "The fayre land of Wessex" is like. Mr. Clive Holland writes the text accompanying the pictures.

The Rev. Thomas Barns, M.A., has made a new translation of St. Francis de Sales' "Introduction to the Devout Life" for Messrs. Methuen's Library of Devotion; it is from the 1619 edition as revised and corrected by M. Silvestre de Sacy, published in Paris in 1860. It has been the endeavour of the translator both to be loyal to the simplicity of the French and at the same time to preserve the rhythm of the English language.

An enlarged edition of the "Red and White" Book of Menzies, brought up to date, is almost ready for the press and will contain a wealth of historical information only now brought to light, connected with Prince Charlie and the forty-five, etc. There will be a large number of illustrations, one being a reproduction of a painting discovered by Sir Robert Menzies, representing the Clan Menzies (two hundred in number) as the Guard of Honour to Queen Victoria on her first visit to the Highlands in 1842, and an account of the great Highland funeral of the late chief of the clan is given.

Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes have in preparation "The Knights of England," a complete record from the earliest time to the present of the knights of all the Orders of Chivalry in England, Scotland and Ireland, and of knights bachelors, by William A. Shaw, Litt.D., editor of the Calendar of Treasury Papers at H.M. Record Office, author of the History of Currency, etc., incorporating a complete list of knights bachelors dubbed in Ireland, compiled by G. B. D. Burtchaell, M.A., M.R.I.A., Barrister-at-Law, Office of Arms, Ireland; printed and published for the Central Chancery of the Orders of Knighthood, Lord Chamberlain's Office, St. James's Palace.

A new book on the "Queen of the Blue Stockings" is promised by Mr. Murray early in April: "The Early Life of Elizabeth Montagu," by her great-grand-niece, Emily J. Climençon. Four volumes of letters to and from the Madame du Deffand of London society, as Mrs. Montagu has been called, were published by her nephew and executor, Matthew Montagu, between 1731-61, but fortunately her correspondence has been most carefully collected and preserved, and this work will consist of materials from that great store which have not hitherto been made public.

"Wenharton and Bulcamp, Suffolk," is the title of a work of local history by Rev. J. B. Clare to be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. It contains a list of vicars of the parish from 1217, and churchwardens from 1547, and gives a description of the recently discovered ancient painting in the church, known as "The Wenharton Doom" and an account of some of the old wills and lawsuits of the locality. A glossary of old-fashioned words still in use is also supplied.

The Gresham Publishing Co. are issuing, in fourteen volumes, a handsome new edition of the "Shakespeare" edited by Sir Henry Irving and Frank A. Marshall; and the third volume of Professor J. Wortley Axe's work, "The Horse: its treatment in health and disease, with complete guide to breeding, training, and management"—which the same firm is issuing in nine volumes—is in the press.

It is believed in America that Mr. Carnegie is engaged on an autobiographic volume, which he intends should be a guide to young men of energy and ambition. He has intimated that he will not shield himself nor omit his mistakes in life, and he has asked each of his former partners to furnish dates and reminiscences, which he will compile.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE VALUE OF CRITICISM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have seldom read words of weightier wisdom than I found in the ACADEMY of February 17, 1906, at p. 165, where it is said that—"We object, on principle, to the literary introduction [to a classical book], which dulls the direct effect of the book on the reader's mind," etc. It is well said, at the same time, that "the gain of reading a good book is doubled when the reader learns also its place in the history of literature, its derivation, its kinship, its descendants."

That is just the very point. All that we want to know about a book is a brief account of its origin and all the facts and dates regarding it that are essential and acceptable. But what I, for one, resent with my whole heart is a mass of opinions about its style, and its relation to the styles of other writers.

During a good half-century, English literature has been my delight. My plan has always been, and always will be, to buy texts, complete if possible, in an accessible and readable form; and then to read the texts themselves, from end to end if possible, but leisurely and as it has pleased me to do from time to time. Some pieces, even by reputed authors, are hardly to be read now, except in so far as they illustrate old customs or old words. Others can be read twice or thrice.

But the twaddle about style is intolerable. I do not read a book in order to form somebody else's opinion about it; I would far rather do so for myself. I am not a babe, and I detest spoon-meat. If only some of our critics could come to appreciate, even to a slight degree, that we do not want their opinions, that their standing in the author's light is often a piece of needless and offensive impertinence, and that a great deal of their talk about the beauties and defects of an author is either irrelevant, inconclusive, or peculiar to themselves, much less ink need be spilt. The only editor whom I can respect is one who faithfully serves and helps me, and who has sufficient common sense to know when he has said enough. "Parallelisms" from other writers are often lugged in, head and shoulders, merely to show learning, and are by no means "parallel" except at a very great distance. Let all wise men read the texts themselves, and let editors learn that they are mere servants, not literary advisers.

WALTER W. SKRAT.

MR. LANG'S "SECRET OF THE TOTEM"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some readers of Mr. Lang's interesting work, "The Secret of the Totem," may yet, like myself, find a difficulty with part of his theory. Mr. Lang suggests that the animal names originally arose from "sobriquets given by group to group." The "We" did not require a name for themselves but for each of the other groups whom they collectively designated "wild blacks," "barbarians," "outsiders," etc.; and thus the animal nicknames were applied. For our benefit he compares the use of sobriquets in France, England, Orkney, etc. Without doubt these latter are true nicknames and were applied as terms of contempt, the object being to reduce the party to the level of the beast or to pour ridicule on him. But Mr. Lang tells us that "savages undeniably do not draw the line between beasts and other things on the one hand and men on the other, as we do." Now it is just because we draw this distinction that these animal names have been applied in Scotland and elsewhere, and they would not have been given were this not implied.

"The names were rather honour-giving than derisive," says Mr. Lang. Why then were the names given? All Mr. Lang's modern examples seem to imply the reverse. "The savage does think nobly of all animals and so has no reason for resenting but rather for glorying in his totem name." Yes, as totem name; but is there any proof that he would apply the name of an animal he thought nobly of to the "barbarians," "outsiders," etc.? Mr. Lang seems to want to eat his cake and have it. In the first case the savage is required to have a contempt for animals and to draw a wide distinction between the animal kingdom and man in order that the names may be applied to the hostile groups; then he is required to honour all animals and to believe in a "mystic union," etc., in order to give rise to the belief in the totem. Both can hardly be true.

Again, if "a name" implies all that Mr. Lang supposes it does to the savage, why does the latter give it to his enemy? He surely must be able to reason sufficiently to know that in his own mind this brings his enemy under the protection of the animal. If not when used by him, it would certainly do so if adopted by the enemy. This ought to put a prohibition on the use of animal names unless self-imposed.

ALFRED H. CROOK.

Hong Kong, January 16.

IN MEMORIAM

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I submit a paraphrase of that passage in your review of "In Memoriam," of which it is asked how many readers could disentangle the texture?

"If, in thy second state sublime, Thy ransom'd reason	If, in heaven, Thy reason, being again where it first came from,
change replies	interchange opinion
With all the circle of the wise,	with the array of wise spirits already in heaven
The perfect flower of human time;	who were at one time humans, and the best and greatest of the world;
And if thou cast thine eyes below,	And if thou look back upon earth again and see me, having in thine eyes the glamour of these great departed ones,
How dimly character'd	how little must my form stand out from its environment, since all things appear in a mist when one has been gazing at a strong light;
and slight,	and how feeble must I appear, compared to those great ones;
How dwarf'd a growth of cold and night,	how like a plant that has been deprived of sunshine: small, and
How blanch'd with dark- ness	colourless (for plants become white when grown in the dark)
must I grow!	must I seem more and more to you as your vision compares me with what is before you;— "the perfect flowers."

Your reviewer says nothing about the first couplet of the third stanza; but perhaps the readers are presumed to be "equal to the intellectual pressure" of that.

F. C. TILNEY.

February 8.

WORDSWORTH AND SHELLEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. G. E. Biddle, is clearly of the same opinion as Wordsworth himself, who once observed in Lamb's presence that he could write plays like Shakespeare, if he had a mind. "Then," observed Lamb drily (and the vast majority of critics will agree with him), "it's only the mind that's wanting!"

Of course Macaulay was completely in the wrong, and the power of writing masterpieces like the "Iliad" and "Odyssey" the Prometheus Bound, the Bacchae, the "Republic," the "Inferno," the "Paradise Lost," the "Faery Queen," and the "Pilgrim's Progress," is "the easiest and most obvious of gifts." What a pity that so few of us take the trouble to exercise it!

But Shelley's poetry is "infected with wretched pessimism and gloomy melancholy." Unhappily the Agamemnon, Oedipus Rex, Medea, Hamlet, King Lear, Phedre, Wallenstein, Faust, "Isabella," the "Prisoner of Chillon," the "Ring and the Book," the "Bride of Lammermoor," "Eugénie Grandet," "Romola," "Vanity Fair," Pascal's "Pensées," La Rochefoucauld's "Maxims," Swift's and Juvenal's "Satires" are infected with the same baneful spirit. What a misfortune that literary students are perverse enough to study such morbid productions, instead of turning to the "better and richer banquet spread by Wordsworth," including, I presume, such inimitable poems as the "Idiot Boy," the "Ecclesiastical Sonnets," and the dreary pages of the "Prelude"!

Your correspondent's remarks on "trash" are amusing and unlucky. No doubt there have always been critics who have set Colley Cibber above Pope, Mrs. Hemans above Browning, and Mrs. Henry Wood above Thackeray, Codrus above Juvenal, and Bavius and Maeuius above Virgil—"Valent quantum!"

I will not trouble you and your readers by taking any further part in this discussion.

A STUDENT OF LITERATURE.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I regret having again to trouble you with a letter. My previous contribution—appealing only for toleration for the supreme rights of individual taste—was so severely handled, so much misconstrued that I write in fear and trembling as to the reception that will be accorded to my second letter. But Mr. Hutton has asked me a question, and no other course seems open to me but to make an attempt at replying. My great difficulty is to know how rightly to interpret his inquiry. Lest he should think me raising difficulties of my own creation I will quote his actual words. "If to be inspired with a genuine admiration for some of the noblest lines yet written by any poet since Shakespeare and Milton is to entitle one to the appellation of 'fanatical devotee,' what name shall be given to one who equally admires a poet whose words, 'Came like water and like wind (they) go,' leaving no lasting or ennobling influence on the minds and hearts of his readers?" This question seems to me open to two distinct interpretations. If he intends this extract from Omar together with the following words to represent the effect of either Shelley's or FitzGerald's verse, I have no hesitation in denying his assertion with all the strength of which I am possessed. It is utterly absurd—one might almost say ridiculous—as a comment on the greatest lyricist in our language—on Shelley who wrote the great "Ode to the West-wind"—or the "Ode to Night"; and, always assuming I have understood him aright, the relevancy or necessity of his question is by no means clear. What we are discussing is "The Immortal Phrase"—not the relative positions in the poetical hierarchy of Shelley and Wordsworth.

But perhaps he wants me to give him a description of a lover of a poet of his own selection, but not being aware of the poet he has chosen, I cannot possibly do as he wishes.

I have done what I can to satisfy Mr. Hutton's demand, and it is not for me to criticise his comparison of Shelley's verse with a rainbow, or to express my inability to appreciate his talk about the "universal heart of mankind" in this connection. And I suppose I must not do more than merely remark the eagerness with which he seizes upon a slight mistake of mine—perfectly immaterial as it is—in the omission of the word "correspondent" from the sentence of mine he quotes.

Before I close, however, I should like to point out to J. E. H. that it is the very antithesis to dogmatism to assert that each individual mind is the final arbiter on points of taste. It does not imply dogmatism, to state a thing emphatically and decisively. And I should like him to observe that all I wished to know of Coleridge's statement, which Mr. Hutton quoted, was, whether it was made under circumstances which would justify its being used as an argument in this particular controversy. Perhaps Mr. Hutton may even yet oblige me by elucidating this somewhat obscure point.

FRANK FOVARQUE.

February 7.

PATELIN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A sense of gratitude might surely have induced your reviewer to refrain from further reference to my "feeble" translation, which he tried his best to bludgeon out of existence last April. (But, as I pointed out in your columns, some of his strokes fell à tort et à travers, a scintilla of life remained, and I believe my humble attempt will yet reach a second edition.) The recent "scholarly and vigorous translation" of the original farce must have been suggested by a revival of interest in the whole subject early in 1905. The alternative supposition would imply that the long arm of coincidence this time had extended over nearly four and a half centuries. The difficulty of translating the Breton and other dialects Dr. Holbrook, it would seem, has surmounted (or evaded, as you obligingly and obliquely suggest) by leaving unattempted; but this evasion is a very small matter compared with the whole form of this latest version. With deference, I submit that to give in prose a great classic that made its first appeal in such lively verse is not to present English readers, for the first time, with "an opportunity of gaining a just idea of what this famous play was like." As a poor private student, with no University training, I am not in a position to estimate to what degree Archbishop Whateley is still an authority, but I read in my copy of his "Rhetoric" that "none but a poet can be qualified to translate a poem," and further, that "a good translation in verse is read, by one well acquainted with the original, with equal or even superior pleasure to that which it affords to one ignorant of that original." Hitherto I have been given to understand that a close prose translation of poetry served the purpose merely of the harmless, necessary "crib."

SAMUEL F. G. WHITAKER.

February 20.

[Our Reviewer writes: I abstained from mentioning Mr. Whitaker's name in connection with Dr. Holbrook's Patelin; but, since he wishes it to appear, pray use your discretion. I have no intention of referring further to his work, but does he class Lang, Leaf and Myers's and Butcher and Lang's Homer, Lang's Theocritus, and Jebb's Sophocles among "harmless, necessary cribs" ?]

BOOKS RECEIVED

ARCHÆOLOGY.

- Bland, R. N. Historical Tombstones of Malacca, mostly of Portuguese and Dutch Origin. 11½ x 8½. Pp. 75. Elliot Stock, 10s. 6d.
[With the inscriptions in detail and illustrated by numerous photographs.]
Macdonald, George. Coin Types: their origin and development. The Rhind Lectures for 1904. With numerous plates. 9½ x 6. Pp. 275. MacLehose, 10s. net.

ART.

- Miltoun, Francis. The Cathedrals and Churches of the Rhine. 8 x 5½. Pp. 370. Brimley Johnson, 6s. net.

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Tweedie, Mrs. Alec. Porfirio Diaz: seven times President of Mexico. With over 100 illustrations and a map. 10 x 6½. Pp. 421. Hurst & Blackett, 21s. net.
[After publishing "Mexico as I Saw It," Mrs. Tweedie revisited the country and stayed with President Diaz and his wife. At the beginning of her biography, the author ingenuously remarks that she considers her hero the greatest man the nineteenth century produced.]

DRAMA.

- Fyfe, Peter. Kedar: a Drama. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 134. Glasgow: William Hodge, 2s. 6d.

EDUCATION.

- A Nature Reader for Senior Students*. An Anthology of the Poetry of Nature. Edited by the Hon. Sir John Cockburn and E. E. Speight. 7½ x 5. Pp. 334. Hodder & Stoughton, 2s. net.

FICTION.

- Marriott, Charles. The Lapse of Vivien Eady. 7½ x 5. Pp. 311. Nash, 6s. (See p. 181.)
Thurston, Katherine Cecil. The Gambler. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 389. Hutchinson, 6s. (See p. 181.)
Ohnet, Georges. The Poison-Dealer. Translated by F. Rothwell. 7½ x 5. Pp. 293. Werner Laurie, 6s.
Boyd, Mary Stuart. The Misses Make-Believe. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. Chapman & Hall, 6s.
Rickert, Edith. Folly. 8 x 5½. Pp. 315. Arnold, 6s.
Elliott, Edwin. Barr and Son. 7½ x 5. Pp. 291. Elliot Stock, 6s. net.
A Time of Terror. The Story of a Great Revenge. (A.D. 1910.) 7½ x 5½. Pp. 340. Greening, 6s.
Thurston, E. Temple. Traffic. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 452. Duckworth, 6s.
Everett-Green, Evelyn. Lady Elizabeth and The Juggernaut. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 349. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.
Eyre, Archibald. The Girl in Waiting. 7½ x 5. Pp. 313. Ward, Lock, 6s. net.
Farrer, R. J. The House of Shadows. 7½ x 5. Pp. 335. Arnold, 6s.
Webbing, Peggy. Blue Jay. 7½ x 5. Pp. 378. Heinemann, 6s.
Reynolds, Mrs. Fred. In Silence. 7½ x 5. Pp. 336. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

GENEALOGY.

- The Scots Peerage*. Founded on Wood's edition of Sir Robert Douglas's "Peerage of Scotland." An historical and genealogical account of the nobility of Scotland. Edited by Sir James Balfour Paul, Lord Lyon King of Arms. With armorial illustrations. Vol. iii. Crawford-Falkland. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 617. Edinburgh: Douglas. To subscribers 25s. net. per vol., or single vols., 30s. net.

HISTORY.

- The Records of the City of Norwich*. Compiled and edited by the Rev. William Hudson and John Cottingham Tingey. Published in two volumes by authority of the Corporation of the City of Norwich. Vol. 1. 10½ x 6½. Pp. cxlvi. Jarrold, 25s. net.

[The Norwich Muniment Room is, perhaps, richer than that of any other City in the Kingdom in its Records, dating back to the twelfth century. These have been arranged and put into order, and some two years ago the Authorities of the City decided to place a portion of the most interesting of these Records at the disposal of the reading public by publishing them in two volumes. The first issue is limited to 500 copies, of which the Norwich Corporation have reserved 100 copies for their future use, leaving only 400 copies for subscription.]

Stubbs, William. Lectures on Early English History. Edited by Arthur Hassall. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 391. Longmans, 12s. 6d. net.

[Delivered at various times. The Constitution under the Early English and Norman Kings is described, and full explanations are given of the technical terms used in the laws and charters of the Norman Kings, forming a kind of commentary on the "Select Charters." Among the more important of the later lectures are an account and comparison of Early European Constitutions, and discussions on the Character of the Early Ecclesiastical Systems in Europe, on the Origins of the European Land System, and on European Law. The volume closes with a lecture on the Beginnings of English Foreign Policy.]

LITERATURE.

Moulton, James Hope. A Grammar of New Testament Greek. Vol. i.—Prolegomena. 9½ x 6. Pp. xx, 274. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 8s. net.

[Based on W. F. Moulton's edition of G. B. Winer's Grammar.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Acorn. A Quarterly Magazine of Literature and Art. 9 x 7. Pp. 129. Published by the Caradoc Press, at 47 Great Russell St.

Lorimer, Adam. The Author's Progress, or The Literary Book of the Road. 8 x 5½. Pp. 276. Blackwood, 5s. net.

MUSIC.

Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland. In five vols.—vol. ii. F.—L. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 794. Macmillan, 21s. net.

Singing, or Method of Song and Speech. By a Singer. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 112. Elliot Stock, 3s. 6d.

[Chapters on voice-articulation, voice-nervousness, voice variation, the voice in reading and speaking, etc.]

Goddard, Joseph. The Deeper Sources of the Beauty and Expression of Music. With many musical examples. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 119. Reeves.

PHILOSOPHY.

Hight, George Ainslie. The Unity of Will: studies of an Irrationalist. 9½ x 6. Pp. xv, 244. Chapman & Hall, 10s. 6d. net.

[The views expressed in these pages are based on those of Schopenhauer, contained in chapter xix, Pt. ii. of his "Die Welt als Vorstellung."]

POETRY.

White Poppies. By Iarfhlaith. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 190. Oxford: Blackwell, 3s. 6d. net.

Roberts, R. Ellis. Poems. 9½ x 6. Pp. 100. Brimley Johnson.

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Watt, A. F.; and Hayes, B. J. Matriculation Selections from Latin Authors. University Tutorial series. Second Edition (third impression). 7 x 5. Pp. 338. University Tutorial Press, 2s. 6d.

The Pocket George MacDonald. A Choice of Passages. Made by Alfred H. Hyatt. 5½ x 3½. Pp. 214. Chatto & Windus, 2s. net.

SCIENCE.

Guenther, Conrad. Darwinism and the Problems of Life. A Study of Familiar Animal Life. Translated from the Third Edition by Joseph McCabe. 10 x 6½. Pp. 436. Owen, 12s. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY.

Prayer-Book Commentary for Teachers and Students. New edition, revised and partly rewritten by the Rev. F. E. Warren, B.D. 6½ x 4. Pp. 312. S.P.C.K., 2s.

[Notes on the Calendar, Services, Articles, Table of Kindred, etc., together with complete Concordances to the Prayer-Book and Psalter.]

A Book of Angels. Edited by L. P. With 12 plates. 8½ x 5½. Longmans, 6s. net.

[Papers and selections from sermons dealing with angels. Similar to "The Inheritance of the Saints," by the same editor.]

Devas, Charles Stanton. The Key to the World's Progress, being an essay on historical logic. 8 x 5½. Pp. 321. Longmans, 5s. net.

Legg, J. Wickham. Ecclesiastical Essays. 9 x 6½. Pp. xii, 275. The De la More Press, 7s. 6d. net.

[Vol. vii. of the Library of Liturgiology and Ecclesiology for English Readers, edited by Vernon Staley. Dr. Wickham Legg's essays, collected from periodicals, deal mainly with liturgical and ritual subjects, and include "Revised and shortened services" and "The Lambeth Hearing." The book is handsomely illustrated, and there is a good index.]

Books on Egypt and Chaldaea: The Egyptian Heaven and Hell. By E. A. Wallis Budge. 3 vols. Each 7½ x 5½. Kegan Paul, 6s. net per vol.

[Vol. i. contains the complete hieroglyphic text of the Book Am-Tuat; vol. ii. the hieroglyphic text of the summary or short form of the Book Am-Tuat, and the complete hieroglyphic text of the Book of Gates, and both volumes give translations and reproductions of all the illustrations. In vol. iii. the contents of the books of the Other World are described and compared.]

Religions, Ancient and Modern. Animism: the Seed of Religion, by Edward Clodd (pp. 99); Pantheism: its Story and Significance, by James Allanson Picton (pp. 93); Religions of Ancient China, by Herbert A. Giles, LL.D., Professor of Chinese at Cambridge University (pp. 68); The Religion of Ancient Greece, by Jane Harrison (pp. 64). Each 6½ x 4½. Constable, 1s. net per vol.

[The aim and scope of the series is to provide bird's-eye views, in separate volumes, of the religions of the world. Each volume enumerates and explains the tenets and teachings of the religion it is dealing with, and records the influence that religion has exerted, not only on its immediate adherents and the nations which have adopted it, but also upon the sister religions and upon the world at large. The next volumes will be: "Islam," by Professor T. W. Arnold; "Magic and Fetishism," by Dr. A. C. Haddon; and "The Religion of Ancient Egypt," by Professor W. M. Flinders Petrie.]

Weinel, H. St. Paul: the Man and his Work. Translated by the Rev. G. A. Bienemann and edited by the Rev. W. D. Morrison. 9 x 5½. Pp. 399. Theological Translation Library. Williams & Norgate, 10s. 6d.

[The greater part of this book appeared as a series of articles in the "Christliche Welt," but these have been revised, and the two chapters "The Theologian" and "The Man" added.]

Bousset, W. Jesus. Translated by Janet Penrose Trevelyan. Edited by the Rev. W. D. Morrison, LL.D. Crown Theological Library. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 211. Williams & Norgate, 4s.

[Book i: The Outward Course of the Life of Jesus, and the Forms of His Activity. Book ii: The Teaching of Jesus; Book iii: The Mystery of the Person.]

Edmonds, Dom Columba. The Early Scottish Church: its doctrine and discipline. With a preface by the Right Reverend Aeneas Chisholm, LL.D. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xix, 306. Sands, 6s. net.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Reynolds-Ball, Eustace. Rome: a Practical Guide to Rome and its Environs. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 256. Black, 2s. 6d.

Fountain, Paul. The Eleven Eagles of the West. 9 x 6. Pp. x, 362. Murray, 10s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Fountain, contrary to his expressed intention, has returned to America in this, his fourth book; but he deals here with the eleven Western states—California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah and Nevada.]

THE BOOKSHELF

Poetical Tributes in memory of the late Sir Henry Irving. Edited by Chas. F. Forshaw, LL.D., F.R.S.L., F.R.Hist. S., Honorary Dental Surgeon to the Actors' Association. (Elliot Stock, 5s. net). This volume is a further proof of the enthusiasm awakened in the breasts of his countrymen by the late Sir Henry Irving, and is interesting on that account as a document in evidence. There its interest ends. We cannot recommend any one to be at the pains of reading these tributes: it is enough to know that Sir Henry's death inspired no less than one hundred and four persons to write "poems" which found a place in one or other of the London and Provincial journals—of how many more were roused to less fortunate efforts there is no record in the volume before us. Occasions like these are festivals of the obvious. Of these one hundred and four twenty-seven quote—in various degrees of accuracy—the now famous line from Becket: no less than thirty-four request that the curtain may be drawn down, or rung down, or inform us that it has been drawn down, or rung down, or closed. We have not tried to count the number who talk of life as a role (which in this volume is consistently spelled and printed as if it were an English word), and quotations from Hamlet are as thick as blackberries. One gentleman introduces a diversion by scanning "Melpomene" as a trisyllable; another by three times in two poems crying "Elegiac," as if it were "Oyez," and scanning it as two iambs. With the exception of the fine lines of Mr. Sydney Grundy, Mr. W. L. Courtney (here twice spelled Courtenay), Mr. James Rhoades and Mr. Owen Seaman, we find no "tributes" in which the poetic power shown is so creditable to their authors as the honest admiration of the great man in whose honour they were written—not even that of the Alderman who brackets Shakespeare and Sir Henry Irving together as "masters of the tragic art," nor the clergyman who rhymes "Pericles" to "Mon fils." The book is carelessly edited and printed.

To all aspirants to authorship we commend Miss C. E. Heisch's little book, The Art and Craft of the Author, practical hints upon literary work (Elliot Stock). Miss Heisch has nothing new to say—and that is to her credit. Her advice may be boiled down into the old golden precepts: Be honest; be patient; be industrious. But it is just because, year by year, the growth of journalism offers more and more temptation to young people to be in a hurry to "turn out" articles in response to the constantly increasing demand, that we call their attention to a little book which takes the art and craft of the author seriously and points no easy royal road to success. The book is not free from faults (surely Miss Heisch might have found something better than "Jim Bludso" to quote as an example of "exceedingly powerful writing, achieved by very natural means"); but her advice is always good, and her book is well arranged and clearly written.

Students of Rossetti will be glad to have their attention called to the Bibliography of the Works of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, by Mr. William Michael Rossetti (Ellis). It is reprinted, with revisions and additions, from the Bibliographer of New York, and contains, in addition to the bibliography proper, a list of Books illustrated by Rossetti, a supplementary list of French and Italian translations from Rossetti, and an Index.

A Manual of Carpentry and Joinery. By J. W. Riley (Macmillan, 6s. net). This book is designed with special reference to the syllabus of the City and Guilds of London Institute, and its object is "to develop an appreciation of general principles." The author has, on the whole, succeeded in producing a book which will prove of great service to the student, and the chapters on Geometry and Mensuration are especially valuable, for the tyro who makes himself master of these will be well equipped when entering on the practical stage of the course. The summaries and questions appended to each section of the book will prove very useful to the lecturer, as well as to the student who desires to test his knowledge as he goes on. In the list of timbers it is stated that the wood of the chestnut is "of a brownish colour," and that "it is used for piles, and occasionally as a substitute for oak." This statement is misleading, for it applies only to the wood of the sweet or Spanish chestnut. The timber of the Horse-chestnut, which Mr. Riley does not mention at all, is almost pure white and very brittle, and is used extensively in turning and for in-laying. The American Hornbeam should also have been described, for it is a valuable timber and is largely employed in pattern-making, for wooden cog-wheels, and boot-trees, and for many other purposes where a hard, tough and very durable wood is required. The telescopic or extension ladder is so very generally used nowadays that a description of its construction would have been useful, and should be included in the next edition of the book, in which the following errors should also be corrected; on p. 159, line 9, "that" is put for "than"; p. 286, line 3, the reference should be to Fig. 542, not 539. On p. 331 we have three-fourths of a page of verbatim repetition from p. 160, which could with advantage be replaced by a reference. The book is very fully illustrated with diagrams, sketches, and photographs, all of them without fault, except the drawing of a "clout" nail, which should have a much larger head and a round point, not a flat one.

Mariale Novum (Longmans, 3s. 6d. net).—A few members (fourteen or fifteen) of the Society of Jesus have collected into a volume a series of sonnets on the titles of the "Litany of Loreto," or "Litany of Our Lady." The sonnets, including an introductory sonnet to St. Joseph and those on the invocations to the Trinity, are sixty-three in number, in allusion to the sixty-three years which the Virgin Mary is said by tradition to have lived. The sonnets are only signed by initial Greek letters, but the same letter stands always for the same writer. Our favourite in all is Zeta, though Alpha has a fine sonnet to St. Joseph. The making of sonnets is, after all, in most cases a gentlemanly exercise; the inspired sonnet is rarer in literature than poets and critics are willing to believe; and it is in no depreciation of the sonnets before us that we pronounce them—nearly all—the work of intelligent, cultivated and thoughtful men, rather than of poets. One and all, they are well worth study. Most of them are packed with thought, all of them have a grave restraint and dignity very far removed from the religious sensationalism that has done so much to discredit sacred poetry in the eyes of students of literature. We in England have a fine heritage of sacred poetry; and the Society of Jesus, the Society of which Robert Southwell was a member, has peculiar claims on and duties towards that heritage. Worthily conscious of their privilege, the authors of this most interesting and pleasing volume have proved themselves good stewards.

The Extinction of the Ancient Hierarchy. By the Rev. G. E. Phillips. (Sands, 10s. 6d. net.) The frescoes and inscriptions commemorating the English martyrs for the Roman Catholic Faith, which were painted in the Old English College in Rome late in the sixteenth century by Pomarancio, mainly through the activity of George Gilbert, assisted by Bishop (afterwards Cardinal) Allen and others, were instrumental in securing the Beatification of those martyrs by Pope Leo XIII. Part of one of these frescoes (which survive now only in engravings) represented a prison, with this inscription beneath it: Propter sedis Romanæ et fidei catholice confessionem undecim Rmi. episcopi catholici ex diuturna carceris molestia contabescens obierunt. Who were these eleven Bishops who died in prison in the Elizabethan persecutions? Their names were well known in the times contiguous to their own; the record became confused and blurred before the day of the Beatification; and the task Father Phillips has set himself is the identification of the eleven and the record of their histories. A careful examination of contemporary evidence, conducted with acumen and power, has resulted in his complete success. The eleven are identified, and the book, besides the obvious interest to Roman Catholics, has claims on the student of history for the light it throws on the events of those stirring years. Incidentally, Father Phillips, following in the footsteps of Mr. James Gairdner and other Protestant historians, clears Bishop Bonner from the charge of cruelty that has clung to him too long.

Peg Woffington. By Charles Reade. (Moring: The King's Novels, 1s. 6d. net.)—We are glad to welcome so charming a reprint as this of so fine a novel as "Peg Woffington." The work itself is, we hope, too well known to need comment; but the value of this edition is enhanced by the introduction contributed by Dr. Richard Garnett. Dr. Garnett tells the story of how Masks and Faces came to be made into a novel, sets out the advantages a novel has over a play, and raises two interesting questions: Why was there so much acted and so little written fiction before Boccaccio; and which branch of the art—play or novel—will outlive the other? In answer to the first he suggests want of education, paucity of writing materials, and the fact that "literature was for many ages confined to countries where the conditions of climate encourage exhibitions and recitation in the open air." He might have added, we believe, the superior force of illusion with which a play affects people not critical enough to observe its essential exaggerations and falsities. To the second question, Dr. Garnett replies that he believes the novel will outlive the theatre. We believe him to be right, but hope that we shall not live to see the day when his prophecy is fulfilled. The present book is a welcome addition to one of the most charming series of reprints in the market.

SMITH, ELDER & CO'S LIST

NEW NOVEL BY M. E. CARR.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE

POISON OF TONGUES.

By M. E. CARR,

Author of "Love and Honour" and "George Goring's Daughters."

NEW NOVEL BY G. F. BRADBY.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

DICK: A Story Without a Plot.

By G. F. BRADBY,

Author of "Joshua Newings; or, The Love Bacillus" and "The Marquis's Eye."

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. PERCY DEARMER.

READY FEBRUARY 26. Crown 8vo, 6s.

BROWNJOHN'S.

By Mrs. PERCY

DEARMER,

Author of "The Orangery: a Comedy of Tears," "The Difficult Way," etc.

ALSO A THIRD IMPRESSION OF MRS. DEARMER'S NOVEL.

THE DIFFICULT WAY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

STANDARD.—"Mrs. Dearmar's new novel is one of the most remarkable and noteworthy that have been produced this season."

THE FOURTH PARTY.

By HAROLD E. CORST. With a Preface by Sir JOHN CORST.

With a Frontispiece and Facsimile Letter. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. WORLD.—"There are few more entertaining episodes in our recent political history than that which is narrated by Mr. Harold E. Corst in 'The Fourth Party.'"

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

The University and the Nation

The "Saturday Westminster Gazette" is publishing a series of eight articles upon Oxford, entitled "The University and the Nation." These discuss briefly the resources at the disposal of Oxford, the use which is made at present of college emoluments, and the possibility of rendering the humane education of our older Universities, their distinctive and inestimable gift, more easily accessible to the increasing number of men in all classes who are fitted alike by previous training and future responsibilities to pursue University studies.

1. THE CASE FOR INQUIRY.
2. THE RESOURCES OF OXFORD.
3. THE UNIVERSITY AND THE COLLEGES
4. THE SCHOLARSHIP SYSTEM.
5. THE ENTRANCE EXAMINATION.
6. THE LIMITATIONS OF THE COLLEGE SYSTEM.
7. PRIZE FELLOWSHIPS AND RESEARCH.
8. WHAT A NEW COMMISSION MIGHT DO.

The first three articles appeared last week, and Nos. 4 and 5 are given in the current number.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

February 24 One Penny

OFFICES: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations. 21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD and OWEN THOMAS. Price 21s. net.
507 pages. Size 10½ by 7½ in.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 500 Full-Page illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

CADBURY'S COCOA

"Has stood the test of Time"

"The good old English cocoa"

CADBURY'S
COCOA ESSENCE
REGISTERED
Guaranteed Absolutely Pure Cocoa

Absolutely Pure therefore Best.

Sold only in Tins & Packets.

CADBURY'S
COCOA ESSENCE
REGISTERED
GUARANTEED TO BE GENUINE COCOA

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1765

MARCH 3, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF WALES, ABERYSTWYTH
(A Constituent College of the University of Wales).

PROFESSORSHIP OF ENGLISH.

The Council invite Applications for the post of Professor of English at the above College, at a Salary of £300 a year.

Applications, together with 75 printed copies of Testimonials, must reach the Registrar not later than Tuesday, March 13, 1906.

Full particulars may be obtained from the undersigned.

J. H. DAVIES, M.A.,
Registrar.

OAKHAM SCHOOL (Rutland).

A small well-endowed Public School with numerous Exhibitions to the Universities.

The alterations and additions, which are now complete, make the buildings exceptionally good.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.

For particulars apply to the Headmaster.

EDUCATION SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS and ENGRAVERS, 5a, Pall-mall East, S.W.

24th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN
AILY, 10 to 6. Admission 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water-colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 3 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS,
All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue Just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London,

STRADIARIUS VIOLIN in case, date 1770, in good condition.—J. HOLLAND, Belton, Grantham, Lincs.

LIFE and WORKS of ROBERT BURNS,
Paterson's beautiful edition. Limited to 500 copies. This is No. 239. Illustrations and facsimiles. Well bound 4 call, gilt top, 6 vols. £3 12s. 6d.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

CHAMBERS'S "MEDIÆVAL STAGE,"
Clean second-hand copy wanted.—No. 364 Academy
Advertisement Office, 20 Tavistock Street, W.C.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

DR. K. FEYERABEND, PROFESSOR at the State College, Coethen (Germany), receives one or two English gentlemen. Refined home. Best German, Classics, etc. Polytechnic in th Town,

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts), Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French. German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

TO AUTHORS.—ISABEL H. CAINE (Certificated Cambridge) undertakes all descriptions of TYPING at 9d. per 1000 words; with Carbon Duplicate, 1s. Excellent references.—The Hollies, Durrington, Worthing.

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING.
Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

THE BOOKSELLERS' PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

Founded 1837.
Patron—HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.
Invested Capital £30,000.

The Annual General Meeting will be held at Stationers' Hall on Tuesday, March 13, 1906, at 6 P.M.

IMPORTANT AUCTION OF DOCUMENTS GENEALOGICAL AND HISTORICAL. AUTOGRAPHS.

Livres d'heures—Medieval MSS.—Miniatures—Autographs (Gabrielle d'Estrées, De Ruyter, Dibdin, Grotius, Ulrich von Hutten, Kant, John Locke, Schiller, Garrick, Beethoven, Boerhaave, Herschel, Jenner, Linnée, Newton, James Watt, etc.)—Albums Amicorum (XVth-XVIIIth cent.)—Armoriale—Family documents.—Economic works of P. de la Court (MSS of the XVIIth cent.)—Etc.

Collections: Baron M. P. Smisgaert., Baron Gost. van Havre, Baron P. H. de la Court, Baron Vanden Bogaerde de Heeswijk.

AUCTION IN AMSTERDAM AT Messrs. FREDERIK MULLER & Co.
DOELENSTRAAT 10 2-4 APRIL 1906
The Catalogue (1200 items with 8 reproductions) is sent on application.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 Illustrations. 21s. net.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450 Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. £2 2s. net each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS, V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies, and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc. Price 3s. 6d. net.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 9d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Normandy—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD, SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net.

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net, by post 13/- each.

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	195	The Drama :
Literature :		A Close Time for the Peasants	206
An Academic Biography . . .	198	"Measure for Measure" by the
The Aeneid in English Verse . .	199	O.U.D.S. . . . .	207
James Russell Lowell . . . . .	201	Mr. Hewlett's "Pastoral" at
The Failure of Metaphysics . . .	202	the Court Theatre . . . . .	207
Thackeray as Journalist . . . . .	202	Fine Art :
Napoleon on English History . .	203	The Painter-Etchers . . . . .	208
Literary Causerie :		Music :
The Song of the Siren . . . . .	203	The Oxford History of Music—
Fiction . . . . .	205	IV . . . . .	208
Books Received . . . . .	213	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	210
		Correspondence . . . . .	211

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

WE remarked, the other day, that Cambridge was more prolific of comic verse than Oxford. It is also a common saying and a popular belief that all the great poets and most of the minor poets who have been at any University at all have been at Cambridge. One can only settle the point by making out a list; and as there is always room for argument as to whether certain men of letters are rightly classed as poets or not, the essential thing is to have a principle of selection which is at least fair as between the two seats of learning. We will therefore place a Scotch critic in the judgment seat, and include in our list all the Oxford and Cambridge poets who are recognised as poets in "Chambers's Cyclopædia of English Literature," and about whom the necessary educational information is there given. Most of the names will thus be those of the illustrious dead, and of the illustrious living only the seniors will be included. Such poets as Mr. Owen Seaman of Cambridge and Mr. Laurence Binyon of Oxford are omitted for that reason and for no other. Let it be added that we adopt Chambers's division into periods. And now for the lists:

FIRST PERIOD.—The Reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
Daniel	Spenser
Drayton	Ben Jonson
Lodge	Phineas Fletcher
Barnfield	Nash
Sidney	Green
Wotton	Marlowe
Lyly	Beaumont
Peele	Thomas Heywood
Massinger

SECOND PERIOD, 1625-1689.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
Wither	Herbert
Carew	Quarles
Lovelace	Suckling
Cartwright	Randolph
Strode	Crashaw
Davenant	Herrick
Denham	Cowley
Otway	Milton
	Marvell
	Dryden
	Nathaniel Lee

THIRD PERIOD, 1689-1727.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
Addison	Prior
Bramston	Garth
Tickell	Ambrose Philips

FOURTH PERIOD, 1720-1780.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
Young	John Byrom
Collins	Gray
Shenstone	Robert Lloyd
George, Lord Lyttelton	Churchill
Merrick	Mason
Samuel Johnson	Whitehead
Thomas Warton	Christopher Anstey
Joseph Warton

FIFTH PERIOD, 1780-1830.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
William Jones	Erasmus Darwin
William Gifford	Kirke White
Bowles	Wordsworth
Southey	Coleridge
Landor	Byron
"Monk" Lewis	W. S. Rose
Shelley
Heber
John Wilson ("Christopher North")
Milman
Thomas Haynes Bayly
Keble
Cary

SIXTH PERIOD, since 1830.

OXFORD :	CAMBRIDGE :
Hartley Coleridge	Praed
Clough	Moultrie
Matthew Arnold	Macaulay
Swinburne	Lord Houghton
Barham	Tennyson
Robert Montgomery	Lord Lytton
J. H. Newman	Trench
R. S. Hawker	Barnes
Faber	FitzGerald
Tupper	Frederick Tennyson
John Nichol	Tennyson-Turner
J. A. Symonds	Cory
Lewis Carroll	Roden Noel
Lewis Morris	F. W. H. Myers
Edwin Arnold
William Morris
Bridges
Wilde

Some poets have been omitted on the ground that they were at both Universities—Chaucer and Calverley among the number. Of the one hundred and eight names on a list composed with the strictest impartiality, fifty-nine, it will be seen, belong to Oxford and only forty-nine to Cambridge; but if we limit the competition to poets of the very highest rank Cambridge indubitably has the better of it. Suppose we imagine such a thing as a poetical Triplos. The names in the First Class would presumably be those of Spenser, Milton, Dryden, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Byron, Tennyson, Shelley, Matthew Arnold, William Morris, and Swinburne. Cambridge, that is to say, would take seven firsts to Oxford's four; and, if Oxford should claim an additional first for Landor, Cambridge would make the same claim for FitzGerald and Gray. A comparison of the periods shows, however, that the Oxford standard is improving. The last two Oxford lists are both the longest and the strongest.

The latest stage in the negotiations with regard to copyright between Russia and France is a declaration on the part of M. Witte that he recognises the existence of literary property, and intends to adhere to the principles laid down upon the subject in the convention of Berne. In nothing perhaps is the necessity for some restrictive regulations more obvious than in matters relating to translation. On the one hand no sooner does Tolstoy, or some other well-known Russian author publish a novel, than incorrect and mutilated versions of it appear all over western Europe, while Russian publishers are often restrained from undertaking a really good translation of some important foreign work, because they have no means of discovering what inferior versions may be in process of production at the hands of some thoroughly incapable denizen of the Grub Street of St. Petersburg. Thus fourteen different versions of Zola's "Débâcle" were published in Russia—a great waste, it must be admitted, of literary energy.

Beyond the fact that two rival publishing firms have in the press editions of his Diary, little notice is likely to be taken of the two hundredth anniversary of the death of John Evelyn. He had the misfortune to be a contemporary of Pepys, and his style being cold and formal, he has suffered by comparison. Yet, if the truth were known, later-day historians have probably owed more to him than to either Pepys or Walpole. His neglect is doubtless due as much to his lack of sympathy with his environment as to anything else. The unbridled licence of Charles II.'s Court suited Pepys: it disgusted Evelyn; and it was this alienation from the life of his contemporaries that made him a Great Londoner. He interested himself in schemes for its improvement and was largely instrumental in procuring the paving of "the Hay Market about Piquillo." Dearly as he loved his garden, he seems to have loved his London more, and he has this claim on its remembrance and affection, that he discovered Grinling Gibbons. It was a momentous discovery, and if he preens himself overmuch on his perception of the talent of the man he discovered in a wretched hovel near his own house, we can forgive him. The humour of his indignation against the French "peddling woman" at the Court who found faults in Gibbons's work, "which she understood no more than an asse or a monkey," is sufficient atonement.

Even the hardened heart of Mr. Bernard Shaw would find room for praise of at least one of the amateur acting clubs—that of the St. James's Dramatic Society, which gives occasional performances at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock Place. Last Monday, as if to rebuke the unkindness of the great man, the members gave part of their repertory—scenes from Midsummer Night's Dream, Romeo and Juliet, Twelfth Night and the Paolo and Francesca of Mr. Stephen Phillips (by special permission of Mr. George Alexander). Among the ladies who specially distinguished themselves may be mentioned the Miss Fernheads, Miss Amy Rooker, and Miss Matilda Hayes, and among the young men Mr. Charles Gadsly, Mr. William Hayes, and Mr. Frederick Stanley Smith, who at the New Stage Club and elsewhere is in constant requisition owing to his real ability for speaking poetry, an unusual gift among amateurs. The scenes were simply and tastefully mounted: the crowded house was enthusiastic, and the gate-money was devoted to the Church of St. James, of which the incumbent, Father Barber, is no less popular among his congregation than the Major Barbara of Mr. Shaw was in the Salvation Army.

It is not generally known that Alfred Domett, whose name is to be linked with that of Robert Browning in a book shortly to appear as a memorial of a strong and enduring, a tender and classic friendship, was born in Camberwell Grove, and spent his youth in scenes familiar in later years to the boyhood of an illustrious statesman. Domett attended the same school as Browning at Peckham—that in which Goldsmith had been an usher—though he did not make the poet's acquaintance then. In his twenty-second year he published a volume of verse; and a poetical contribution of his to Blackwood's in 1837 was thus heralded in one of its symposia by Christopher North: "Sit down, and we shall sing thee a song—by—by—Al. D.—a new name to our old ears—but he has the prime virtue of a song-writer—a heart." In the "Christmas Hymn," which appeared in Maga in 1837—it was reproduced, by the way, in the Century Magazine last December—Christopher North alludes to its "magnificent stanzas." Every one is familiar with Browning's tribute in his poem: "What's become of Waring," published in "Bells and Pomegranates" in 1842, after Domett had gone to New Zealand; but comparatively few are aware of the intensity of the great poet's regard for the man whom he addressed on his return to England after an absence of thirty years—"How happy I am that I shall see you again.—Ever, affectionately yours."

The recent triumph of Labour at the polls has directed attention to poems and songs in glorification of toil—of work and the workers; but James Macfarlan's stirring lyric—"The Lords of Labour"—has apparently been forgotten. When Thackeray heard the ode recited by Samuel Lover at the Garrick Club in 1859 he exclaimed: "By Jove! I don't think Burns himself could have taken the wind out of this man's sails." Here is the first of its three stanzas:

They come! they come in a glorious march!
You can hear their steam-steeds neigh
As they dash through Skill's triumphal arch,
Or plunge mid the dancing spray.
Their balefires blaze in the mighty forge,
Their life-blood throbs in the mill,
Their lightnings shiver the gaping gorge,
And their thunders shake the hill.
Ho! these are the Titans of toil and trade,
The heroes who wield no sabre;
But mightier conquests reapeth the blade
That is borne by the Lords of Labour.

Macfarlan, known as the Glasgow Pedler Poet, died in 1862 in his thirty-first year. Charles Dickens accepted many of his poems for Household Words, and his volumes, "Poems," published by William Hardwicke, Piccadilly, in 1854, and "Lyrics of Life" issued by David Bogue in 1856, have long been out of print. In "The Poet's Prayer" and "Book World" there is an elevation of thought, a breadth of knowledge and power of imagery, combined with a mastery of rhythmic melody, that give to Macfarlan a unique place among Scottish minor bards.

At the annual dinner this evening of the London Association of Press Correctors, under the presidency of Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, literature and art will be represented by, among others, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Owen Seaman, Dr. Hermann Gollancz, Mr. G. K. Chesterton, Mr. E. F. Benson, and Professor Hubert von Herkomer, R.A. It is because Mr. Andrew Lang is not a diner-out that the proof-readers have never entertained a writer who has made some complimentary and many stinging remarks concerning the correctors of the press. Mr. Lang avers that when an author writes a difficult hand the proof-reader must have a genius for conjectural emendation. He may carry emendation too far, however, as in the case of the French author who, according to Mr. Lang, wrote that, "if any one would know Love, il faut sortir de soi." The proof-reader, seeing no sense in this, altered it to, "if any one would know Love, il faut sortir le soir."

The announcement of a new edition, in twenty volumes, of the works of Henry David Thoreau, brings to mind the fact that during his lifetime—he died in 1862—two volumes only were published—"A Week on the Concord" and "Walden." Out of an edition of one thousand copies of the first, seventy-five were given away, two hundred and twenty-five found purchasers, and the balance were returned to their originator as "unsaleable." The whole edition of "Walden" was disposed of in about three years. Lowell and Stevenson were severe in their characterisation of Thoreau. Stevenson looked at the hermit of Walden through his books instead of at the books through the man, and he lived, it should not be forgotten, to apologise for his immature judgment that Thoreau was without a "large unconscious geniality."

A plea for an exact and uniform system of classification in all public libraries was made by Mr. Mould of the Southwark Public Libraries, at the monthly meeting of the Library Association held on February 19 at the London School of Economics. Aristotle was described as the first instructor in Library practice, and the history of classification was lightly touched upon from the ancient Assyrians and Babylonians through the Middle Ages to the present time. But the reader of the paper and those who took part in the discussion confused, to some extent, what Jevons has called the classification of knowledge with the classification of books. Attention was drawn to the great diversity of the systems of classification even in the libraries of a single borough or town. And a scheme was suggested having composite symbols of letters and numbers. The difference, one of great importance, between the classification of books and the class notation of the catalogue was touched upon, but might have received greater emphasis, as it is not at all necessary that the classification number should be that of the individual book.

The suggestion that the Library Association should "adopt" a system of classification was generally deprecated (Mr. Brown, Islington). But it was agreed that an exact system should be in use in every library. There can be no doubt that any system of close classification—and it is only the style of notation that differs in all exact schemes (Mr. Wyndham Hulme, Patent Office Library)—would be infinitely preferable to the plans still found in a number of libraries, of classifying by size; or in a few main classes without sub-divisions of any kind. The desideratum of all classification is a system which will allow of expansion in any direction, with the growth or alteration of any branch of literature. Following out the idea of co-operation exemplified in the adoption of a set of cataloguing rules to be used both here and in America, it was suggested that a system of classification should not only be general in this country, but universal.

One of the most interesting points elicited was the fact that at the Southwark libraries a universal catalogue was in the course of compilation; entries from every available source being gathered together and massed into a composite whole.

The idea of removing the remains of Corneille from the little church of St. Roche to the Pantheon was well received in Paris, but it has had to be abandoned because it has been found impossible to find which the remains are. They have become part of the dust of the crypt, and no one can trace the exact spot in which the coffin was laid. Parisian literary circles are now beginning to quote Chateaubriand: "Quel nomenclateur des ombres m'indiquerait la tombe effacée?" he exclaimed when seeking his mother's grave in order to raise a large mausoleum to her memory. And the historians are reminded that Louis Philippe was doubtful. In 1821, in his character of protector of arts and guardian of the nation's treasures, he had a tablet placed in the Eglise Saint-Roche on one of the pillars of the principal nave, inscribed with the day of the birth and of the death of Corneille.

Mr. F. R. Benson, than whom there is no more unselfish and public-spirited practitioner of the drama, has formed a scheme which he enunciated in a letter appearing lately in the Times. We cannot do better than print the objects of the society which he proposes to form:

1. (a) To facilitate and encourage amateur dramatic representations of plays in country villages by the villagers themselves.

(b) In schools by the scholars for purposes of education and recreation.

(c) Putting its members into communication with suitable professional artists, whenever their assistance might be desired.

(d) Acquiring a stock of scenery, dresses, and play-books, which it would let out on hire at a small fee to individual members and affiliated societies requiring same.

By some such means as outlined above it is hoped:

(a) To provide instructive and intellectual recreation for rural districts.

(b) To popularise among the English people the dramatic masterpieces of all times and countries.

(c) To assist in the revival and production of mystery, morality, lyrical, and poetical plays.

2. To form a central association in connection with the above, that should be able to assist where requested all amateur dramatic societies throughout the kingdom by

(a) Keeping records of all amateur dramatic societies and the performers.

(b) Collecting for its members information as to plays, acting versions, casts, scenery, dresses, music, etc.

(c) To encourage dramatic experiments of untried authors.

One guinea a year, Mr. Benson thinks, would be sufficient to defray expenses. All who have had the pleasure of seeing the Village Players at Hildenborough in Kent, or who had learned something of the work done in that village by Mr. Dagny Major and the enthusiastic residents, will have realised the valuable social and intellectual benefits that may result from such undertakings when wisely conducted. It may be questioned, however, whether the scope of his proposals be not too wide. Again, the good folk of Hildenborough, who succeed in pleasing with home-made drama, might find themselves sadly out of their depth in Othello or Richelieu. Everyman, admirably acted as it was, drew good houses; but in general a little of Mystery or Morality would go a long way. And as for the numerous company of the great unacted, their works would have a better chance in the hands of professional players. Nevertheless, Mr. Benson's scheme is worthy of the fullest discussion; the root-idea of it is sound and fertile, while it may prove necessary to lop superfluous branches.

Millet's study for Les Glaneuses and his drawing, L'Enfant Malade, lately on view at the Leicester Galleries, have been acquired for the nation.

On Tuesday and Wednesday next Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge will sell by auction more than three hundred original drawings by Mr. Linley Sambourne, including most of his famous cartoons which have appeared in Punch during the last fifteen years.

Society of Arts: Arrangements for the week ending March 10, 1906. Tuesday, March 6, at 8 p.m. Colonial Section.—"Imperial Questions in the West Indies." By Sir Nevile Lubbock, K.C.M.G. The Right Hon. Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal, G.C.M.G., High Commissioner for Canada, will preside. Wednesday, March 7, at 8 p.m.: Ordinary Meeting—"Art in Painting and Photography." By J. C. Dollman, A.R.W.S. David Murray, R.A., will preside.

The Dante Society, 38 Conduit Street, London, W.: Syllabus of Lectures: March 7, Justin Huntly McCarthy, Esq., "The Vita Nuova as a Love Story"; Commendatore Guglielmo Marconi in the chair. April 4, Professor A. J. Butler, M.A., "Dante and the German Mystics"; Right Hon. and Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Southwark in the chair. "Dante and St. Thomas Aquinas"; Sir Hubert Jerningham, K.C.M.G., in the chair. June 13, Rev. J. F. Hogan, D.D., "The Companionship of Dante." The date of Signora Leonora Duse's promised Recital of the Episode of Francesca da Rimini will depend on the date of her next visit to England. The Society's annual dinner will take place on June 27, at the Hotel Cecil. Members should apply for tickets (7s. 6d. each) for themselves and for their guests at their earliest convenience.

The Institution of Electrical Engineers. Meeting at the Institution of Civil Engineers, Great George Street, Westminster, S.W., Thursday, March 8, 1906. Ordinary General Meeting at 8 p.m. "A New Single-Phase Commutator Motor," by V. A. Fynn, member.

Next week's number will contain the Spring Announcements Supplement.

LITERATURE

AN ACADEMIC BIOGRAPHY

Henry Sidgwick. A Memoir by A. S. and E. M. S. (Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a long and baffling Life of an extremely interesting man. The authors have accentuated a tendency recently displayed in writing the biographies of men connected with University life, which is to make the book no true study but a collection of papers and memoranda, some of which are interesting and others most trivial and irrelevant. This is casting no blame whatever on the late Professor Sidgwick. If a stenographer were to take down a conversation of any man, however eminent he might be, or if all the letters of a most gifted person were to be printed as they passed from his pen day by day, it is inevitable that, though here and there one might come across a suggestive phrase or an original thought, the impression produced by the whole would be one of commonplace. We are afraid that this is the only verdict which can be fairly arrived at with regard to the biography before us. It consists of over six hundred closely printed pages, and apparently the writers have thought it a duty to put in every document that came into their possession. It would take a considerable amount of space to demonstrate this, because it could only be done by quoting the dullest portions of a dull book. We may give the following as a typical example of much that may be found between its covers:

... I went by the Metropolitan Railway on Monday; it is really most impressive—more so than any other “wonder of the age” that I have ever seen. In spite of the enormous expense it ought to be a great success. There is no disagreeable smell.

A good biographer would have shorn away this wool, and certainly there was material enough here to have made a striking and interesting story. Sidgwick was a man who, during the greater part of his adult life, used to adopt a text from Scripture as a kind of motto for the period. From 1861 to 1865, for instance, it was: “After the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers,” and for four years after that it was the passage beginning: “Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?” From 1869 to 1875 the text was: “Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind,” and then it changed for fifteen years to: “But this one thing I do, forgetting those things that are behind, and stretching forth unto those that are before, I press towards the mark”; and finally, as old age approached, he chose the pathetic comment: “Gather up the fragments that are left, that nothing be lost.” In connection with this it is interesting to note that, when he contemplated burial without the Church of England service, the earnest and quiet words that he wished to have said over his grave were:

Let us commend to the love of God with silent prayer the soul of a sinful man who partly tried to do his duty. It is by his wish that I say over his grave these words and no more.

Passages such as these do indeed help us to gain some vital idea of our subject. To complete the picture we cannot do better than reproduce certain descriptions of Sidgwick by men with whom he came into contact. In the course of a long communication which is just a little marred by a certain formality in the sentences, as though even on this occasion the writer could not escape his political style, Mr. Arthur Balfour says:

Of all the men I have known he was the readiest to consider every controversy and every controversialist on their merits. He never claimed authority; he never sought to impose his views; he never argued for victory; he never evaded an issue. Whether these are the qualities which best fit their possessor to found a “school” may well be doubted.

Sir Leslie Stephen gives a somewhat more illuminating account of his conversation, with the skill of one accustomed to deal with biographies:

Henry Smith, for example, who often met Sidgwick at the “Ad Eundem,” had an equal fame for good sayings; and both might be credited with unfailing urbanity, humour, quickness, and other such qualities. Their styles were nevertheless entirely different, while to point out the exact nature of the difference is beyond my powers. Smith, perhaps, excelled especially in the art of concealing a keen epigram in a voice and manner of almost excessive gentleness. Sidgwick rather startled one by sudden and unexpected combinations and arch inversions of commonplace. His skill in using his stammer was often noticed. His hearers watched and waited for the coming thought which then exploded the more effectually. Sidgwick not only conceded but eagerly promoted contributions of talk from his companions. He would wait with slightly parted lips for an answer to some inquiry, showing a keen interest which encouraged your expectation that you were about to say a good thing, and sometimes, let us hope, helped to realise the expectation. He differed from Smith—who preserved a strict reticence upon the final problems—by a readiness to discuss any question whatever, if it were welcome to his companions. He was not only perfectly frank but glad to gain enlightenment even from comparatively commonplace minds.

We need only to add a little thumb-nail sketch by Mr. A. C. Benson.

I remember once a supreme instance of his conversational powers. It was at a small dinner-party; he took in a lady whose social equipment was not great, and who was obviously ill at ease. I wondered what subject he would select. He began at once on the subject of the education of children, in the simplest way, as though he only desired information. The lady, who had a young family, became at once communicative and blithe; and what might have been a dreary business was turned into a delightful occasion.

In regard to the inner Henry Sidgwick, nothing in these pages is more eloquent than the following comment upon “In Memoriam”:

The thing most interesting to myself is the intensity of sympathy with which I have been reading In Memoriam. This is due, I think, to my final despair of obtaining—I mean my obtaining, for I do not yet despair as regards the human race—any adequate rational ground for believing the immortality of the soul. What has struck me most in this re-reading is (1) the absence of any originality in the thought, but also (2) the exquisite selection and fitting together of arguments in the best argumentative portions, so as to produce a kind of balanced, rhythmical fluctuation of moods. Perhaps a certain balancedness is the most distinctive characteristic of Tennyson’s mind among poets, which inclines him to the “juste milieu” in politics, and in such poems as “Love and Duty” to a sort of complex sympathy evenly divided between passion and principle.

It is curious to note such little points of touch as occur between Mr. Sidgwick and the outside world. Many interesting names just flicker in these pages, and then pass away. There is a reference to “the poison” of Carlyle, which is very suggestive. The late Mr. Huxley figures quite frequently in this book. The following is an interesting little sketch of him at one of the Society discussions in which Sidgwick seems to have been uninterruptedly engaged:

I remember that on one occasion when I had read to the Society an essay on the “Incoherence of Empiricism,” I looked forward with some little anxiety to his criticisms; and when they came, I felt that my anxiety had not been superfluous; he “went for” the weak points of my argument in half a dozen trenchant sentences, of which I shall not forget the impression. It was hard hitting, though perfectly courteous and fair.

There is a good deal of correspondence with the late Laureate, Lord Tennyson; and of another contemporary poet, Mr. Swinburne, we are told that Sidgwick saw in Rossetti’s sonnets the “missing link” between him and Christina Rossetti. Another reference is somewhat slighting:

Meanwhile we are not most of us in a humour to read a rhymed play by Swinburne; we feel we must leave that amusement to the happy Americans and Australians.

Probably Ruskin was even more “poisonous” than Carlyle, as his name does not occur in the index.

The general impression produced by the biography is an almost wistful one of scholasticism standing outside the glare and dust of life and wondering pathetically what it all means. We have avoided for the moment touching upon Sidgwick’s philosophy, as that is dealt with by itself on another page.

THE AENEID IN ENGLISH VERSE

The Aeneid of Virgil. With translation by CHARLES J. BILLSON, M.A., Corpus Christi College, Oxford. 2 vols. (Arnold, 30s. net.)

YET another translation of the Aeneid, and this time into blank verse. The last attempt to achieve the same task in the same metre was made just twenty years ago by the late Canon Thornhill, of Dublin. It is remarkable that the very first specimen of blank verse in English is the translation of the first and second books of the Aeneid by the ill-fated Henry Howard Earl of Surrey (1517-1547). Many metres have been attempted by translators of Virgil, and each naturally maintains the superiority of his own. Dr. Symmonds, who early in the eighteenth century matched himself with poor success against Dryden in the use of the heroic couplet, calls blank verse "only a laborious and doubtful struggle to escape from the fangs of prose." On the other hand the rhymers quote "Hudibras":

Those who write in rhyme still make
The one verse for the other's sake;
For one for sense and one for rhyme
They think sufficient at one time;

and point to Dryden's rendering of tantaene animis caelestibus irae, demanding whence came the second line in

Can heavenly minds such dire resentment show,
Or exercise their spite in human woe?

We certainly prefer Mr. Billson's:

Can Heavenly hearts so unrelenting prove?

or Thornhill's:

In heavenly bosoms finds such hate its home?

On the whole, we think, Mr. Billson has chosen the best metre. No metre is a better counterpart for the flowing description, the pointed dialogue, the dignified narrative of the hexameter. In truly inspired hands it can be made quite as harmonious and alluring as the best couplets. The present writer knew by heart Tennyson's "Tears, idle tears" for years before it struck him that it was blank verse. But how few can make blank versing! Not one for ten who can give us musical couplets. We must own that we have not yet met a blank verse rendering of the Aeneid, which comes near to being comparable with the blank verse of Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, Shelley, Tennyson, Swinburne. Thornhill tries hard to ride a horse with wings, but the metre in his hands pins him to the earth, and this is still truer of Mr. Billson. Let us compare Juno's speech, Aen. i. 36-48, in the version of each. Thornhill's, which is spirited but exaggerated, runs thus:

Ha! baffled must I yield,
Nor power be mine to keep from Italy
This hated Prince of Troy? The Fates forsooth
Say nay: but what, had Pallas power to burn
That Argive fleet and drown the crews to boot
All for mad Ajax' single guilt and crime?
Yea, from the clouds her daring right hand launch'd
Jove's volley'd bolts, scatter'd their navies wide,
With storm up tore the main, and him, the wretch—
His thunder-riven breast forth panting flame—
Borne in the blast away and smitten home,
Impaled upon a jag of splinter'd rock;
While I who queen it through the courts of heaven,
Sister and wife of Jove, with one poor clan
For years sans count still wage my bootless wars.

Mr. Billson certainly does not exaggerate the tone:

Am I to own defeat?
Not turn from Italy this Prince of Troy?
The Fates forbid me! Could not Pallas burn
The Argive fleets and drown them in the deep
For one man's guilt, the madness Ajax wrought?
She, from the clouds down-flinging Jove's own fire,
Shatter'd their ships and blew the waters high,
Him caught in whirlwind, and his cloven breast
Fix'd on the pointed rock, outbreathing flames.
Yet I, Jove's Wife and Sister, I who move
The Queen of Gods, so many years make war
On one poor race.

While Thornhill makes a somewhat unsuccessful attempt to soar, Mr. Billson contentedly creeps. But "queen it" is very good for incedo regina—far better too than Sir C. Bowen's:

I, who in high heaven move as a queen,

or Conington's:

I, who through heaven its mistress move,

or Morris's:

I, who go for the queen of the Gods.

We will now give a fine passage, iv. 590-629 (omitting 607-620), in Mr. Billson's version, then in two rhyming renderings, and in Thornhill's blank verse:

Dear God! she cries,
And shall he go and flout my kingdom thus?
No arms leap out, not all my city chase
And drag the ships from dock? Go! Fetch me quick Firebrands; bring arms! ply oars!—What words are these?
Where am I? O, what madness turns my wit?
Unhappy Dido, now thy guilt comes home
Too late, thy crown once shared. So loyal proved
This famous saviour of his country's gods!
This famous son who bore his age-worn sire!
O, might I not have torn him limb from limb,
To strew the sea, and slain his friends, aye, slain
His son, and served him for the father's meat?
Such strife had doubtful issue? Yea, but who Could daunt me dying? Brands I should have borne,
And fill'd his decks with flame, burn'd son and sire,
With all their kin, and slain myself the last!

So be it! This last word with my blood I shed.
Thenceforth, O Tyrians, all his seed pursue
With hatred! To my ashes grant this boon!
No love, no league between you. From my bones,
Avenger, rise; and chase with fire and sword
The intruding Dardans, now, hereafter, yea,
Whenever power is thine! May shore to shore
Be adverse, sea to sea, and sword to sword,
For fathers and for children endless war.

Here we have a great many marks of interjection but very little real elevation when compared with the sublime original. Yet it must be owned that it is very literal, quite correct, and gives line for line. It is, we suppose, to emphasise this linear fidelity that Mr. Billson has gone to the expense of printing the whole of the Latin poem on the opposite page, in his two very handsome and well brought out volumes. We now present Morris:

Ah, Jove! and is he gone?
And shall a very stranger mock the lordship I have won?
Why arm they not? Why gather not from all the town in chase?
Ho ye! Why run ye not the ships down from their standing place?
Quick, bring the fire! shake out the sails! hard on the oars to sea!
What words are these? Or where am I? What madness changeth me?
Unhappy Dido! now at last thine evil deed strikes home.
Ah, better when thou mad'st him lord—lo whereunto are come
His faith and troth who erst, they say, his country's house-gods held,
The while he took upon his back his father spent with eld?
Why! might not I have shred him up and scattered him piecemeal
About the sea, and slain his friends, his very son, with steel,
Ascanius on his father's board for dainty meat to lay?
But doubtful, say ye, were the fate of battle? Yea, O yea!
What might I fear, who was to die—if I had borne the fire
Among their camp, and filled his decks with flame, and son and sire
Quenched with their whole folk, and myself had cast upon it all!

Lo this I pray, this last of words forth with my blood I pour,
And ye, O Tyrians, 'gainst his race that is, and is to be,
Feed full your hate! When I am dead send down this gift to me:
No love betwixt the peoples twain, no troth for anything!
And thou, Avenger of my wrongs, from my dead bones outspring,
To bear the fire and the sword o'er Dardan-peopled earth
Now or hereafter; whensoever the day brings might to birth.
I pray the shore against the shore, the sea against the sea,
The sword 'gainst sword—fight ye that are, and ye that are to be!

Put beside this the version of Sir C. Bowen, which, in its plain, manly, straightforward vigour, affords a strong contrast to the artificial simplicity of Morris's verses, and would, indeed, be in many respects adequate, except for the metre:

Father of Earth and of Heaven! and shall this stranger, she cries,
Wend on his treacherous way, flout Dido's realm as he flies?
Leaps no sword from the scabbard? Is Tyre not yet on his trail?
None of ye warping the ships from the dockyards, hoisting the sail?
Forth with the flame and the arrow! To sea and belabour the main!
Ah, wild words! Is it Dido? Has madness troubled her brain?
Ah, too late, poor Dido! The sin comes home to thee now!
Then was the hour to consider, when thou wast crowning his brow.
Look ye! The faith and honour of him who still, as they say,
Carries on shipboard with him his Trojan gods on the way!
Bore on his shoulders his aged sire! Ah, had I not force
Limb from limb to have torn him, and piecemeal scattered his corse
Over the seas? His crews to have slain, and, banquet of joy,
Served on the father's table the flesh of Iulus the boy?
Even were chance in the battle unequal—death was at hand.
Whom had Dido to fear? I had borne to his vessels the brand,
Filled with flames each deck, each hold—child, people, and sire
Whelmed in a blazing ruin, and flung myself on the pyre!

This last prayer as my life ebbs forth I pour with my blood;
Let not thy hatred sleep, my Tyre, to the Teucric brood:
Lay on the tomb of Dido for funeral offering this!
Neither be love nor league to unite my people and his!
Rise! thou Nameless Avenger from Dido's ashes to come,
Follow with fire and slaughter the false Dardanians home!
Smite them to-day, hereafter, through ages yet unexplored,
Long as thy strength sustains thee, and fingers cling to the sword!
Sea upon sea wage battle forever! Shore upon shore,
Spear upon spear! To the sires and children strife evermore!

The same passage as translated by Canon Thornhill well illustrates the extreme vigour of his work, whilst it labours under the characteristic defect of diffuseness:

Shall he then go? Go, and our kingdom left
Insulted, mocked, to point a rover's scoff!
What, lieges, ho!—Will they not arm and out,
All Carthage, quick? Not chase the faithless foe?
Nor pluck those laggard vessels from the docks?
Away! forth fire and sword! ply sail and oar!
Yet hold; what words are these? where, what this place?
What madness whirls my brain? Ah, wretched queen,
Needs guilty deed to touch thy dainty sense?
Late wail'd what's done; wise hadst thou rued in time,
When heart and sceptre at thy giving lay.
Mirror of knighthood's truth! and this is he,
The world-famed prince that ever with him bears
His country's gods about! the model son,
Who on his back did safe from foes bear off
The helpless burden of his aged sire!
Might not this hand—fool, to forbear the deed!—
Have shred his mangled carcase to the waves,
Slain friends and followers, yea, done to death
Ascanius' self, and at the father's board
Have served him up his murdered boy to boot?
True, 't were to fight at risk; but what of that?
Self-doom'd to death, whom—what—had I to fear?
No; I had fired their fleet, each gangway filled,
And, smothering deck with flame, slain sire and son,
With all the cursed brood extinct, and crowned
The blazing ruin with myself and mine!

Such wish take he from me, this parting curse
Here with my streaming blood to Heaven I pour,
Then, Tyrians, you with endless feud still vex
His seed, breed, kind—yea, all shall ever trace
His caitiff line; with this meet tribute still Present your Dido's tomb. Be love nor league
Your hostile realms betwixt! O from our dust—
Hear, righteous Heaven, the prayer!—some Champion start,
Some bold Avenger, doomed with fire and sword
To hunt those Trojan vagrants through the world,
Be it to-day, to-morrow, or whene'er;
No time unmeet shall will and means supply;
Fight shore with shore opposed, wave fight with wave,
Fight all—who—what—or are, or e'er shall be!

It will be noticed that while the Latin, Morris and Mr. Billson have twenty-five lines, Bowen has twenty-eight, Thornhill no less than forty-one. We will take one more passage from the fourth book, Dido's denunciation of Æneas, 365-380, and then compare Thornhill and Conington:

No Goddess bore thee! Thine no Dardan stock!
Traitor! The flinty peaks of Caucasus
Got thee, Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck!
Why should I mask myself? Why wait for more?
When hath he sighed, or look'd upon my tears?
When hath he wept, or pitied her who loved?
Where should my charge begin? Not Juno now,
Not Father Jove now looks with righteous eyes.

No faith is sure! Wreck'd, starved, I bade him hail,
Madly with him I shared my realm; I found
His missing ships; I saved his friends from death.
Ah, Furies burn me! Now Apollo calls,
Now Lycia bids! Now, sent by Jove himself,
Comes the Gods' Herald with his mandate harsh.
What work for Gods! What care to vex their calm!
I hold thee not; I answer not. Away!

Thornhill is far more vigorous in Dido's fierce denunciation of her faithless lover:

Nor goddess gave thee birth, false-hearted wretch,
Nor Dardanus thy miscreant kind begot,
But thou from flinty Caucasus wast hewn,
Congenial grain! and tigers gave thee suck.
Yes, why mince words, and wait for baser wrong?
What! see me weep, nor heave one kindly sigh!
Moved he those eyes? shed he one answering tear?
Yea, was e'en pity to my pangs denied?
But why note this or that, or how award
The palm for worst where barbarous all alike?
Ay me! not man alone—not Juno now,
Nor Jove himself, hath ruth of wretches' wrong!
Yes, yes; no trusting more of Earth or Heaven.
This ingrate I, what time our angry waves
Flung out the needy waif upon these shores,
Not housed alone and fed, but bade him share—
Ah, fool!—my throne and state, and snatched withal
His shattered barks and starving crews from death.
Ha! that way madness lies—my brain's afire!
'Tis Phoebus now—'tis now some Lycian seer—
Anon—and special sent of Jove himself—
E'en Heaven's own herald cleaves his airy way
To bear the dread command. Yes, fitting task,
Belike, for god's employ! such cares—'tis apt!—
Must ruffle Heaven's repose! But I, good sooth,
Nor court thy stay nor deign thy lies refute.

This very spirited rendering of the Dublin scholar is, it must be owned, affluent to diffuseness, containing ten lines more than the Latin, and it will be noticed that there is a heightening of the tone which almost amounts to exaggeration. "Wretch," "miscreant," "barbarous," are not in the Latin, and dicta is not lies; on the other hand, "that way madness lies" is very happily adopted from King Lear. Conington, with his shorter measure, uses one line less. I quote his rendering to show that, with all his skill, in a really impassioned passage his ambling metre drags him down:

No goddess bore thee, traitorous man:
No Dardanus your race began;
No; 'twas from Caucasus you sprung,
And tigers nursed you with their young.
Why longer wear the mask, as though
I waited for some heavier blow?
Heaved he one sigh at tears of mine?
Moved he those hard impassive eyes?
Did one kind drop of pity fall
At thought of her who gave him all?
What first, what last? Now, now I know
Queen Juno's self has turned my foe:
Not e'en Saturnian Jove is just:
No faith on earth, in heaven no trust.
A shipwrecked wanderer up and down,
I made him share my home, my crown:
His shattered fleet, his needy crew
From fire and famine's jaws I drew.
Ah, Furies whirl me! now divine
Apollo, now the Lycian shrine,
Now Heaven's own herald comes, to bear
His grisly mandate through the air!
Aye, gods above ply tasks like these;
Such cares disturb their life of ease.—
I loathe your person, scorn your pleas.

An absolutely literal rendering is certainly helped by rhyme. Compare, for instance, Mr. Billson, i. 128, 129:

*Disiectam Æneae toto videt æquore classem,
Fluctibus oppressos Troas caelique ruina,*

Strewn o'er the sea he saw Æneas' fleet
He saw the Trojans spent with wind and wave, with Bowen's:

Far on the watery waste he beheld Troy's company driven,
Trojans crush'd by the waves and the wrack and ruin of heaven.

Again, in ii, 353, 354, compare:

To death! And charge with me on serried arms! :
One chance the conquer'd have, to hope for none,

and

Come let us perish, and charge to the heart of the enemies' line,
One hope only remains for the conquer'd—hope to resign.

We think we have shown sufficiently that Mr. Billson's muse is not such as can dispense with the embellishment of rhyme. A translator who aims only at reproducing the literal meaning of the words may quite fail to reproduce the spirit, and may not bring the reader at all as near to the original as the prose translations of Conington and Mackail. The late Archbishop Trench well said:

Words are enclosures from the great outfield of meaning; but different languages have enclosed on different schemes, and words in different languages which are precisely coextensive with one another are much rarer than we incuriously assume.

Hence paraphrase, expansion, compression (even to some slight extent omission and interpolation), are sometimes requisite to give a more real and faithful impression of a great original than could be obtained from literal reproduction of the very words, clause by clause, and line by line. Our last chance of a really great blank verse Aeneid disappeared when Tennyson died.

For one thing Mr. Billson is to be commended. While all other translators elaborately defend the metre they have employed, he has not a syllable of foreword save "Dedicated to my daughter Camilla."

R. Y. TYRRELL.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL

James Russell Lowell, his Life and Work. By FERRIS GREENSLET. With illustrations. (Constable, 6s. net.)

No consistent Tariff Reformer ought to admit this book to his house, for it is a clear case of "dumping." Not only are both writer and subject Americans, but the printing and spelling, and for aught we know the binding, are American too. Now, we do not complain of this; indeed, it is really appropriate, for Lowell himself was never more of a citizen of the world than a good American has any business to be, patriotically considered. What we do complain of, and that very strongly, is Mr. Ferris Greenslet's patriotically American style. Some of Lowell certainly belongs to us—"What? Lowell an alien! Fiddlededee!" as Punch sang on a famous occasion—and he should not be celebrated in a manner of writing which must make Englishmen "stare and gasp," and can hardly, one would suppose, really please Mr. Greenslet's compatriots.

It is dreadful to picture to oneself Lowell's own feelings if he were to return to earth and were to employ his time, or some of it, in reading this curious production. How would he like to read of the things that "elemented" his his own personality: to learn that "in a small circle of congenial friends he was a perfect master of the conversational instrument"; that he "could talk in paragraphs, patiently endeavoring to thread the difficult needle of truth"; that "the one irreducible factor in his equation was an irrepressible whimsicality of a kind more often found in low-voltage men than in men of Lowell's grade of power"; that Oliver Wendell Holmes expressed his view of him "with an almost lapidary concision"; and, what is perhaps most horrifying of all, how would he like to read of his "excursions into the field of what may be called applied poetry"? "Applied poetry"! Neither "The Biglow Papers" nor anything else "may" be called by a name so detestable. Shall all-conquering science be allowed to annex with her metaphors the fair kingdom of literature? Her own sons, we believe, will gladly join in our protest against such phrases as "applied poetry," for Mr. Greenslet is not nowadays a solitary offender.

There is this to be urged in our author's defence, though it may to some minds only enhance his enormities, namely that he does not behave in this way always, or even very often. You may read several pages of him which, if marked by no distinction of style, are nevertheless full of interesting and well-delivered information; and then suddenly you are stricken down by such a passage as this:

Savory is perhaps the best word wherewith to describe the quality of Lowell's prose style. . . . The defect of this quality was that Lowell lacked quite the "choiceful sense" to make it constantly effective. He was capricious in this as in everything else. Sometimes the breezy vocabular was too breezy, and blew the decent draperies of convention about too wantonly, sometimes the prodigious sesquipedalian was too obviously dragged in by its inky heels.

Can it be that Mr. Greenslet is a low-voltage man, and that his "thusness" is due to an irrepressible whimsicality? In any case, we are very sure that he would do well to have his voltage raised by some skilled literary electrician, or perhaps we should say electric littérateur; for his peculiar style is like to lose him many readers, and that he does not fairly deserve. Yet who could be blamed for throwing the book away, or giving it to a Carnegie library, on encountering, before a seventh part of the work has been read, such a sentence as this, descriptive of the Transcendental period in America: "No brain but had its private maggot, which must have found pitifully short commons sometimes"? The image is disgusting and the conceit is unscientific, for wise persons have no monopoly of large-sized brains.

We are sorry to write in this strain, for the idea with which Mr. Greenslet started is a good one. He proposed to make Lowell, as far as possible, tell his own story by fashioning, so to speak, a mosaic of extracts from his letters and other writings, as well as the recorded impressions and reminiscences of others. He has carried out this plan with care and intelligence, and an evident affection for his subject; it is the more surprising, therefore, that a man who is steeped in Lowell should on occasion himself write so vilely. A book on these lines—a kind of sublimated essence of Charles Eliot Norton, Horace Scudder, and F. H. Underwood, varied with dashes of Howells, Henry James, Dr. E. E. Hale, and other friends—would be read in this country. Whether, as Mr. Greenslet confidently announces, Lowell was "the first true American Man of Letters," he will always be read in America; but on this side he has already begun to be neglected, even by people who, if they did read him, would be astonished to discover him so "full of quotations." Such people will often read and re-read a little book when they will not go to the originals, and it is better to know Lowell out of a little book than not at all. That is why we particularly regret Mr. Greenslet's unfortunate lapses in style. We do thank him cordially for a very good index. He gives no bibliography of Lowell because an exhaustive one is being prepared by Mr. George Willis Cooke. There is a little new "material," including two letters to Mr. F. J. Garrison about corrections in "Endymion," which show Lowell to have been curiously fastidious and even meticulous in his old age, together with—most interesting of all from a literary standpoint—a portion of a fine poem addressed by Emerson to Lowell on the celebration of the latter's fortieth birthday by the Saturday Club. We may fitly conclude by quoting a few lines:

Man of marrow, man of mark,
Virtue lodged in sinew stark

Most at home in mounting fun,
Broadest joke and luckiest pun,
Masking in the mantling tones
Of a rich laughter-loving voice
In speeding troops of social joys,
And in volleys of wild mirth,
Purer metal, rarest worth,
Logic, passion, cordial zeal
Such as bard and martyr feel.

But, if another temper come,
If on the sun shall creep a gloom,

A time and tide more exigent,
When the old mounds are torn and rent,
More proud, more stormy competitors
Marshal the list for emperors—
Then the pleasant bard will know
To put the frolic masque behind him
Like an old familiar cloak,
And in sky-born mail to bind him,
And single-handed cope with Time,
And parry and deal the Thunder-stroke.

THE FAILURE OF METAPHYSICS

The Philosophy of Kant and other Lectures. By the late HENRY SIDGWICK, Knightbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

It is said to have been Henry Sidgwick who taught Mr. Balfour to doubt philosophically. He was capable of teaching it to any man who did not prefer to doubt unphilosophically; and one may truthfully say of him—what Whewell said of Edward FitzGerald—that he passed his life as “a prisoner in Doubting Castle.” The doubts expressed in these posthumous essays relate chiefly to the philosophical systems of Kant, T. H. Green, and Herbert Spencer; Sidgwick assailing each of them in turn in a style which suggests Sir Edward Clarke cross-examining a difficult witness. Like Sir Edward, he always seems to get the best of it, though he has an advantage over the great advocate in the fact that the difficult witness is not actually present to spring awkward surprises upon his cross-examiner. A critical scrutiny of the destructive arguments which he employs is impossible within the limits of our space. It must suffice to say that most of them seem deadly enough to leave any student of metaphysics, whose standpoint is that not of a master but of a disciple, wondering: If he cannot lean upon any of these three great teachers, on whom will it be possible for him to lean? In Sidgwick's own writings, at any rate, there is nothing to lean upon. He knows it, and makes no pretences, seeming to be a metaphysician by accident rather than by inclination. He pulls down, but does not build anything on the space he clears. We are not surprised to learn, as we do from a chapter in the Memoirs of the late F. W. H. Myers, that, when he sought knowledge of matters beyond the ordinary ken of the scientific observer, he knew no better way of pursuing it than to apply experimental methods to phantasmological research.

Perhaps, however, there is one positive conclusion deducible from Sidgwick's Lectures, though it is nowhere formally drawn by the lecturer. It is nothing less than the conclusion expressed in the familiar and vulgar saying that “when one fellow talks about what he doesn't understand to another fellow who doesn't understand him, that is metaphysics.” To put it more properly and precisely: Metaphysics fails, and must fail, to progress because there exists no language in which any metaphysical philosopher can so state his propositions that any other metaphysical philosopher can be absolutely certain of his meaning. That is the difference between the easiest metaphysics and the most difficult science. When Sir Oliver Lodge talks about radium or electrons, he may seem obscure to the average reader of the newspapers, but there is no danger of his being misinterpreted by Sir William Ramsay. An electron is an electron to a physicist, as surely as a primrose was a primrose to Peter Bell. The technical language of metaphysics is much more vague and indefinite. You cannot even trust two metaphysicians to use simple words like “objectivity” or “externality” in precisely the same sense. Their attitude towards each other's systems too frequently recalls the Duke of Devonshire's famous exclamation at the beginning of the Home Rule Question: “Mr. Gladstone does not mean what I mean.” It was, as is well known, on these grounds that Herbert Spencer neglected to reply to certain neo-Hegelian attacks on his philosophy. He did not reply to them, he said, because he could not understand them. Sidgwick, now as always, approaches all the systems, including that of Spencer, in a somewhat similar spirit, though he carries analysis further. His method is to select a sentence which apparently contains the clue to a system, and show that it is capable of conveying at least two or three different meanings, and that, even to the writer of it, it evidently meant different things at different times. Under the steady application of the process, one certainty after another seems to melt away. It is admirably done, and furnishes excellent reading to those who delight in dialectics; but to those who thought that they had firm ground under their feet because, for instance, Green had bridged the gulf between ethics and metaphysics, it must be terribly disconcerting. A few of them may continue to cling vaguely to some vague metaphysics of their own, while admitting their inability to express their conceptions in any form of words capable of withstanding Sidgwick's Old Bailey methods. We can picture others, unable to endure the pain of a suspended judgment, feeling that there is nothing for it but to fly for refuge to the confident dogmas of Catholicism or the persuasive visions of Theosophy; while Mr. Balfour, as all the world knows, finds his way out in the argument that, as there is no certainty anywhere, there can be nothing unreasonable in the assumption of the truth of the doctrines of the Church of England as by law established.

THACKERAY AS JOURNALIST

The New Sketch Book. By W. M. THACKERAY. Edited, with an Introduction, by ROBERT S. GARNETT. (Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net.)

AMONG the petty maxims that one constantly hears repeated in literary circles, few are more untrue than the statement that journalism is fatal to literature. The recourse of the indolent has always been to vague generalisations of this kind, but it is surprising that the example of Thackeray has not been more frequently quoted to show the fallacy of this deliverance. Thackeray was the journalist par excellence. No one who has read the inimitable picture of him drawn by Edward FitzGerald is likely to forget the busy and buoyant Thackeray writing to some half-dozen journals at one and the same time and finding stimulation in the very act, and that was probably the happiest time of Thackeray's life. Later, when he became editor of the Cornhill, the everlasting reading of manuscripts soon began to age him before his time, and the delight of composing his books was considerably reduced by the heart-breaking labour and thought that were entailed. For it must be remembered that Thackeray was never a glib and fluent writer. Whether doing articles for the press or composing a chapter in his novel like that in “Vanity Fair” after which he came down and, slapping his thigh with his hand, said: “By God! that's genius,” he was always slow and painstaking with his pen. Probably to that fact is due the excellence of the literary style to which he attained. His work too, even when fished out of the most unexpected quarters, is always interesting. In a general way we have very little sympathy with those who rummage about in the files of magazines and newspapers in order to obtain stuff that the author in his life-time did not care to preserve. As a rule, this objection applies with particular force in the case of one who was a journalist, as it is probable that the necessities of his occupation forced him to turn out a great amount of work that had not and was never meant to have any permanent value. But Thackeray is so good that to him the general rule does not apply. Every student of his work will find much to delight him in these sketches, most of which appeared in The Foreign Quarterly Review at a time when the new editor had come to the conclusion that it required to be conducted on more popular lines. The book consists of essays on Victor Hugo's book on the Rhine, the German in England, Alexandre Dumas, Balzac, Sue and other writers whose works were appearing at the time. That the stuff is genuine Thackeray is best proved by sampling it. Take this from the delightful little essay called “The German in England”:

Sir, a glass of wine! Will you drink a glass of wine? Will you take a glass of wine? Will you do me the honour to take some wine? —Noble variety of phrase! We know that Socrates and Plato were not averse to a cup, and can see in imagination Dr. Whewell and Dr. Buckland hobnobbing together. His Very Reverence Herr Peacock aus Ely calls on the Naturforscher to try a glass of the real Metternich Johannisberger; round about pass noiselessly “dienstbarer geister in scharlachenen kurzen Beinkleidern"; and in the midst of the sages, Sir Robert, like a gallant Alcibiades urging Socrates to a bumper of champagne, or Plato to improve the sweet flow of his eloquence by a draught of the honeyed Constantia. "Portwein und Bordeaux, Madera, und Champagner, Rhein-wein und Constantia alles wird untereinander hineingetränken"; and properly grateful is our philosopher for the chance which the English custom gives him of mixing these delightful liquors—"of course in moderate glasses and not in pint-tumblers"—no, no, there is no philosophy, however deep, that can bear to be drunk out of schoppengläser.

Thackeray really was more of the essayist than the critic. He is extremely interesting when touching off the characteristics and peculiarities of individual persons, but, when he comes to criticism pure and simple, one feels that he does not enter into it with the same zest and gusto. A natural, born critic would have felt no attraction to many of the themes which Thackeray discusses with un-failing charm and brightness. We see his satire, his irony and his unlimited chaff in the brightness of their hey-day. A piece quoted in the introduction is as absolutely Thackerayan as that which we have reprinted above:

It will be seen, then, that contrast and action are the merits of this novel. It is a work indeed of no slight muscular force. Murder and innocence have each other by the throat incessantly, and are plunging, and shrieking and writhing, through the numberless volumes. Now crime is throttling virtue, and now again virtue has the uppermost, and points her bright dagger at the heart of crime. It is that exciting contest between the white-robed angel of good and the black principle of evil, which, as children, we have seen awfully delineated in the galanty-show, under the personifications of the devil and the baker. And the subject is interesting, let us say what we will: if galanty-shows are now what they were some scores of years since, that is: still is it a stirring and exciting theme. Sometimes it is the devil who disappears conquered, out of the shining disk, leaving the baker victorious: sometimes it is the baker, who is hurled vanquished into the universal blackness, leaving the fiend to shout his hideous song of triumph. Last Christmas, no doubt, many hundred children sat in dark drawing-rooms, and witnessed that allegorical combat, and clapped hands for the baker, their favourite: and looked wistfully at each other when the fight was over, and the whole room was awful and dark.

We must congratulate Mr. Robert Garnett on a discovery which it is surprising that no one had made before, and on the sound critical introduction which he prefixes to these delightful essays.

NAPOLÉON ON ENGLISH HISTORY

Napoleon's Notes on English History. Made on the eve of the French Revolution. Illustrated from contemporary historians, and refreshed from the findings of later research. By HENRY FOLJAMBE HALL, F.R.Hist.S. (Dent, 7s. 6d. net.)

IN a memorial note prefixed to this book, Mr. J. M. Dent pays a touching tribute to his friend the author, who died while it was passing through the press. He tells us that in his forty years of life Mr. Hall accomplished an immense amount of work, but that Napoleon "had become the romance of his life, nay, one may almost say its passion," and that he had resolved to clear from the rubbish and mud-throwing of a hundred years the character of his hero.

M. Frédéric Masson, to whom Mr. Hall very properly dedicated this book, first gave to the world these notes by Napoleon on the history of England. They were written in 1788, on the eve of the Revolution, at the little town of Auxonne, near Dijon, where Napoleon's regiment was quartered. The future Emperor was then plunged in the most sordid poverty, and he starved himself to buy books, taking only one meal a day, chiefly milk. The literary merit of these notes is of the smallest; their true interest lies in the fact that Napoleon all through forms his own opinions, which were generally quite different from those of the authorities then available. With extraordinary industry Mr. Hall has illuminated Napoleon's text with voluminous notes of his own, striving to surround them with the precise atmosphere—if we may so express it—of contemporary historical research. He has digged especially in the histories of Rapin, John Barrow and Samuel Carte; but his style is his own. Such a phrase as "the bovril of biography" is unfortunately no isolated slip; we have also, for example, "writers who quaff the Pierian spring of history are apt to end in mental typhoid."

The very first sentence of Napoleon's notes, "It is probable that the British Isles were peopled by Gallic colonists," illustrates his early Corsican hatred of France. He had already twice endeavoured to stir up discontent in Corsica, and at this time it was England which seized his imagination as the land of liberty. A natural corollary of this is his anticipation of Captain Mahan and his school in realising the importance of sea-power. It is impossible to divine why he omits all mention of Joan of Arc, though later, as First Consul, he was to utilise the patriotic associations of her name for his contemplated invasion of England. He anticipates Kingsley in appreciating "Hereward de Wake," as he calls him; he perceives the greatness of Simon de Montfort and the importance of Magna Carta. The notes end with the accession of William and Mary. We can only find space for Napoleon's most interesting summary of Cromwell, in whom perhaps he saw a kindred spirit:

"Cromwell was in early days a libertine; religion took possession of him, and he became a prophet. Courageous, clever, deceitful, dissimulating, his early principles of lofty republicanism yielded to the devouring flames of his ambition, and having tasted the sweets of power he aspired to the pleasure of reigning alone. He possessed a strong constitution, and had manly but brusque manners. From the most austere religious functions he passed to the most frivolous amusements, and made himself ridiculous by his buffoonery. He was naturally just and temperate."

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE SONG OF THE SIREN

NATURAL history is a delightful borderland between the province of science and the province of poetry; science there takes on sometimes the colour of poetry, and poetry the form of science. A sense of the loveliness of the scenes amid which one has watched the ways of life of some wild creature often remains vivid in the mind when the thing one set oneself to observe has grown indistinct. In one object of natural history, especially, my interest has been wholly sustained by a keen recollection of the beauty of the spot where I first tried to study it. On reading a tale on the subject in M. Jules Lemaitre's new book, "En Marge des Vieux Livres," there revives within me the feeling of the strange fascination of the sea which I once felt when a boy. Whether it was really the white shoulder of a mermaid that I saw listening far out in the Baie de Douarnenez that night, or only the flash of moonshine on a breaking wave, I cannot now recall. Of course, I may have caught just a glimpse of Princess Ahez: Renan avers that the sound of the bells of her sunken city of Ys still floats up through the waters of the enchanted gulf. But all that survives in my memory is an impression of the mysterious charm of moonlit seas murmuring on a ghostly headland.

Somewhat of this charm attaches to all the literature on the subject. And how varied and abundant that literature is! The singers of every adventurous race that has seen the wonders of the deep and been touched by the glamour of unknown lands, have contributed to it. Few English poets, however, save the author of "The Ancient Mariner," seem to have had their imaginations deeply stirred by the mystery of the sea. An old sailor once remarked of "Enoch Arden" that it was written by a man who had only seen the ocean from the top of a cliff. Certainly, the "Sea-Fairies" in Tennyson's verses, who sing:

O hither, come hither and furl your sails,
Come hither to me and to me:
Hither, come hither and frolic and play . . .
Hither, come hither and see;
And the rainbow hangs on the poisoning wave,
And sweet is the colour of cove and cave,
And sweet shall your welcome be:

are merely the innocent elves of the greenwood. These gentle spirits are sometimes mistaken for mermaids, as they so delight in the society of women that they follow them to their homes on shores and islands, and there acquire a certain amphibiousness. It was for Miranda, I am sure, that such nimble-footed fays danced and sang on the yellow sands by her father's house. How passionately they can love the fair daughters of men is told by Matthew Arnold in his "Forsaken Merman." A story of a similar nature is related by the girls of Ushant. Some time ago a fishermaid of that island, Mona Kerbeli, married a fairy who had saved her from death. They lived together very happily beneath the sea until Mona went on a visit to her own people. She was warned that if she kissed a man she would forget her fairy husband and children, but in the excitement of meeting her brother she did not remember the warning. Night after night her elfin lover came to the shore and looked for her in vain. One evening Mona heard a voice singing outside her window: "Have you forgotten, Mona, so soon, the fairy who loved you and saved you from death? You promised to return at sunset, but I wait very long and I am unhappy." The song touched the girl's heart, and her past life came back to her mind. Opening the door she found there her lover, and with him she returned to her palace beneath the sea-shore, and was never seen again.

But these charming elves of Shakespeare, Tennyson, and Arnold's poems are not sirens. They inspire neither the terror of the water-sprites of Northern Europe, nor the awe of the wise divinities of the sea of the Southern races. The mermaid that our mariners fear is a dreadful spirit that haunts strange reefs and tempestuous waters. A sailor's chanty runs:

'Twas a Friday morn when we set sail,
And our ship not far from land,
When there we espied a fair mermaid,
With a glass and a comb in her hand.

Out and spoke the captain of our ship,
And a brave, young man was he:
I've married a wife in fair London town,
And a widow this night she'll be . . .

Out and spoke the little cabin boy,
And a brave, little boy was he:
I've a mother in old Portsmouth town,
And to-night she'll weep for me.

Then three times round went our gallant ship,
And three times round went she:
The moon shone bright and the stars gave their light,
And she went to the bottom of the sea.

The mermaids of modern poetry who raise their shining bodies above the waves, and make gestures of invitation with their beautiful arms were never seen by a seafarer. The spell of the siren is never a sensuous one. It is to the adventurer's desire after new knowledge that she appeals in her song. The merman Ea, the oldest god of the Chaldeans, was revered as "the lord of deep wisdom," and the founder of civilisation; and somewhat of his renown was transmitted to Dagan, the sea goddess of the Babylonians and the Phœnicians. From the Phœnicians the tradition seems to have been handed down to the Greek mariners:

Stay your ship, and hear our song. No one ever passes our isle without listening to it, and then he departs joyfully, having gathered much wisdom. For all things are known to us, and we know all that shall happen hereafter upon the fruitful earth.

That was the song with which the sirens tempted Ulysses, that daring spirit, yearning in desire

To follow knowledge like a sinking star,
Beyond the utmost bound of human thought.

The subtle Greek, as we know, eluded the sirens. Forewarned by Circe, he stopped up the ears of his companions with wax, and had himself bound to the mast. But according to M. Lemaître there was one sailor in the Argive ship whose daring was equal to his curiosity. As the tale runs in "La Sirène," Euphorion, observing how wildly Ulysses struggled to get free, said to himself that it must be worth hearing, even at the price of one's life, the song that troubled so strangely the wisest man of Greece. He took the wax from his ears and listened: then, leaping overboard, he swam with all his strength to the enchanted island. There he was like to have suffered a worse fate than befell Eve in her pursuit of hidden knowledge. The sirens dragged him into a cave heaped up with dead men's bones. But the Greek was a man of infinite resource. Turning to Leucosia, the fairest of the sirens, he said: "I am well content to die after having heard the song of the daughters of the sea, but I should die more happy if I met my death at your hands alone." The siren looked at him in surprise. It was the first time that she had seen a desire or a thought illumine a man's face: the features of drowning men usually expressed the emotion of terror, or, when the struggle had been a severe one, no emotion whatever. Leucosia fell in love with Euphorion. "Well," said the curious Greek, when he had won her confidence, "what is the secret wisdom that you promised to reveal?" Leucosia explained that the sirens had no strange knowledge. Their song was intended merely to excite the curiosity of adventurous men, and lure them to destruction. All that they were able to feel was the grace of the morning skies and the splendour of the sunset, the sweetness of the air, and the beauty of the infinite expanse of the sea; and this was what they sang of.

That is M. Lemaître's story. It rather provokes suspicion. The two mermaids in the "Odyssey," for instance, have increased to seven in "La Sirène." Leucosia and her companions seem, indeed, to be only the graceful nereids of the Greeks masquerading as the wise and terrible divinities of the sea, from whom the Phœnicians had learned the arts of civilisation. One has but to compare Leucosia with the Sea Lady of Mr. H. G. Wells's tale to perceive the distinction between a charming sea-nymph and a fierce and subtle siren. Miss Waters was a mermaid who came to Folkestone a few years ago, and carried away the handsome young Liberal candidate for Hythe. She, at least, was not one of those innocent creatures of the summer sea, taken with pretty trinkets and pretty compliments, who become mortal women and placidly live the life of their human lovers. Beautiful she was in spite of her cold, strange eyes; but her power of fascination lay in her alluring, eerie and cruel wisdom. It was she against whom Circe had warned Ulysses: "He who hears the sound of the siren's voice, shall never see his wife and children stand by him on his return, and rejoice in his coming."

"The little things you must do, the little cares, the extraordinary little duties," said Miss Waters, "all these things are a fancy that has taken hold of you . . . You are in a dream, a fantastic, unwholesome little dream. This life of yours is not everything. It is not to be taken too seriously. Because there are better dreams."

The song of the Sirens was in her voice. "This life of yours! Not even for Love would I face it. No. But then you know"—her voice sunk to a low whisper—"there are better dreams. . . ."

They went down through the soft moonlight, tall and white and splendid, interlocked, with his arms about her, her brow on his shoulder, and her hair about his face. . . . They swam together for a little while, the man and the sea-goddess who had come for him, and of the end I can only guess and dream. Did there come a sudden horror upon him? . . . Or was she tender and wonderful to the last; and did she wrap her arms about him, and draw him down, down until the soft waters closed above him, down into a gentle ecstasy of death?

That is the worst of all true stories of the sirens; they end badly. With a little of the power of infinite imagination and infinite curiosity of these ancient divinities of the sea, men may build up great civilisations; too much of it takes away from human life its force and its savour. We must work within our limitations. Renan in his later years, I fancy, listened too lightly with open ear to the song of Princess Ahez, the destroyer of cities. Somewhat of her bitter, intoxicating wisdom is certainly reflected in his last plays and dialogues.

EDWARD WRIGHT.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Development of Chaucer's Genius," by Alfred W. Pollard.]

FICTION

Hyacinth. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. (Arnold, 6s.)

ON a first reading of "Hyacinth" it appeared to us that Mr. Birmingham had visited Ireland, talked with a number of Protestants, jumped to several wholly erroneous conclusions, hit by accident on a few truths, and decided to make a book on the strength of it. A second and third reading of certain portions confirms our premiss. "Hyacinth" is a novel without a backbone: lacking a plot, lacking an ending, and lacking a purpose. Mr. Birmingham has little knowledge of Irish history (he speaks of Castlereagh, evidently confused by a tourist's recollection of Lough Rea), and less of Irish people and Ireland as it is. His book deals with the fortunes of the son of the rector of a small fishing-village in Connemara. The mother dies, and Hyacinth grows up among the peasantry and—acquires a knowledge of Gaelic! We may admit, for the sake of argument, that it would have been possible for him to acquire a speaking acquaintance with a degenerate language far removed from the Gaelic of to-day: it would not have been possible for a Dublin man to understand him. When he goes to Trinity College, Professor Henry remarks on his Galway brogue: throughout the book he speaks irreproachable English, as does every rabid Gaelic Leaguer and every Irishman. The brogue apparently baffled the tourist: does he, we wonder, know the difference between the brogue and the brogues? Oddly enough no one at T.C.D. remarked on Hyacinth's. Mr. Birmingham gives a detailed—and not very accurate—description of the Silent Sister, fails entirely to suggest the atmosphere and makes no reference to the library. He tries to describe a typical Connaught town, and makes no fewer than five glaring misstatements. His characters are as un-Irish as Ainos or Andamanese. Connaught has two other spellings—Connaucht and Connacht—of which, if we must have either, we prefer the latter. (But perhaps we owe the disappearance of the "u" to the fact that the printer was cramped for room.) Sometimes Mr. Birmingham attempts picturesque writing: then we are inclined to say, with the author of the "Bab Ballads," that:

His gentle spirit rolls
In the melody of souls—
Which is pretty, but I don't know what it means.

The Sea Maid. By RONALD MACDONALD. (Methuen, 6s.)

WHEN Mr. Macdonald thought of losing a very reverend Dean and his very respectable wife on an uninhabited island of the South Seas for twenty years until the Dean was forced by the laws of wear and tear to compromise his gaiters and back bebuttoned waistcoat for scant but serviceable pig-skin and his wife to discard her skirts and equivocate with the draperies of hand-woven grass-matting, and their daughter was nineteen years old and adorable and of course loved by all the party of men and women who eventually arrive upon the scene, he hit upon a happy if not quite original, idea, and he developed and wrote his idea in a mood as happy as the idea, and as happy as every one will inevitably be, who is wise enough or fortunate enough to read his book. There is something deliciously attractive in the serious manner in which he handles the subject. We seem to hear every now and then a faint sigh, half of regret, half of apology, as he hints with all tender delicacy at the full horror of his dear Dean's plight. Hinc illae lacrimae—of laughter. And though the Dean and his wife are as ludicrous in their costume as we should wish any Dean and his lady to appear, yet Polynesia their daughter is never anything but charming, and we love her as fondly as any of the men to whom the mutiny on board the Aurungabad gave the opportunity of loving her, except perhaps Lord Ormsrood, who wins her for his wife. But that is another matter, and, we may add, no matter. Perhaps the most pregnant moment is when the respectable wife of that dear Dean's bosom retires into her cave with many parcels (the Dean is their porter), containing a kind young actor's purchases in Paris for his wife's trousseau, and reappears in the smartest Parisian pair of cycling—exactement le dernier cri—of cycling bloomers.

The Bending of a Twig. By DESMOND F. T. COKE. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

Dick. By G. F. BRADBY. (Smith, Elder, 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. COKE has written a little preface to explain his aim and to expound a theory. His aim is "to level destructive satire at the conventional school story and on its ruins to erect a structure rather nearer to real life," and his theory is that "no story which is consistently gay or doggedly grave throughout can possibly describe school-life." Here Mr. Coke states his case, and here he shows exactly the flaw in his book, which only serves to strengthen our original opinion that destructive satire and serious creative work are absolutely incompatible. "No man can serve two masters" is as true in matters of art as in matters of morality. Satire is a ticklish weapon to handle: and the fact that Lycidas Marsh tries at first to shape his conduct at Shrewsbury on the conduct of boys in "Eric" and "The Hill," and "Jack Joker" and "Stalky and Co." does not so much fill us with contempt for those books as with amazement at the boy's ridiculous ignorance and the still more ridiculous ignorance of the boy's mother, who encouraged him. The situations that arise are fairly amusing, and would be much more so if they were treated merely as the mistakes of a very imaginative, singular boy; but they are not. They are treated as damning proofs of the worthlessness of the books which this singular boy has read: a manner of criticism which is so exasperating in its unfairness that we are inclined almost to welcome the "pi"-ness of "Eric," to reconsider our verdict of "The Hill," and at once to return with increased avidity to that fascinating and monstrous "Stalky." But this element of satire, which we could not find gay, fades away at last, and when we are able to forget the strange attitude which says: "All other books but mine are unreal, that is not how boys behave; but this is the real thing, these are real boys," and which arouses antipathy in the saying, we come to a careful and well-written study of an exceptional and interesting boy, and we are shown the inside of another public school—and that, too, is always interesting. The character of Lycidas Marsh is extraordinarily well thought out: he is a morbid, self-conscious boy, who never quite forgives Providence for his inability to play games; and, a little bitter in consequence, is for ever trying to win popularity in his house, and always thinking that he has failed. And very clever is the way in which Mr. Coke makes us see all the other boys and the school life generally through the critical eyes of this strange self-conscious boy without ever making us dislike him.

Mr. Bradby's novel, "Dick," is so far original that it tells of the doings of a boy of fourteen during the summer holidays. In the form of a diary written by middle-aged men whose summer rest Dick is sharing, Mr. Bradby, who is a house-master at Rugby, manages to throw much light on boy-nature in its most amiable aspect and makes some very sound remarks upon education and the management of boys. All the humour and lightness of touch, in which lay the charm of his other books, are apparent and associate so pleasantly with the more serious moments that never for an instant do we feel a trace of the pedagogue, but only realise that the man who is writing knows thoroughly what he is writing about, and loves his subject—boy. "Dick" is a good antidote or perhaps complement to Mr. Coke's designing boys; for the enthusiasm and lightheartedness of boyhood, a side which is left untouched in "The Bending of a Twig," are continually present in "Dick"; and that continual keenness on the thing of the moment, whether it be the search for worms, or stump cricket, or the composition of a passionate letter of remorse to a sad mother in Peru or any "hairy old rag," is one of the vital elements of the normal boy, and carries him over his morbid moments, which are far rarer and of less importance than we should gather to be the case from Mr. Coke's study of Lycidas Marsh. It is exactly this irresponsible enthusiasm which Mr. Bradby would see nurtured and developed: and the old curriculum of Latin grammar and verbs in  $\mu$  he condemns bitterly because they tend only to suppress this enthusiasm and leave a kind of stupid weariness in its place. What he says in the book is as interesting and delightful as the manner in which he says it.

Lads of the Fancy. By GEORGE BARTRAM. (Duckworth, 6s.)

It is a delight to read such a stirring story of real men and women, of a time when "every English gentleman was expected to be master of a pair of hands, the power of staring blenchlessly into the eyes of an enemy, and the gift of enduring." In these days, when our England is too much given over to effeminate men, motor-cars, and the unemployed, it is a relief to read again of men who could use their fists as well as their brains, of women who were beautiful and courageous without trying to step into men's shoes, of elopements and Gretna Green, prize-fights that were worth talking about, and all the doings of the country side in the year 1811. Redmond Shenstone and Dick Poynings, his friend, are a pair of as fine fellows as ever followed the hounds, and fell into the clutches of villains in London town. If it had not been for the friendly offices of Grainger, the detective, they might not have come out of their troubles so well, but our sympathies go with them all the way, and we cannot feel anything but pleasure when they accomplish their destinies. There are several other charming and healthy-minded young people, whose fortunes we follow with great pleasure after seeing too much of the latest evolution of hero and heroine in the modern novel, who pass their time in morbid self-questionings and in emotional outbursts, which our friends in Mr. Bartram's book would feel to be most indelicate and unnecessary. We cannot do better than conclude with the following sentence:

At the time of our story it was just possible to meet here and there in lane and country road the Englishman, not as a futile human budget of axioms and inane little facts, but as something blent of demigod and viking. Also one might view the most beautiful country on earth as God intended it to be, not as a century of pismirism has made it.

Brownjohn's. By MABEL DEARMER. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE reality of a storm in a tea-cup depends, as Mrs. Dearmer suggests on the fly-leaf of this little story, upon whether you happen to be in the tea-cup yourself. It may also depend upon how many of you there are in it. If there are too many the storm will quite possibly spill over and lose itself outside, and this, we fancy, is what has happened to "Brownjohn's." Regarded as a tea-cup it was, of course, necessary that old Mrs. Brownjohn's little country-village post office should be full to overflowing; yet even at the sacrifice of a room or two we should have ruthlessly excluded Robin and Toby Kitchen from the list of temporary inmates. Their elimination would have left Bab and Sue Drummond in sole possession, while the card setting forth that the place was a "Cyclist's Rest," at sight of which Hubert Leycester (a young artist in search of beauty) marched innocently in and occupied the bedroom of "Fräulein," absent on a visit to a sick sister, would have had to be affixed to the gate in some other manner. This simplification would have been all to the good. As it is, the little plot at which we hint is overcharged with machinery, and the author is kept so busy looking after her two imps in the car (who are after all not more than colourable imitations of the real human boy) that she half loses sight of her first conception of her two girls. Sue, indeed, just touched in as a foil to her sister, is a negligible quantity. But Bab as heroine may be something of a disappointment to those who are acquainted with Mrs. Dearmer's more finished studies of character. It is not merely that, like many another pretty girl of eighteen, she is full of little "tantrums" and jealousies; it is rather that Mrs. Dearmer has omitted to suggest such inner subtleties and charms as might engage an unbiassed reader's sympathy.

THE DRAMA

A CLOSE TIME FOR THE PEASANTS

The Dynasts. By THOMAS HARDY. Part Second. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.)

ANY one who has ever ascended Vesuvius will remember that on leaving the little railway (admirably managed by Messrs. Cook) you are seized by a couple of ruffians who demand money or press bad change upon you. Like "Good Deeds" in the morality play of Everyman, Messrs. Cook accompany you to the pit's mouth and then you are handed over to the Italian Government, represented by retired brigands. This image presents itself vividly on reading or even writing a review of any remarkable work by some great writer. The author and publisher (Good Deeds or Messrs. Cook) have brought out a book, and the public with a taste for literary phenomena experiences the laudable curiosity to look inside; but it is not allowed to do so in the ordinary course. A reviewer seizes you by the throat in the morning or weekly paper: presses his own ideas in the form of papal francs and Helvetia seated, both on you and the volcano, insists upon your looking at everything from his own coign of disadvantage. That is why some people are disappointed with Vesuvius.

Since Mr. Hardy wrote "Under the Greenwood Tree," and has been slowly recognised as a great novelist, it was as the delineator of peasant-life that he first struck our cockney imaginations; so that everything by him in the general view, must be about peasants. Yet the "Group of Noble Dames" contains hardly a smock; the flora suggest the gardens of Boccaccio and Brantôme rather than the cottage annuals of Wessex and Mr. Hardy's other cereals, if I may call them so, in the Illustrated London News. To tell the truth, the author is much more various than reviewers suppose. He has always had plenty of life's little ironies in the fire; and the great drama of The Dynasts, the second part of which has just been issued, proves him not merely a great novelist but an essayist, a poet and a dramatist and, I might add, an acute historical critic.

Of course it is rather startling, almost discouraging, to commence reading a drama in three parts, nineteen acts and one hundred and thirty scenes. You wonder if there will be time for a cigarette; or, as at Oberammergau, when lunch will be served. You recall M. Jules Claretie's refusal to place one of M. Sar Peladan's works on the stage of the Odéon—The Prince of Byzantium, a Wagnerian drama in forty-eight acts and seventy-six tableaux.

"The charge brought against the Queen Mother in Act 17," wrote M. Claretie with his usual courtesy, "and the terrible (funeste) suggestion cast on the Prince's character in Act 46 would render it unsuitable for production at a National State theatre. French dramatic art does not yet ride on the back of a swan."

I can fancy Mr. Tree refusing The Dynasts for quite different reasons, and I can imagine it being accepted by the Stage Society because of them; and played by that admirable institution to the bitter end some bitter Sunday night. The author has described the work as a panorama; I should call it a cinematograph, in which the figures and even the scenery, actual though they are, move just a little too fast. It is a trifle bewildering. At first all seems amorphous, and you come to the exquisite prose rubrics—you can hardly call them stage-directions—with a sense of relief, as of sunshine after rain, to use one of Pater's happy expressions. After a time, at all events, a portion of the author's purpose is revealed to you, but only a portion. I frankly do not understand all the elaborate scaffolding, though it must have its reason, because the author, it should be remembered, is an architect. When you have lost the sense of the theatre, and are thrilled only by the dramatic tenseness of dialogue, you get a real stage-direction: "A long silence in the room. Another rider is heard approaching," etc. Then I seem to hear some one beating up an egg "off" in order to produce the sound of horses' hoofs. The illusion has gone. Again, the supernatural characters, besides uttering most beautiful poetry, like the Beryl spirits of Rossetti, are often unintelligible as they. Is this Mr. Hardy's mordant humour, so often employed throughout the drama in a more obvious way? A Scotch paper once complained that English newspapers were uncomfortable to read because you never knew which portions were intended to be serious, whereas in the Northern press the humorous portions were all put in one column and headed Facetiae. I am Scotch myself and I am sure the fault is mine. Just following some ringing, almost Elizabethan lines from the mouth of Napoleon, we have:

SPRIT SINISTER: I spell herein that our excellently high coloured drama is not played out yet.

The view of "Spirit Sinister" is too plainly some dismal resolution at the old Playgoers' Club, the Deaf and Dumb Playgoers' League, or one of those useful societies designed to make our Sundays brighter.

Just as Marlowe and Webster wound you by their incongruities, Mr. Hardy stabs you with his wilful discords. In Act ii. scene vi., however, he has consented to leave himself alone; it is the most beautiful and moving in the whole drama, though the motive (that of Napoleon's resolve to divorce Josephine) has often been treated before, but never with such direct simplicity. The scene following is rubric; in admirable contrast the battle of Vimiero is painted like an illuminated letter by that exquisite miniaturist and master-builder who sometimes carves you grotesques for the miserere seats of his auditorium. Particularly grim and macabre is the final scene, where the "Spirit of the Years" becomes materialised and is mistaken by the Prince Regent and his vulgar court for one of the suite of the French princes. It recalls Rethel's print, or Poe's "Masque of the Red Death"; but it is more striking than either of them.

Is The Dynasts a success? I would rather not answer the question until it has reached another edition, and I can be on the safe side. I would call it a great imperfect work of art; imperfect in the sense that the Sixtine Chapel is imperfect as a scheme of decoration. You must return to it very often before you can absorb its spaces. It is the spectator who is out of proportion, not the giants nor the mind which conceived them.

ROBERT ROSS.

"MEASURE FOR MEASURE" BY THE O.U.D.S.

IF the production of Measure for Measure at Oxford showed nothing else, it showed that this play can be acted without offence. And why not? What is the subject on which Othello turns? What is the aim of Falstaff in the Merry Wives? What the crux of Much Ado and of the human part of A Midsummer Night's Dream? and The Winter's Tale and Cymbeline? All these plays are acted without protest; and it only remained for Mr. G. R. Foss, with sound sense and good taste, to show that Measure for Measure could be acted too. His version was, on the whole, very good. He was a little drastic, perhaps, in his alteration of the text, and he certainly—by transposing a scene from Act II. to Act I.—relieved the horror of the impending doom too soon by showing us the Duke practising his mission of mercy before we had begun to feel that the case was desperate.

The play itself will never be a popular play: it is too gloomy, too little relieved by comedy. In the weakness of our hearts we were almost grateful to Barnardine (Mr. J. L. Philipps) for his outrageous but amusing attack of delirium tremens. What made the play so popular in the eighteenth century (and we shall always believe it to have been more popular with the actors than with their audiences) was its two or three superb acting scenes: the two between Angelo and Isabella, the scene between Isabella and Claudio in prison, with its splendid outbursts of rhetoric and rage, and some others. Measure for Measure contains as many passages of beautiful language as any play of Shakespeare's—perhaps more; but alas! beautiful language is not much appreciated in the English theatre nowadays—nor always (it must be admitted) are the players ready to do it justice. We hazard a suggestion, which we are quite prepared to hear violently controverted, that a little more concession should be made to the Elizabethan manner of acting; that Claudio, for instance, should not be too anxious, in speaking those famous lines on death, to preserve character, and should allow more to the claims of mere rhetoric. Still, Mr. F. C. Meyer played the part consistently, if a little feebly, and sincerity marked every performance. Mr. G. S. C. Rentoul's Angelo, for instance, was wholly sincere, carefully worked out on a reasoned view of the character and rendered with no small power. We should have liked the Duke of Mr. R. Gorell Barnes much better if we had heard more of his lines; amid a cast that suffered all round from indistinctness of speech, he suffered most. Miss Maud Hoffmann made a fine, passionate Isabella, and among other good performances we remember Mr. W. J. H. Curwen in the very difficult part of Lucio, Mr. L. Gartside as Elbow, Mr. H. G. Tanner as Pompey, Mr. G. A. E. Williams as the Provost, and Miss Edith Coleman as Mariana. On the whole, the Society is to be congratulated on a sound rendering of an interesting, if unequal play, to which the music composed and conducted by Mr. Robert Cox lent considerable attraction.

MR. HEWLETT'S "PASTORAL" AT THE COURT THEATRE

WHEN Pan and the Young Shepherd, by Mr. Maurice Hewlett, first appeared in print, people said it would never act. They were wrong. Cut down and adapted for the stage, it acts fairly well—very largely, we suspect, because it had Mr. Granville Barker to stage and rehearse it. Is there anything that Mr. Barker couldn't stage? It is not a play for those who care to see on the stage only pictures of real and modern life. To like it at all, you must be a neo-Pagan with a dash of the mediæval Christian in you: it would be well, too, to add an appreciation of the young Irish School, with something of Fiona Macleod and a little of the Elizabethan—you must offer, in fact, a great many facets to interests striking in from all directions. For Mr. Maurice Hewlett is here one of those neo-Renaissance people who gather from here and from there, selecting thoughts, figures and images from all art and from all time, and weaving them together into beautiful, shot, rich fabrics which do not wear very well but are very nice to look at. The young shepherd who goes for a bride to the "daughters of the earth," soulless creatures who are gay without care, and chooses one whom Pan has struck dumb and cold because she alone of the seven sisters has denied herself to him—he is a Christian and a man altogether of the earth. Then, when he has brought her home, Pan calls her back, and only the sacrifice of a mortal maiden to his desires can save her and restore her to her husband. The mortal maiden is Merla, a strapping wench who catches the goat-god's fancy; and, loving Neanias, the young Shepherd, to distraction, she has learnt the first lesson of love—self-sacrifice. To save him and his bride, Aglaë, she will give herself to Pan. It is not—well, not very nice, somehow, to think of Neanias singing carols to Aglaë on Epiphany Eve, while Merla, who loves him, has bought his happiness at such a price. But there are no laws of propriety in this strange world. Suffice it that we have some beautiful scenes, some beautiful language (we can trust Mr. Hewlett for that!), some ripe Shakespearean peasant humour, and some good acting, notably from Mr. Ainley as Neanias, Miss Suzanne Sheldon as Merla, and Miss Grace Lane, who played the very difficult part of the dumb girl with fine expression. The scenery was perfect, and Mr. H. W. Hewlett's music very Parsifalian and appropriate. In future performances Miss Alice Crawford and the other (very handsome) Daughters of the Earth should be allowed to recite their lines to music and not encouraged to sing.

The Youngest of the Angels, which followed, is a one-act play, adapted by Maurice Hewlett from his last novel. It shows a version of the scene in which Francis Hastings is hidden in the cupboard of Professor Tolfino Tron's room, while the Professor supps with his wife. It makes a dull little play of no distinction. Mr. Barnes, Mr. Harcourt Williams, Miss Lillah McCarthy and Miss Agnes Thomas acted it well.

FINE ART

THE PAINTER-ETCHERS

It would be insincere and no true sign of friendship on the part of a well-wisher of the Society to pretend that this is one of its good years. Taking it collectively, one cannot fail to notice certain omissions and shortcomings, and to regret especially the absence of one of the most interesting features of some past exhibitions, the representation of a group of old masters or some single classic of the etcher's art by a selection of works which have stood the test of time. This is a feature which the Council, if it so chooses, may easily restore another year. It will not so easily combat the tendency, so strongly marked at the present day, among black-and-white artists as well as painters, for the younger men of marked originality and talent to be drawn away from the large and long-established societies to smaller and more intimate groups. The progress of English etching can no more be studied on the walls of the Royal Society of Painter-Engravers alone than that of English painting at the Royal Academy. That is obviously a matter largely beyond the Society's control; it can hardly be said, however, to derive much lustre from the new associates of this year. Among the older members, too, we miss the contributions of several distinguished original etchers whose work is always looked for eagerly by the regular habitues of the exhibitions. What has Mr. Short been doing, whose recent election, with that of Mr. Strang, to the honours of an Associate-Engraver of the Royal Academy has been received with such general satisfaction? It is a great pity if his other duties as a teacher or as the translator, unrivalled in his generation, of Turner, Dewint and Watts, have left him no time for original work. We miss Mr. Burridge and Mr. Gascoyne, and, among the foreign associates, two to whom we have looked especially for entertainment and the stimulus of novelty, M. Jeannot and M. Chahine.

Then it must strike a visitor who reflects on the choice of subject that there is too much architecture and too much landscape in the room. There are few members who even attempt an imaginative or historical composition and fewer still who succeed. What has become of the art of portrait-etching in England since Mr. Strang abandoned it, let us hope for a time only? Apart from Professor Legros's dry-point portrait of himself (from a drawing which has already been seen, treated more successfully, as a lithograph), the only portraits in this exhibition are those of two bishops by a Norwegian, Mr. Nordhagen, and of Israels and Segantini by a German, Mr. Hermann Struck.

Few of the individual contributors, again, are seen at their best this year. Let us mention some of those who are. In the first place, Professor Legros himself, whose Les Oraisons de Noël might almost be dated thirty years back, if a certain indecision and softness in the figure and hands of the elder woman, partly due (I suspect) to the printing of the plate, did not assimilate it to the latest phase of his etching. The profile of the girl behind her is as firmly drawn as ever, yet tender and charming in its na veté. La Petite Mare is a delicate landscape in the pale and silvery tone to which the etcher has restricted himself in all his recent work, and it is one of the most charming plates of the kind that he has done. Mr. Brangwyn's work is very strong again: it may be called ambitious, but it must also be called successful. He exhibits two large etchings, Breaking up the "Hannibal" and A Butcher's Shop. The latter is very imperfectly described by its unromantic title. It is not the kind of shop that disfigures our English streets, but a picturesque roadside stall in some southern or eastern clime, consisting chiefly of a beam slung between two huge trees, to which two pigs' heads are attached, while a carcass hangs in shadow and the "purveyor" serves a customer as pleasingly attired as himself. The description may not sound attractive, but the print is admirable. Sir Charles Holroyd has been working again in two congenial regions, at Venice and among the English lakes. From both he has brought back good and interesting compositions. The Salute Steps, drawn from a wholly new and original point of view, and "Rio San Gregorio, No. 223" are the two that please me most of the first group; of the second only one example is shown, Langdale Pikes, an excellent study of rugged hills, work suited to the firm, strongly bitten line in which the artist habitually expresses himself. Le Pont Neuf, by M. Eugène Béjot, is one of the best architectural etchings; the treatment of the water is much in the manner of M. Lepère. Mr. Axel Haig's work appeals to those who delight in high finish, and they will find good examples of his style in subjects chosen from Spain, Portugal and France. Mr. Sydney Lee exhibits some good architectural plates of moderate size, especially Notre Dame, Bruges and House at Fuenterrabia, which are more impressive in their well-designed pattern of light and dark than the more ambitious, big plate, The Cathedral Precincts, printed in an unpleasantly hot, reddish tint. Mr. Waterson has made a fine mezzotint plate of The Strath, with its great stretch of sky over bleak, snow-covered hills; when he attempts to give the atmosphere of woods he is much less successful, and his experiment of dividing a mezzotint plate into a triptych (No. 244) is not at all to be commended. Just above The Strath hangs an aquatint by Mr. Hubert Schröder, Evening, near Pilsey, which deserves a position more nearly on the level of the eye; it is a clear and luminous rendering of an expanse of water and a cloudy sky, and seems, at a distance, to be of great technical merit. Mr. Hartley has found a charming subject in Stokesay Castle, Shropshire, and his plate of The Straw Waggon is one of the best of the small things in the room. Miss Margaret Kemp-Welch has done a number of good landscape plates this year. Barges unloading on the Deben, Suffolk, may be specially mentioned among them. Miss Ethel Stewart, a new contributor, shows some good etchings of Somerset landscape, and her Groote Kerke, Veere, shows more taste and selection than many of the more ambitious architectural plates in the gallery. Mr. Oliver Hall and Mr. C. J. Watson are good, if not quite at their best. Mr. East's contributions are disappointing; both his trees and his human beings are distorted. Mr. Spence's etchings are quaint and dramatic, as ever. Colonel Goff is not so successful with Nile scenery as with Fiesole or Viareggio: his dry-point plates of Nespole, Blackthorn and Pine are good studies from nature done in a painter-like way, in contrast to the neat and realistic draughtsmanship of Mr. G. Woolliscraft Rhead, whose Toadflax and Carnations show a scrupulous observation which would have delighted Ruskin. Most of the exhibitors call for no remark; it is not a great year. C. D.

MUSIC

THE OXFORD HISTORY OF MUSIC—IV

It is no ill compliment to the work of Mr. Fuller Maitland to regret that the Oxford History of Music changes hands at this point so as to separate Bach and Handel from their predecessors. That their work should be treated in a separate volume from the music of the seventeenth century was inevitable, but, as the chief usefulness of such a work as this, and indeed its object as stated by the editor, is to show the relation of these great ones, who too often appear in majestic isolation, to the work of their predecessors and contemporaries, this could only have been completely achieved in a volume continuing the standpoint of volume iii., and having such constant textual reference to it as only the same author could give. This is, of course, the weak point of the divided authorship system altogether, but this one is the most awkward joining-place of the four, and in reading these two volumes one cannot help feeling that Sir Hubert Parry's work was hampered by the knowledge that he was not to trace the new movements of the seventeenth century to their ultimate fruition, as was that of Mr. Fuller Maitland by having to build upon another's foundation. Apart from this initial disadvantage the picture presented of the time is remarkably clear. The author never forgets that his subject is "The Age of Bach and Handel," not Bach and Handel themselves, and he is largely successful in placing them in their surroundings, so that one sees them and their contemporaries somewhat from the point of view of their time, and this is especially helped by his quotation of the comments of Burney, Addison and Steele, Mattheson the German critic, and others. Even Johnson, with his inimitable power of hitting the nail on the head in conversation on topics of which he was wholly ignorant, comes in with the remark that opera is an "exotic and irrational entertainment," and Mr. Fuller Maitland makes it very clear that he was right.

The first chapters deal with special forms of musical composition. The Chorale, the Cantata, Passion Music, belong exclusively to Germany, and are in this period chiefly illustrated by the works of Bach. The birth and growth of these highly characteristic forms have been already traced, and their treatment here is somewhat slight; the author confines himself almost entirely to showing and illustrating their derivation from the chorale, and hence the essentially devotional character of such music. He illustrates this mainly from those Cantatas which are together known as the Christmas Oratorio, and a comparison of the two "Passions" of Bach. The author's wisdom is shown in his omissions. Detailed information on the numerous works of this kind by Bach would, of course, be disproportioned, but it is tantalising to be refused it by one so qualified to give it. The chapter on Latin Church Music discusses the curious anomalies and inconsistencies of Italian writers such as Durante, Leo, Caldara, Pergolesi and Astorga, in which choral writing of a massive and noble type is continually marred by the trivialities and obvious devices of Opera, and the childish device of placing two soprano voices to sing in an endless succession of thirds. How far Bach's great Mass was removed above these efforts, by bringing all the sincerity and earnestness of German protestantism to bear upon the grand traditions of Catholic Church music, is one of the most interesting features of the period. With the discussion of Oratorio we are taken away from music of which devotional impulse of any sort was an inspiring force. Handel's Oratorios are to this day so much represented in the public mind by the "Messiah," that it is still difficult to realise how far removed from religious worship they are. They came into existence as Biblical Drama without action and scenery, the place of which was taken by the extensive use of the chorus and a general improvement of workmanship, which, purging them from the banalities of his operas, transformed his work, so as to show the master as he really was. Handel's works of this kind are enumerated with short notes upon them, and in this connection it was inevitable that the author should have a word to say on his famous plagiarisms. He admits that it is impossible to maintain the plea that these were unconscious, but suggests the original theory that :

it is at least possible that his illness of 1737, while it had not permanently affected his mental well-being in the least, may have caused him to forget the source of some of the manuscripts in his possession, and he may have mistaken the unnamed copy of Erba's Magnificat for a work of his own, when he wanted materials for his "Israel."

It seems better frankly to accept the situation and allow that Handel was unprincipled in this matter, than to weave these theories, always remembering in extenuation that he regarded himself more as a provider of fashionable entertainments than as an original and creative artist.

The kind of musical instruments in use and the technique of performers exercised at this time a most potent influence upon the development of the art of composition. The chapters on "The Keyed Instruments," "The Orchestra," "The Growth of Form," and "The Rise of Virtuosity" are, therefore, the most important contribution to the history of music which this volume makes. Of the keyed instruments, the only one capable of what we now call expressive light and shade was the clavichord, Bach's favourite instrument, since the gradations of the harpsichord, like those of the organ, were controlled by stops, and consequently consisted in the mere contrast of tone-colours, and it was therefore the instrument for the display of virtuosity. This fact may well be taken in conjunction with Mr. Fuller Maitland's comment on the words of Naumann, that fugue form was "transmitted to Bach in a state so perfect that he had but to put the finishing touch to it." What, asks Mr. Fuller Maitland, was this "finishing touch"? Having examined the "Art of Fugue," with its immense intellectual output, he comes back to the "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues," and says :

It was not in these mighty intellectual efforts [i.e., The Art of Fugue] that Bach put the finishing touch to the fugue form of his day; it is by the emotional quality and the expressive power of his fugues that he stands far above all composers of any age who have attempted fugal writing.

How Bach saturated his works with every kind of expressive power we can only fully realise when we compare them with those of his contemporaries and even with those of Handel. The broad effects of the latter are apparent and easily grasped, while the intimate expression, the detailed care with which Bach expresses emotion by the special use of a certain ornament at a given point, or the employment of a certain colour of harmony or tone, often escape the notice of a careless listener.

The state of the orchestra at this time is very difficult to grasp without an intimate knowledge of the scores of composers and the records of historians. With the exception of the clarinet, almost every component of the modern orchestra was available, but the idea of the interweaving of tone-colours as in modern orchestration had scarcely occurred to composers. Bach made some tentative experiments, but as a rule he conformed to the system of writing obligato parts throughout a whole movement for one or two special instruments. Mr. Fuller Maitland by an apt analogy describes each movement as "a picture in monochrome, in which variety and interest could only be got by the management of outlines or the opposition of lights and darks." One may say that the orchestra in the modern sense of the term did not exist, though the materials for its construction had been collected together. But the builders did not begin to work at it until after the death of Bach and Handel. It dominates the course of the next volume of the present work. In "The Rise of Virtuosity," however, is to be found an important element which contributed much to the resources of the next generation, and by its development especially of the technique of the stringed instruments, helped towards the building up of the orchestra. Mr. Fuller Maitland shows that the impulse towards virtuosity has come in special periods or waves, rather than in a steady flow, and that from each of these waves the art has come out with increased resources, however regrettable individual manifestation of this tendency may appear.

The largest wave of virtuosity from which the art has suffered overspread the age of Bach and Handel, and swamped with its evil traditions the immature efforts of innumerable good composers of opera and instrumental music, either directly, or indirectly by vitiating public taste; Bach stood aloof from it and was alone, unvalued in his generation and almost unknown; Handel grappled with some of its worst manifestations in opera, bullying his singers, cajoling his audience, ruining his own work. The picture is a dismal one, relieved only by the presence of these two mighty men, and the very faithfulness with which it is presented makes one willingly turn away to see the dawn of truer and wider ideals in the close of the century.

H. C. C.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE Cambridge University Press has in preparation two new volumes in the Cambridge Type Series—Milton's "Comus" and other Poems; and Bacon's Essays. They will be uniform, of course, with the Cambridge Type edition of Earle's "Microcosmographie," Dekker's "Seven Deadly Sinnes," Ben Jonson's "Underwoods," etc. A book on Spitzbergen by Sir Martin Conway is also announced, under the title "No Man's Land," by the Cambridge Press, and it has in the press a school edition of the text of Jebb's "Bacchylides."

Dr. Paget Toynbee has written a book on "Dante in English Literature" which he is publishing, we understand, with Messrs. Methuen. It traces the references to Dante in English writings from the date of Chaucer's second visit to Italy in 1380 down to the death of Henry Francis Cary in 1844. The book will contain brief biographies of each of the writers represented and will be furnished with full indices.—Messrs. Methuen have in preparation a new edition of "The Poems of William Wordsworth," in four volumes, with introduction and notes by Mr. Nowell C. Smith, who edited "Wordsworth's Literary Criticism" for the Oxford University Press.

Mr. A. C. Benson is writing "The Life of Walter Pater," which Messrs. Macmillan will publish shortly in their English Men of Letters series. "If one attempts to depict Pater in the purely critical spirit," writes Mr. Benson in his introduction, "one never comes near to his inner seriousness, his mildness, his simple tenderness, his essential meekness of spirit. . . . And thus one is driven to his books, not only to criticise them, but to divine his character: and so again one falls under the spell, and depicts him, almost inevitably, in his own chosen manner."

Messrs. J. M. Dent have in the press an edition of the work of Alexandre Dumas in forty-eight volumes, unabridged, which are to be issued at the rate of two volumes a month.—The same firm have almost ready a book on Morocco, translated from the French of Eugène Aubin under the title "Morocco of To-day"; and they will begin the publication shortly of a new series—The Temple Greek and Latin Classics—the first four volumes of which will be "The Medea and Hippolytus of Euripides," translated and edited, with an introduction and notes, by Sidney Waterlow; "The Euthyphro, Crito, and Apology of Socrates," translated and edited, with an introduction and notes, by F. M. Stawell; "The Æneid of Virgil," translated by E. Fairfax Taylor, and edited, with an introduction, by E. M. Forster (2 vols.); and "The Satires of Juvenal," edited, with an introduction and notes, by A. F. Cole. In every case the original text will appear opposite the English rendering.

Messrs. Constable will publish next week a volume entitled "The Chief American Poets." Selections are given from Poe, Emerson, Longfellow, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell, Whitman, etc.—The same publishers promise "A Short History of Italy, 476–1900," by Henry Dwight Sedgwick, early this month; the fifth volume of Professor G. Santayana's "The Life of Reason" immediately; and they have in preparation a popular edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson, in six volumes, edited by Augustine Birrell.

Messrs. Constable have in the press and will issue shortly an important book on "Tunnel Shields, and the Use of Compressed Air in Subaqueous Works," by William Charles Copperthwaite. Although the employment of a shield, with or without the aid of compressed air, in tunnelling operations, is of English origin, and there are probably more tunnels so constructed in this country than anywhere else, save in Simms's "Practical Tunnelling" and in Prelini and Hills's "Tunnelling" the subject has not been dealt with in English engineering text-books. The two authorities we have quoted only touch on the shield slightly as part of the general history of tunnelling; and so far as we are aware there have been only two French books which dealt with it any length: Legouez's "L'Emploi du Bouclier dans la Construction des Souterrains," and Phillippes's "Le Bouclier." Mr. Copperthwaite's book should therefore be of value.—Messrs. Constable will also issue shortly another book by Mr. John Fyvie, entitled "Some Literary Eccentrics." The "eccentrics" in question are Thomas Amory, Thomas Day, William Beckford, Walter Savage Landor, William Hazlitt, Henry Crabb Robinson, Charles Babbage, Douglas Jerrold, George Wither, James I., and Sir John Mandeville.—The same publishers are preparing a work on "Early Victorian Novelists" from the pen of Mr. Lewis Melville, the author of a Life of Thackeray. Mr. Melville deals with Bulwer Lytton, Benjamin Disraeli, Douglas Jerrold, Samuel Lover, Thackeray, Charles Kingsley, Wilkie Collins, Charles Reade, Anthony Trollope, Whyte-Melville, Mrs. Gaskell, Sheridan Le Fanu, Henry Kingsley, Mrs. Oliphant, James Payn, Sir Walter Besant, and William Black.

In celebration of the tercentenary of the birth of Rembrandt, Mr. Heinemann announces a memorial of the artist which is to be published simultaneously in England, France, Germany, and Holland. It will contain forty "Rembrandt" photogravure reproductions of the finest pictures of Rembrandt, and there will be in addition facsimile reproductions of a number of his drawings with accompanying text by Emile Michel. The present publication will appear in fortnightly parts at 2s. 6d., starting on March 9, so as to be complete by July.

Among the books announced for publication this spring by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons, Ltd., are a novel by a new writer called "The Separatist," a volume of "Moving Memories" by a late King's messenger, under the title of "On the Queen's Errands"; a book of Art criticism by Mr. Frederick Wedmore, which he has named "Whistler and Others"; and a volume of new extracts from the sermons and manuscripts of Mr. Stopford Brooke, entitled "The Life Superlative."

Among Mr. Fisher Unwin's announcements for this month is "Haeckel: His Life and Work," by Wilhelm Bölsche, with an introduction and supplementary chapter by the translator, Joseph McCabe. Professor Bölsche is well known in Germany both as scientist and poet. The translator has added a full account of Haeckel's experiences and achievements during the past ten years, and the book should prove an adequate study of the work and character of the "Darwin of Germany."—Mr. Percy Fitzgerald's biography of Sir Henry Irving is promised at an early date, and Mr. Unwin will publish during the month "Aristotle's Theory of Conduct" by Thomas Marshall. The book is intended to bring Aristotle's Ethics to the notice of English readers. It contains a general introduction, separate introductions to the several chapters, followed by explanatory remarks and a paraphrase of the greater part of the text. As an adjunct to more elaborate commentaries, it will be useful to students of the Ethics, giving as it does within a reasonable compass a somewhat full conspectus of Aristotle's theory. References, definitions, and important passages are given or transcribed in the notes at the foot of each page. The exposition of the scope of the Ethics in the introduction will enable the general reader to appreciate Aristotle's celebrated treatise.—The same publisher has almost ready a novel by Mr. Archibald Little, "A Millionaire's Courtship," which is frankly farcical.

Messrs. Blackwood have in preparation, and will publish some time in March a new book on Fontenoy: "Fontenoy, and Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession." It is written by Mr. Francis Henry Skrine, the author of "The Expansion of Russia."—Mr. A. T. Quiller-Couch is writing the "George Eliot," in Messrs. Blackwood's Modern English Writers series. The book will be published some time in the spring.

Mr. Andrew Lang has just completed a Life of Joan of Arc to be included in a new series entitled "The Children's Heroes," which Messrs. Jack are about to publish. The volumes, of which fifteen are already in active preparation, are on similar lines to their "Told to the Children" Series, several new volumes of which are on the eve of issue.

On March 15, Messrs. Methuen will publish a new Life of Sir Walter Scott by G. le G. Norgate. The book treats of Sir Walter both as man and as author and is in many respects different from former biographies. Whilst Lockhart's great work, the "Letters" and the "Journal" have been freely utilised, particulars have been drawn not merely from contemporary writers, but from memorials and recollections only given to the world in recent years. Abbotsford and the Scott country have been specially visited, and interesting details are given as to their condition at the present time. The aim has been to produce a thoroughly popular, readable book, and thus, although due place has been given to critical commentary, this has not been done at the expense of other phases. In the volume, the publishers claim, are collected fresh facts about Scott not to be found elsewhere. Particular attention has been paid to the illustrations, and there is to be a monograph on Scott as a lawyer by Francis Watt.

Mr. John Lane will publish on March 6 "Hauntings": fantastic stories by Vernon Lee, the author of "The Enchanted Woods," "Hortus Vitae" and "The Spirit of Rome."—On the same day Mr. Lane will publish "The Boyhood and Youth of Napoleon I," by Oscar Browning, in The Crown Library.

A new volume in the Memorials of the Counties of England Series—"Hampshire"—will be issued in a few days by Messrs. Bemrose. It is edited by the Rev. G. E. Jeans, and among the contributors are Mrs. Willingham Rawsley, Lady Cope, Mr. Horace Hutchinson, and other writers.

Mr. C. F. A. Voysey has nearly ready for publication with Mr. Elkin Mathews "Reason as a Basis of Art." This slim little brochure is written with an endeavour to show that the only enduring formation of art must be the reason, conscience and love of man, and that sensuous feeling alone is untrustworthy, because, ignoring the reason, it leads to narrowness of sympathy and understanding. Art being an expression of thought and feeling, it must follow that the human character is the most important factor in its composition.

Mr. E. Marston has in the press a new volume to be called "Fishing for Pleasure, and Catching It." The book will contain an account of his various angling excursions in different parts of the country, described in fourteen chapters, to which are added two chapters on "Salmon and Trout Fishing in North Wales," by R. B. Marston; it will be published by Mr. T. Werner Laurie.

"Some Reminiscences" by William M. Rossetti, will be published in two volumes early in the autumn. The book contains a complete record of the Rossetti family and of the pre-Raphaelite movement, with many interesting facts and illustrations hitherto unpublished.

CORRESPONDENCE

TOTEM NAMES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am much obliged to Mr. Crook for suggesting objections to my theory of the origin of Totemism. To make objections is to collaborate in the search for truth. Of course I cannot tell whether or not savages held their present high opinion of animals and all other objects in nature, when, on my theory, they "blazoned" neighbouring groups with names derived from such objects. Nor do I know at all when the European or ancient Israelite village sobriquets were given: I only learned that they "were very old, and people seemed not to like to talk about them" in Cornwall. Mr. Spencer tells us that the blacks are also shy of talking about their totems, and very averse to telling all. Thus I cannot say whether the animal names of groups, in early Israel, Cornwall or Australia, were originally regarded as derisive or not. I do know that the names of Siouan groups (non-Totemic) were often derisive, yet were accepted. I gave my evidence to the facts, evidence as old as 1850 (Grinnell: "Blackfoot Lodge Tales," pp. 208, 225). I also gave such derisive clan-names as "wry nose," "wry mouth" (Cameron, Campbell). These names were not complimentary, but is any one ashamed of being a Cameron or a Campbell? The totem names I suppose to have been originally distinctive, but even if they were also derisive in intention, after being accepted they ceased to be derisive among savages, for they were universal. I prove that among the Bakwena tribes, tribal names which the natives assert to have been given in derision, are now honourable (Bleek MSS. 120, "Secret of the Totem," pp. 25, 26). The natives see no difficulty in the matter. It is enough for my argument that names, even when certainly derisive, have been accepted and glorified in by their bearers.

I specially guarded against being supposed to hold that, in pristine days, the superstitions about names were already developed, so that to give to a man or group the name of an animal was to put him under that animal's protection. I said: "It would appear that this superstition as to names is later than the first giving of animal names to groups" (p. 122). Even savages do not think all round a subject, so that, even if to give a group an animal name was to give it an animal ally (which, at so remote an age, is unlikely), the name might be given.

St. Andrews, February 26.

ANDREW LANG.

HEROIC ROMANCES OF IRELAND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the kind notice that appears of "Heroic Romances of Ireland" in this week's ACADEMY your reviewer quarrels with my inconsistency shown by translating some tales in a non-Irish form, while refusing to make small alterations in others. May I be allowed to make my object clearer than I seem to have done in the preface to the volume?

The intention of the translations was to reproduce the stories and the ideas of the authors exactly; and, so far as another language would permit it, to reproduce the literary effects aimed at by the old Irish forms. The works are of very different characters, and it seemed to me that these effects could in the case of some tales be reproduced in English by adherence to the original forms, and in others they could not be so reproduced. Short prose pieces appear to be of the latter character, and for this reason they were reproduced in the ballad form; those which are given in vol. i. seemed to be more capable of reproduction, but these, although in the Irish form of prose and verse, are not literal translations, the difference can be seen by comparing vol. ii. pp. 151-161 with vol. i. pp. 27-32. The Irish metres have been kept, where they seemed to give to an English ear the effect intended by the sense; but in other cases, especially in songs of triumph, non-Irish metres were thought to be more suitable. Similarly in the prose, strings of sharply contrasting substantives have been replaced by adjectives, and occasionally by verbs; but it was intended to insert and to omit no idea which the original did not convey or imply.

Such insertions as I have made were meant to bring out a meaning that the occasionally elliptical style of the original writer left vague: the insertion mentioned by your reviewer is a case of this; and in this I admit that, as your reviewer plainly thinks, I may have gone too far. In the Irish, twelve men are represented as dying at the sound of the music of fairy harpers. An account of the birth of these harpers is then given, ending with a prophecy (thirty lines farther on) that men would die at the sound of the music that they played. I think that the author intended the deaths and the prophecy to be connected, though he does not say so; and in order to bring out the connection I inserted the prophecy twice, once when it was given, once when it was fulfilled. I have made a few similar insertions, but in each case the insertion is to make the author's meaning clear, not to introduce new ideas.

The object of the series is, as stated in the preface to the first volume of the Irish Saga Library, "not to prepare literal versions for the use of scholars, but to reproduce Irish tales in such English forms as might interest English readers, keeping, however, as near as possible to the sense and form of the Irish" (page xxi.). I hope that this explanation may absolve the book from the charge of inconsistency.

A. H. LEAHY.

February 27.

May I take this opportunity to ask such readers of the ACADEMY as may possess a copy of "Heroic Romances" to note the following corrections, which Professor Kuno Meyer has been good enough to send to me. I fear that, judging from the lack of general interest in previously published Irish works, there will be no opportunity of inserting the corrections in a second edition:

Vol. ii. page 154, line 23, allá sin should be "on that very day," not "in that very place" (which is alla sin). The error came from the omission of the accent in the transcript as first made.

Page 155, line 15, is barr sobarche folt and, "hair there is the topmost bloom of the primrose," barr is summit of anything, not only top of head.

Page 155, line 17, co ind "to finger-tips," not "to head"; ind is an extremity. In this case the finger-tips, not the head, seem to be indicated.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Whilst thanking the friendly reviewer of Professor Leahy's "Heroic Romances of Ireland," I should like to enter a plea against some of his judgments. He considers that the plan adopted in vol. ii. of rendering into verse stories which in the original are in prose "robs the Irish Saga Library of the value it might have possessed for scholars." Seeing that he himself notes the fact that Professor Leahy has also printed a "literal translation" of these stories, it is difficult to understand your reviewer's position. What the scholar does want is the "literal translation," but surely if a book contains this it is not deprived of value for him because it contains something else which he may or may not want. Since when has supererogation been deemed equivalent to deprivation?

Professor Leahy has duly noted (p. 164) the Egerton MS. substitution of Eocho Fedlech for Eochaid Airemm. Both Professor Leahy and I held it would be inadvisable to tacitly make the change. I think most Celtic scholars will be of our opinion.

I venture to dissent from your reviewer's suggestion, thrown out in reference to Aubrey de Vere's "Foray of Queen Meave," whether Professor Leahy's scholarship "has not been wasted." Fine prose as the "Foray" is, it fails utterly in my opinion in producing anything like the effect of the original. I don't think Aubrey de Vere had any such intention—if he had he certainly failed. What the student of literature, who is not an Irish philologist, requires, and what he is entitled to require, is a version faithful as far as possible to the spirit as well as to the form of the original. He wants to know what Irish literature of the 8th-12th centuries is, not what it may possibly suggest to men of the nineteenth century. He does not require a crib, nor a text translated on the principle of qu'est ce que c'est que cela—what is that which that is what that—a principle upon which some versions from the Irish have been made. But he does want the form of the original, however imperfect that form may be. Professor Leahy has essayed to meet the requirements alike of the student of subject-matter (which includes the literary form) and of the language. It is hardly fair to suggest that the latter alone will be attracted by his labours.

May I refer to another matter which is essentially as well as superficially cognate to the study of Irish literature. Most of the latter is anonymous, and its study has to proceed largely upon lines laid down by the "higher criticism" of the last sixty years. An excellent opportunity now offers of testing the methods and validity of this method of investigation. The late Mr. William Sharp has left a not inconsiderable body of work to which he signed his own name; he is also stated to have written the works issued under the name of "Fiona Macleod." With the latter I am fairly familiar, with the former slightly so. My knowledge certainly would not warrant any dogmatism on my part. Yet I am bound to say that if six months ago I had been asked my opinion, I should have rejected Mr. Sharp's authorship of the "Fiona Macleod" works on the ground of fundamental dissimilarity of form and style, using these two terms in their widest acceptance. I should not have claimed for my opinion that it was the result of special critical research, but simply of that instinct which is generally acquired by the practice of critical study generally. One gets to "feel" whether a thing is possible or not, though it by no means follows that this feeling is invariably justified by subsequent investigation.

I should like to see an exhaustive examination of both bodies of work undertaken by some one thoroughly familiar with the methods of modern philological criticism and thoroughly competent to apply them. The result could not fail to throw light upon a method of investigation which is being freely applied to archaic, classical, and mediæval literature and used to sustain the very far-reaching consequences.

ALFRED NUTT.

BERNARD SHAW—PLAGIARIST

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some few days ago a sister of mine went with some friends to the Court Theatre to see Mr. Bernard Shaw's play, Major Barbara. My sister told me it was "very fine and very clever," but that she and her party "nearly exploded" when one of the characters said, "You call yourself a gentleman," and the other answered, "I never called myself a gentleman!" I was hitherto unaware that this passage occurs in Mr. Shaw's play. I have never seen it; in fact, I have not visited a theatre for years. But I am not a little indignant with Mr. Bernard Shaw for coolly cribbing an excellent joke from another person, and incorporating it into one of his plays, thus leading people to suppose that the jest is his own. Or will Mr. Shaw pretend that this is merely a coincidence, and that he was ignorant of the existence of my recently published volume of letters to the Press, entitled "Truth, Wit, and Wisdom," where, in Letter 303, I relate an instance of the rudeness of a London cabman, who, without the slightest provocation, once bawled out to me, "And you call yourself a gentleman?" upon which I instantly replied, "I never called myself a gentleman!"? Imitation is certainly the sincerest form of flattery, but I am really surprised at Mr. Bernard Shaw, who is considered to be a man of some originality and imagination, but yet does not scruple to pick up his jokes from other sources.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

[We publish this letter in the hope that Mr. Shaw will reply to the serious allegation it contains.—ED.]

"SIX-SHILLING" NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I draw attention to what seems to me to be an unfair method, apparently on the increase with some publishers? That is the issuing of novels at a uniform price of 6s., irrespective of quality or contents. I have before me an example of this in three books just issued:

- (a) Beatrice Harraden, "Scholar's Daughter," ordinary cloth, cut edges, 284 pp., about 6532 lines;
- (b) Maxwell Gray, "The Great Refusal," ordinary cloth, cut edges, 381 pp., about 13,716 lines;
- (c) Eden Phillpotts, "The Portreeve," ordinary cloth, cut edges, 364 pp., about 14,560 lines.

To assume that the first-named writer is equal to either of the others is a proposition that few would affirm—but the publishers practically go much further, as they ask the public to pay the same price for 6000 lines of Miss Harraden's writing as for 14,000 lines of Mr. Eden Phillpotts's.

If books like "The Portreeve" and "The Great Refusal" can be sold at 6s., then 3s. 6d. is the outside charge that should be made for books like the "Scholar's Daughter."

H. J.

SHELLEY AND EASTERN POETS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I have been reading with great interest the discussion going on about Shelley in the ACADEMY. It is true no doubt that perfect phrases which linger in the memory of the reader for ever and ever may not be found abundantly in Shelley's poetry. He was not an artist in the sense in which Shakespeare or Wordsworth or Tennyson were artists. His poetry "was not an art but an inspiration." He never desired to be a phrase-monger or a platitude-polisher like most poets. He was possessed with divine frenzy and his poetry flowed out of him with spontaneous melody. Obedient to the will of the Spirit of Beauty, he sang as no western poet has sung with the unconscious fervour of a bard.

It is not phrase-coining but a sustained continuity of impassioned utterance that makes the true poet. Has any English poet written lines where so many exquisite images half-bursting from their shells are seen together in such suggestive groups?

"My soul is an enchanted boat

Which like a sleeping swan doth float

Upon the silver waves of thy sweet singing."

Has any European poet expressed the thrilling influence of beauty on human soul in such words?

"And in the soul a wild odour is felt."

Shelley lived in an atmosphere of rarefied ecstasy like Hafiz and Jelaludin Rumi, the great Sufi poets of Persia, whose doctrines of love and beauty bore a close resemblance to his own doctrines. It is only in this atmosphere that the highest poetry is born out of the harmonious commingling of soul and senses. It is this life of his in regions of perpetual rapture, the spontaneity of his verse, the fervour of his imagination, the melody of his thoughts, the originality of his symbols that entitle him to be ranked as one of the greatest poets, not of England or of Europe, but of the whole world.

V. B. MEHTA.

Bombay, February 10.

A CONSENSUS OF OPINION

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I again trespass on your space respecting the resumed Wordsworth and Shelley correspondence in present issue? The claim to be a "Student of Literature" is so all-inclusive, that one feels sorry there should be a limitation in your correspondent's studies, excluding Wordsworth. In impartial and exhaustive study, one realises the necessary inclusion of many barren names; but that against Wordsworth should be made the sweeping accusation of the dreary pages of the "Prelude," must be due to the prejudice of non-acquaintance. Innumerable are the lovers of Wordsworth who, like George Eliot, have made him also a sort of inspired text-book, as witness her frequent quotations and one memorable allusion to that "immortal phrase" in the "Prelude":

There is

One great society alone on earth:

The noble living and the noble dead.

Not only Coleridge (as referred to by Mr. Fovargue) but many other acknowledged critics, including Hazlitt and Lamb—who only laughed at Wordsworth because they loved him—attribute the inspiration of genius to his many "unforgettable lines" of which the "Prelude" is as "a sky, sown thick with stars." Hazlitt says of Wordsworth's poetry: "It has to me something of the effect that arises from the turning up of the fresh soil, or of the first welcome breath of spring." Coleridge: "That his [Wordsworth's] soul seems to inhabit the universe like a palace and to discover truth by intuition." The author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden" confesses that she always carries the "Prelude" in her pocket for recreative reading during a holiday, though she admits, with laughing toleration, that some parts of it are stodgy. So, also, are too many parts of the "Ring and the Book," "The Revolt of Islam," and even occasional parts of the "Fairy Queen" and "Paradise Lost." But the fascination of discovering hidden gold in poetic deserts even, is reward enough to any prospecting student, and what an admirable foil are the stodgy parts to those luminous passages throughout the "Prelude," and notably, amongst many notable, those which describe "Childhood and School-time," beginning,

Wisdom and Spirit of the universe!
Thou Soul, that art the Eternity of thought!

The "Ecclesiastical Sonnets" are perhaps as mistaken an elongation as is that persistent reiteration of a sordid police report, called "The Ring and the Book"; but they are, at any rate, coherent and contain some purple patches and many "unforgettable lines," as in "Canute," "Mutability," "Cathedrals," "Ejaculation." I have refrained from a wealth of quotation, because I dare not further trespass.

EASTWOOD KIDSON.

February 24.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Caffin, Charles H. How to study Pictures. 9x6½. Pp. 16, 513. Hodder & Stoughton. 10s. 6d. net.

[By an American critic and lecturer. The system of study is "by means of a series of comparisons of paintings and painters from Cimabue to Monet, with historical and biographical summaries and appreciations of the painters' motives and methods." So far as we have examined it, it seems to be an admirable book for beginners. Mr. Caffin takes fifty-six principal painters of different countries, treats them chronologically and side by side and pays full attention to the historical point of view. There is a full-page illustration of one work by each artist. There is a very full and valuable index.]

Giovanni Bellini. 9½x7. Pp. xxii, 64. Newnes's Art Library, 3s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Everard Meynell contributes a sound and interesting biographical note on the great Venetian religious artist. Then follows a list of the principal of his undoubted works, in chronological order based mainly on the evidence of development of style. Then come sixty-four of the beautiful full-page reproductions in black and white which have all the excellence of selection and execution for which we never look to this admirable series in vain. They include the Peter Martyr in the National Gallery, the Portrait of the Artist in the Uffizi, and the Portrait of a Man in the Naples Museum, three pictures of which the ascription is not absolutely certain. The frontispiece is a fine photogravure of the Madonna with the Sleeping Child in the Venice Academy.]

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

Keene, H. G. Here and There. Memories Indian and other. 9x6. Pp. xiv, 215. Brown, Langham, 10s. 6d. net.

[Mr. Keene, who was educated at John Company's College at Haileybury, gives reminiscences of life then, in London and Oxford in the middle of the last century, and of his life in India before, during and after the Mutiny. The second part of his book deals with life at home as seen after his return.]

Berthe, Austin. Life of St. Alphonsus de Liguori, Bishop and Doctor of the Church, Founder of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer. Edited in English by Harold Castle. Illustrated. In two vols. Each 10½x6½. Pp. xlv, 1685. Dublin: Duffy.

[Father Berthe is himself a Redemptorist. His Life of St. Alphonsus is already well known and highly valued abroad, and we welcome the book in its handsome British dress. Father Castle, also a Redemptorist, has made an excellent translation.]

Henry Sidgwick: a memoir. By Arthur Sidgwick and Eleanor Mildred Sidgwick. 9x5½. Pp. 633. Macmillan, 12s. 6d. net. (See p. 198.)

DRAMA.

Smara Khamara. In the Valley of Stars there is a Tower of Silence. A Persian Tragedy. 7½x5½. Pp. 61. The Green Sheaf. 3s. 6d. net.

[“An attempt to portray, after the Oriental manner, the possible reason for the founding of the great far-reaching doctrine known as Sufism.” The author takes, for the purposes of his tragedy, the view that Sufism was founded by Rabia. He contributes an introduction, giving a clear account of the doctrines of this esoteric Mahomedanism.]

Hewlett, Maurice. Pan and the Young Shepherd; A Pastoral in two Acts. 7x5. Pp. viii, 101. Heinemann. Paper 1s. 6d., cloth 2s. 6d. (See p. 207.)

EDUCATION.

Purser, Frederick. Elementary Geometry based on Euclid's Elements. 6½x4½. Pp. vii, 118. Dublin: Hodges, Figgis.

[Professor Purser's design is not to furnish a new edition of Euclid as such but to present Euclid's subject-matter as a coherent system of geometrical truth in which the student may recognise at once the cogency and the natural sequence of the propositions, and be fitted to frame geometrical demonstrations for himself.]

Atherton, R. P., assisted by Gal-Ladevèze, F. Bell's First French Reader. With illustrations by French artists. 7½x5. Pp. viii, 78. Bell, 1s. [Intermediary between the First and Second Parts of Bell's French Course.]

FICTION.

Pemberton, Max. My Sword for Lafayette. 7½x5½. Pp. xii, 297. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[“Being the story of a great friendship: and of certain episodes in the wars waged for liberty both in France and America, by one who took no mean part therein.” With eight illustrations by W. B. Wollen, R.I.]

Askew, Alice and Claude. Jennifer Pontefract. 7½x5½. Pp. 314. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Dearmer, Mabel. Brownjohn's. 7½x5½. Pp. 312. Smith, Elder, 6s. (See p. 204.)

Sabatini, Rafael. Bardelys the Magnificent. 7½x5½. Pp. 307. Nash, 6s. [“Being an account of the strange wooing pursued by the Sieur Marcel de St. Pol, Marquis of Bardelys, and of the things that in the course of it befell him in Languedoc, in the year of the Rebellion.”]

Pryce, Gwendolen. A Son of Arvon. 7½x5½. Pp. 320. Unwin, 6s.

Herring, Henry A. The Burglars' Club. A Romance in Twelve Chronicles. With sixteen illustrations by F. H. Townsend. 7½x5½. Pp. 280. Cassell, 3s. 6d.

Bradly, G. F. Dick, a story without a plot. 7½x5½. Pp. 191. Smith, Elder. (See p. 203.)

HISTORY.

Ancient Records of Egypt. Historical Documents from the Earliest Times to the Persian Conquest, collected, edited and translated with commentary by James Henry Breasted. Vol. i. The First to the Seventeenth Dynasties. 9½x6½. Pp. xlii, 344. Chicago: the University of Chicago Press. London: Luzac. $3.00 net.

[This is a volume in the University of Chicago's admirable Ancient Records Series, under the general editorship of Professor W. R. Harper. In the volume before us Professor Breasted gives essays on the documentary courses of Egyptian History and on Chronology with a Chronological Table, and then translates, with footnotes, the documents themselves.

Archivio per lo studio delle Tradizioni Popolari, Rivista Trimestrale, diretta da G. Pitrè e S. Salomone-Marino. Vol. xxii. Fasc. iv. 9½x6½. Pp. 130. Turin: Clausen.

MILITARY.

M'Cullagh, Francis. With the Cossacks. 9x6½. Pp. xiv, 392. Nash, 7s. 6d. net.

[Letters reprinted from the New York Herald, describing the experiences of "an Irishman who rode with the Cossacks throughout the Russo-Japanese War."]

MISCELLANEOUS.

Bullen, Frank T. Sea-Spray. 7½x5½. Pp. 313. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s. [Twenty-seven stories, reminiscences and essays, mainly on sea subjects, collected from various journals. Illustrated.]

Ward, Mrs. Humphry. The Play-Time of the Poor. 8x5½. Pp. 28. Smith, Elder, 2d.

[A reprint in pamphlet form of Mrs. Humphry Ward's two letters which appeared in the Times on February 2 and February 5. Together they form an account of the play-centres for children, started at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in Tavistock Place and elsewhere, with the results achieved, the possibilities and the costs of the movement and an appeal to Public Authority to take up the work, a development which Mrs. Ward regards as inevitable if it is to be properly conducted.]

Wagner, Charles. Toward the Heights. An Appeal to young men. 7½x5. Pp. xvii, 262. Unwin. Paper, 1s. net, cloth 2s. net.

[By the author of the famous "Simple Life."]

Penty, Arthur J. The Restoration of the Gild System. 8x6. Pp. x, 103. Sonnenschein, 3s. 6d. net.

[A practical consideration of Ruskin's idea of restoring the Gild System as a solution of modern industrial problems.]

NATURAL HISTORY.

Harwood, W. S. New Creations in Plant Life. 7½x5½. Pp. xiv, 368. Macmillan, 7s. 6d. net.

[An authoritative account of the life and work of Luther Burbank. Illustrated.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

Maine, Sir Henry Sumner. Ancient Law, its connection with the early history of Society and its relation to modern ideas. With introduction and notes by Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. 8½x6. Pp. xxiv, 426. Murray, 5s. net.

[The advance of knowledge of early history since Maine wrote his great classic more than forty years ago has induced Sir Frederick Pollock to republish the original text unaltered, with notes at the end of each chapter showing how subsequent discoveries have confirmed Maine's theories, and where he was at fault. Index to Text, and to Introduction and Notes.]

Henslow's Diary. Edited by Walter W. Greg, M.A. Part i, Text. 10½x8½. Pp. lii, 240. Bullen, 10s. 6d. net.

The New Sketch Book. By W. M. Thackeray. Edited, with an introduction, by Robert S. Garnett. 9x6. Pp. xiv, 324. Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net. (See p. 202.)

THEOLOGY.

Maclaren, Alexander. Expositions of Holy Scripture. The Books of Isaiah and Jeremiah (Isaiah, chaps. xlix to lxxv). Pp. 403. The Gospel according to St. Matthew: chaps. xviii to xxviii. Pp. 379. Each, 9½x6½. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net each.

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

Miltoun, Francis. Rambles in Brittany. With many illustrations by Blanche McManus. 7½x5½. Pp. xiv, 376. Duckworth.

Williams, Leonard. Granada: memories, adventures, studies and impressions. With twenty-four illustrations from photographs and a frontispiece in colour by A. M. Foweraker, R.B.A. 8½x6. Pp. xii, 213. Heinemann, 10s. 6d. net.

The usual SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS SUPPLEMENT will be published with THE ACADEMY of March 10. Publishers who have not yet sent their lists are requested to do so at their earliest convenience. Applications for advertising space should reach the office by Tuesday, March 6.

SOMETHING NEW IN THE WAY OF ATLASES!

THE ATLAS OF THE WORLD'S COMMERCE

EDITED BY

J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.S.E.

1000 MAPS and DIAGRAMS, with Voluminous Text.

The Result of many Years of Labour in One Volume available to every one.

---

*To be issued in 22 parts. The price of each part is only 6d. net. Part I. appears on March 15.
See the First Part.*

PART 2 ON APRIL 12, AND FORTNIGHTLY AFTERWARDS.

---

A FEW WORDS FROM THE EDITOR.

From the merchant's point of view the world may be regarded as a vast Commercial Exchange. For certain commodities we are dependent on certain countries. Every country to some extent imports from every other country, and no country is commercially independent. This is the basis of the Fiscal Question.

The first object of this Atlas is to show where all the commodities of commerce come from—our food, drink, clothing, and all that we use in our daily lives. Perhaps few people realise that the food to supply our simplest meals has come from far distant lands, and that its provision necessitates an elaborate organisation of industry capital, transport, and distribution. All this is shown in the Atlas. It is a key to the merchandise of the world—a summary of its material resources.

The Atlas consists of no less than 176 large pages of coloured plates, containing upwards of 1000 maps and diagrams. The plates are accompanied by descriptive text which is practically a dictionary of the commerce of the world. The maps and text together combine to illustrate the distribution of the various products, the imports and exports of the various countries, also their natural resources—developed and undeveloped—the means of communication and transport, and many other aspects of international commerce.

This is the first Commercial Atlas on a large scale that has been published in this country. Its preparation has occupied several years, and represents much labour and research. It embodies the substance of many hundreds of Blue Books, Trade Returns, and Commercial Reports from all countries of the world. It aims at presenting a graphic statement of the world's commerce of to-day, and, although not designed to illustrate the "Fiscal Question," will bring more light on the solution of the great problem of international trade now before our statesmen.

ASK TO SEE THE DETAILED PROSPECTUS.

---

GEORGE NEWNES, LTD., 3-12, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER

MARCH 1906

- The Flood—and After. By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart.
- The Life of Gladstone. By Lord HUGH CECIL
- Education and the New Government. By the Right Hon. Lord STANLEY OF ALDERLEY
- Evangelicals and the Education Question. By the Lady WIMBORNE
- Randolph Churchill. A Personal Recollection. By WILFRID SCAWEN BLUNT
- The Future of Europe. By the Right Hon. Lord AVEBURY
- The Nation and the Army. By Colonel the Earl of ERROL
- The Expatriation of Capital. By W. H. MALLOCK
- The Dance in Ancient Greece. By MARCELLE AZRA HINCKS
- Earthquakes in Great Britain. By Dr. CHARLES DAVISON
- The Labour Party: A Unionist View. By Sir HENRY SETON KARR, C.M.G.
- The Unemployed and Trades Unions. By DAVID McLAREN MORRISON
- Brixen and Health. By Lady PAGET
- The Holy See and France. By the Rev. ETHELRED TAUNTON
- Football and Polo in China. By HERBERT A. GILES (Professor of Chinese at Cambridge)
- The First Gentleman of Europe as Paterfamilias. By the Hon. Mrs. CONRAD DILLON
- The Government and the Opposition. By HERBERT PAUL, M.P.

LONDON: SPOTTISWOODE & COMPANY, LTD.,
5 NEW STREET SQUARE

NOTICE

If you are interested in books and do not know the BOOK MONTHLY, you are missing a useful friend. It is published at the beginning of each month, 6d. net, and the March number is now ready. Among its contents are interviews with the Japanese Ambassador on Anglo-Japanese literary relations, and with "John Oliver Hobbes" on Literary America, from which she has just returned. Write for a specimen copy of the BOOK MONTHLY to the Publishers, SIMPKIN, MARSHALL & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE

RED DRINK THE
WHITE
DELICIOUS FOR BREAKFAST
AND AFTER DINNER. & BLUE
In making use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

MESSRS. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

NEXT WEEK'S BOOKS.

- A SHORT HISTORY OF ITALY (476-1900). By HENRY DWIGHT SEDGWICK. With Map. Demy 8vo. 8s. 6d. net.
- CITIES OF PAUL: Beacons of the past rekindled by the Present. By WILLIAM BURNET WRIGHT, Author of "Ancient Cities from the Dawn to the Daylight." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
- THE RELIGION OF ALL GOOD MEN, and other Studies in Christian Ethics. By H. W. GARROD, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Extra crown 8vo. 5s. net.
- ON LEPROSY AND FISH EATING. By JONATHAN HUTCHINSON, F.R.S. With Maps and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- BOSWELL'S LIFE OF JOHNSON. Edited by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C., M.P. New Popular Edition. With Frontispiece to each volume. Bound in cloth with paper label. Price 6s. net the set.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

- THE SHADOW OF LIFE. By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK, Author of "The Paths of Judgment," etc.
- THE WHEEL OF LIFE. By ELLEN GLASGOW, Author of "The Deliverance," etc.
- CURAYL. By UNA L. SILBERRAD, Author of "The Success of Mark Wyngate," "The Wedding of the Lady of Lovell," etc.

Messrs. ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co. beg to announce that by arrangement with Messrs. HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & Co. they now publish the following Series:

- AMERICAN MEN OF LETTERS. 11 vols. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net each.
- AMERICAN STATESMEN. 22 vols. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net each.
- AMERICAN COMMONWEALTHS. 12 vols. crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net each.
- WORKS OF THOREAU. Cambridge Edition. 11 vols. extra crown 8vo. 6s. each.
- WORKS OF EMERSON. Riverside Edition. 12 vols. extra crown 8vo. 6s. net each.

Write for List of Titles, Authors, etc.

SOME RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

- JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL: a Biography. By FERRIS GREENSLET. Illustrated. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
- SHAKESPEARE'S LONDON. By HENRY THEW STEPHENSON. With Maps, Plans, and Illustrations of the well-known topographical landmarks of Shakespeare's Day. Crown 8vo. 6s. net.
- IN OUR CONVENT DAYS. By AGNES REPLIER, Author of "Compromises," "Points of View," etc. Fcap. 8vo. 5s. net.
- THE EUAHLAYI TRIBE: a Study of Aboriginal Life in Australia. By K. LANGLOH PARKER. With an Introduction by ANDREW LANG. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
- SCARABS: an introduction to the Study of Egyptian Seals and Signet Rings, by PERCY E. NEWBERRY. With Forty-four Plates and numerous Illustrations in the text. Royal 8vo. 18s. net.

The above form a selection from the Books published by ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co., Ltd., of 16 James Street, Haymarket, S.W. Complete Catalogue, New List, and Prospectus of each book will be sent post free on application.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

Incorporated]

[A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.

West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fuller Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS' ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE WESTERN MORNING NEWS

Is the most widely circulating paper in the four Western Counties.

LONDON PRIVATE WIRE OFFICE: 49 FLEET STREET, E.C.

Telegraphic Address: "PLYMOUTHISM, LONDON.

Telephone No.: 165 HOLBORN.

THE DUNDEE COURIER

Has double the circulation of any Morning Paper North of the Forth.

Literary Notes on Monday. Reviews on Wednesdays.

London Office, 109 Fleet Street, E.C.

SPECIAL PUBLISHERS' PAGE EVERY FRIDAY.

The University and the Nation

The "Saturday Westminster Gazette" is now publishing this series of articles. They discuss briefly the resources at the disposal of Oxford, the use which is made at present of college emoluments, and the possibility of rendering the humane education of our older Universities, their distinctive and inestimable gift, more easily accessible to the increasing number of men in all classes who are fitted alike by previous training and future responsibilities to pursue University studies.

1. THE CASE FOR INQUIRY.
2. THE RESOURCES OF OXFORD.
3. THE UNIVERSITY AND THE COLLEGES
4. THE SCHOLARSHIP SYSTEM.
5. THE ENTRANCE EXAMINATION.
6. THE LIMITATIONS OF THE COLLEGE SYSTEM.
7. PRIZE FELLOWSHIPS AND RESEARCH.
8. WHAT A NEW COMMISSION MIGHT DO.

Nos. 6 and 7 appear in the current number.

THE SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

March 3 One Penny

OFFICES: TUDOR STREET, LONDON, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1766

MARCH 10, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF WALES, ABERYSTWYTH
(A Constituent College of the University of Wales).

PROFESSORSHIP OF ENGLISH.

The Council invite Applications for the post of Professor of English at the above College, at a Salary of £300 a year.

Applications, together with 75 printed copies of Testimonials, must reach the Registrar not later than Tuesday, March 13, 1906.

Full particulars may be obtained from the undersigned.

J. H. DAVIES, M.A.,
Registrar.

OAKHAM SCHOOL (Rutland).

A small well-endowed Public School with numerous Exhibitions to the Universities.

The alterations and additions, which are now complete, make the buildings exceptionally good.

SCHOLARSHIP EXAMINATION IN MARCH.

For particulars apply to the Headmaster.

EDUCATION IN ENGLAND AND ABROAD. SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

ST. PAUL'S SCHOOL, WEST KENSINGTON.

AN EXAMINATION will be held at the above School on Tuesday, April 3, 1906, and on the following days for filling up about seven vacancies on the Foundation.

Full particulars can be obtained on application to the Bursar.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

FORTHCOMING EXAMINATION.

ASSISTANT EXAMINERS IN THE PATENT OFFICE, (20-25) April 5. The date specified is the latest at which applications can be received. They must be made on forms to be obtained, with particulars, from the Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Burlington Gardens London, W.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

PRINCIPAL OF HIGH-CLASS SCHOOL for Gentlemen's Daughters will receive immediately, or after Easter, TWO PUPILS of good birth at half fees.—A. B., ACADEMY Office, Tavistock Street, W.C.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.
MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS,
All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London,

J. POOLE & CO. Established 1854.
104 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific
BOOKSELLERS, New and Secondhand,
All inquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered. BOOKS BOUGHT.

FIRST Editions of Modern Authors, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, etc. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27 New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from

FREDK. HOLLYER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY (Limited).

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST., LONDON.

Stocktaking Sale

Messrs. MUDIE are offering for Sale until March 17 a LARGE STOCK of SECOND-HAND LIBRARY BOOKS, and MISCELLANEOUS STANDARD WORKS in VARIOUS BINDINGS, CLOTH and LEATHER, at SPECIAL REDUCTIONS. List on Application.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS and ENGRAVERS, 5a, Pall-mall East, S.W.

24th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN DAILY, 10 to 6. Admission 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water-colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss FOOT, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

GOOD TYPEWRITING (First Class Cert. Soc. Arts). Typist of "Queen Mary of Modena," etc. etc., can just now type one or two books very quickly. Short articles by return. French. German.—Miss DE LA COUR, 16 Chalfont Road, South Norwood, S.E.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1000 words. Specimens and references.—Address, Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING. AUTHORS' MSS., 10d. 1000 all descriptions: neat, prompt, accurate; duplicating a specialty. Shorthand, translations. References. MICHEL, 23, Quarrendon Street, Fulham, S. W.

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING. Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

AN OPENING OCCURS FOR IN LIGENT YOUTH to train to fill an important position in London editor's office. Ex future, premium £150.—Address, Box 840, J 5 Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' NEW BOOKS

ENIGMAS OF PSYCHICAL RESEARCH. By JAMES H. HYSLOP, Ph.D., LL.D., former Professor of Logic and Ethics at Columbia University, Vice-President of the Society for Psychical Research; Author of "Science and A Future Life," "Problems of Philosophy," etc. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

REMINISCENCES OF BISHOPS AND ARCHBISHOPS. By the Right Rev. HENRY CODMAN POTTER, Bishop of New York. With 14 Portraits. Crown 8vo, cloth extra.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES, REVELATIONS, THE GOSPEL OF JOHN, THE THREE EPISTLES OF JOHN. By HENRY P. FORBES, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth 7s. 6d.

THE RELIGION OF CHRIST IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

A particular feature of this book is a fair-minded examination of three representative Christian denominations, the Roman Catholic, the Anglican and the Unitarian.

MONTAIGNE. Including his best Essays in full from the version of Florio, 1603. One vol., 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. (French Classics for English Readers.)

MOLIERE. Two volumes. With an Introduction by BRANDER MATTHEWS. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt tops, 15s. net. (French Classics for English Readers.)

GEORGE WASHINGTON. Patriot, Soldier, Statesman: First President of the United States. By Professor JAMES A. HARRISON. Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. (No. 41 in "The Heroes of the Nation Series.")

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA. Life in the Open. Sport with Rod, Gun, Horse, and Hound. By CHARLES FREDERICK HOLDER, Author of "Life of Charles Darwin." Fully illustrated, 8vo, cloth extra.

POETRY AND THE INDIVIDUAL. An Analysis of the Imaginative Life in Relation to the Creative Spirit in Man and Nature. By HARTLY BURR ALEXANDER, Ph.D., Columbia University. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE LIFE OF GOETHE. By ALBERT BIELSCHOWSKY. Authorised Translation from the German. By WILLIAM A. COOPER, Assistant Professor of German in the Leland Stanford, Junior, University. Illustrated. 3 vols. Large 8vo, cloth, gilt tops, 15s. net per volume.

[Vol. I. ready, Vol. II. shortly.]
"This first volume of Bielschowsky's 'Life of Goethe' will whet the appetite for the two that are to follow."—LITERARY WORLD.
"Bielschowsky's 'Life of Goethe' admittedly stands in the first rank of existing biographies of the poet."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

PHYSICAL EFFICIENCY. A Review of the Deleterious Effects of Town Life upon the Population of Britain, with suggestions for their Arrest. By JAMES CANTLIE, M.A., M.B., D.Ph. With Preface by Sir LAUDER BRUNTON, M.D., D.Sc., LL.D., F.R.S., and a Foreword by Sir JAMES CRICHTON-BROWNE, M.D., LL.D., F.R.S. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"A most original and suggestive book, which should be read by all who regard their own health as belonging to the community."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

LOUIS XIV. AND LA GRANDE MADemoiselle. By ARVEDE BARINE. Authorised English version. Illustrated, 8vo, cloth extra, in box, 12s. 6d. (Uniform with "The Youth of La Grande Mademoiselle.")
"It is entertaining in the vivid picture it gives of the times."

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.
"The work shows literary qualities of a high order, and a clearness of judgment and orderly marshalling of facts which cannot be too freely praised."

SHEFFIELD DAILY TELEGRAPH.
A SWORD OF THE OLD FRONTIER. The Adventures of a French Officer in the Pontiac Conspiracy. By RANDALL PARRISH. First edition (English and American) 25,000 copies. Second Edition in the Press. With Four Coloured Illustrations by F. C. YOUNG. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

"A stirring tale."—BELFAST NORTHERN WHIG.
"Mr. Parrish writes with colour and spirit, and his ingenuity in devising new variations in adventure is admirable."—ATHENÆUM.

THE NOVELS OF HENRY JAMES. A Study. By ELIZABETH LUCY CARY, Author of "The Rossettis," etc. With a Bibliography by FREDERICK A. KING, and Photogravure Frontispiece. Crown 8vo, half-cloth extra, gilt top, 5s.

"To those who have read with appreciation and understanding a considerable proportion of the works of Henry James, Miss Cary's book will be a treasured possession."—BELFAST NORTHERN WHIG.

"The value and attractiveness of the book are advanced by a photogravure of Mr. James, and a bibliography of his writings which has been compiled by Frederick A. King."—DUNDEE ADVERTISER.

Spring List Now Ready.

42 BEDFORD STREET STRAND, LONDON; & NEW YORK.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS

The Heart of a Garden.

By ROSAMUND MARRIOTT WATSON. Royal 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. Numerous Plates.
"For garden lovers. . . unquestionably a thing of beauty."—MANCHESTER COURIER.
"A gem of literature . . . a joy for ever."—DAILY MAIL.
"The really exquisite cycle of garden word-pictures."—THE WORLD.
"Her observation is honest and personal."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.
"One of the prettiest books we have seen for many a day. The writer loves the birds as few do."—ATHENÆUM.

The Heart of a Garden.

Now Ready. Profusely illustrated, demy 8vo, gilt top, 10s. 6d. net.

A Manual of Costume, as Illustrated by Monumental Brasses. By HERBERT DRUITT. Indispensable Handbook for all interested in Brasses and Costume and Mediæval Archaeology.

GERMAN FOR SCIENCE STUDENTS.

With Diagrams Illustrating Scientific Instruments, etc. Square 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. 1

A First German Course for Science Students.

By Prof. H. G. FIEDLER and F. E. SANDBACH (of Birmingham University). [Next week.]

DE LA MORE PRESS QUARTOS. New Volume.

The Beggar's Opera.

By JOHN GAY. Edited by HAMILTON MCLEOD. Handmade Paper, Limited Issue 7s. 6d. net; Japanese Vellum (50 Copies), 21s. [Next week.]

LIBRARY OF LITURGOLOGY AND ECCLESIOLOGY. New Volume, 7s. 6d. net.

Ecclesiological Essays.

By J. WICKHAM LEGG, F.S.A. With many illustrations. Prospectus of the Library on application.

Notes on Shipbuilding and Nautical Terms of Old in the North. By EIRIKR MAGNUSSON. Demy 8vo, 1s.

New Edition. Revised and Enlarged.

Ships and Shipping.

By COMMANDER DOWLING, R.N.R. Preface by Lieut. RAMSAY-FAIRFAX, R.N. With Six Coloured Plates and many illustrations, and Map, small square 8vo, 3s. net.
"One of the most complete little manuals of the sea and the sea services we have seen."—LLOYD'S NEWS.

A complete List of the DE LA MORE publications, including THE KING'S CLASSICS, on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, Limited, London,

32 George Street, Hanover Square, W.

IF YOU WANT A WEEKLY PAPER WHICH NEVER FAILS TO PLEASE AND SATISFY, ORDER FROM YOUR NEWSAGENT THE

Saturday Westminster.

(Issued by the "Westminster Gazette.")

IT COSTS BUT A PENNY, YET IS THE LARGEST AND BEST ALL-ROUND MAGAZINE-REVIEW PUBLISHED.

SEND A POSTCARD REQUEST FOR SPECIMEN COPY.

THE YEARLY POSTAL SUBSCRIPTION IS 6s. 6d. INLAND, AND 8s. 8d. ABROAD. SHORTER PERIODS PRO RATA.

THE "SATURDAY WESTMINSTER," TUDOR ST., LONDON, E.C.

Mr. Edward Arnold's New Books

NEW 6s. NOVELS

THE LADY OF THE WELL

By ELEANOR ALEXANDER, Author of "The Rambling Rector," etc,

THE HOUSE OF SHADOWS

By REGINALD J. FARRER, Author of "The Garden of Asia." SCOTSMAN.—"An able and impressive story."

HYACINTH

By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM, Author of "The Seething Pot." SPECTATOR.—"This engrossing and admirably written novel."

FOLLY

By EDITH RICKERT, Author of "The Reaper." STANDARD.—"A novel of distinguished cleverness."

A BOOK ABOUT CHILDREN FOR GROWN-UPS CONCERNING PAUL AND FIAMMETTA

By L. ALLEN HARKER, Author of "The Intervention of the Duke," etc. Crown 8vo, 5s.

THE AENEID OF VIRGIL

With a Translation by CHARLES J. BILLSON, M.A., Corpus Christi College, Oxford. 2 vols. crown 4to, 30s. net.

SOME DOGMAS OF RELIGION

By JOHN ELLIS McTAGGART, Litt.D., Lecturer in Moral Sciences, Trinity College, Cambridge. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE ROMANCE OF EMPIRE

By PHILIP GIBBS, Author of "Knowledge is Power," etc. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LONDON: EDWARD ARNOLD, 41 & 43 MADDOX STREET, W.

The "LIBRARY EDITION" of RUSKIN

Edited, with Additions from the Original Manuscripts,
By E. T. COOK and ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

This, the ONLY Complete Edition,
Consists of about 80 different Works in 37 Volumes, illustrated with 1400 PLATES and WOODCUTS in addition to over 100 other DRAWINGS by Mr. RUSKIN NOT HITHERTO REPRODUCED.

Issued in chronological order at intervals of about one volume per month.
LIMITED ISSUE. Sold only in Sets.

Large Medium 8vo (9½ by 6½); Holliston Cloth, uncut edges.

Each Volume is prefaced with a Biographical Account of the several Works, containing Selections from the AUTHOR'S DIARIES and CORRESPONDENCE.

Volume XXII. just out.

LECTURES ON LANDSCAPE, THE EAGLE'S NEST, ARIADNE FLORENTINA & MICHAEL ANGELO AND TINTORET.

With Notes for other Oxford Lectures.

584 pages, with 4 Woodcuts, 41 Plates (2 in colour), and 3 Facsimiles of MSS.

METHODS OF PAYMENT FOR THE EDITION.

No. 1.—£42 with Order, for the whole Set, whatever the number of volumes (not less than 36).

No. 2.—£15 with order, and two further annual payments of £15 each, and the balance (if any) to make up cost at 25s. per Volume in the fourth year.

No. 3.—Payment with Order of £27 10s. for Twenty-two Volumes, and 25s. as each succeeding Volume is published.

No. 4.—Payment of 25s. per month for one Volume to be sent each month.

Pocket Edition of Ruskin.

FORS CLAVIGERA

Letters to the Workmen and Labourers of Great Britain. With Illustrations.

Foolscap 8vo. Cloth 3s. net; leather 4s. net per volume.

Vols. I. and II. Letters I. to XLVIII.

Vol. III. Letters XLIX. to LXXII.

Vol. IV. Letters LXXIII. to XCVI.

[Now ready.

[April 6.

[May 9.

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN, 156 CHARING CROSS ROAD.;

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

CAMBRIDGE ENGLISH CLASSICS. A Series of Re- productions of Original Texts of Classical English Writers

This series is intended for the reader and lover of English literature as well as for purposes of reference and the use of scholars. The texts are carefully chosen and faithfully reprinted, neither spelling nor punctuation being altered. An appendix to each volume gives a record of all variations, from the text printed, occurring in other author's editions published during the author's lifetime or in later authoritative texts. The type used is large and clear, and the books (which are large crown octavo—7½ by 5½ inches—in size) are well bound in art linen, with cut edges, the top gilt.

Recent volumes:

BEAUMONT AND FLETCHER. Complete Plays and Poems. Edited by Arnold Glover, M.A., & A. R. Waller, M.A.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net
each vol.

To subscribers,
4s. net

The text of this edition of Beaumont and Fletcher, reprinted from the folio of 1679 with a record of all earlier variant readings, will be completed in ten volumes. It is intended to follow the ten volumes of text with an eleventh containing explanatory notes, a glossary, and other material of use both to the student and the general reader.

Subscribers for complete sets of the edition are entitled to purchase copies at the reduced rate of 4s. net per volume. ||

Vol. I. Containing the Made Tragedy, Philaster, A King and no King, The Scurful Lady, and The Custom of the Country

"Une œuvre solide et qui rendra les plus grands services."

REVUE GERMANIQUE
"Pre-eminently, then, this new edition . . . is an edition for scholars."—ATHENÆUM

"In the full sense, then, the edition is critical and adequate."

NOTES AND QUERIES
"An ideal 'Beaumont and Fletcher.'"—SCOTSMAN

Vol. II. Containing the Elder Brother, The Spanish Curate, Wit without Money, Beggars Bush, The Humourous Lieutenant, and The Faithful Shepherdess

Now ready. Vols. III. and IV. are in the press, and will follow shortly.

GEORGE CRABBE: POEMS. Edited by A. W. Ward, Litt.D., Master of Peterhouse. Volume I.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net
each vol.

This edition, which includes a number of poems not hitherto identified or till now unpublished, will be completed in three volumes. Vol. II. is in the press, and will shortly be ready.

"Here, at last, then, is the edition of Crabbe."—ACADEMY

"The most complete and reliable text of Crabbe."—SCOTSMAN

ABRAHAM COWLEY: POEMS. Edited by A. R. Waller, M.A.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net

A companion volume, "Essays and Plays," is in the press. The two volumes together contain the whole of Cowley's English writings.

"An edition to gladden the heart of the scholar."

NOTES AND QUERIES
"Admirable in all respects—in type, form, and price."

DAILY MAIL

MATTHEW PRIOR: POEMS ON SEVERAL OCCASIONS. Edited by A. R. Waller, M.A.

Crown 8vo,
4s. 6d. net

This volume contains all the poems included by Prior in his collected and revised folio edition of 1718. The remainder of his works, both prose and verse, including the hitherto unpublished "Prose Dialogues" from the Longleat MSS., are contained in a companion volume now in the press.

"As for Mr. Waller's edition, that cannot be too highly praised."

ACADEMY
"Quite a model of what such an edition should be."

SPECTATOR

LONDON: CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE 6, F. CLAY
FETTER LANE MANAGER

MR. MURRAY'S LIST.

THE THREE DORSET CAPTAINS AT TRAFALGAR. THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF THOMAS MASTERMAN HARDY.

With some account of his comrades Charles Bullen and Henry Digby. By A. M. BROADLEY and R. G. BARTELOT, M.A. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"... They have given us a work which is not only one of exceptional interest, but is of permanent value."—MORNING POST.

"... Full of interest as a fresh contribution to our knowledge of stirring times, and especially for its full life-story of an engaging personality, a hero of whom the country no less than Dorsetshire may well be proud."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF GIOVANNI ANTONIO BAZZI.

1477-1549 (hitherto usually styled "Sodoma"). R. H. HOBART CUST. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 2rs. net.

PEASANT LIFE IN THE HOLY LAND

By the Rev. C. T. WILSON, M.A. (Oxon), F.R.G.S., Vicar of Totland Bay, Isle of Wight. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

THE ELEVEN EAGLETS OF THE WEST

By PAUL FOUNTAIN, Author of "The Great North-West," "The Great Deserts and Forests of North America," "The Great Mountains and Forests of South America," etc. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

WESTERN CULTURE IN EASTERN LANDS

A comparison of the methods adopted by England and Russia in the Middle East. By ARMINIUS VAMBERY, C.V.O., Author of "Travels in Central Asia," "History of Bokhara," etc. Medium 8vo, 12s. net.

[Ready next week.]

MAST AND SAIL IN EUROPE & ASIA

By H. WARINGTON SMYTH, Secretary, Mines Department, Transvaal; Author of "Five Years in Siam." With numerous Illustrations and Diagrams by the Author and others. Medium 8vo, 21s. net.

"Mr. Warington Smyth has given us in this exhaustive work a compendium of great historical and intrinsic value... a volume at once handy, instructive, and exhaustive... To the student it is invaluable, and to the reader a mine of interest and instruction."—THE YACHTSMAN

OUR WATERWAYS

A History of Inland Navigation considered as a Branch of Water Conservancy. By URQUHART A. FORBES, of Lincoln's Inn, Barrister-at-Law, and W. H. R. ASHFORD. With a Map especially prepared to illustrate the book. Demy 8vo, 12s. net.

[Ready next week.]

CHEAP EDITION OF CHARLES DARWIN'S WORKS.

MOVEMENTS AND HABITS OF CLIMBING PLANTS

With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

A NEW NOVEL BY MR. BASIL LUBBOCK. JACK DERRINGER

A Tale of Deep Water. By BASIL LUBBOCK, Author of "Round the Horn Before the Mast." Large crown 8vo, 6s.

THE WATANEE

By ARTHUR EGGAR. With Frontispiece, 6s.

This is a remarkable book; a novel, the scene of which is laid in British Burma, and the incidents of which are based on actual facts. The weird superstitions of the Burmese form admirable material for a story of this kind.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

JARROLD & SONS' NEW BOOKS

JUST ISSUED. LIMITED EDITION OF 500 COPIES ONLY THE NORWICH SCHOOL OF PAINTING

BY WILLIAM FREDERICK DICKES

Being an Account of the Norwich Exhibitions, with the Lives of the Painters, Lists of their respective Exhibits, and accurate Descriptions of their Pictures.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED IN THE TEXT AND WITH TWENTY FULL-PAGE PHOTOGRAVURES
Size, royal quarto.

The Special Edition is Limited to 100 Copies, and is handsomely bound, having 20 Photogravures printed on India paper, including Duplicate Set of Photogravures for framing, £6 6s. net.

The Cheaper Edition is Limited to 400 Copies, including 20 Photogravures on ordinary paper, £2 2s. net.

Each Copy of the Editions is Numbered.
"This carefully compiled and well-illustrated production will be for a long while—I may predict confidently—the standard work of reference as to facts about the Norwich School. Facts innumerable, facts interesting and enlightening, are in Mr. Dickes' book."—Standard.

JUST PUBLISHED

BY AUTHORITY OF THE CORPORATION OF NORWICH
In Two Volumes

THE RECORDS OF THE CITY OF NORWICH

Volume I. Now Ready, 25s. net, postage 6d.

Compiled and Edited by the REV. WILLIAM HUDSON, M.A., F.S.A.,

Editorial Secretary of the Norfolk and Norwich Archaeological Society, Author of "Local Jurisdiction in the City of Norwich," "How the City of Norwich Grew into Shape," etc.

AND

JOHN GOTTINGHAM TINEY, M.A., F.S.A.,

Author of "Norfolk County Enrolments," etc.

The Edition is limited to 500 Copies, of which 100 Copies are reserved for the future use of the Norwich Corporation.

The Norwich Muniment Room is, perhaps, richer than that of any other city in the kingdom in its records dating back to the twelfth century. These, under the guidance of the two mentioned antiquarian experts, have been arranged and put into order.

BY CARMEN SYLVA—QUEEN OF ROUMANIA

SUFFERING'S JOURNEY ON THE EARTH

Translated from "Leidens Erdengang," by MARGARET A. NASIR. With Photogravure of Autographed Portrait of Carmen Sylva.

Bound in calf gilt, 3s. 6d. net. Presentation Editions, richly bound, purple German calf, 7s. 6d. net; crimson Russia, 10s. 6d. net.

"The whole is a beautiful allegory told in the fine language of a true poet, showing how suffering has acted as an intellectual stimulant, and the Queen-poet is herself a case in point. Full of beauty is this work of hers."—Queen.

LONDON: JARROLD & SONS, 10 and 11 Warwick Lane, E.C.

JUST PUBLISHED.

Crown 8vo, 6/-

THE SECRET OF THE SPHINX

BY

JAMES SMITH & JOHN WREN SUTTON.

Extract from THE PROLOGUE:

"I am he who will be spoken of, hereafter, as Archon the Scribe. I have lived many lives and have borne many names, both upon earth and upon other planets. The events I shall describe are my own experiences, which I am permitted to recall and record. This book, therefore, will be a chronicle, and not a work of fiction."

This powerful and remarkable romance gives an unequalled picture of the ancient land of the Pharaohs, its temples, rites, system of government, and the condition of life under the most illustrious of its rulers. The book is the more remarkable in that it purports to be a true relation of incidents which occurred many centuries ago, and are here recorded mediumistically by those whose names appear on the title-page.

OF ALL LIBRARIES AND BOOKSELLERS

or from the Publisher,

PHILIP WELLBY, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

MR. FISHER UNWIN'S SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT LIST

GIVES FULL PARTICULARS OF THE FOLLOWING
AND MANY OTHER INTERESTING NEW BOOKS

A Literary History of the English People

Vol. II. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. I. By J. J. JUSSERAND. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The "Pope" of Holland House

By Lady SEYMOUR. With a Biographical Introduction and Supplementary Chapter by W. P. COURTNEY. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sir Henry Irving

A Biography. By PERCY FITZGERALD. Author of "Life of David Garrick," "Life of Sterne," etc. With a Photogravure Frontispiece and 35 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Naefel: His Life and Work

By WILHELM BOLSCHÉ. With an Introduction and a Supplementary Chapter by the Translator, JOSEPH MCCABE. With a Coloured Frontispiece and 12 other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Society in the Country House

Anecdotal Records of Six Centuries. By T. H. S. ESCOTT, Author of "King Edward and his Court," etc. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 16s.

The First Annexation of the Transvaal

By W. J. LEYDS, LL.D., formerly State Secretary of the South African Republic. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

Links in my Life on Land and Sea

By Captain J. W. GAMBIER, R.N. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 21s.

The History of Co-operation

By G. J. HOLYOAKE, Author of "Bygone Worth Remembering," etc. Illustrated. Two volumes. Demy 8vo, 21s.

Recreations of a Naturalist

By J. E. HARTING, Author of "Handbook of British Birds," "Extinct British Animals," "Rambles in Search of Shells," etc. With numerous Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Sport and Travel

Abyssinia and British East Africa. By Lord HINDLIFF, F.R.G.S., F.Z.S. With Maps and more than 70 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 21s. net.

From Pump Court to Delhi

By S. PARNELL KERR. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s.

With Fire and Sword in the Caucasus

By LUIGI VILLARI, Author of "Russia under the Great Shadow," "Italian Life in Town and Country," etc. etc. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

On Arts and Artists

By MAX NORDAU. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

Disestablishment in France

By PAUL SABATIER, Author of "The Life of St. Francis of Assisi." Translated by ROBERT DELL. With portraits of the Author and the Abbé Loisy. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Best Plays of George Farquhar

Edited, and with an Introduction by WILLIAM ARCHER. On thin paper. With Frontispiece. Small crown 8vo. Leather, 3s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON

CONTENTS

	Page		Page
The Literary Week	219	Literary Causerie:
Literature:		The Development of Chaucer's
Nero in Drama . . . . .	221	Genius . . . . .	225
Mr. R. H. Hutton's Literary		Fiction . . . . .	227
Criticism . . . . .	222	Fine Art:
Gypsy and Gentle Idylls . . . . .	223	The International Society at
The Fate of the Manor Rolls . . . . .	224	the New Gallery . . . . .	228
The Tiny Cosmetic . . . . .	224	Round the Galleries . . . . .	229
The Last Message . . . . .	225	Forthcoming Books . . . . .	230
		Correspondence . . . . .	230
		Books Received . . . . .	231

This Number contains a Supplement.

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Subscriptions: Inland 15s., Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

THE LITERARY WEEK

OUR census of Oxford and Cambridge poets may suggest a similar census of Oxford and Cambridge novelists. A few of the poets re-appear in the fiction lists, but that cannot be helped. Here are our parallel columns:

OXFORD:

Samuel Johnson
Thomas Day
"Monk" Lewis
Theodore Hook
J. G. Lockhart
Charles Reade
T. A. Trollope
Henry Kingsley
Thomas Hughes
Walter Pater
R. D. Blackmore
G. A. Lawrence ("Guy
Livingstone")
C. L. Dodgson ("Lewis Carroll")
Andrew Lang
W. H. Mallock
Anthony Hope
A. E. W. Mason
Sir Herbert Maxwell
A. T. Quiller-Couch
Stanley Weyman
Stephen Gwynn
Francis Gribble
E. H. Cooper

CAMBRIDGE:

Laurence Sterne
Horace Walpole
Lord Lytton
W. M. Thackeray
Charles Kingsley
Samuel Butler
Sir Walter Besant
James Rice
F. W. Farrar
S. Baring-Gould
James Payn
E. F. Benson
R. C. Lehmann
Egerton Castle
Barry Pain
E. H. Lacom Watson
Robert Machray
Cutcliffe Hyne

The score is Oxford 23: Cambridge 18. In the fiction Tripos, as in the Poetical Tripos, Oxford has the numerical superiority. The names worthy to be placed in the first class are, we should say, those of Sterne, Thackeray, Reade, and Blackmore, perhaps in the order given, so that Cambridge takes the first and second and Oxford the third and fourth places. Our readers may classify the other names for themselves. We shall not be so invidious as to do so, as too many of them are the names of our contemporaries. It is to be noted, however, that other Universities have also brought forth novelists. The Edinburgh and Dublin lists may be set side by side:

EDINBURGH:

Henry Mackenzie
R. L. Stevenson
J. M. Barrie
Conan Doyle

DUBLIN:

Jonathan Swift
Oliver Goldsmith
Charles Robert Maturin
Charles Lever
Sheridan Le Fanu

The Dublin list is the longer and stronger of the two. Swift and Goldsmith must certainly be awarded firsts. It is doubtful whether, south of the Tweed, the same distinction will be felt to be due to any of the Scotsmen enumerated. On the Glasgow list there are three names: those of Dr. John Moore, Michael Scott (author of "Tom Cringle's Log"), and "Benjamin Swift." Aberdeen can boast of George MacDonald, and Durham of Edward Bradley ("Cuthbert Bede"). Some of the Oxford and Cambridge men also have their names on the books of some Scottish University, but that fact has been ignored in the compilation of the lists on the ground that the greater contains the less.

A list of non-University novelists would probably be more distinguished than all the other lists put together. It would, at any rate, include Fielding, Richardson, Smollett, Scott, Dickens, Disraeli, Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy, and Mr. Kipling, as well as Mesdames Jane Austen, George Eliot and Charlotte Brontë; and the question naturally arises whether irregular methods of education are not, for novelists, the best. The University man certainly has a good deal to live down before he is likely to be very successful, for broad humanity is not a characteristic of the academic point of view. As a consequence it is the non-University novelist who makes his mark in early youth. Dickens, Disraeli, and Mr. Zangwill are examples. But the University novelist, though he arrives later, often comes to stay; and his work generally has good qualities of its own for which his University training is to be thanked.

This point is usually made by a comparison of Dickens and Thackeray; the University man here has admittedly more sense of style, more distinction, and more restraint. A more instructive comparison might, however, be that between Dickens and Besant. There never were two writers who, fundamentally, had more in common. They both inclined to humour and pathos of the broader and more obvious sort; they both delighted in writing with a philanthropic purpose; they both had a keen eye for the observation of external oddities. It may almost be said that Besant modelled himself on Dickens and learnt characterisation from him. But, the University having intervened, he observes different things, and observes them from a different standpoint; and the fact that his natural genius was less does not affect the argument. The reproach is constantly levelled at Dickens that he could not draw a gentleman or a lady. At any rate he seems to regard them as purely comic characters, and generally gives them comic names—Sir Mulberry Hawk, for instance. Even when their hearts are in the right place, they are eccentric—we are thinking of the brothers Cheeryble. They are either observed from a distance, or else they are invented. But where Dickens invented Besant knew. His gentlemen are the sort of gentlemen whom one meets. They are educated gentlemen. Even when they have their little eccentricities, they are gentlemen first and eccentric afterwards, as is the case with Humphrey and Cornelius Jaxenal.

From Besant one always gets the impression, not indeed that one is moving in a fashionable world, but that, whatever the world may be through which one is conducted, one's guide is an educated man. Besant knew Latin and Greek and French—to say nothing of mathematics. He had read widely, and he had travelled. He does not by any means thrust his knowledge down his reader's throat; but it colours his point of view, and gives him a much wider outlook than Dickens ever had. Allowance must be made, of course, as we have said, for the fact that Dickens was the man of greater genius; but when that allowance has been made, this may reasonably be said: To read Besant is to see what Cambridge might have done for Dickens; to read Dickens is to see what would have been Besant's additional limitations if he had been brought up in a blacking factory instead of being sent to the University.

What is a Gallantee-Show? was a question we heard asked on all sides when the International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers issued invitations (now unfortunately withdrawn) for the entertainment of that name to be given last Wednesday. There are a great many people in the world not old enough to remember the men who used to go about the streets in pairs with a lantern, pipes and a drum. Invited into the hall or nursery, they had a white sheet stretched, and showed from behind, by shadows, a story, which went as follows: Scene i. The baker has a dispute with the constable over his scales, which are false: the constable tries to arrest the baker. Scene ii. The Devil comes and runs off with a loaf out of the baker's basket; the baker catches him by the tail. Then comes "Pull Devil, Pull Baker!" a proverb many people use without knowing its origin. Scene iii. The devil puts the baker on his back and walks off. Scene iv. and last: The Mouth of Hell: a huge head with goggle eyes and a vast mouth, into which the baker is carried by the Devil.

There are things in the story that incline one to believe that it is really a survival of some mediæval French farce, or Italian commedia dell' arte, but we have been unable to trace its origin, and are not aware that it ever has been traced. Certainly the mouth of Hell in the last scene is exactly what the mouth of Hell used to be in the French miracle-plays; possibly, too, in the English. Old stories about a tussle on the edge of the crater of Stromboli between the Devil and a fraudulent contractor in ship's biscuit may be safely disregarded.

What the derivation of the word gallantee is, no one knows for certain. Dr. Murray connects it, we believe, with gallant; an older philologist recommended that it be spelt galantee and suggested that some foreign showman of the name of Galanti was the inventor or principal exponent of the show. The word was not in use, apparently, before 1821, and is rarely heard now, save in metaphorical usage. An interesting passage on the show may be found in Thackeray's review of Sue's "Mysteries of Paris," recently reprinted by Mr. Robert S. Garnett in his "New Sketch-Book" (p. 190).

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, in her tribute to the memory of William Sharp in a letter contributed by her to the Argonaut of San Francisco, mentions that William Sharp praised her youthful effusions as warmly as her own countrymen had berated them, and, while alive to their faults, promised her a definite future if she would persist. "A most interesting fact in connection with Sharp was that he possessed," Miss Gertrude Atherton asserts, "the knowledge of his exact term of life. When I first knew him—in 1890 I think it was—he told me that his father and all his paternal grandfathers had died suddenly of heart disease on or about their forty-ninth birthday, and that he expected the same meagre shrift and no more. During my last visit to London, in the winter and spring of 1904, I asked him, jestingly, being under the impression that thirty-nine was the fatal birthday, how it was that he was still alive. 'Oh, it is forty-nine,' he said, laughing; and he was in the best of health and spirits. 'I still have nearly two years.' And so he had; he died almost upon entering his fiftieth year."

Lord Rosebery's valuable collection of Burnsiana, which we are happy to hear has not been purchased for 60,000 dollars by Mr. Pierpont Morgan, has been brought together throughout a period extending to nearly thirty years. At the Whitefoord Mackenzie sale in Edinburgh twenty years ago Lord Rosebery enriched his collections by the addition of some valuable manuscripts, some of which, though purchased as original compositions of Burns, were discovered to be only copies in his handwriting from certain numbers of the Scots Magazine; and he made more valuable additions from the A. C. Lamb library sale in 1898 and from the Craibe Angus sale in 1902.

In connection with the assertion that "Auld Lang Syne" is included among Lord Rosebery's Burns manuscripts, it may be stated that there are several holograph copies of this song. A copy was enclosed by Burns with a letter to Mrs. Dunlop of date 17th December, 1788, and he alludes to it thus: "Is not the Scotch phrase 'Auld Lang Syne' exceedingly expressive? There is an old song and tune which has often thrilled through my soul. You know I am an enthusiast in old Scotch songs." Though modelled on one or other of two older songs attributed to both Sir Robert Aytoun and Francis Sempill, the whole is to all intents and purposes, as Dr. William Wallace states, Burns's own, and its finest stanzas, the third and fourth, are entirely original.

A sale of exceptionally interesting manuscripts is due at Messrs. Sotheby's on March 27 and following days. It includes the manuscript of "Rab and his Friends," Burns's song "To Mary in Heaven," part of "Masterman Ready," letters of Pope, and a unique lot of manuscripts concerned with Joanna Southcott. Then there are Bolingbroke's secret and official despatches to the Lords Plenipotentiary at Utrecht, 1711-1713, and a great deal of Napoleoniana. At Messrs. Hodgson's this month there will be sold a proof-sheet, corrected by Browning, of poems by T. Powell; letters of Bernard Barton; a thirteenth-century manuscript of Justinian, and other good things. Messrs. Christie will offer on Wednesday next a letter from Dickens to Behnes, the sculptor, a prompt-copy of The School for Scandal, and Nelson's "general memorandum" for the attack at Trafalgar, which has lately been discussed in The Times.

The Metropolitan Police. Suggested County Council Control.—At a meeting of the Street Noise Abatement Committee, held on Saturday, it was stated by the Hon. Secretary that the Government would, in all probability, transfer the control of the Metropolitan Police to the London County Council. In this case there were good reasons for believing that the police would have conferred upon them the requisite powers to deal with the nuisance of unnecessary and objectionable street noises instead of, as at present, the aggrieved householder having to put the law in force. At the same meeting it was stated that the Committee had nearly one hundred petitions in hand respecting the abatement of organ-grinding and other objectionable street noises in various districts of the Metropolis.

At a meeting of the Japan Society in the Hall, 20 Hanover Square, W., on Wednesday next at 8.30 p.m., Mr. J. Morris will read a paper on Pilgrims to Isé, illustrated by lantern-slides shown through the Epidiascope.

On Sunday evening (March 11) at 8 p.m., the English Drama Society will give a performance of Ibsen's Ghosts in the King's Hall (National Sporting Club), Covent Garden. Seats cannot be obtained at the door, but only on application to the Hon. Sec., Mr. Nugent Monck, 20 Regent Street, S.W.

Society of Arts. Arrangements for week ending March 17, 1906.—Monday, March 12, at 8 p.m., Cantor Lectures: "Fire, Fire Risks, and Fire Extinction." By Professor Vivian B. Lewes. Lecture I. Wednesday, March 14, at 8 p.m., Ordinary Meeting: "Imperial Organisation from a Business Point of View." By Geoffrey Drage. Thursday, March 15, at 4.30 p.m., Indian Section: "The Languages of India and the Linguistic Survey." By Dr. George A. Grierson.

Royal Institution.—A General Monthly Meeting of the Members of the Royal Institution was held on Monday afternoon (the 5th instant), the Duke of Northumberland, K.G., President, in the Chair. Mr. Frank Green, Mr. A. W. Oke, Mr. N. M. Ogle, Mr. H. F. Pooley, Mr. H. Taverner, and Mr. A. B. Thomas were elected Members.

Linnean Society of London. Evening Meeting, Thursday March 15, 1906, at 8 p.m. Discussion on the "Origin of Gymnosperms," to be opened by Professor F. W. Oliver, F.R.S., F.L.S.

LITERATURE

NERO IN DRAMA

Nero. By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. (Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net.)

It is to be feared that Mr. Stephen Phillips will add little to his reputation by the latest of his dramatic poems. He has chosen to conceive of Nero as being something of an artist, using that word with the hackneyed meaning which it has in third-rate literary circles. The result fails altogether to be convincing. We read of a monster who is addicted to every lust of the flesh that can be imagined or described, but he is not sufficiently human to create the illusion that he is a man. Even in his stage directions Mr. Phillips has not succeeded in being quite sincere and unaffected. Indeed, some of those rubrics, which we imagined should be written down in the tersest and most businesslike language conceivable, read like a novel of the Anna Matilda type. For example, at the end of the first act we read: "Nero is led by her a little way, then hesitates, still gazing after the procession of Emperors. Gradually he loses Acte's hand, and she leaves him, gazing." The scene is one that would be dear to a sentimental housemaid. In the opening of the second act: "Acte is reclining on a couch. The time is broad noon. A faint exotic odour pervades the palace." If we do not forget, it was Henrik Ibsen who introduced the habit of writing stage directions in a sentimental manner, and we can scarcely think the innovation is an improvement. If we cannot imagine the scene in which a dramatic poem is being enacted, no amount of description will help us.

In style, it seems to us that Mr. Phillips has throughout strained too much at the leash. Nero himself speaks like one of those literary persons who have got the word artist into their mouths and cannot refrain from using it. It occurs in Seneca's forecast of what the Emperor is going to be, and Nero himself loses no opportunity of asking:

Have I not toiled for art, forsworn food, sleep,
And laboured day and night to win the crown?

and to justify his artistic tastes scenes like the following are introduced. Lucan refers to the words of the poet: "When I am dead, let fire devour the world." The stage direction here is: "Nero starts at these words and comes among them," and thus he speaks:

Nay, while I live! The sight! A burning world!
And to be dead and miss it! There's an end
Of all satiety: such fire imagine!
Born in some obscure alley of the poor,
Then leaping to embrace a splendid street,
Palaces, temples, morsels that but whet
Her appetite: the eating of huge forests:
Then with redoubled fury rushing high,
Smacking her lips over a continent,
And licking old civilisations up!
Then in tremendous battle fire and sea
Joined: and the ending of the mighty sea:
Then heaven in conflagration, stars like cinders
Falling in tempest: then the reeling poles
Crash: and the smouldering firmament subsides,
And last, this universe a single flame!

As an artist, too, he is bound to be a gourmet. So he talks of eating dormice with poppies and milk honey, and of the appropriate music for each course, until he reaches:

And at last the tongues
Of nightingales—the tongues of nightingales?
O, silence with the tongues of nightingales.

Even when he comes to plan the murder of the boy Britannicus it is, to hackney a word once more, as an artist.

It shall be Performed to-night at supper: get you seats;
It shall be something new and wonderful,
Done after wine, and under falling roses;
And there shall be suspense in it, and thrill:
It shall be very sudden, very silent,
And terrible in silence—I the while,
Creator and arranger of the scene,
Reclining with a jewel in my eye:

And Agrippina shall be close to me,
Aware, yet motionless: Octavia,
Though but a child, yet too discreet for tears.
This you may deem as yet a little crude,
But other details I will add ere supper.

We have but one more quotation to give, and we give it, because Mr. Phillips was following precedent in putting into the mouth of one of his characters a description of Britain.

ANICETUS: To Britain send her. There for Claudius
I fought; a melancholy isle, alone,
Sundered from all the world; and banned by God
With separating, cold, religious wave,
And haunted with the ghost of a dead sun
Rising as from a grave, or all in blood
Returning wounded heavily through mist.
Her rotting peoples amid forests cower,
Or mad for colour paint their bodies blue.

We are sorry to be unable to do more than repeat our judgment, that as a tragedy in drama the work entirely fails to interest or convince.

MR. R. H. HUTTON'S LITERARY CRITICISMS

Brief Literary Criticisms. By the late RICHARD HOLT HUTTON. (Macmillan, 4s. net.)

ONE of the first reflections aroused by a glance over this volume of short literary essays is: How did the late Mr. R. H. Hutton rise to that eminence which he attained? The only explanation that occurs to us is that it was due to character. Mr. Hutton appears to have been a man of the highest principles, and in all his writings he conscientiously adhered to views that had been deliberately and intelligently adopted; and so in process of years the journal over whose fortunes he presided came to be regarded with confidence by the sober English middle classes. It was taken as guide by those whose instincts inclined to the grandmotherly. But, of course, when one thinks the matter over, it never had much reputation as a literary organ. That statement, however, needs qualification. The Spectator has always possessed that fine reputation which is built on honesty, and fairness, and justice; but it never was clever, and Mr. Hutton himself was never more than a second-rate intellect. It would be easy to substantiate this statement by references to almost any chapter in the book before us. But let one speak for many. In his inquiry, "What is a lyric?" Mr. Hutton was exposing himself to one of the finest tests conceivable. Of all things literary, the lyric is at once the most graceful, the most touching, the most beautiful, the most exquisite product, and whoever would discuss its formation must have an innate love for that gossamer and ethereal beauty which it is much easier to recognise than to describe. One would think that the very act of writing upon it would incite the critic to the use of the most delicate language of which he was capable. Yet in the course of the first few lines we have a sentence in which he speaks of "a predominantly narrative poem, however saturated with imagination it may be." A fastidious reader might well be forgiven if on meeting with the phrase "saturated with imagination" he closed the book as one that was not meant for him. Mr. Hutton quotes several pieces of verse which he calls lyric, but, so far as we can see, he does not bring forward a single couplet deserving of the word. If we go back to the ancient and simple definitions of poetry, we know that the dramatic poem was one meant for men and women to act, that the epic poem was the narrative poem which in the days of jongleur and minstrel was sung to the harp or, as often as not, recited in a sing-song without accompaniment, while the lyric is the little poem which is sung. Probably in its simplest state it took the form of a lullaby that primeval woman sung to her baby, a lullaby that we can easily imagine was made up mostly of nonsense words and mere sounds uttered for the purpose of soothing. It was also the natural expression of the lover who made sonnets to his mistress's eyebrow as spontaneously as the bird sings to his mate.

The most perfect examples of lyric song in the English language stand out with such absolute distinction from other literature that there is really very little room for discussion in regard to them. Of its kind Ariel's song :

Come unto these yellow sands,
And then take hands ;
Courtsied when you have, and kiss'd
The wild waves whist,
Foot it feathery here and there ;
And, sweet Sprites, the burthen bear, is unapproached. There is no dirge in any language equal to Fear no more the heat o' the sun,

Nor the furious winter's rages ;
Thou thy worldly task hast done,
Home art gone, and ta'en thy wages :
Golden lads and girls all must,
As chimney-sweepers, come to dust ;

but he who has such standards as this before him must feel simply amazed when told that the description of the harper playing in Scott's "Lay" was lyrical in the truest sense, a notion which Mr. Hutton seems to have adopted from William Pitt. Another example is from a piece dear to the penny-reading reciters :

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land !

At the best it is only a piece of vigorous declamation. Yet any one with a really literary taste could have found in Scott a great deal that was much more lyrical. For instance, take two verses out of L'envoy to "The Lady of the Lake" :

Yet, once again, farewell, thou Minstrel harp !
Yet, once again, forgive my feeble sway,
And little reck I of the censure sharp
May idly cavil at an idle lay.
Much have I owed thy strains on life's long way,
Through secret woes the world has never known,
When on the weary night dawn'd wearier day,
And bitter was the grief devour'd alone.
That I o'erlive such woes, Enchantress ! is thine own.

Hark ! as my lingering footsteps slow retire,
Some Spirit of the Air has waked thy string !
'Tis now a seraph bold, with touch of fire,
'Tis now the brush of Fairy's frolic wing.
Receding now, the dying numbers ring
Fainter and fainter down the rugged dell,
And now the mountain breezes scarcely bring
A wandering witch-note of the distant spell—
And now, 'tis silent all !—Enchantress fare thee well !

The touch of personal pathos is thoroughly in place here. Purely lyric, too, in our opinion, is :

The herring loves the merry moon-light,
The mackerel loves the wind,
But the oyster loves the dredging sang,
For they come of a gentle kind.

Scott, however, was not really a great lyric poet. "Oddly enough," to quote a phrase from Mr. Hutton, he finds the truest lyric Wordsworth ever wrote to be :

From town to town, from tower to tower
The red rose is a glad some flower.
Her thirty years of winter past,
The red rose is revived at last ;
She lifts her head for endless spring,
For everlasting blossoming :
Both roses flourish, red and white :
In love and sisterly delight
The two that were at strife are blended,
And all old troubles now are ended.—
Joy ! joy to both ! but most to her
Who is the flower of Lancaster !

Could Mr. Hutton have forgotten : "Will no one tell me what she sings ?" Here we have the true melody of words, and without that the word lyric would be a contradiction in terms. As Mr. Swinburne has pointed out, harmony and imagination are the requisites of a great poem.

No ; Mr. Hutton is not to be altogether trusted when he swears that we have the true lyric fervour and the right beat of the lyric pulse in the "Feast of Brougham Castle." Shelley, we are told, is the greatest lyrical poet in our century ; and Mr. Hutton was quite entitled to hold this opinion, even though, as we believe, those critics who possess the finest taste would be inclined to disagree with it. The essay ends with the choice remark that "a recent satirist has described Mr. Watson as, 'Wordsworth and water.' 'Wordsworth and music' or a lyrical Wordsworth, would have been a truer description." We can only echo the phrase : "Would it ?"

To turn to another side of Mr. Hutton's writing, he was a kind of authorised exponent of the virtues of George Eliot. To him she was "the greatest writer among Englishwomen of this or any other age," and amongst the articles of faith with him which lie secure from any touch of doubt is that George Eliot "touched the highest point which, in a woman, has been reached in our literature." Just before the essay from which we quote comes a paper on Jane Austen, and, if Mr. Hutton had been alive, he would probably have been surprised to hear any one saying that so immeasurably greater as a woman of letters was Jane Austen than George Eliot that it is idle to institute any comparison between them. Looking backward, however, we can see how forced and strained was the work of George Eliot, while with every new reading "Pride and Prejudice" unfolds new charms. If the adjectives that Mr. Hutton applies to the one had been transferred to the other, his statement would have gained, as we think, in judgment and truth. But it is much more profitable to argue with Mr. Hutton on points of doctrine than on his judgment of men and women. There are various little excursions into the domain of theory that invite criticism, as for example his question : "Is Irony a Form of the Ludicrous ?" He writes a paper that leaves us in great doubt as to whether he really knew the meaning of that attribute which Mrs. Slip-slop called "ironing." The very mention of that lady's name reminds us that Mr. Hutton is able to write a whole paper on "ironing" without a single reference to the name of Fielding, the most perfect master of it in the English tongue. Of course, where he misses the point is in his laborious search for the earnest. He is like a man in a dark cellar seeking tenpenny nails with a lantern, and is so concentrated upon these tenpenny nails that he tramples over gold and pearls without seeing them. The tenpenny nails in this case consist of the irony that appeals to the very serious nature of the seeker's character, while the gold and jewels are the treasures strewed over the length and breadth of English literature which might have been his for the asking. Another of his chapters is headed with the original question : "What is humour ?" In point of fact, wit may be possessed by anybody and is as likely to be found in the head of a fool as in that of a wise man. Humour is the gift of seeing things all round us with laughter and tears, pathos and the lack of it all combined into one melting vision. The quotation that Mr. Hutton gives from Lamb is not really worthy of the name of humour. That is to say, it is simply funny. A High-gate omnibus conductor put his head in at the door to ask "All full inside ?" when Lamb, who was half asleep in the corner, immediately replied : "I really cannot answer for the other ladies and gentlemen, but that last piece of pudding at Mrs. Gilman's did the business for me." That is really only the laughter-provoking retort of a mountebank. It has wit and cleverness in plenty, but no vision. The question is propounded with special regard to Charles Dickens, and people are still going on asking and answering it. Perhaps the truest comment upon the matter is that Charles Dickens suffered little from the lack of a sense of humour and a sense of pathos, but, to use an expressive Americanism, he "went for them too bald-headed."

GYPSY AND GENTILE IDYLLS

The Coming of Love. Rhona Boswell's Story and other Poems.
By THEODORE WATTS-DUNTON. Seventh edition, enlarged and revised. (Lane, 5s. net.)

THE Gypsy race, as some hopefully hold, is dying out, carrying with it its ancient custom, code, and language. Yet somehow one still meets here and there, encamped in English lanes, bands of Stanleys or Lovells who, by their looks, might have landed only yesterday from Hindustan. Nor is it a thing of the past to find by the banks of a Welsh trout stream, or trudging from inn to inn with his triple harp slung over his shoulder, some scion of the family of Abraham Wood who, despite his "gorgified" dress and appearance and his command of Welsh and English, speaks in his own home a tongue many shades nearer to Sanskrit than any of the seven vernaculars of India described by John Beames. A threatened race lives long. Gypsies and scholar Gypsies are still among us; and, regarding the day when these enliveners of our country-side are merged with those who take a staid view of life, we devoutly say procul esto! Yet even should Gypsydom disappear, the hope might be cherished that the extinction of the race need not necessarily involve the disappearance of the cult. The "merry race of Romany Rye" (that pet phrase of the penny-a-liner which, as Mr. F. H. Groome once remarked, is "not without a certain misapprehended truth") might still as of yore make the Gypsy speech a passport to good-fellowship, and follow the Gypsy life while summer hold, resting them merry in tent or caravan.

This fond belief is suggested by the appearance of the seventh edition of Mr. Watts-Dunton's "Coming of Love." A master of magic of the white variety, the author of this poem makes an irresistible appeal to the spirit of romance which is hidden in the heart of the most confirmed kairengro. He may not, it is true, like the "lad in the University of Oxford" of whom Glanvil tells us, "leave his studies to join himself to a company of vagabond Gypsies," yet even sitting before the fire in his easy chair and reading this Romany idyll, it will be strange if he does not feel himself one of the children of the open air, and, for the time at least, a scholar Gypsy.

The freshness of this poem is amazing, almost as amazing as its audacity and simplicity; a glance through its pages is like a breath from the heath, or a morning plunge in a river pool. Poor indeed must be the spirit of the youth who, opening this book for the first time, does not wander away into a new world. Though he may never possibly become an actual "tzigologue"—which we understand is the repellent name applied to the few erudite scholars, chiefly German professors, who devote their lives to the study of Gypsy philology and ethnology—yet in sympathy at least he has become one of the "merry race," perhaps all the better Romany Rye because unspoiled by any taint of pedantry. Gypsyism is a sort of religion, and if Pott or Paspati be the breviary of its priesthood, "Aylwin" or "The Coming of Love" may not inaptly be described as its Book of Hours, or lay folk's service book, which Mr. Watts-Dunton like a skilful illuminator has enriched with his delicate and delightful decorations.

For this poem is a triumph of artistry. Carried along by its rush and power, few will be able at first to appraise sufficiently the literary skill with which the poet has fashioned the finest of his lyrics out of the poor debased dialect of the English Gypsies, or the unerring judgment with which he introduces just the right degree of tent idiom and no more. Rightly to estimate this success, we need to recall the failures of pioneers in the same path, who have sought to commemorate Gypsy life in song. These experiments vary from the sham sentiment of such lines as:

And how should a poor Gypsy maiden like me Ever hope the rich bride of a noble to be?

which we ourselves have heard sung by a poor Gypsy maiden with a diabolical jeer which greatly enhanced its effect—to poems written in that pseudo deep dialect of Romany which never was on field or moor. But the happy mean has never before been struck. The difference between the manner of Mr. Watts-Dunton and that of his predecessors is as great as between that of Scott and the author of "Queenhoo Hall." We have already referred to what we esteem Mr. Watts-Dunton's greatest triumph in this sort, the beautiful and pathetic love-letters of Rhona Boswell, which few can read unmoved. Rhona herself is a real being, and the absolute fidelity of these letters of hers to the Gypsy character and mode of expression almost compel the belief that we have here unaltered, save for a little metrical arrangement, genuine historical documents rather than a creation of the poet's mind.

Yet Gypsies, though delightful talkers, are not, as a rule, good letter-writers. Their familiar epistles are mostly confined to postal addresses and pious remembrances, dictated by them to rustic scribes, who form each character with an effort which seems to bring every muscle into play. "Why, my rye," said an admiring Gypsy to a gentleman who acted as his amanuensis, "you does it as easy as woosering kraafnies to a groovny" (throwing turnips to a cow). Nor is mastery of the art of reading held in less esteem. Some years ago on one of our Gypsy rambles we fell in with a young Romany chal, who, among other questions, inquired whether we could read, and, on receiving a modest affirmative, was encouraged to boast of his own progress. Ascertaining that his learning had been acquired while messenger for a certain West India packet company, and anxious to gratify him, we wrote on the ground in large capital letters the word "west" and invited him to display his skill by reading it. With a surpassing frown, like a prize-fighter in the wrong corner with the sun in his eyes, the Gypsy stared at the inscription as though to terrorise it into yielding up its secret. In vain! The writing was full of science, and would not be caught off its guard. Minutes passed without apparent advantage on either side; our friend getting at closer and closer quarters until at last he was bent almost at right angles over his foe. Seeing that only the fall of night could put an end to this obstinate contest, we intervened at the end of several rounds by inquiring what he made of it so far. "Well, I wouldn't like to be exactly certain," was the answer, "but I rather think it's something like Bess."

But, though neither Lamb nor FitzGerald are Romany names, the reader must not rashly assume that no interesting Gypsy letters exist, for there is at least one signal exception in the correspondence penes nos of John Roberts with the late Mr. Groome. How pleasantly, for example, the old Welsh harper begins a letter dated May 27, 1880:

Siting around a large Family Table at breakfast, and as usual some little remarks by some one saying, "I wonder how is such a person," and "I wonder this," and "I wonder that"—when presently a lowed nock at the Door brings it open, and a letter announced for John Roberts by the Post Man. The reciver, knowing the well known hand-writing, cries out, "a letter from Edinburgh! a letter from Edinburgh!" when a beam of Joy was in every one's face and the Letter flung on the Table, when a general scramble took place to see who would read it first. Me seeing it very big and well pact, by reaching over nockt my Teacup over (and had the water been a little hotter I should have scalded myself) which cosed a rood laugh aroun the board.

Or read this, dated March 23, 1880, in which Roberts refers to the death of a Gypsy boy who was drowned at Aberdovey:

With regard to my poor cousin William Wood, which died one of these last days, and was berrid quite respectable in a Town called Amlwch in the county of Anglesea, I can only give you a little account, and that is one time (before the picture was moved out of the Dining room) there used to be in the Dining Room at Kinnell Park (a very large gentleman's house where I inginerly play at) a very large pictur with two or three different plates upon it of our Blessed Savour, how he was served by the crewel Jews. One of the forms was with his hand on his Face, and his Fingers extended, and his hair all over his Forehead, looking very pityfull, and as much as to say "look what I've come to!" And my poor Cousin Billy looked the very same when sitting down on the grass, and his wife oppersite him and his poor drowned Boy in some kind of an old building behind him, and did not know what to do. It struck me there and then how very much he looked like that picture: I am sorry that I can't explain it to you so well as I felt it. Mary his wife is a catholic and she is a very good little woman. And him poor fellow, he could not read nor write, but between servis times on Sundays he use to oppen his Bible, and look at it for the space of a half an hour, without taking his eyes off it, thinking that would be some good for him.

Partly, no doubt, through personal predilection, we have dwelt chiefly on the Romany muse of Mr. Watts-Dunton, but it would be scarcely fair to neglect a patteran directing the gorgio reader to the poems in this volume which deal with other topics than those of Egypt. There as elsewhere we find ample illustration of the author's gift of embalming in verse some pregnant thought, saying or incident, and of presenting his poetic fancies in a style which, though entirely his own, recalls the manner of the masters of English verse.

J. S.

THE FATE OF THE MANOR ROLLS

The Manor and Manorial Records. By NATHANIEL J. HONE. (Methuen, 7s 6d. net.)

Now that inquests, fines and assize rolls have their safe harbour in the Public Record Office, where they lie clean and accessible, and seeing that we are come to enlightened days in which the most reckless parson will hesitate before making over the parchment leaves of his ancient register to kitchen or household use, the rolls of English manors ask in their turn for the national consideration which has been denied them.

These manor-rolls are of the nearest interest to us English folk. We are becoming a nation of dwellers in streets, of landless men, and the rolls will remind us that we come of a nation of land-holders. Were the rolls but complete and at hand, we might read how our ancestor was admitted to his land by the steward and by what rents and services he held it, of his plough gear and oxen, of his chickens and bees, of what befell him when he brewed beer illegally or drew blood on his neighbour, of his share in the never-ceasing quarrel of metes and bounds until the day when he is returned as dead since the last court held. Priceless matter for the topographer is in these manorial rolls and bailiffs' accounts, for the history of the parish is chronicled field by field and toft by toft. The economist may learn here concerning work and wages and of the prices of produce. The genealogist, above all, is rejoiced at the sight of a court roll, for in the court rolls are the pedigrees of most Englishmen.

England is deeply marked with the traces of the manorial system. In many a village we may still see the manor house in its demesne lands, the line of copyholders' tenements with their backs upon what were the common fields, the manorial pinfold, the site of stocks and ducking-stool, the waste and the wood, and the lord's water-mill or wind-mill. Within the memory of living men the dividing hedges have sprung up which cut in pieces the last of the common fields of the manor.

Mr. Hone's treatise on the manor offers itself rather as a popular introduction to its history and customs than as an original study of a subject on which much good ink has been spent. He has been able to avail himself of the labours of Maitland and Vinogradoff, of Round and Elton, and of the collections of such topographers as Massingberd and Baildon. The result is a book which may be commended especially to those who are entering upon the study of English topography.

Half Mr. Hone's book is devoted to a reasonably short account of the history of the manor, no undue space being given to the dispute concerning its evolution. With this we have the story of the lord and his tenants and officers and of their daily life and work as a community, the illustrations being for the most part already familiar. Nothing more to the purpose could, indeed, be found than Jewitt's wood-engravings of manor houses, and the calendar-blocks of the month's work in the fields are welcome; but the view of a prince's hall from a Bodleian manuscript and a picture of a merchant reckoning his gains, both from foreign sources, might have been excused further service in a book on the English manor.

The second half of the book shortly explains the procedure of the manorial courts, and then gives a very well chosen series of examples of court rolls, accounts and extents. With these to aid, the amateur of topography may take in hand his first manor roll with a good understanding of what he may look to find on the parchment skin. Specimens of rolls are illustrated by photography, and the beginner who will approach this clipped Latin and unfamiliar handwriting with patience and courage will soon surprise himself by his feats in deciphering the record. Mr. Hone's own translations are adequate, although the Bishop of Lincoln's messenger tipped with twenty pence by the Prior of Bicester need not appear as "the Nuncio of the lord Bishop." And to render the ancient capital F as "ff" is ignorant and amateurish.

The manor as an institution is fast vanishing away as copyholds are enfranchised. It rests with the nation to say at once and to say quickly whether the priceless records of its past are to be scattered and destroyed or saved for our descendants, who will in any case curse the apathy which has already allowed the manufacturer of jellies or glues to buy the raw material of English history at twopence a pound. Our manor rolls rot in stable lofts and decay in the cellars of country solicitors, and the nation has as yet no better home to offer them.

A central depository for the records of the manor, with an office for public research, should be our first demand. Given such a depository under the control of the officers of the Public Record Office, we might then appeal to those who find themselves the unwilling and uninterested custodians of manorial documents to surrender them to the safer keeping of the skilled archivist. In any case we must remember that such records have the sibylline character; to-day we may buy many cheaply, but to-morrow we must buy few at a high price.

OSWALD BARRON.

THE TINY COSMETIC

Richard Cosway, R.A. By GEORGE C. WILLIAMSON, Litt.D. (Bell, 10s. 6d. net.)

ACCORDING to something more than tradition, when Mrs. Fitzherbert died it was found that clasped within her hand lay the portrait in miniature of her disputed husband and, for the time, undoubted lover—King George IV. When, some years before, that monarch's life was ended, a locket with his first wife's likeness was found on his breast, where he had always worn it. We have no doubt that both these pictures, whose sentimental adventures were extensive and remarkable, had been painted by the hyperfashionable and gifted Richard Cosway; can a miniaturist's fame reach to further heights? In the days of his vanity he was the intimate friend and neighbour of both the Prince and the lady. He had, indeed, painted His Royal Highness from infancy upward with a charm and consistent flattery which should have grappled him to his sitter with hoops of steel. But the Regent did not care for the familiar friends of the Prince of Wales (although he did not greatly improve on them), and Cosway was among those who suffered neglect. The patronage of the Prince, however, had made his art immensely popular, and Cosway, in his turn, had endowed the painting of miniatures with new life, which recalls, although rather faintly, the great time when Peter Oliver, Samuel Cooper, John Hoskins and Nathaniel Dixon painted the Stuarts and the decorative people of that day. Like the reign of Charles II., the reigns of the last two Georges were periods, sociologically, of some brutality, masked by pleasing sentiment. The miniature was its outward and visible symbol.

The lavish and impecunious King of Westphalia sent Bourrienne his miniature immediately on his obtaining a loan from the purse-bearer of Napoleon; earlier, Catharine the Great, of Russia, decorated with her portrait set in diamonds each new lover—there were thirty, were there not?—and Mr. Gunning wore the painting of one of his beautiful daughters in his buttonhole. In fact the whole of late eighteenth- and early nineteenth-century society delighted to honour an art that has almost always been a rather alluring lie. One must accept the conventions of all or any form of artistic expression, but the miniature especially demands a large acquiescence; in the days of Cosway this was readily given. The personality of a painter in miniature should show in his work, and, judged by the biography which Dr. Williamson now puts before us, "the tiny cosmetic," as one of his many satirists called Cosway, was the man his portraits suggest. There is the politeness, the lack of truth, the connoisseurship, the exquisite finish and the kindliness in his work which is found in his life. There is no place in his art, however, for his absurdities, and, later, his startling eccentricities and illusions.

The biography of Cosway (born about 1742 and died 1821) is one of the most attractive, characteristic and, in a sense, amusing, eighteenth-century romances of artistic life. Although this was a period rich in the rise of genius and the victories of gifted painters over the common-places of life, no one among the men of his age and attributes is quite so attractive, posé, bizarre and agreeable as the accomplished collector and miniaturist who proudly signed himself on most of his considerable work "Primarius Pictor Serenissimi Walliæ Principis." This signature helps one to understand the man, for he was one of the many gifted people whom the Prince made fashionable, and then more or less marred by neglect. At a period of some mental trouble in 1816, Cosway signed a portrait as by "the greatest miniature painter in the world." It is highly probable that he was fully entitled to this style at that period, for his art, although changed in character, did not wane in power and beauty. Some ten years ago Dr. Williamson published a book on Cosway which, largely owing to the popularity of the illustrations, passed rapidly out of print. The present work, with the exception of the reproductions of the portraits, which are on a less sumptuous scale, gives us all the essentials of the larger work. The letterpress has been re-written, and, we consider, greatly improved. New facts are added, and, as the writer says, the biography is made authoritative in every possible way.

Perhaps a more accomplished stylist, and one with a keener sense of humour, might have produced a volume of fuller entertainment; but no writer of to-day could have conscientiously gathered more interesting facts nor more completely understood the skill of the artist. The part which Mrs. Cosway plays in the biography, in the early days at the grand house in Pall Mall—now the War Office—and later carrying on her education work at Lodi, is very fully and interestingly set forth. There are glimpses, too, of many delightful people, who graced the half-century during which Cosway worked and was famous and earned a reputation which the last decade has very greatly enhanced. We know what Hazlitt thought of his work: he put it on a level with the articles of bigotry and virtue which he went to see at "Vathek" Beckford's palace at Fonthill. We are less impatient of prettiness than Hazlitt, and have taken Cosway to our hearts.

And yet, is he so well known outside a narrow circle? Recently an accredited author, saturated in eighteenth-century things, published a book decorated with miniatures by an artist he calls, a dozen times, George Cosway, R.A., and not long ago a daily paper thus mis-named for its millions of readers the "greatest miniature painter in the world." Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil, but we think Cosway would have liked to read his biography written nearly a hundred years after his death and to have heard the prices which Mr. Morgan's agents bid for his graceful work—for he loved an auction and high prices.

THE LAST MESSAGE

WHAT shall I say to him
Whose heart thou hast "broken"?
—Say that I never thought
And give for a token

The slippers I danced in then,
The web-silk mittens,
The coal-black mask and the fan
Whose taps were "a kitten's."

—Will to remind him he said so
Not seem too cruel?
—Though he remember, his pain
Shall have no renewal;

It has broken his heart, and the world
Admires him greatly
For his terrible thoughts and his air
Correct and stately.

—Then shall I say nought of thy heart's Remorse and repentance?
—Yes, yes, but leave unfinished
The half of each sentence;

Say that I thumbed his old letters;
But don't add "weeping":
Tell how I'd murmur his name,
Yet say not "when sleeping."

—But hast thou no hope to send
Of death's re-awaking?
—Nay, for his heart has given
And mine is breaking;

And death seems more welcome to me
Than forgiveness—profounder
Than a heaven remembrance would mar,
Like sleep, only sounder.

T. STURGE MOORE.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE DEVELOPMENT OF CHAUCER'S GENIUS

IN a recent number of the ACADEMY I was allowed to call attention to the remarkable new light thrown by two American scholars, Mr. Kittredge and Mr. Livingston Lowes, on Chaucer's "Legende of Good Women." Thanks to their discoveries we now know that the Prologue to the "Legende" grew out of a pleasant interchange of courtesies between the English poet and some of his French friends, more especially Eustache Deschamps, whose Lai de Franchise, written in connection with the celebration of May-day at the French court in 1385, provided Chaucer with some ideas which he used in his Prologue. Mr. Lowes followed up his first paper, published in December 1904, with which I was mainly concerned in my previous article, by a second, dated a year later,* in which he considers the Prologue in its chronological relations, and draws conclusions, of considerable importance if they can be sustained, as to the order in which some of Chaucer's most interesting poems were composed. In some very just remarks Mr. Lowes points out that, while the exact date at which any poem was written, when considered in and by itself, is a very trifling matter, any re-arrangement of the order of the poet's works must affect our conception of his growth and development. Encouraged by his success in proving that the order of the two versions of the Prologue to the "Legende" has hitherto been misconceived, Mr. Lowes now proposes to alter in some important particulars the sequence of Chaucer's works which has stood almost unchallenged for twenty years or more; and one need not be a Dry-as-dust to be interested in considering what can be said in favour of the old order and what for the new.

* "The Prologue to the Legend of Good Women considered in its chronological relations." By John Livingston Lowes. Modern Language Association of America, 1905.

One of the first of Mr. Lowes's contentions (in which he reinforces an old theory of ten Brink's) is a good example of the effect a change of date may have upon our estimate, not merely of a poet's work, but even of his honour. In the version of the Prologue which we now know to be the earlier, Love bids the poet:

And when this book is made give it the queene
On my behalle, at Eltham, or at Shene.

In the later version this couplet is omitted. How are we to explain the omission? According to Mr. Lowes and ten Brink, by placing the date of the revision later than June 7, 1394, the day of the Queen's death. Only one serious argument can be adduced for this contention. As is well known, Richard II. was so afflicted at the loss of his queen, that he pulled down the palace at Sheen at which she died. If the prologue to the "Legende" were re-written after her death, Chaucer might have thought the allusion to presenting the poem to her at Sheen likely to pain the king, or at least to be considered infelicitous, and the couplet might for this reason have been expunged. The theory is, of course, possible, if only because, when the king set so childish an example, the poet may have behaved equally childishly. But to get over a difficulty in the form of an allusion to a dead patroness by suppressing it altogether would certainly be no ideal course, and the suggestion that this may have been the way that Chaucer chose is far from making me anxious to believe that the Prologue was re-written so late as 1394. On the other hand, Mr. Lowes is even more horrified at the suggestion that Chaucer may have omitted the lines because he was angry with the queen for having failed to come to his rescue when he lost his office in December 1386, the very time when, according to Mr. Lowes's own theory, he was engaged with the "Legende."

That an English gentleman [he writes] should deliberately recall a dedication to his queen because he did not stand so high in royal favour as in earlier days would be hard in any instance to believe; the possibility that Chaucer himself should commit so gross a breach of courtesy one may dismiss without hesitation.

It is ungrateful work to gainsay this chivalrous pronouncement, but Mr. Lowes's certainty hardly accords with what we know of the history of patronage. The quarrels of poets with their patrons and patronesses might well be adduced as illustrating the "sordid influence" of the "cash nexus" which some people consider the best promoter of friendship. In any case, I would as lief think that Chaucer struck out the couplet while smarting under the loss of office which he may well have thought that the queen could have retained for him, as that he omitted it after her death. As an intermediate theory it may be suggested that the couplet hardly amounts to a dedication to the queen, any more than the pleasant courtesies to his French friends constituted a dedication to them. Chaucer may have regarded both allusions as only temporarily appropriate, and have omitted the one, as he modified the other, merely on artistic grounds. If so, the chronological argument falls to the ground, and we are once more free to believe that from the time when he began work on the Canterbury Tales, Chaucer would naturally have given himself wholly up to them, until weariness or regard for his soul made him forego poetry altogether. That seven or eight years after he had given over working on the "Legende" out of disgust at the monotony of the theme he should have busied himself with revising his Prologue to it, is to me incredible. Just as we now know that the two recensions of Gower's "Confessio Amantis" in which he does honour respectively to Richard II. and to his adversary, Henry, Earl of Derby, afterwards Henry IV.,* were separated by little more than a year, so I believe that the two versions of the Prologue to the "Legende" were separated by no great interval, and that both were written before Chaucer abandoned work at the separate stories.

* I cannot see why this substitution of praise of Henry from respect to Richard offers, as Mr. Lowes contends, no parallel to what Chaucer appears to have done when he had a grievance against the queen. To my thinking, it was much worse.

While Mr. Lowes thus represents Chaucer as working upon the "Legende" as late as 1394, he would have us believe that some of the individual stories in it were written several years before 1386. With our knowledge that Chaucer incorporated quite early work into his "Canterbury Tales" there is no a priori difficulty in believing that the idea of the "Legende of Good Women" as a whole may have grown up after one or more individual stories had already been composed. But the evidence which Mr. Lowes advances for his supposition is far from conclusive. He thinks that the story of Ariadne shows so little mastery of the heroic couplet that it must be an early instance of Chaucer's use of it, and that specifically it is earlier than the story of "Palamon and Arcyte," now known to us as "The Knightes Tale." The lack of any special facility in the "Ariadne," ascribed by Mr. Lowes to Chaucer's inexperience in the use of the metre, may equally well be due to haste and carelessness. As for the terrible number of lines he adduces which begin with "And" (twenty-one out of forty-two in lines 2136-2178), this is surely a common trick of Chaucer's in rapid narration, especially when he is compressing. Nor does the ingenious point which Mr. Lowes makes (quite conclusively) as to the use of a passage of the "Teseide" convince me that the "Ariadne" must on this account be earlier than the "Palamon." In the latter poem Chaucer had quite rightly seen that better sport could be obtained if Emily were kept ignorant of the love she had inspired in the two cousins. He therefore refused to follow Boccaccio in making her overhear their complaints in prison. But in this, as in other cases, it pained his economical soul to leave the passage unused, and, when it became convenient to let Ariadne overhear the plaint of Theseus, back to the "Teseide" he went to use the passage he had previously rejected. If Mr. Lowes can prove by external evidence that the order was the other way about, his proof shall be accepted, but æsthetic considerations surely tell as much on one side as on the other. There is more to appeal to us in his suggestion that after drawing Theseus so attractively in "Palamon and Arcyte" Chaucer would have hesitated to rake up the misdeeds of his youth in "Ariadne." But how could Ariadne be omitted from a Lectionary of Cupid's Saints, and, if Ariadne had to be celebrated, how could Theseus be spared? Chaucer did his best, by telling the story with less than his usual gusto.

We seem to have been dealing with rather small points, but this putting back the "Ariadne" to about 1380 and pushing on the revision of the Prologue to 1394 carries with it unwelcome consequences in Mr. Lowes's theory that the "Hous of Fame" and "Palamon and Arcyte" were both written before "Troilus and Criseyde." As has been said, it seems so inconsistent with Chaucer's temper as to be incredible that he could have kept the "Legende" on hand for some fourteen years; and any theory that minimises the importance of the "Troilus" as the crisis of his poetical development reduces my own conception of that development to chaos. The very length of the "Troilus" by itself seems to prove its position as the first great poem of what may roughly be called Chaucer's Italian period, for no poet could write a poem of over eight thousand lines without having his art profoundly modified in the process. Now the "Troilus" is a far greater poem than the "Palamon," and yet the art of the latter conveys the impression of being distinctly later, older, more experienced. In the "Palamon" Chaucer has nothing more to learn; it is well proportioned; save for the one pause for the description of the temples in the lists, there is no interruption to the action; neither speeches nor philosophisings are of excessive length. But in the "Troilus" Chaucer is still making experiments, and, more especially in the third book, he expands so recklessly as compared with Boccaccio that he imperils the success of his story just when it should have been strongest and most rapid. In a word, he introduces here prolixities of the very kind which in the "Palamon" we find him clearing away; and to believe that the "Troilus" was the later of the two cuts away our confidence in the poet as a conscious artist. Mr. Lowes emphasises the other side of the shield, and claims that Chaucer improves on Boccaccio's characterisation much more signally in the "Troilus" than in the "Palamon." It is, perhaps, a fair answer to this that Chaucer heightens the characters in the "Palamon" to the utmost extent that the plot will bear without becoming, like the "Troilus," professedly a "tragedie," whereas the tragic note in it is not only never touched, but never even attempted. In my edition of the "Knights Tale" I have had the hardihood to suggest that this may even be the "som comedie" which Chaucer at the end of the "Troilus" expressed his hope that he might live to write. The generally accepted opinion fixes the allusion on to the "Hous of Fame," which might pass for a comedy on the ground of its distant resemblance to Dante's "Divina Commedia," while the "Palamon" stands the better of the two the test of the simple mediæval requirement that a comedy should begin with bad fortune and end in good. In any case Mr. Lowes has ruled both these candidates for the comedy-ship out of court by one decision, and he must either suppose that Chaucer left his promise unfulfilled or strain his ingenuity to find a proof that it was redeemed by the very lamentable tales of Cupid's Saints!

There are many more arguments in Mr. Lowes's essay than it has been possible here to notice,* and after his brilliant success in establishing the true order of the two versions of the Prologue to the "Legende," any suggestions he offers as to Chaucer chronology must command careful attention. But the arguments which he brings forward in this second essay are much more matters of opinion and interpretation than those of the first, and, when this is so, if the æsthetic consequences of a theory are bad, this is a good reason for hesitating to receive it. Now to me the æsthetic consequences of Mr. Lowes's theory are very bad indeed. No theory of Chaucer's development can be found which will enable us to arrange his works in a steadily ascending order of merit. There were different elements in his nature which pulled him different ways, and in a poet so dependent on a touch of external inspiration, the question of the books to which he had access in any given year is of crucial importance. But the "Troilus" and the "Palamon" are derived from the same source, and my own belief is strong that when the riches of Boccaccio were revealed to the poet of the tales of St. Cecyll, of Grisilde and Constance, it was to the heights of the "Troilus" that they raised him, and that the firm tread with which he walks on the lesser elevation of the "Palamon" represents a later stage.

ALFRED W. POLLARD.

[Next week's Causerie will be "The Novel of Manners," by P.]

FICTION

Uncle Peaceable. By REGINALD TURNER. (Greening, 6s.)

QUITE a short while since there were two ways of making a book successful—to have it repudiated by Mudie or recommended by a popular ecclesiastic. The all-embracing Times Book Club with its catholic inclusiveness has rather * One "curious piece of independent evidence" which he adduces for the priority of the "Palamon" to the "Troilus" is that the decisive action of both begins on May 3, and that since we can see more reason for this carefully specified date in the "Palamon" it was probably borrowed from it for the "Troilus." But there must be something about May 3 which the commentators have as yet failed to fathom, for Mr. Lowes has forgotten that in the "Nun's Priest's Tale," it is on May 3 that Reynard ran away with Chauntecleer! It seems dangerous to build theories on this date till we get some explanation of Chaucer's fondness for it.

taken away the cachet from the English equivalent to the Index Expurgatorius; though none of Mr. Turner's novels could have fallen under that reputable ban. If, however, they are ever fortunate enough to catch the episcopal eye, the Bishop of London might do worse than recommend "Uncle Peaceable" from the pulpit of Westminster Abbey, where Canon Beeching is also known to indulge sometimes in severe and arbitrary criticism. Mr. Turner's latest book offers no solution for Renan's doubts, raises no problem, and cannot be classified in the schools of Henry James, Thomas Hardy or George Meredith. In originality and humour Mr. Turner is alone. In irresponsibility he comes near to Mr. Anstey, our greatest English humorist; but there is no touch of the supernatural which the reader must accept as a postulate; nor are the inevitable laws of improbability so ruthlessly preserved in order to carry things to their cruel, mathematical conclusion, as you see in the author of "Vice Versa." Somewhere between Anstey and Stevenson, under the monument of Charles Dickens, is where Mr. Turner has pitched his tent. And really a pleasanter slope on the precipice of literature could hardly be found. In two of his former works he climbed higher with varied success, and now, refreshed for the mountain air he is more at home than ever in making his characters (and his readers) live and laugh and have their being. "Uncle Peaceable" is the study of a selfish man and his environment, with a charming love motive dexterously interwoven round the egoist's hearth. Every page provokes a smile, and some of them may even appear farcical to those who find life rather a solemn affair. Dickens, indeed, would have made a grievance or a didactic story out of the tempting material, but Mr. Turner, like Isaak Walton, treats his bait tenderly as though he loved it. The man with a "codicil smile" who lives on society and is found to have invested all his money in an annuity, the lonely bachelor, Phil Hemmings, who keeps a wax figure of a lady in his room for company, Miss Mawksley, Mrs. Crutchberry, are more Christian, more Hans Christian Andersen than Dickens; for the satire is never vociferous, and there is no propaganda except as fuel for laughter. Uncle Jacob Bridger is a type with which every one is familiar at the present day, an autochthonous growth of the last twenty years, the self-deceived and deceiving philanthropist of armchairs and clubs. But, whereas he is a character who might serve as relief to more lifeless and romantic types, Mr. Turner makes him the centre-piece of other life-like and delightful beings. For the many readers who will enjoy the humour and seemingly grotesque situations there may appear something facile in this novel; but the art of bringing a crowded composition even into comic relation is extremely difficult, and here is the art of the book. One, or even two grotesque people are easy enough to handle, to invent, to describe; four or five are more difficult to manipulate, as novelists certainly know and novel-readers realise too often. A power to excel in this direction is a dramatic power. "Uncle Peaceable," besides being the most amusing novel of the year, would make a capital play after the style of Dandy Dick or Ernest. One of Mr. Turner's novels has already been cribbed for the stage. Why should he not become his own plagiarist on this occasion?

The History of Richard Raynal, Solitary. By ROBERT HUGH BENSON. (Pitman, 3s. 6d.)

"THE KING'S ACHIEVEMENT" was a fine historical novel, but in reading it we felt that Father Benson was not so much expressing himself as his sense of duty. In "The Light Invisible," and now again in the novel before us, he is writing from his heart as well as his head. Of "The History of Richard Raynal" we can only say that those who will like it will like it very much indeed. It is not a book for everybody. Those for whom the faith of the Middle Ages is a dream or a morbid delusion, and mysticism a thing for mockery, to whom St. Teresa and St. John of the Cross are "hysterical" subjects of hallucination, had better not attempt the story of Richard Raynal, an English mystic of the fifteenth century, who was sent by Heaven on a mission to King Henry VI., and after many trials died a martyr to his devotion. The first trial was the leaving of his hermit's hut by the wood, where the wild boar, the deer and the rabbits were his friends; and where he had tramped to London, seen the hermit of Westminster in his cell and delivered his message to the king, then came the three great trials, the scourging, the temptation to doubt that his mission was from Heaven, and, last and worst of all, "the dark night of the soul." In and out of the external story, so to speak, runs the inner story, the mystical story; and yet perhaps we have wilfully narrowed the class of readers to whom the book will appeal. Those who know anything of mysticism, who have approached it never so distantly in the lives of others, will read with double pleasure; those who have not, the external story, the charm of the solitary as mere man, cannot fail to delight. The serene and careful beauty of the language may be enjoyed again and again; and, if we find that there is a thought too much insistence on the physical attractions of the solitary, on the other hand the pleasant fiction that the work is translated (with omissions) from an early manuscript version of the story written by a good parish priest who dealt with the mystic side of it at tedious length and with incomplete understanding, not only introduces us to a very delightful character but gives room for a good deal of quiet humour. The rare qualities of Father Benson's mind find here their perfect expression.

The Misses Make-Believe. By MARY STUART BOYD. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

MRS. BOYD has not made a happy choice of a title for her new book; it reveals too much, and is reminiscent of little moral tales not beloved of childhood. This, too, in its way, is a story with a moral, and the sugar-plums of fortune reward Belle's and Eileen's return to the paths of prudence. These girls, daughters of an eminent physician, Sir James Fleming, by secret pinching and scraping, by resorting to shabby and vulgar expedients, keep up appearances far beyond their means. When ruin confronts them they retire to a sleepy Devon village to retrench and repent, and eventually to marry, each according to her heart's desire. There are scores of women like Belle and Eileen Fleming, and the author's photographs of them are lifelike, if unflattering; they are never for one moment attractive or agreeable characters. Their story is often entertaining, however; Mrs. Boyd possesses a keen sense of humour, and clearly hits off the meanness and folly of a certain order of feminine mind; but the interest rarely rises above domestic details and the sayings and doings of a set of dull, commonplace people. Still, details of the pantry and the toilet have a fascination of their own for many novel-readers, and with those who enjoy a simple, cheerful story on these lines, the "Misses Make-Believe" should be popular.

The Threshing Floor. By J. S. FLETCHER. (Unwin, 6s.)

MR. FLETCHER has forsaken the green of rustic comedy, where he sported so pleasantly with his Grand Relations, and has passed—though not out of his Yorkshire—to a broader field, to heights, we might say, well-nigh Wuthering. The house of Challenger has lain under a curse ever since an ancestor slew the last monk who was loth to see his monastery turned into a manor. Their men become drunkards: their women worse than women should be. Brigit Challenger, her brother and her father are no exceptions: her conduct is the talk of the neighbourhood, and the opening chapters show with what fatal justice. She has her father's iron will and physical endurance, unlike her brother, who sinks under the weight of his own wickedness. But a spark of good remains in her, preserved by the faithful retainer Jacob Garthen, and that spark is blown into a flame by the love of a strong, true man. She defies the curse. Even when Marriott, her lover, hears certain proof of her infamy, and leaves her, when ruin falls on her father, her defiance never weakens. She becomes a nurse, and, at last, through her bravery and devotion, she recovers her good name, and wins back Marriott. The story fails to be as powerful as it ought to be, because Mr. Fletcher, in his anxiety for rapidity of action, has overcrowded his canvas with incidents that serve no other purpose than to excite horror—a quite insufficient raison d'être—and so has distracted attention from what is essential, namely the characters of Brigit and of Marriott. About them we know far too little. This overcrowding is the main fault of a powerful book, which certainly should be read.

A Young Man in a Hurry. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS. (Constable, 6s.)

THE title of this book so completely suggests the Americans, that we are not surprised to find that it is written by a native of that country. America is always young, and it hides its old age out of sight, as a rule. This book of short stories is as clever and as full of life as the nation who fathered the author. There is some delightful comedy in the first story, and after that Mr. Chambers goes deeper and shows us the primal emotions, which are the same in the American as in the Englishman, save that the woman queens it more in America than she does in our own land. In the "Fire Warden" we are shown that America has very much the same difficulties as we have in preserving game, only with a great deal more depending upon the unfortunate purchaser of the supposed rights to the game in question. The office of fire warden is new to England, but it has an attractive sound. The love interest runs through the story, and we learn how charming can be the daughter of the important man, and that in emergencies she can represent her father as deputy fire warden. There are other quaint names in the book—the path master, the game warden, the market hunter—and the stories that belong to them are very different from anything English. Most of the tales are full of the life of the forests and of wide untrodden spaces, of a new country and her children. There are one or two which treat of cities and civilisation, in the ordinary sense, and these are as delicately told as many American short stories are. They have a freshness, a vigour, and a refinement which should commend them to all readers who appreciate good, original work, which seldom takes them over the old ground either of plot or treatment.

For Life and After. By G. R. SIMS. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

MR. SIMS has had acquaintance with many sides of criminal life in London and elsewhere, and he turns his knowledge to good use in the life-story of Mrs. Richard Grey, who, by a miscarriage of justice, was condemned to imprisonment for life, and released at the end of fifteen years. The reader knows at the beginning who the real murderer was, and the interest of the book lies, therefore, more in the history of the unfortunate woman and her efforts to prove her innocence than in any wild chase after various clues. Mr. Sims has treated his subject with restraint, and the subsidiary characters are well drawn and necessary to the plot. It is, of course, a story with a moral, but a sensible and interesting work.

FINE ART

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY AT THE NEW GALLERY

THE second section of the exhibition of the International Society is now open, containing, besides the sculpture which has remained from the first section, examples of drawings, etchings, lithographs, water-colours and colour-prints. The society is to be congratulated on this division into two sections, which has enabled it to give a really representative show of international art, especially interesting in the department of coloured methods of reproduction. There is no doubt, I think, that the most interesting and probably the most lucrative form of art will lie in these developments, which have been pursued much more keenly abroad than they have here.

Some of the coloured etchings, lithographs and monotypes, especially of the Germans, have got beyond the experimental stage; and, if they can be brought within the reach of a moderate outlay, great hopes may be entertained of their future.

The president has some cryptic utterances in water-colour; pre-historic maps of nude figures decorated with bars of colour, which appear to represent isothermal curves, such as are to be seen in the daily issue of the Tribune.

The tendency of the artists of each nation is curiously brought out. Thus the French artists nearly all run to ugliness—consciously—sometimes with a kind of zest and appetite, as in Degas, Louis Legrand, Edgar Chahine; sometimes with fury and disgust, as in Forain, Léandre, Lautrec, Georges Rouault. The last presents quite a type in his macabre studies of Pitres, Têtes à Massacre, the frightful “knock ‘em down” dummies in a fair. The French ugliness arises from excess of refinement; it is the taste of a jaded and over-wrought civilisation, whilst the German ugliness is bourgeois and naïf. This unconsciousness of theirs, combined with an extremely able workmanship, gives the oddest effect, as of Caliban writing verses to Miranda. But the German Caliban has all the virtues. He is “tuechtig, erhaben, tugendhaft, gediegen”; sometimes merely showing his plentiful lack of wit, sometimes proving himself the worthy descendant of Albrecht Dürer and compatriot of Brahms. Otto Greiner is a typical instance. His lithographs are tremendously thorough, and in the Dancers Düreresque in learning as well as in ugliness. But this sort of technique applied to modern subjects, such as the Shooting Diploma, leads to a bourgeois ungainliness which must be seen to be believed. The bourgeois is very strong in Arnold Böcklin and in Max Klinger, but with them he is pretentious and “grossartig.” The fuss that has been made about Böcklin and Hans Thoma seems unjustified to most English critics, and we feel inclined to attribute it to the feverish desire in Germany to applaud le dernier cri, which accounts for the popularity of Nietzsche and Richard Strauss.

On the other hand, no broad-minded critic can grudge the applause that was Menzel's portion throughout his long career. He was bourgeois too, but a bourgeois of such mental stature that all our fine gentlemen seem a little thin and poor-blooded in comparison. A fair idea of his immense powers and many-sided interests can be obtained from the collection here brought together. The grip of character in such a drawing as the portrait of General von Olfers is unsurpassable. Among a mass of excellent work one ought not to pass by a beautiful drawing in pastel of the Cathedral at Überlingen by Gotthard Kuehl.

When English artists exhibit with foreigners one feels a little conscious of the amateurish and the pretty-pretty; but the personal gift of Mr. Conder and of Mr. Brabazon carries us lightly over any such misgivings. Mr. Conder is to be welcomed back in his old field of the decorative water-colour on silk. His large arrangement of coral and blue is a glorious dream of colour.

The exhibits in the North Room are by American and English artists, among which should be noticed the pastels of Mr. Muhrman, the brilliantly realistic studies of Mr. George Hallowell, especially that entitled Rapide des Femmes, the water-colours by Mr. Livens of Richmond and Kew Bridges and the beautiful studies of leopards and lions by Mr. Swan.

The balcony should on no account be missed, as some of the most remarkable work is to be seen there: the able but a little mechanical etchings of Anders Zorn, the delicate dry-points of Miss Cassatt in the line she has made her speciality, besides works by Sir Charles Holroyd, Mr. Pennell and others. The etchings of Mr. MacLaughlan are absolutely first-rate; his sincere and personal vision is remarkable in Tivoli, the Certosa, and Melencello: views of Italian scenery in which a certain staleness and archaism is usually a source of irritation. It is pleasant to be reassured that no subject can be pronounced stale, since an original artist can make the most hackneyed interesting.

Some of the processes of reproduction in colour are excellent. Coloured etching is apparently very popular, but the glassy, watery quality is unpleasing. Coloured monotype, on the other hand, lends itself to beautiful qualities as in the Moonlit Night of Carl Langhammer. Coloured lithograph is, of course, an old method, of which there are good German and French examples. The beautiful workmanship of Mr. Allan Seaby's colour-prints should encourage artists to pursue their experiments in Japanese colour-printing. Some of Emil Orlik's prints are also of merit, but the best are more imitative of Japanese style, in which there is no salvation.

B. S.

ROUND THE GALLERIES

THERE are many private art galleries in London, and few of them content themselves with one exhibition per month. At the Leicester Galleries, for example, there are now being exhibited, in addition to the Staats Forbes collection of drawings by Millet, a collection of pictures by “Deceased English Painters, chiefly of the Norwich School,” and Mr. Charles Sims's pictures in oils and water-colour. The Millet drawings tempt one to discourse on his greatness as a draughtsman apart from his emotional appeal in such a work as the pastel version of The Angelus. On the other hand, some delicious little cloud studies by Constable in the Early British section prompt one to compare their freshness with the faded splendour of those works of the painter which are “finished” in more than one sense of the word. Again, Cotman's Cottages at St. Albans, as sweet in colour and gentle in handling as an early Monet or a Whistler, provokes one to proclaim the superiority of this painter over the other members of his school, while Bonington's The Waggon starts one reflecting what this genius might not have achieved if an unkind fate had not cut him down at the age of twenty-six. But with the younger generation imperiously knocking at the door we have no time to muse over the might-have-beens of the past, and we hurry on to the twentieth century and Mr. Charles Sims. Very sweet in colour are Mr. Sims's paintings too, very charming and decorative in composition, very expressive in drawing. Look at the whirl of air and movement in The Moth Catchers. We wonder how it is that Mr. Sims's work has escaped the attention of the Chantrey Trustees, especially when we learn that he is already represented at the Luxembourg. And then we remember that works by Constable and Bonington were secured by the French Government while their painters were without honour in their own country. So there is excellent precedent for the neglect of Mr. Sims.

At the Fine Art Society's are water-colours, From the Alps to the Apennines by Miss Evelyn J. Whyley, bronzes by Charles Van Wijk, and water-colours by living Dutch artists. The last section forms an interesting complement to the exhibition of Sir John Day's fine collection of modern Dutch water-colours, by Mauve, Israels, Neuhuys, the Marises, etc., a little lower down the street at Messrs. Obach's. The soft, sunny scenes of Bernard Schregel, the Brangwynesque market scenes of F. Arntzenius, Mr. Haverman's The Young Mother and the little landscapes and brilliant still-lives of Willem E. Roelofs, jun., are sufficient to prove that the youth of Holland are ably carrying on the torch they received from their fathers; while the bronzes of Van Wijk show that Meunier is not without a worthy successor in his own Netherlands.

But our pilgrimage is not yet ended, for a little below Obach's Mr. Heyman waylays us with an invitation to view “an important Turner,” a large seascape painted in 1838, with great waves curling over a rocky coast, the whole subdued in tone but rich in colour, the lights caked on thickly and the shadows thinly painted. Mr. Heyman has other Turners to show us, a quaint water-colour said to have been executed by the artist at the age of fifteen, and a Sunset in the Tropics which belongs to a much later period. But we are getting a little weary of pictures, and are scarcely to be detained by a deftly handled head by Lawrence, and a masterly portrait group of two young anglers by the great Raeburn. Already we have seen more than we can hope to chronicle.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

AN announcement of great importance is made by the Cambridge University Press. The Syndics have arranged to publish a comprehensive History of English Literature, on a scale and plan more or less resembling that of the Cambridge Modern History. The work will be published in about twelve royal octavo volumes of about four hundred pages each, and will cover the whole course of English literature from Beowulf to the end of the Victorian Age. The action of foreign influences and the part taken by secondary writers in successive literary movements will receive a larger share of attention than is possible in shorter histories, in which lesser writers are apt to be overshadowed by a few great names. Each volume will contain a sufficient bibliography. The Cambridge History of English Literature will be edited by Dr. A. W. Ward, Master of Peterhouse, and Mr. A. R. Waller.

CORRESPONDENCE

HEROIC ROMANCES OF IRELAND

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I am afraid Mr. Leahy's explanation hardly absolves him from the charge of inconsistency. I wrote in no carping spirit, but I considered it my duty to my editor to point out the defects of the translations. The inconsistencies to which I drew attention were: (1) The translations in the first volume followed the form of the original, while in the second a literal rendering was given and also a verse translation; (2) Mr. Leahy gave the Leabhar na h'Uidhri version of "The Sick-bed of Cuchulainn," where two very different forms of the story have been combined, with the result, as I remarked, that "we have endless repetitions, and one paragraph frequently contradicts another. Instead of selecting the better form of each incident and making a continuous whole, Mr. Leahy has translated the manuscript as it stands, and the story, as a story, is unreadable. He has, we notice, omitted the account of the election of Lugaid and the exhortation of Cuchulainn to the new king: we fail to see why he did not continue his excision"; (3) Despite these omissions he did not correct an obvious mistake. The inconsistency is apparent.

For my own part, I think Mr. Leahy's verse in his second volume remarkably good on the whole, and I did not hesitate to say so; but, me judice, the tales lent themselves to prose translation as much as those in the first volume. It would, perhaps, have been better if both volumes had been rendered in verse, with a literal translation on the opposite page. Mr. Leahy, however, reminds me that the object of the series is "not to prepare literal versions for the use of scholars, but to reproduce Irish tales in such English forms as might interest English readers, keeping, however, as near as possible to the sense and form of the Irish." Then why was the literal translation given?

YOUR REVIEWER.

MR. A. ASHTON AND DISCLAIM OF GENTILITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. A. Ashton was not the first modest man to disclaim gentility, as the following story will show. I had the tale from an old friend, who died full of years in the eighties of the last century. He told me that in the year 1836, strolling through a country fair in the county Wicklow, where he held a public appointment, he saw a gambler, who with board, three thimbles and a pea, offered to the crowd the chance of making a fortune. He ventured a shilling and found the pea. Putting the money he had won into his pocket he was walking away, when the gambler, who, I suspect, had allowed him to win the first stake, shouted after him: "Are you not going to play any more?" My friend replied, "No." "Well," said the irate croupier, "you are no gentleman." My friend answered, "I never said I was," and secured the laugh.

EDWARD T. QUINN.

Dublin, March 5

"SIX-SHILLING" NOVELS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The letter of your correspondent H. J. complaining of having to pay six shillings alike for the works of Maxwell Gray, Beatrice Harraden, and Eden Phillpotts only goes to prove how relative is a sense of "quality" in literature. Personally Maxwell Gray's turgid prose makes the reading of "The Great Refusal" an impossibility to me, while any book of Beatrice Harraden's, however slight, is made readable by her pleasant style.

Perish the thought of naming Maxwell Gray and Eden Phillpotts in the same breath! The former belongs to the class of Marie Corelli and Hall Caine, while, to my mind, the latter is in, or almost in, the first rank of novelists. How wisely, then, do the publishers cater at once and at the same cost for my perverted taste and H. J.'s! Then think of the heart-burnings that would follow upon the publishers' decision as to what books should be published at six shillings and what at three shillings and sixpence. Your novels, Mr. Editor, would be issued at six shillings, mine at three shillings and sixpence. How invidious! As things are at present no one but our publishers and ourselves need know that your book was bought by them for a great sum and mine printed at my own cost.

For the comfort of our vanity let us hope no publisher sees H. J.'s letter.

D. F. G.

WORDSWORTH AND SHELLEY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is perfectly useless continuing this discussion with Mr. Fovargue, whose somewhat irrelevant letter appeared on February 24, for the simple reason he is so blinded by his enthusiasm for the "greatest lyricist in our language" that sound and sense appear from his point of view to be synonymous terms.

Taking him at his word and harking back to the real crux of this controversy, viz., the "immortal phrase," and applying that test to Shelley's verse, in spite of his "haunting melody," he is simply nowhere in comparison with Wordsworth. And I will be bold enough to go a step further and say "it is utterly ridiculous" to attempt to compare them from that aspect. Indeed, it would not be difficult to find in one piece of Wordsworth's verse more immortal phrases than could be culled from the whole of Shelley's works.

The circumstances that gave birth to Coleridge's famous eulogy of Wordsworth's work are, to me, in spite of Mr. Fovargue's insistence, utterly beside the question. Few, I venture to say, will dispute its justice, and still fewer are so well qualified to utter such a eulogy, for not only was Coleridge a great poet, but he was also a great critic, and a singularly acute thinker. However, for Mr. Fovargue's benefit I will give the origin of the quotation, viz., Wordsworth's Memoirs, vol. ii. page 74.

In closing, I would advise Mr. Fovargue in entering on his next controversy to use more courteous terms than that of "fanatical devotee" as applied to one who differs from him.

STANLEY HUTTON.

March 5.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Probably I should not have bothered you again but for the necessity of introducing a few words of reply to "A Student of Literature," who has read into my last letter what it did not contain, setting up a target of his own to aim at! He has brought up very heavy artillery and trained it carefully upon a position which I did not and could not occupy. There is a big display, but his practice is quite harmless so far as my former remarks are concerned. To watch the bombardment has been diverting and possibly amusing. It has served these purposes well—that is all that can be said with truth—and your correspondent is to be thanked accordingly.

Let me briefly touch upon the two or three points raised in his letter:

(1) Most certainly I do not hold the opinion attributed to Wordsworth, that he could have written plays like Shakespeare had he wished. The notion is absurd and cannot surely be entertained by any sane critic. What I did submit was simply this: that the mere fact that Wordsworth did not write dramas does not prove that he couldn't. We know from the single work of this kind left by him that he had some dramatic power; but we are also quite safe in concluding, from a sound estimate of his genius based upon his entire output, that his mind was not essentially dramatic, and that whatever he might have done in that department would hardly have stood comparison for a moment with even the lesser plays of Shakespeare.

(2) Macaulay's gifts were many and varied, but acute critical insight into literature was not one of them. The expression of abstract conceptions in concrete terms—in fact, all that may be roughly included under allegory and personification—is doubtless a gift, though of a facile kind—lying on the surface, so to speak. The nine masterpieces mentioned by "A Student" are not supremely great because of the examples they furnish of the exercise of this gift, but rather because of the vastness and truth of their conceptions of life, their profound spiritual beauty; and that amazing imaginative power whereby they reveal and interpret, justify and reconcile, unify and clarify, and bring into rational relation the realities of character and being underlying outward appearances.

This gift for which your correspondent appears so highly to esteem these works is by no manner of means the reason of their greatness: it is seen and felt to be altogether subordinate by discerning readers. More than this: artistic creations like "The Faery Queen" and "The Pilgrim's Progress" are immortally great quite apart from allegory, etc.—perhaps one may say in spite of it!

(3) My critic next proceeds to fire off at me a long list of books which he says are infected with pessimism and melancholy, presumably to show that these objectionable qualities in a book need not in themselves necessarily disqualify it from occupying a distinguished position in the realm of letters. I must first remind him that this is not the question in dispute between us at all. My contention was, and is, simply that the prevalence in Shelley's poetry of unhealthy and morbid elements, and the sombre pessimism colouring so much of it places it, in these respects, considerably below that of Wordsworth, a poet who points us to the permanent sources of happiness in life and in experience, leads us ever to the "central peace subsisting at the heart of endless agitation," and blesses and strengthens us with the quiet joy which he himself had gained by love and reflection. In this important matter he is, therefore, by far the nobler poet. And, other things being equal, the writer who does this for us will always be the greater. It is a shallow philosophy that issues in Schopenhauerism!

But in glancing carefully through "A Student's" list I find, first of all, that several of the works named by him have most decidedly not won acceptance as belonging to the first or even second rank, e.g., "The Prisoner of Chillon," "The Bride of Lammermoor," "Isabella," "Romola," "Eugénie Grandet," and the "Satires" of Swift and Juvenal. These being sorted out, I very emphatically deny that, in any large view of the case, the remaining masterpieces are really fruits of the spirit of pessimism, or produce in us those baneful, depressing and paralysing feelings flowing from that radically false view of life. There is contained in them certainly the most serious and earnest contemplations of life, and there is frank (ideal) representation of all sides thereof; but in those of them even that are fullest of sadness and solemnity and pitifulness, by the operation of the principle of Katharsis, our emotions are purged and freed, so that we can rise from the perusal of Hamlet, King Lear, Agamemnon, Edipus Rex and the rest of them with minds fortified with courage and hearts consoled and calmed—yea, and lightened and cheered:

"By force of sorrows high
Uplifted to the purest sky
Of undisturbed humanity."

(4) I can pass over "A Student's" further note concerning "trash." His remarks unfortunately do not bear upon my contentions, but go off completely at a tangent. Still I think it is in order to suggest to him that there exist in all literatures multitudes of poems of mediocre merit, of inferior quality, much below the line of high achievement, but yet good and worthy of their kind and in their class, and not at all deserving the epithet "trash" bestowed so freely by some people who do not like them, or cannot understand that there is good in them.

G. E. BIDDLE.

ST. WILLIAM'S COLLEGE, YORK

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR.—The restoration of the beautiful old building known as St. William's College, lying under the shadow of York Minster, which is to serve as a much-needed Convocation and Church House for the North, proceeds apace.

The large chamber for the House of Laymen will soon be completed, and that for the House of Bishops also very shortly. Electric light, ventilation shafts and fans, and warming apparatus are now being laid down.

But through lack of funds we have been unable hitherto to commence the work on the chamber for the Lower House, the committee rooms, and caretaker's rooms.

The handsome offer of £500 towards the chamber for the Lower House has just been made to us on condition of a like sum being raised at once to meet it. This may be done by one sum of £500, or by five of £100, or by fifty of £10 or one hundred of £5. Will you kindly help us to make this offer widely known in the hope that those who are able will come forward to secure it?

A most interesting account of this ancient religious house, where also the mint and printing press of King Charles found a home in troublous times, is to be seen in the Treasury for February; and papers giving further details may be obtained from the Secretary.

Contributions may be sent to Becketts Bank, York, or to the Secretary.

G. R. WAKEFIELD, Chairman,
Bishop of Wakefield.
C. N. GRAY, Secretary,
Helmsley, R.S.O.

BOOKS RECEIVED

ART.

Bemrose, William. Longton Hall Porcelain: being further information relating to this interesting fabrique. 11½ x 8. Pp. xxi, 72. Illustrated. Bemrose, 42s. net.

[Starting from Mr. Nightingale's work. 1881, Mr. Bemrose set himself to find out all that he could about William Littler and his early attempt to make porcelain in Staffordshire, circa 1745. The result has been to give meaning to much that is vague, and to establish the characteristics of this interesting work (which Mr. Bemrose himself does not always admire). The volume is lavishly and sumptuously illustrated with beautiful reproductions in colour.]

Finberg, A. J. The English Water Colour Painters. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xxi, 190. Duckworth: Popular Library of Art. Cloth, 2s. net; leather 2s. 6d. net. [It is surprising how much information and criticism Mr. Finberg manages to get into his small space. Bare historical fact is not to his taste, but he uses history as a clue to interpretation and understanding. He has his point of view, which, right or not, he explains ably. The 40 and odd illustrations are well chosen and serviceably reproduced.]

Drawings of David Cox. 11½ x 8½. Modern Master Draughtsmen. Newnes, 7s. 6d. net.

[Thirteen pages of biographical and critical introduction by Mr. A. J. Finberg. Coloured frontispiece, and 44 plates, 3 of which are in colour.] Board of Education, South Kensington. Catalogue of Prints, II. Modern Etchings and Aquatints of the British and American schools in the National Art Library, Victoria and Albert Museum. 8½ x 5½. Pp. 364. H.M. Stationery Office, 2s. 6d.

[Compiled by Mr. Martin Hardie: Original works only, not Reproductions of pictures or drawings.]

CLASSICS.

The Philoctetes of Sophocles. With a commentary abridged from the larger edition of Sir R. C. Jebb by E. S. Shuckburgh. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xlv, 228. Cambridge University Press, 4s.

[Intended for "ordinary or youthful students," and carried out on the principle which guided Dr. Shuckburgh in his admirable edition of the Antigone and Edipus Coloneus. Certain additions rendered necessary by the fact that this edition does not contain the English translation.]

Euripides: Medea and Hippolytus. With Introduction, Translations and Notes by Sydney Waterlow. 7 x 4½. Pp. xviii, 206. Dent, 2s. 6d. net.

[This is the first volume of the new "Temple Greek and Latin Classics." The Greek is given on one page, the English prose translation opposite. The Introduction is critical; the notes explanatory, critical and sometimes textual. An Appendix of the most important differences between the readings of "the MSS." and that adopted by the editor, who frequently follows Verrall. The book is very well printed and bound, and there is a frontispiece showing the Naples bust of the poet. This promises to be a delightful series for the general reader.]

Plato: Theaetetus and Philebus. Translated and explained by H. F. Carllill. 7½ x 5. Pp. xxv, 202. Sonnenschein, cloth, 3s. 6d. net; leather, 4s. 6d. net.

[This is also the first volume of a new series, "The New Classical Library," edited by Dr. Emil Reich, for readers who have no Latin or Greek. The Introduction sets forth the disagreements of the commentators, and gives Mr. Carllill's own view of the Platonic philosophy. Then comes his translation of the Theaetetus; then an excursus on it which is also an introduction to the Philebus; Concluding Essay on the Theory of Man in the Philebus and its place in science; short bibliography and index.]

DRAMA.

Phillips, Stephen. Nero. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 127. Macmillan, 4s. 6d. net. (See p. 221.) Hale, Edward Everett, jr. Dramatists of To-day: Rostand, Hauptmann, Sudermann, Pinero, Shaw, Phillips, Maeterlinck. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 236. Bell, 6s. net.

[An informal discussion of the significant work of these dramatists. By an American critic: Partly reprinted from The Dial. A useful appendix giving date and plan of first productions of plays, with occasional notice of performance in countries and languages other than the author's. Index.]

EDUCATION.

Pitt Press Series. Tales from Shakespeare. By Charles and Mary Lamb. Second Selection, edited by J. H. Flather. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xvi, 160. Cambridge University Press, 1s. 6d.

[Midsummer Night's Dream, Winter's Tale, Much Ado about Nothing, Macbeth, Comedy of Errors, Othello. Introduction; glossary; short extracts from the plays.]

Donington, G. C. Practical Exercises in Chemistry. 7½ x 4½. Pp. x, 251. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.

[An attempt to combine "text-book" and "experimental" teaching. The instructions for each experiment are fully given, but there is no statement of the precise facts to be observed, and the work of making the deductions is left entirely to the student. Diagrams and Index.]

FICTION.

Somerset, Lady Henry. Under the Arch of Life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 315. Hurs & Blackett, 6s.

Tynan, Katharine. The Yellow Domino, and other stories. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 312. White, 6s.

Kernahan, Mrs. Coulson. An Artist's Model. 8 x 5½. Pp. 312. Hurst & Blackett, 6s.

Ventors, David. Sweet Mistress Anne. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 556. Drane, 6s.

Easton, W. G. The House by the Bridge. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. Lane, 6s.

Carr, M. E. The Poison of Tongues. 7½ x 5. Pp. 320. Smith, Elder, 6s.

Marsh, Richard. The Garden of Mystery. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 318. Long, 6s.

Tweedale, Violet. Lady Sarah's Son. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 380. Long, 6s.

Turner, Reginald. Uncle Peaceable, a Comedy. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 322. Greening 6s. (See p. 227.)

Gissing, Algernon. The Master of Pinsmead. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. Long, 6s.

Smith, James, and Sutton, John Wren. The Secret of the Sphinx, or the Ring of Moses. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 288. Wellby, 6s.

[The story of Moses, imaginatively and theosophically related. Moses, we may note, is here the illegitimate son of Pharaoh's daughter, Pherenice, and a Hebrew mason named Nathan.]

Tracy, Louis. Karl Grier, the strange story of a man with a sixth sense. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 277. Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.

[The sixth sense was "telegony" or far-knowing. Mr. Grier could also understand the language of animals.]

Regnas, C. The Land of Nison. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 310. Daniel, 6s.

[When we say that Nison=No Sin, and that some of the chapters are headed thus: "Eht Licnuoc," it will be clear that Mr. Regnas has read "Erewhon." He has read "The Coming Race" as well and assimilated

- its idea of "vril," and has written a novel of a subterranean land, through a visit to which the hero acquires wealth and the power of living to 200 years.]
- Morse, Margaret. The Spirit of the Pines. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 159. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin. $1.00
- [The love-story of two nature-lovers of unusual temperaments, in the woods of New Hampshire.]
- Kieler, Laura. Thy People shall be my People, or Karen Jurgens of Egtved. Translated by Berno (Clara Bener). 7½ x 5½. Pp. 294. Jarrold, 6s.
- [A translation of a very popular Danish novel, giving a picture of Danish life and habits.]
- Irving, George. Love? 7½ x 5½. Pp. 320. Greening, 6s.

HISTORY.

- Mackinnon, James. A History of Modern Liberty. Vols. I. and II. 9 x 6. Pp. xxxiii, 888. Longmans, 30s. net.
- [Assuming the fact of human liberty (i.e. free will) as well as of human dependence, Dr. Mackinnon writes the history of that liberty throughout the modern age. His first volume examines the origins of liberty in the Middle Ages, starting from the chaos of the western Roman Empire. Vol. II. carries the story to the Reformation in Central and Western Europe, with particular attention to England and Scotland down to the time of Elizabeth. Future volumes will deal with the seventeenth, eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in England, France and America, etc. Each volume has an Index.]
- Colvin, Sir Auckland. The Making of Modern Egypt. 9½ x 6½. Pp. xv, 428. With Portraits and Maps. Seeley, 18s. net.
- [The object of these pages is to tell, in popular terms, the story of the making of modern Egypt under British influence. The story begins with the arrival of Lord Dufferin in Egypt, 1882 (the history of earlier years being briefly sketched), and is carried down to 1904. Index.]

LITERATURE.

- Monahan, Michael. Benigna Vena. Essays, Literary and Personal. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 187. New York: The Alban Publishing Co.
- [Mr. Monahan is the editor and main author—or at any rate the soul—of that interesting publication The Papyrus, a Magazine of Individuality.]

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Heape, Walter. The Breeding Industry: its value to the Country and its Needs. 7½ x 5. Pp. xii, 154. National Problems. Cambridge University Press, 2s. 6d. net.
- [The application of Science to the Breeding Industry, "the greatest industry to which Science has never yet been applied." Mr. Heape's desire is to draw close together the Practical Breeder and the Scientific Biologist.]
- Abrahams, Israel. Festival Studies, being Thoughts on the Jewish Year. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 185. Macmillan, 2s. 6d.
- [Papers mainly written to "provide momentary entertainment or to provoke passing thought on the festivals of the Jewish year occurred." Reprinted, many of them, from the Jewish Chronicle.]
- The English Catalogue of Works for 1905*. 10 x 6½. Pp. 302. The Publishers' Circular, Ltd.
- [The 69th yearly issue of this invaluable publication, which gives "in one Alphabet, under author, title and subject, the size, price, month of publication, and publisher of books issued in the United Kingdom and of some of those issued in the United States," and is a continuation of the "London" and "British" Catalogues. Appendix of Transactions of Learned Societies, and Directory of Publishers.]
- Inkster, Lawrence. Library Grouping. 10½ x 6½. Pp. 7. Aberdeen University Press, 8vo.
- [Reprinted from the Library Association Record, February 1906.]
- Corporation of Wigan Free Public Library. Catalogue of Books. By H. T. Folkard, Librarian. Part VII. P-Pizz. 9½ x 7½. Pp. 353. Wigan: Starr.
- Dod's Peerage, Baronage and Knightage of Great Britain and Ireland*. Supplement. February, 1906. 7 x 4½. Pp. 40. Whittaker, 1s. net.
- [Brought up-to-date. With a note on "The Choice of Peerage Titles."]
- Morris, George Le, and Wood, Esther. The Country Cottage. 6½ x 4½. Pp. xvi, 152. Lane. The Country Handbooks, 3s. net.
- [All about building a country cottage, from drains to decoration. Diagrams and illustrations. Index. Thoroughly practical.]
- Young, Filson. The Happy Motorist: an introduction to the use and enjoyment of a motor-car. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 230. E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.
- Hints on the Cure of Stammering*. By one who has suffered. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 16. Edinburgh: Elliot, 6d. net.
- Hardy, E. J. What Men Like in Women and What Women Like in Men. 7½ x 5. Pp. 149. Werner Laurie, 1s. net.
- [By the author of "How to be happy though married." Sometimes homely, but not nearly so vulgar as the title.]

PHILOSOPHY.

- Westermarck, Edward. The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas. In 2 volumes. Vol. I. 9 x 6½. Pp. xxi, 716. Macmillan, 14s. net.
- [The first of Dr. Westermarck's work comprises a study of the moral concepts; right, wrong, duty, justice, etc., an examination into the moral emotions, their nature and origin, and their relations to moral concepts. These will cause a discussion of the subjects of moral judgments and an answer to the question why some things are matters of moral concern and others are not. Finally the most important of these subjects will be classified, and the moral ideas relating to each class will be stated and explained.]
- Höfding, Harold. The Philosophy of Religion. Translated from the German edition by B. E. Meyer. 9 x 6. Pp. viii, 410. Macmillan, 12s. net.
- O. Hashnu Hara. Practical Psychometry: its value and how it is mastered. 6½ x 4½. Pp. 88. Fowler, 1s. net.

POETRY.

- Moore, T. Sturge. Poems. Collected in one volume. The Centaur's Booty; The Rout of the Amazons; The Gazelles and other Poems; Pan's Prophecy; To Leda and other odes; Theseus, Medea and Lyrics. 8½ x 6½. Pp. 202. Duckworth 6s. net.
- [A re-issue in a single volume of the six little brown paper volumes published by Messrs. Duckworth.]
- Rice, Cale Young. Plays and Lyrics. 8½ x 7½. Pp. 317. Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net.

- [By an American author. The plays, in verse, Yolanda and David, are good. As a lyric poet Mr. Rice seems scarcely worthy of the beautiful paper, print and binding his publishers have provided for him.]
- Ware, Joseph. The Divine Man. A new Epic. 9½ x 6½. Pp. 278. The True Light Publishing Co.

["The Theme of the Iliad," says the author, "is the contention of gods and of heroes for the destruction of Troy; the Aeneid, its re-establishment; Paradise Lost, the fall of man; The Divine Man, a New Epic, the progress of man to final perfection in the kingdom of Heaven." The scene of the New Epic is the Transfiguration; and one of the episodes is the revelation by an Angel to St. James of the flag of the United States, of which an illustration is given. We believe the book to be written in all simplicity and earnestness.]

- Sharply, Hugo. A Realist of the Aegean, being a verse-translation of the Mimes of Herodas. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 57. Nutt, 2s. 6d. net.
- Marks, Mary A. M. The Tree of Knowledge. 7½ x 4½. Pp. 173. Nutt, 3s. 6d. net.

[About half of these 173 Sonnets were privately printed in 1896. They start with Eden and the fall of Man, and go on to the New Earth. There is much thought and devotion in Mrs. Marks's work, and not a little sincere and grave poetry.]

POLITICAL.

- Lely, Sir F. S. P. Suggestions for the better governing of India. With special reference to the Bombay Presidency. 7½ x 5½. Pp. 117. Alston Rivers, 1s. net and 1s. 6d. net.
- [Plain-speaking from a retired Indian Civilian. The author's main contention is "that the broad lines of government as lately extended and deepened by Lord Curzon are true, but the administrative filling-in is often at fault." He pleads for more personal knowledge, sympathy and consideration, particularly in the minor but all-important matters of detail.]
- Munro, A. (of Johannesburg). The Transvaal (Chinese) Labour Problem. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxvii, 64. Drane, 2s. 6d. net.
- [Dr. Munro is a whole-hearted supporter of Chinese Labour.]
- Brailsford, H. N. Macedonia: its races and their future. 9 x 6. Pp. xx, 340. Methuen, 12s. 6d. net.
- [Mr. Brailsford's main object is to explain, with what detail is necessary, the nature of Turkish rule as it affects the peasantry of Macedonia. He has spent much time in five journeys to the Near East, and passed the winter of 1903-4 in Monastir on behalf of the British relief fund; and sees no hope in an arrangement in which the rulers' creed is one of resignation and the ruled of freedom. Fully illustrated. 2 Maps. Index.]

REPRINTS AND NEW EDITIONS.

- Essays, Moral and Polite (1660-1714)*. Selected and edited by John and Constance Masefield. The Chap. Books—ii. 4½ x 3½. Pp. xiii, 263. E. Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net.
- [Selections from John Evelyn, Jeremy Collier, Cowley, Dryden, Roger L'Estrange, Earl of Shaftesbury, Addison, Steele and George Berkeley.]
- Lever, Charles. Arthur O'Leary: his wanderings and ponderings in many lands. With 10 illustrations by George Cruikshank. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xix, 388. Macmillan, 3s. 6d.

SCIENCE.

- Burke, John Butler. The Origin of Life: its physical basis and definition. 9 x 6½. Pp. xvi, 351. Chapman & Hall, 16s. net.

THEOLOGY.

- Patrick, William. James the Lord's Brother. 8½ x 6. Pp. xii, 366. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 6s. net.
- [By the Principal of Manitoba College, Winnipeg. Dr. Patrick's aim is to show "the James of history," rather than "the James of Legend and romance." He believes James to have been the son of Joseph and Mary. He finds his Christianity in essence identical with that of Paul, and believes the relations between the two to have been frank and cordial.]
- Oldfield, W. J. A Primer of Religion based on the Catechism of the Church of England. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xvi, 222. Methuen, 2s. 6d.
- [Intended to help in home teaching. Frequent diagrams which can be drawn with a pair of compasses, to facilitate learning by young children.]
- Wagner, Charles. The Gospel of Life. 7½ x 5½. Pp. x, 246. Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.
- [A few sermons chosen at random, and reproduced from memory on paper. The theme of the book is the close tie between work and adoration, the Gospel and daily life.]
- Barry, William. The Tradition of Scripture: its origin, authority and interpretation. 7½ x 5½. Pp. xxv, 278. Longmans, 3s. 6d. net.
- [This is the first volume of "The Westminster Library," a series of manuals edited by Mr. Bernard Ward and the Rev. Herbert Thurston, S.J., for the use of Catholic Priests and students, embracing fields of professional knowledge (other than Dogmatic and Moral Theology) which is in danger of being crowded out in the years before ordination, and the practical utility of which may not be fully realised until some experience of the ministry has been gained.]

TOPOGRAPHY AND TRAVEL.

- Wilson, the Rev. C. T. Peasant Life in the Holy Land. 9 x 6. Pp. x, 321. Illustrated. Murray, 12s. net.
- [An attempt to record some of the customs and manners of the Fellahin in the Holy Land to-day, in order to throw some light on the Bible and rouse deeper and more sympathetic interest in the Western mind. Mr. Wilson spent many years in Palestine as a member of the C. M. S.]
- Pratt, A. E. Two Years among New Guinea Cannibals: a Naturalist's sojourn among the aborigines of unexplored New Guinea. With notes and observations by his son, Henry Pratt, and appendices on the scientific results of the Expedition. With 54 illustrations and a map. 8½ x 6. Pp. 360. Seeley, 16s. net.
- Edwards, A. Herbage. Kakemono: Japanese Sketches. 8½ x 6½. Pp. viii, 300. Heinemann, 7s. 6d. net.
- [Mr. Edwards divides his book into sections: The Faith of Japan; Lord Fuji, which describes an ascent of that mountain; The Art of the Nation; Scenes in Rain and Sunshine; The Land of the Gods; the Heart of the People.]
- Snell, F. J. The Blackmore Country. With fifty full-page illustrations from photographs by C. W. Barnes Ward. 8½ x 5½. Pp. xviii, 288. Black, 6s.

THE "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARY

Roses for English Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY.
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 10d.

Lilies for English Gardens

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.
By post, 8s. 10d.

Wall and Water Gardens

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."
Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants
on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page Illustrations.
Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net. By post, 12s. 10d.

The Century Book of Gardening

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover
of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations.
21s. net. By post, 21s. 10d.

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Trees and Shrubs for English
Gardens

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net. By post, 13s.

Volumes I. and II.

Gardens Old and New

(The Country House and its Garden Environment.) Over 450
Superb Illustrations in each Volume, printed on treble thick
Art Paper, portraying in a manner never before attempted the greatest and most interesting Gardens and Homes in England. 22 2s. net each.
By post, 22 3s. each.

A NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION OF

The Fruit Garden

By GEORGE BUNYARD V.M.H., and OWEN THOMAS,
V.M.H. Price 12s. 6d. net, by post 13s.

Sweet Violets and Pansies,
and Violets from Mountain and Plain

Written by several authorities, and Edited by E. T. COOK, Editor of
"The Garden," Author of "Trees and Shrubs," etc.
Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

The Book of British Ferns

By CHAS. T. DRUERY, F.L.S., V.M.H., President of the British
Pteridological Society. Price 3s. 6d. net. By post, 3s. 10d.

Carnations and Pinks

Written by Experts and Edited by E. T. COOK. Price 3s. 6d. net.
By post, 3s. 10d.

NOW READY

PRICE 3s. 6d., by post 3s. 10d.

DIFFERENT DRUMMERS

BY

EVELYNE E. RYND,

Author of "Mrs. Green," "The Riggleses."

Times.—"The title is from Thoreau's fine saying, 'If a man does not keep pace with his companions, perhaps it is because he hears a different drummer'; and the author here shows that the humour of 'Mrs. Green' is only part of her literary outlook, for she touches with real skill the lives of those who do not walk in step with that delightful charwoman. There is a touch of her in one or two of the stories, but they are very varied—three of them in Womanly
—and, in all, the chords of real and tender human feeling are touched with skill and sympathy."

NOW READY

BIG GAME SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each net,
by post 12/11 each.

Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

NOW READY

HALF A CENTURY OF
SPORT IN HAMPSHIRE

Being Extracts from the Shooting Journals of JAMES EDWARD,
SECOND EARL OF MALMESBURY, with a Prefatory Memoir by his Great Grandson, THE FIFTH EARL.

Edited by F. G. AFLALO

Price 10/6 net. By post, 10/11

POLO

PAST AND PRESENT

By T. F. DALE.

Price 12/6 net, by post, 13/-

Field.—"Polo Past and Present" deals with the subject to the minutest detail, and the book is filled with useful hints and maxims. The style in which the information is proffered gains for the author the confidence of the reader, and to those who are interested in the subject comes the satisfaction, as they lay the book aside, that they have gained knowledge in the historical, theoretical, and practical views of Polo. It is given to few writers to thoroughly realise the niceties which surround the modern circumstance. In this Mr. Dale is particularly fortunate, for not only may the novice become initiated in what best concerns him, but the experienced may find pleasure in digesting the reminiscence of an observant mind.

"Regimental Polo, elementary Polo, and the training of the Polo pony, each has its chapter, to be followed with an excellent treatise of Tournament Polo and Team-play, certainly the most instructive message the book contains and well worthy the consideration of the player. Mr. Dale gives detailed consideration to combination in match teams, and explains the why and wherefore, not always an easy task even for those who are high exponents of the game. Umpires and referees are given their corner, and many wholesome words of advice are spoken to guide the fulfilment of their duties.

"A very good chapter on the management and care of Polo grounds will prove of service to the troubled spirits of hard-worked secretaries, and the book closes with varied and complete information of Polo in Australia and America; rules of England and India; a full-fledged appendix of useful information; and last, but not least, a thoroughly efficient index."

SHOOTING

In Two Volumes

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post 25/8. Vols. I and 2, 12/- each net, by post 12/11 each.

FISHING

Edited by Mr. HORACE G. HUTCHINSON

Now Ready. In Two Volumes

With Coloured Plates of Salmon and Trout Flies. Over 250 Full-Page
Illustrations with various diagrams

2 Vols., 25/- net, by post, 25/10. Vols. I and 2, 12/6 each
net, by post 13/- each.

ROYAL EXCHANGE Incorporated] ASSURANCE [A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Sea, Annuities,
Accidents,
Employers' Liability.

The Corporation is prepared to act as
Executor of Wills, Trustee of Wills and Settlements.

SPECIAL TERMS TO
ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Funds in Hand . . . £5,250,000.

For full Prospectus apply to the SECRETARY.

Head Office: ROYAL EXCHANGE, E.C.
West End Office: 29 PALL MALL, S.W.

PUBLISHERS' MEDIA.

THE SPHERE.

6d. Weekly.

A Literary Letter by C. K. S. appears each Week. Also List of Books Received.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT RATES FOR PUBLISHERS'
ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Office: Great New Street, E.C.

THE PALL MALL GAZETTE. 10, 12, 14, and 16 Pages Daily

THE EVENING PAPER OF THE EDUCATED MAN AND HIS FAMILY.

Famous for its brilliant Reviews of current Literature, and without doubt the best Evening Paper in the Kingdom for Publishers' Announcements.

Special Columns for New Books. Next to Literary Matter every Day.

OFFICES: NEWTON STREET, HOLBORN, LONDON, W.C.

The Best, Brightest, and most Interesting Paper.

THE DAILY CHRONICLE. 10 or 12 Pages Daily.

POPULAR FEATURES ARE:—

The Reviews of Books and Literary Notes, Full Resume of the Principal
Musical, Art, and Dramatic Events. Science and Art Specially dealt with.

Fulllest Reports of all Current Events and Special Telegrams from Correspondents Everywhere.

THE ABERDEEN FREE PRESS.

The Morning Newspaper of Aberdeen and the Northern Half of Scotland.

Reviews of Books appear on Mondays and Thursdays, and on other days as required.

Book Advertisements are inserted on Literary Page.

NEW BOOKS ARE PROMPTLY REVIEWED.

LONDON OFFICE: 149 FLEET STREET, E.C.

IS YOUR PENCIL A
KOH-I-NOOR
OR ONLY AN IMITATION?

There are no better pencils made than L. & C. Hardtmuth's Koh-I-Noor Pencils. Many Manufacturers have tried to equal this wonderful pencil—all have failed. The merit lies in the lead, in the selected wood, and in the workmanship. Using a Koh-I-Noor is like drawing silk over paper—so smooth.

Koh-I-Noor Pencils are one price everywhere—4d. each, or 3s. 6d. for one dozen. Of Stationers, Photographic Dealers, and Artists' Colourmen. Dainty Booklet on Pencils post free from L. & C. HARDTMUTH, 12 Golden Lane, London, E.C.

JOSEPH GILLOTT'S

"J.G." & "WELCOME" PENS.

The "J.G." is rapidly superseding the old "J." It is the best broad-pointed pen ever made. The "Welcome" is one of the new metal pens, with a special point, soft in touch, and very suitable for rapid, flowing handwriting.

Joseph Gillott's Pens in Sixpenny and Gross Boxes, of Stationers, etc. Sample Card of Pens free on receipt of Penny Stamp for Postage and Address. Sample Box of Thirty Pens, assorted, for testing, Seven Stamps.—JOSEPH GILLOTT & SONS, (Dept. 3) 37 Gracechurch Street, London, E.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE,
SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION

Inland, 15s. post free. Foreign and Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

*This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of
THE ACADEMY, SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.*

To _____

Please send me the ACADEMY for the next _____

months. I enclose remittance value _____

Name _____

Description _____

Address _____

THE ACADEMY

MARCH 10, 1906

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

BROWN, LANGHAM'S NEW BOOKS

Indian Reminiscences.

Here and There

Memories, Indian and Other. By H. G. KEENE, C.I.E. With Portrait. Royal 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

"There is more than enough in the book to justify its existence. There is also less of the acrimony with which, in 'A Servant of John Company,' the author criticised some of his contemporaries. Not that he is at peace with all the world even now. . . . He has remembered, however, many things worth telling; and his literary and artistic tastes give the book a pleasant flavour." STANDARD.

A Cowboy's Adventures.

The Sunset Trail

By A. H. LEWIS, Author of "The President" and "Wolfville Days." Illustrated. 6s.

"Just published. The stirring adventures of "Bat" Masterson with Indians and desperadoes will appeal to every reader who likes excitement, and plenty of it.

School and College Life.

Christopher Deane

By E. H. LACON WATSON. A new and cheaper edition of this story of Winchester and Cambridge. With Frontispiece, crown 8vo, cloth gilt. 3s. 6d.

"A review of 'Christopher Deane' must necessarily harp upon the two notes 'charming' and 'wholesome,' because there is no part of this straightforward story of how two manly boys grew up to be Englishmen of the best public-school and university type which does not deserve one or both of these adjectives."—WEEK'S SURVEY.

A Story of the Sea.

The Lady Navigators

By EDWARD NOBLE. 6s.

"It is sure to be likened to the work of Mr. W. W. Jacobs. But, paradox though it may seem, this is reality compared with fantasy. . . . What pleasures occur in the course of the trip; what true picturing of human nature, male and female; what faithful nautical episodes; what brilliantly written seascapes, bitten into the reader's mind! Altogether the thing is a most excellent piece of nautical fooling."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

A Story of Anglo-Indian Life.

A Daughter of Thor

By HELEN MAXWELL. Second Large Edition just ready. 6s.

"A thoroughly and typically modern novel."—SKETCH.

"The merits of the book are very decided."—MORNING LEADER.

A Charming Book of Essays.

Reflections of a Householder

By E. H. LACON WATSON. 3s. 6d.

"Here are eighteen essays written with a rare grace of style, an easy, familiar charm that weaves so gradual and subtle a spell upon you that you open the volume merely with the intention of glancing through the first one before you go to bed, and find you have forgotten your intention and got nearly half through the book before you remember it again. You decide to read no further than the next one, and go on making it the next one and the next, until you have read them all."—BOOKMAN for February.

TWO POPULAR BOOKS.

Three Little Gardeners

By L. AGNES TALBOT. Second Edition. 2s. 6d. net.

"This book should be given to every little girl or boy who has a garden, and who is anxious to do things properly."—EXAMINER.

Litanies of Life

By KATHLEEN WATSON. Third Edition. 2s. 6d. net.

"A little book containing five short stories, but every one of them is worth reading, and the note of all sounds sweet and true. The reader will lay down the book, as I did, with a feeling of profound sympathy and gratitude to the writer."—MR. W. T. STEAD.

BROWN, LANGHAM & CO., 78 NEW BOND STREET, W.

A SELECTION FROM MACMILLAN'S NEW & FORTHCOMING BOOKS

MEMOIRS OF ARCHBISHOP TEMPLE.

By SEVEN FRIENDS.
Edited by E. G. SANDFORD, Archdeacon of Exeter.
With Photogravure and other illustrations in 2 vols. 8vo, 36s. net.

HENRY SIDGWICK: A Memoir.

By A. S. and E. M. S. With Portraits, 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

NOW READY.

NERO.

By STEPHEN PHILLIPS. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

SECOND PART NOW READY.

THE DYNASTS.

A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars, in 3 Parts, 19 Acts, 130 Scenes. By THOMAS HARDY.
Part Second. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

*.* Previously Published, Part I., 4s. 6d. net.

TIMES.—"Perhaps Mr. Hardy's greatest book. . . . It is a great, modern, Epic of the Intelligence—a vision of the world charged with amazing significance, amazing originality of conception."

NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE SOUL OF A PEOPLE."

A PEOPLE AT SCHOOL

By H. FIELDING HALL. 8vo, 10s. net.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A book marked by such individuality as gives it a continuous charm from first page to last. . . . Really delightful book—a notable addition to the many excellent records kept by Empire-builders in far portions of the King's dominions."

THE ARBITER IN COUNCIL

8vo, 10s. net.

*.* A volume which deals, partly by way of essay, partly by way of conversation, with various aspects of Peace and War.

POCKET TENNYSON.

TENNYSON'S COMPLETE WORKS. In 5 vols. Printed on India Paper. Fcap. 8vo. With full gilt tops. Limp cloth, 2s. net. Limp leather, 3s. net each. [Shortly.]

EVELYN'S DIARY.

New Edition in 3 volumes, with Preface and Notes by AUSTIN DOBSON. With Photogravure Portraits, Contemporary Views of Localities, Maps, and Facsimile Title-pages. 8vo.

*.* Also an Edition de Luxe.

[Shortly.]

NEW EDITION WITH COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS.

ELIZABETH AND HER GERMAN GARDEN.

With Coloured Illustrations by S. HARMON VEDDER. Extra crown 8vo. [Shortly.]

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS. NEW VOL.

WALTER PATER.

By ARTHUR C. BENSON. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

[Shortly.]

EVERSLEY SERIES. NEW VOL.

BRIEF LITERARY CRITICISMS.

By the late RICHARD HOLT HUTTON. Selected from the Spectator and edited by his Niece, ELIZABETH M. ROSCOE. With Portrait, globe 8vo, 4s. net.

SECOND EDITION.

THE FOUNDERS OF GEOLOGY.

By Sir ARCHIBALD GBKIE, F.R.S., D.C.L., D.Sc. 8vo, 10s. net.

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE MORAL IDEAS.

By EDWARD WESTERMARCK, Ph.D., Author of the "History of Human Marriage." In 2 vols. Vol. I. 8vo, 14s. net.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION.

By Professor HARALD HOFFDING. Translated by B. E. MEYER. 8vo, 12s. net.

VOLUME III. COMPLETING THE WORK.

DICTIONARY OF PHILOSOPHY AND PSYCHOLOGY.

Written by Many Hands and Edited by Prof. J. M. BALDWIN, Ph.D.
In 3 vols. With illustrations and extensive Bibliographies. Imperial 8vo, Vol. III., in 2 parts. 42s. net.

*.* Previously published, Vols. I. and II. 21s. net each.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

Archibald Constable & Co.'s First List of Announcements.

- A TREASURY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. Selected and Arranged by Miss KATE M. WARREN, with an Introduction by Dr. STOPFORD BROOKE. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.
- SOME LITERARY ECCENTRICITIES. By JOHN FYVIE, Author of "Some Women of Wit and Beauty," etc. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
- RENASCENCE PORTRAITS. By PAUL VAN DYCK, D.D. Illustrated. Demy 8vo. [Pietro Aretino—Thomas Cromwell—Maximilian I.] 10s. 6d. net.
- JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL: A Biography. By FERRIS GREENSLET. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 6s. net.
- A SHORT HISTORY OF ITALY (476-1900). By HENRY DWIGHT SEDGWICK. With Map. Demy 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.
- THE FLORENTINE HISTORY, written by NICCOLO MACHIAVELLI. Translated from the Italian by NINIAN HILL THOMSON, M.A. In two volumes. 12s. net.
- THE CHIEF AMERICAN POETS. Edited with Notes, Reference Lists, and Biographical Sketches, by CURTIS HIDDEN PAGE, Ph.D. With Frontispiece. Demy 8vo. 7s. 6d. net.
- ANIMAL HEROES: being the Histories of a Cat, a Dog, a Pigeon, a Lynx, two Wolves, and a Reindeer, by ERNEST THOMPSON SETON, Author of "Wild Animals I have Known," etc. With over 200 Illustrations by the Author. 6s. net.
- CITIES OF PAUL: Beacons of the Past rekindled by the Present. By WILLIAM BURNET WRIGHT, Author of "Ancient Cities from the Dawn to the Daylight." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.
- THE ENGLAND AND HOLLAND OF THE PILGRIMS. By the late HENRY MARTYN DEXTER, D.D., LL.D., and his Son, MORTON DEXTER. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.
- THE RELIGION OF ALL GOOD MEN, and other Studies in Christian Ethics. By H. W. GARROD, Fellow of Merton College, Oxford. Extra Crown 8vo. 5s. net.
- AN ESSAY ON MAN AND CHRISTIAN CIVILISATION. By W. Y. CRAIG. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.
- THE LIFE OF REASON; OR, THE PHASES OF HUMAN PROGRESS. By GEORGE SANTAYANA, Assistant Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University. Volume V. REASON IN SCIENCE—completing the Series. Crown 8vo, 5s. net each.

RELIGIONS: ANCIENT AND MODERN.

Fcap. 8vo, 1s. net. per volume.

- ANIMISM. By EDWARD CLODD, Author of "The Story of Creation."
- PANTHEISM. By JAMES ALLANSON PICTON, Author of "The Religion of the Universe."
- THE RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT CHINA. By Professor GILES, LL.D., Professor of Chinese in the University of Cambridge.
- THE RELIGION OF ANCIENT GREECE. By JANE HARRISON, Lecturer at Newnham College, Cambridge, Author of "Prolegomena to Study of Greek Religion."

The following will be published shortly:

- THE RELIGION OF BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA. By THEOPHILUS G. PINCHES, late of the British Museum.
- HINDUISM. By Dr. L. L. BARNETT, of the Department of Oriental Printed Books and MSS., British Museum.
- CELTIC RELIGION. By Professor ANWYL, Professor of Welsh at University College, Aberystwyth.

POCKET EDITIONS.

Cloth, 2s. 6d. net each. Leather, 3s. 6d. net.

NEW VOLUMES.

- THE OLD DOMINION. By MARY JOHNSTON. With a Frontispiece Portrait.
- BY ORDER OF THE COMPANY. By MARY JOHNSTON. With a Frontispiece.

SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

- THE HEALERS. By MAARTEN MAARTENS, Author of "Dorothea," etc.
- A YOUNG MAN IN A HURRY, and Other Stories. By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS, Author of "The Maid at Arms," "The Reckoning," etc. With Illustrations.
- CURAYL. By UNA L. SILBERRAD, Author of "The Wedding of the Lady Lovell," etc.
- THE WHEEL OF LIFE. By ELLEN GLASGOW, Author of "The Deliverance," etc.
- THE SHADOW OF LIFE. By ANNE DOUGLAS SEDGWICK, Author of "The Paths of Judgment," etc.
- THE HOUSE OF COBWEBS, and Other Stories. By GEORGE GISSING, Author of "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," "Veranilda," etc. With an Introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE.
- HENRY NORTHCOTE. By C. J. SNAITH, Author of "Broke of Coveniden," "Mistress Dorothy Marvin," etc.
- ANTHONY BRITTEN. By HERBERT MACILWAINE, Author of "Dinkinbar," "Fate the Fiddler," etc.
- MR. JOHN STROOD. By PERCY WHITE, Author of "Park Lane," "The West End," etc.
- FACE TO FACE. By FRANCISCA ACEBAL. Presented in English by MARTIN HUME.
- SET IN AUTHORITY. By SARAH JEANNETTE DUNCAN (Mrs. EVERARD COTES), Author of "Those Delightful Americans," etc.

A. CONSTABLE & CO., LTD., 16 JAMES STREET, HAYMARKET

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST

FORTHCOMING WORKS

- Elizabeth Barrett Browning in Her Letters. By PERCY LUBBOCK. With a Photogravure Portrait of Mrs. Browning from a Chalk Drawing by Mrs. BRIDELL FOX. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [March 26.]
- Robert Browning & Alfred Domett. Edited by FREDERIC G. KENYON, D.Litt., F.B.A. With 3 Photogravure Portraits. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [March 20.]
- A Woman of Wit and Wisdom: A Memoir of Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, one of the "Blue" Society (1717-1806). By ALICE C. C. GAUSSEN, Author of "A Later Pepys." With a Photogravure Frontispiece, Facsimile, and nine Half-Tone Illustrations. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [March 16.]
- Seventy Years' Fishing. By CHARLES GEORGE BARRINGTON, C.B., formerly Assistant Secretary to the Treasury. With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [March 26.]
- The Small Garden Beautiful, and How to Make it So. By A. C. CURTIS, Author of "A New Trafalgar," etc. With a Coloured Frontispiece, 16 Half-Tone Illustrations, and several Plans. Small demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Early in April.]
- Wesley and his Century: a Study in Spiritual Forces. By W. H. FITCHETT, B.A., LL.D. With a Photogravure Frontispiece from the Portrait of John Wesley by Romney, and four Facsimiles. Small demy 8vo, 6s. net. [In April.]
- The Victorian Chancellors. Vol. I. By J. B. ATLAY, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "Lord Cochrane's Trial before Lord Ellenborough," "Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, Bart., K.C.B., F.R.S.: a Memoir," etc. With seven Portrait Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 14s. net. [In April.]
- * * * The Work will be completed in a Second Volume.
- With Mounted Infantry in Tibet. By Brevet-Major W. J. OTTLEY. With 48 pages of Illustrations, including Portraits of General Macdonald and Colonel Younghusband. Small demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. [March 26.]

[NEW AND FORTHCOMING 6s. NOVELS

- Brownjohn's. By Mrs. PERCY DEARMER, Author of "The Orangery: a Comedy of Tears," "The Difficult Way," etc. SECOND IMPRESSION IN THE PRESS. DAILY NEWS.—"A novel which will deservedly be widely read and enjoyed."
- The Poison of Tongues. By M. E. CARR, Author of "Love and Honour," "George Goring's Daughters," etc. PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"An admirable series of studies in character and social life. . . A capital piece of work."
- Mr. Baxter, Sportsman. By CHARLES FIELDING MARSH, Author of "God's Scholars." [March 30.]
- Old Mr. Lovelace. By CHRISTIAN TEARLE. Author of "The Vice-Chancellor's Ward." [March 30.]
- If Youth but Knew. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE, Authors of "The Secret Orchard," "The Star-Dreamer," "Rose of the World," "French Nan," etc. With 20 Illustrations by Mr. LANCELOT SPEED. [On April 2.]
- Salted Almonds. By F. ANSTEY, Author of "Vice Versa," "A Fallen Idol," "The Brass Bottle," etc. [Early in April.]
- * * * A collection of stories and sketches full of fantastic humour, chiefly from the columns of PUNCH.
- Dick: a Story without a Plot. By G. F. BRADBY, Author of "Joshua Newings; or, The Love Racillus," and "The Marquis's Eye." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. ACADEMY.—"All the humour and lightness of touch in which lay the charm of Mr Bradby's other books are apparent."

"The best 3s. 6d. series in the market."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE WATERLOO LIBRARY

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each volume.

This Series comprises some of the best work of Modern Authors. The Volumes are well printed, and issued in a neat cloth binding of special design.

NEW VOLUMES IN PREPARATION.

- The Brass Bottle. By F. ANSTEY. With a Frontispiece. [March 26.]
- The Log of a Sea Waif. By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S. With 8 Full-Page Illustrations by ARTHUR TWIDLE. [April 2.]
- The Gamekeeper at Home. By RICHARD JEFFRIES. With numerous illustrations.

LONDON: SMITH ELDER & CO., 15 WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS

MARCH 10, 1906

MR. GEORGE ALLEN

Biography

- The Life and Letters of Lord Leighton: with Selections from his Diaries. By Mrs. Russell Barrington, in collaboration with Lord Leighton's sister. 2 vols. ....net 42/0
Days with Walt Whitman. By Edward Carpenter ..net 5/0

Fiction

- George's Whims. By P. M. Whithard ..... 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Science in Public Affairs. In seven essays, with Preface by the Rt. Hon. R. B. Haldane, K.C., M.P., LL.D. ....net 5/0
Library Edition of Ruskin:
Vol. xxii., Lectures on Landscape, The Eagle's Nest, Ariadne Florentina, and Michael Angelo and Tintoret; with Notes for other Oxford Lectures. Vol. xxiii., Florence: including Val d'Arno, Mornings in Florence, and The Schools of Art in Florence. Vol. xxiv., Venice and Padua: including St. Mark's Rest, Pictures at Academy of Venice, Giotto and His Works. Ill.

MR. ALSTON RIVERS

Children's Books

- Spring Blossoms and Summer Fruit. ....net 1/6
The Legend of St. Mark. By John Byles .....net 1/6

Fiction

- Mrs. Erricker's Reputation. By Thomas Cobb ..... 6/0
My Cornish Neighbours. By Mrs. Havelock Ellis ..... 3/6
The Fifth Queen. By Ford Madox Hueffer ..... 6/0
Richard Baldock. By Archibald Marshall ..... 6/0

Literature

- The New Sketch-Book. By W. M. Thackeray. Edited by R. S. Garnett. ....net 7/6
The Heart of the Country. By Ford Madox Hueffer ..net 5/0

Miscellaneous

- The Ancient Britons. By Hansard Watt .....net 2/6
Mixed Maxims. By Monte Carlo .....net 2/6
In Youth. Mrs. Ennis Richmond .....net 2/6

Political

- Abyssinia: the Ethiopian Railway and the Powers. By T. L. Gilmour .....net 1/0
The Turk in the Balkans. By T. Comyn Platt ..... 3/6
Suggestions for the Better Governing of India. By Sir Frederick S. P. Lely .....net 1/0

MR. EDWARD ARNOLD

Fiction

- Concerning Paul and Fiammetta. By L. Allen Harker.... 5/0
The Lady of the Well. By Eleanor Alexander ..... 6/0
Hyacinth. By George A. Birmingham ..... 6/0
Folly. By Edith Rickert ..... 6/0
The House of Shadows. By Reginald J. Farrer ..... 6/0

History

- The Romance of Empire. By Philip Gibbs. Ill. .... 6/0

Literature

- Shakespeare and His Day: A Study of the Topical Element in Shakespeare and in the Elizabethan Drama. By J. A. de Rothschild .....net 5/0

Miscellaneous

- Races of Domestic Poultry. By Edward Brown. Ill. ....net 6/0

Poetry

- The Aeneid of Virgil. With a trans. by Charles J. Billson. 2 vols. ....net 30/0

Theology

- Some Dogmas of Religion. By J. E. McTaggart .....net 10/6
The Church and the Commonwealth: The Visitation Charges of the late Bishop of Southwell. Ed. by his wife, Lady Laura Ridding .....net 10/6

Travel

- Through India with the Prince. By G. F. Abbott. Ill.

MESSRS. BEMROSE & SON

- Memorials of Old Hampshire. Edited by the Rev. G. E. Jeans. Ill. ....net 10/6
Memorials of Old Somerset. Edited by F. J. Snell. Ill. net 10/6
Memorials of Old Wiltshire. Edited by Miss Alice Dryden. Ill. ....net 10/6

- Longton Hall Porcelain; Being Further Information Relating to this Interesting Fabrique. By William Bemrose, F.S.A. Ill. ....net 42/0
The Values of Old English Silver and Sheffield Plate from the Fifteenth to the Nineteenth Century. By J. W. Caldicott. Edited by J. Starkie Gardner, F.S.A.
Old English Gold Plate. Ill. By E. A. Jones
Derby: Its Rise and Progress. By A. W. Davison
Old Church Plate of the Diocese of Bangor. By E. A. Jones
Church Plate of the Isle of Man. By E. Alfred Jones
Soldiers of the Cross in Zululand. By E. and H. W.

MESSRS. A. & C. BLACK

Art Books

- The Thames. Painted by Mortimer Menpes. Described by Dorothy Menpes .....net 20/0
Constantinople. Painted by Warwick Goble. Described by A. van Millingen .....net 20/0
Greece. Painted by John Fulleylove. Described by Rev. J. A. M'Clymont .....net 20/0
Sussex. Painted by Wilfrid Ball. Described by an anonymous writer .....net 20/0
Wessex. By Walter Tyndale. Described by Clive Holland .....net 20/0
Algeria and Tunis. Painted and described by Frances E. Nesbitt .....net 20/0
The Highlands and Islands of Scotland. Painted by William Smith, junr. Described by A. R. Hope Moncrieff net 10/0
Bruges and West Flanders. Painted by A. Forestier. Described by G. W. T. Omond .....net 10/0
Yorkshire Dales and Fells. Painted and described by Gordon Home .....net 7/6
Days with Velasquez. By C. Lewis Hind. Illustrated net 7/6
English Costume. Painted and described by D. C. Calthrop .....net 7/6
Sir Henry Irving (portrait biography). By Mortimer and Dorothy Menpes .....net 2/0
The Education of an Artist. By C. Lewis Hind. Ill. net 7/6
Gothic Architecture. By Edith A. Browne. Ill. ....net 3/6
The Blackmore Country. By F. J. Snell. Illustrated.... 6/0

Education

- Old Testament History. Part I. By T. Nicklin. Ill. .. 3/0
The Council Literary Readers. By John Finnemore.
Picture Lessons in English. I. By W. R. Taylor. Ill. .. 0/6
Dickens: A Tale of Two Cities. Barnaby Rudge. Edited by A. A. Barter. Coloured frontispiece .....each 2/6
Scott: The Abbot. Edited by H. Corstorphine. Complete text, 2/0. Abridged text ..... 1/6
Summary of English History. By N. L. Frazer. Ill. .. 2/0
Man: His Manners and Customs. By L. W. Lyde. Ill.

Guide-Books

- Rome. By E. A. Reynolds-Ball. Illustrated ..... 2/6
New editions of Devonshire; West Kent; Ireland; Manchester; West and South-West Scotland; and Scotland

History

- Mediaeval London—Social. Mediaeval London—Ecclesiastical. By Sir Walter Besant. 2 vols. Ill. ....each net 30/0

Miscellaneous

- The Law of Banking and Negotiable Instruments. By F. Tillyard. Second edition .....probably net 5/0

Science

- Black's Medical Dictionary. By John D. Comrie. Ill. ....net 7/6
A Treatise on Zoology. Part V., Mollusca. By Dr. Paul Pelseneer .....net 12/6 and 15/0
Modern Cosmogonies. By Agnes M. Clerke .....net 3/6

Sport

- Salmon-Fishing. By W. Earl Hodgson. Illustrated ..net 7/6
Fishermen's Weather. Edited by F. G. Aflalo. Illus. net 7/6

Theology

- Johanne Grammar. By Edwin A. Abbott .....net 16/6
A Declaration of Biblical Criticism. By 1725 Clergymen of the Anglican Communion. Edited by Hubert Handley .....net 2/0
The Life of Jesus. By Arno Neumann. Translated by M. A. Canney .....net 2/6
Religions of the Past and the Religion of the Future. By the Author of "Thoughts of a Freethinker" .....net 1/0

MESSRS. WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SON

Biography

- William Pitt. By Charles Whibley. Illustrated .....net 6/0
George Eliot. By A. T. Quiller Couch. (Modern English Writers series) ..... 2/6
Charles Lever: His Life in His Letters. By Edmund Downey. 2 vols .....net 21/0

Education

- A Practical German Grammar Reader and Writer. Part II. By Louis Lubovius

Fiction

- "No. 101." By Wymond Carey ..... 6/0
The Heir. By Sydney C. Grier ..... 6/0
Count Bunker. By J. Storer Clouston ..... 6/0
Fisherman's Gat: a Story of the Thames River. By Edward Noble ..... 6/0
The Bar Sinister. By J. Morgan-de-Groot ..... 6/0
A Maid of Normandy: A Romance of Versailles. By Dora M. Jones ..... 6/0
Lady Sarah's Deed of Gift. By E. Aceituna Griffin ..... 6/0
Phantasma. By A. C. Inchbold ..... 6/0

History

- Fontenoy, and Great Britain's Share in the War of the Austrian Succession. By Francis Henry Skrine. Map, Plans, and Illustrations .....net 21/0
A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. By Andrew Lang. Fourth and concluding volume .....net 15/0
The First Half of the Seventeenth Century. By Professor H. J. C. Grierson. (Periods of European Literature Series) .....net 5/0
The Development of Tactics from 1740 to the Present Day. By Lieut.-Col. Walter H. James
The Siege and Capitulation of Port Arthur. By Ellis Ashmead Bartlett. Illustrations and Maps .....net 21/0

Miscellaneous

- The Forester: A Practical Treatise on British Forestry and Arboriculture. By John Nisbet. Ill. 2 vols. net 42/0
The Author's Progress: or, The Literary Book of the Road. By Adam Lorimer .....net 5/0
The Scots Churches in England. By Kenneth Macleod Black .....net 5/0
The Vital Spark. By Hugh Foulis. Illustrated .....net 1/0

Poetry

- Drake: an English Epic. By Alfred Noyes. Books I.-III.

MESSRS. BROWN, LANGHAM & Co.

Fiction

- The Sunset Trail. By Alfred Henry Lewis. Illustrated.. 6/0
Rouge. By Haldane McFall and Dion Clayton Calthrop.. 6/0
Moons and Winds of Araby. By Roma White ..... 3/6
It Happened in Japan. By the Baroness D'Anethan .... 6/0
Christopher Deane. By E. H. Lacon Watson. Cheaper edition ..... 3/6
A Daughter of Thor. By Helen Maxwell. New edition.. 6/0

Memoirs

- Here and There. Memories Indian and Other. By H. G. Keene, C.I.E. ....net 10/6

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

Bibliography

- Early English Printed Books in the University Library, Cambridge (1475-1640). Vol. IV.

Classics

- Aristotle: De Sensu and De Memoria. Edited by G. R. T. Ross
Bacchylides. Text from Sir Richard Jebb's edition
Herodotus: Book IV. Edited by E. S. Shuckburgh

English

- Cambridge English Classics:
Beaumont and Fletcher, Complete Plays and Poems, vols. iii. and iv., edited by Arnold Glover and A. R. Waller. George Crabbe, Poems, edited by Dr. A. W. Ward, 3 vols., vol. ii. Matthew Prior, Prose Dialogues and other Works, edited by A. R. Waller (forming with the volume already issued in same series, a complete edition of Prior's writings, prose and verse). Abraham Cowley, Essays and Plays, edited by A. R. Waller (completing the edition of Cowley's English works). Samuel Butler, Characters, edited by A. R. Waller .....each net 4/6
Cambridge Type Series:
John Milton, Comus and other Poems. Bacon's Essays .....each (boards) net 1/1/0, (leather) net 1/11/6

History and Law

- The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. ix., Napoleon ..net 16/0
Modern Spain, 1815-1898. By the late H. Butler Clarke

- No Man's Land: A History of Spitsbergen. By Sir Martin Conway
The Growth of an English Manor. By Miss F. G. Davenport

Mathematics

- Cambridge Tracts in Mathematics and Mathematical Physics:
Quadratic Forms and their Classification by means of Invariant Factors. By Professor T. I'A. Bromwich
Trigonometry for Beginners. By J. W. Mercer

Philology

- An Introduction to Comparative Philology for Classical Students. By J. Maxwell Edmonds
Latin Grammar. By the Rev. A. Sloman
German Grammar. By G. H. Clarke and C. J. Murray

Theology

- The Origin and Propagation of Sin. By F. R. Tennant (Second edition)

MESSRS. CASSELL & Co.

Art

- Stanhope Forbes, R.A., and Elizabeth Stanhope Forbes, A.R.W.S. By Mrs. Lionel Birch. Illustrated .....net 5/0
Royal Academy Pictures, 1906. Illustrated. Five Parts, 7d. net each ..... One volume, net 7/0 and 15/0

Biography

- The Hon. F. S. Jackson. By Percy Cross Standing. Ill. .... 2/6

Education

- The Health Reader. By W. Hoskyns-Abrahall. Ill. .... 1/9

Fiction

- A Human Face. By Silas Hocking. Illustrated ..... 3/6
The Red Seal. By Morice Gerard. Illustrated ..... 6/0
The Hidden House. By J. Colin Dane. Illustrated .... 6/0
A Toy Tragedy. By Mrs. H. de la Pasture. Illustrated.. 3/6
The Burglars' Club. By H. A. Hering. Illustrated .... 3/6
The Mystery of the Shadow. By Fergus Hume. Illus.. 3/6
Highcroft Farm. By J. S. Fletcher. Illustrated ..... 6/0
The Light. By Mrs. Harold Gorst. Illustrated ..... 6/0
The Woman at Kensington. By W. Le Queux. Illus. .. 6/0
Miriam Lemaire, Money-lender. By Coralie Stanton and Heath Hosken. Illustrated ..... 3/6

History

- The Story of Protestantism. By F. Holderness Gale. Illustrated ..... 6/0

Miscellaneous

- Pictorial Practical Carnation-Growing. By Walter P. Wright. Illustrated .....net 1/0 and 1/6
Cassell's Building Construction. By Henry Adams. Illustrated ..... 7/6
Technical Instruction Series:
Practical Painters' Work. Practical Boot and Shoe Pattern Cutting and Clicking. Iron: Its Properties and Manufacture. Sanitary Conveniences. Sanitary Construction in Building. Illustrated .....each 2/0
Glass Writing. By P. N. Hasluck. Illustrated .....net 1/0
Plasterers' Work. Edited by P. N. Hasluck .....net 6/0

Topography and Travel

- Pictures from the Balkans. By John Foster Fraser. Illustrated ..... 6/0
In a Tramp Camp. By Bart Kennedy. Illustrated .... 6/0
The Thames and Its Story. Illustrated ..... 6/0
Pictorial London. Illustrated ..... 12/0

MESSRS. CHAPMAN & HALL

Biography

- Jean Jacques Rousseau: A New Study in Criticism. By Frederika Macdonald. Illustrated. 2 vols. ....net 21/0
A Friend of Marie Antoinette (Lady Atkyns). By Frederic Barbey. With Portraits .....net 10/6

Fiction

- The Smiths of Surbiton: A Comedy without a Plot. By Keble Howard. Illustrated by Frank Reynolds ..... 6/0
The Bishop's Apron: A Study in the Origins of a Great Family. By W. S. Maugham ..... 6/0
The Bending of a Twig: A Story of Shrewsbury Life. By Desmond T. Coke. Illustrated ..... 6/0
The Measure of Life. By Frances Campbell ..... 6/0
The Misses Make-Believe. By Mary Stuart Boyd ..... 6/0
An Elderly Person, and Other Stories. By Ella MacMahon ..... 6/0
An American Duchess. By Dr. Arabella Kenelady ..... 6/0
A New Volume of Stories. By Netta Syrett ..... 6/0
Men at Arms. By Major W. P. Drury ..... 3/6

Literature

- The Shakespeare Symphony: An Introduction to the Ethics of the Elizabethan Drama. By Harold Bayley .....net 12/6

Miscellaneous

- Fictitious Creatures in Heraldry. By John Vinycomb. Illustrated .....net 10/6

Philosophy

- The Criticism of Life. By Emil Reich
The Unity of Will: Studies of an Irrationalist. By G. Ainslie Hight .....net 10/6
Morals in Evolution. By L. T. Hobhouse. 2 vols. ....net 21/0
The Origin of Life: Its Physical Basis and Definition. By J. Butler Burke. Illustrated .....net 16/0

Sport

- The M.C.C. in South Africa. By P. F. Warner. Illustrated 6/0

Travel

- America Re-visited. By Henry James .....net 10/6
By-paths in the Balkans. By Captain F. W. von Herbert
The Brighton Road. By Charles G. Harper. Re-written and re-illustrated

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS

- Collected Library Edition of Mr. Swinburne's Tragedies. In 5 vols. Vol. V. ....net 6/0

Fiction

- A Mender of Nets. By William Mackay ..... 6/0
Caste and Creed. By F. E. Penny ..... 6/0
Mara. By Chris Healy ..... 6/0
Nature's Vagabond. By Cosmo Hamilton ..... 6/0
For Life—and After. By George R. Sims (Dagonet) .... 6/0
The Dreams of Simon Usher. By Algernon Gissing ..... 6/0
In the Roaring Fifties. By E. Dyson ..... 6/0
The Lost Earl of Ellan. By Mrs. Campbell Praed ..... 6/0

Reprints

- The Pocket George MacDonald. By Alfred H. Hyatt .....net 2/0 and 3/0
The Cloister and the Hearth. By Charles Reade. Illustrated by Matt B. Hewerdine .....net 6/0
Children of To-morrow. By William Sharp. Cheaper edition ..... 3/6
Books by Austin Dobson:
Thomas Bewick and his Pupils, ill. 3/6. Four Frenchwomen, ill. 6/0. Eighteenth-Century Vignettes, in three series, each 6/0. A Paladin of Philanthropy, and other Papers, ill. Side-walk Studies, ill.

Topography and Travel

- The Story of Charing Cross and its immediate Neighbourhood. By J. Holden Macmichael. Illustrated .....net 7/6
The Romance of the South Seas. By Clement L. Wragge. Illustrated .....net 7/6
Literary Rambles in the West of England. By Arthur L. Salmon ..... 6/0

MESSRS. CONSTABLE & Co.

Art and Archæology

- Staple Inn. By E. Williams. Ill. ....net 5/0
Time and Clocks. By H. H. Cunynghame. Ill.
Modern Bookbindings. By S. T. Prideaux. Ill. ....net 10/6
Porcelain of all Countries: A Book of Handy Reference. By R. L. Hobson. Ill.
Old Oxford Plate. By H. C. Moffatt. Ill.
Historic Greek Coins. By G. F. Hill. Ill. ....net 10/6

Biography

- Some Literary Eccentrics. By John Fyvie. Ill.
Renaissance Portraits. By Paul Van Dyke. Ill.
Early Victorian Novelists. By Lewis Melville. Ill.
The Life of Alfred Ainger. By Edith Sichel. Ill.
James Russell Lowell. By Ferris Greenslet. Ill. ....net 6/0
The Life of Charles Godfrey Leland (Hans Breitmann). By Mrs. Pennell. 2 vols. Ill. ....net 21/0
Alexander Hamilton: an Essay. By Frederick Oliver. Ill. ....net 12/6
The King of Court Poets: A Study of Lodovico Ariosto. By Edmund Gardner. Ill. ....net 16/0
The German Pompadour (Wilhelmina von Grävnitz). By Marie Hay

Fiction

- The Healers. By Maarten Maartens ..... 6/0
The Shadow of Life. By Anne Douglas Sedgwick ..... 6/0
A Young Man in a Hurry. By R. W. Chambers ..... 6/0
The Wheel of Life. By Ellen Glasgow ..... 6/0
Curayl. By Una L. Silberrad ..... 6/0
The House of Cobwebs, and other Stories. By George Gissing ..... 6/0
Henry Northcote. By J. C. Snaith ..... 6/0
Anthony Britten. By H. MacIlwaine ..... 6/0
Mr. John Strood. By Percy White ..... 6/0
Face to Face. By Francisca Acebal. Trans. by Martin Hume ..... 6/0
Holy Land. By Gustav Frenssen ..... 6/0
Set in Authority. By Sarah Jeannette Duncan ..... 6/0

History

- The History of Warwick School. By A. F. Leach. Ill. net 12/6
Tacitus and other Roman Studies. By Gaston Boissier. Trans. by W. G. Hutchinson .....net 6/0

- A Short History of Italy (476-1900). By Henry Dwight Sedgwick .....net 8/6
The Florentine History. Written by N. Machiavelli. Trans. by N. H. Thomson. 2 vols.
The England and Holland of the Pilgrims. By H. M. Dexter. Ill.

Literature

- The Poetry and Philosophy of George Meredith. By G. M. Trevelyan .....net 3/6

Medicine

- Physiology of the Nervous System. By J. P. Morat. Trans. and ed. by H. W. Syers. Ill. ....net 31/6
On Leprosy and Fish-Eating. By Jonathan Hutchinson. Ill. ....net 12/6
Diet and Dietetics. By A. Gautier. Trans. and ed. by A. J. Rice-Oxley .....net 21/0
The Integrative Action of the Nervous System. By C. S. Sherrington .....net 16/0

Miscellaneous

- The Euahlayi Tribe. By Mrs. Langloh Parker. Ill. ....net 7/6
Animal Heroes. By E. Thompson Seton. Ill. ....net 6/0
The Fixed Period. By William Osler
An Essay on Man and Christian Civilisation. By W. Y. Craig

Philosophy

- The Subconscious. By Professor Jastrow
The Life of Reason. By George Santayana. In 5 vols. each net 5/0
Religions, Ancient and Modern: Animism, by E. Clodd; Pantheism, by J. A. Picton; The Religions of Ancient China, by Prof. Giles; The Religion of Ancient Greece, by Jane Harrison .....each net 1/0

Reprints

- A Treasury of English Literature. Ed. by Kate M. Warren .....net 7/6
The Chief American Poets. Selected Poems of Bryant, Poe, etc. Ed. by Curtis Hidden Page .....net 7/6

Technical Works

- Motor Vehicles and Motors. By W. Worby Beaumont. Vol. II. Ill. ....net 42/0
The Seven Follies of Science. By John Phin. Ill. ....net 5/0
Tunnel Shields. By W. C. Copperthwaite. Ill. ....net 31/6
Water Softening and Treatment. By W. H. Booth. Ill. ....net 10/6
Radio-Active Transformations. By E. Rutherford .....net 16/0
Modern Turbine Practice and Water-Power Plants. By J. W. Thurso. Ill. ....net 16/0
Practical Electro-Chemistry. By Bertram Blount. New and enlarged ed. Ill. ....net 15/0
Experimental Electro-Chemistry. By N. Monroe Hopkins. Ill. ....net 12/0
Bridge and Structural Design. By W. Chas. Thomson. Ill. ....net 8/0

Theology

- The Religion of All Good Men. By H. W. Garrod .....net 5/0

Travel and Topography

- Cities of Paul. By W. B. Wright .....net 4/6

MESSRS. J. M. DENT & Co.

- Personal Forces in Modern Literature. By Arthur Rickett. Essays on Newman, Huxley, Spencer, Dickens, etc. ....net 3/6
Saint Bernardine of Siena. By Paul Thureau-Dangin. Trans. by the Baroness von Hugel .....net 3/6
Temple Dramatists:
Ford's Broken Heart, edited by Oliphant Smeaton, M.A. Goethe's Iphigenia in Tauris, edited by Edward Dowden .....net 1/0 and 1/6
Temple Greek and Latin Classics:
Plato: Euthyphro, the Apology of Socrates and Crito; trans. and ed. by F. M. Stawell. Euripides: Hippolytus and Medea; trans. and ed. by Sydney Waterlow. Virgil: Æneid; trans. by E. Fairfax Taylor, ed. by E. M. Forster. 2 vols. Juvenal: Satires; trans. and ed. by A. F. Cole .....each net 2/6
English Men of Science:
Herbert Spencer, by J. A. Thomson. Priestley, by T. E. Thorpe. George Bentham, by B. Daydon Jackson. Huxley, by J. R. Ainsworth Davis. Sir William Flower, by R. Lydekker .....each net 2/6
Mediaeval Towns Series:
Brussels, by E. Gilliat-Smith, illustrated .....net 4/6 and 5/6
Prime Ministers of England (new edition):
Lord Rosebery, by S. H. Jeyes. Earl of Beaconsfield, by J. A. Froude. Earl of Aberdeen, by Lord Stanmore. Viscount Melbourne, by Henry Dunckley. Sir Robert Peel, by Justin McCarthy. W. E. Gladstone, by G. W. E. Russell. Marquis of Salisbury, by H. D. Traill. Viscount Palmerston, by the Duke of Argyll. Earl of Derby, by George Saintsbury. Lord John Russell, by Stuart J. Reid .....each net 2/6

Temple Classics :

- The Golden Treasury, with an appendix containing additional poems, ed. by Edward Hutton. Dante's Vita Nuova, Songs and Ballads, trans. by T. Okey. Burke's Speeches on America. Edited by C. B. Hawkins, B.A. Faust, Part II., trans. and ed. by A. G. Latham. Browning's Dramatis Personæ, with Bibliographical Note by M. Edwardes.....net 1/6 and 2/0
- Monographs on the Oxford and Cambridge Colleges (illustrated by E. H. New):

- Magdalen College, Oxford, by the President. New College, Oxford, by W. H. Prickard. Merton College, Oxford, by H. T. White. Trinity College, Cambridge, by W. W. Rouse Ball. King's College, Cambridge. St. John's College, Cambridge, by R. F. Scott .....each net 2/0
- Peace and War. By Charles Richet. Translated by M. Edwardes .....net 1/0
- Morocco of To-day. Translated from the French of Eugene Aubin. With three Maps .....net 6/0
- The Christ of English Poetry: Hulsean Lectures for 1905. By the Very Rev. Charles W. Stubbs, Dean of Ely.....net 6/0
- Songs of Love and Praise: Being Hymns for Home Singing. By Miss Matheson. Illustrated .....net 2/0
- The Works of Dumas. Unabridged English trans. With the original ill. 48 vols.; 2 vols. per month each ..net 2/6

Education

Dent's Mathematical and Scientific Series :

- Light, by F. E. Rees. Trigonometry, by Cecil Hawkins. Practical Mathematics, by J. E. Boyt. Geometrical Conics, by G. H. Bryan and R. H. Pinkerton

Modern Language Series :

- Sounds of Spoken English, by W. Rippmann, 1/6 net. Rippmann's Picture Vocabulary, illustrated; French 1/0 net, German 1/0 net. First Spanish Book, by F. R. Robert, 1/6 net. Fables of La Fontaine, edited by Prof. Rippmann.....net 1/6

Short French Readers :

- Second-year book: Perrault's Contes du Temps Passé, 2 vols., each 4d. Third-year books: De Varigny's L'Elephant Blanc; Simple Stories—each 4d. Fourth-year books: French History in Extracts. Vol. I., The Nineteenth Century; Vol. II., The Revolution.....each 6d.

Temple Primers :

- Hygiene and Diet, by H. Drinkwater. Sculpture of the West, by Hans Stegman, translated by Miss Edwardes .....each net 1/0

MESSRS. DUCKWORTH &amp; Co.

Art

- The Scottish School of Painting. By Wm. D. McKay, R.S.A. Illustrated .....net 7/6
- English Water-Colour Painters. By A. J. Finberg. Illustrated .....net 2/0 and 2/6
- The Museums and Ruins of Rome. Vol. I. by Walter Amelung, with 170 illustrations. Vol. II. by Henry Holtzinger, with Map, Plans, and 100 illustrations. Edited by Mrs. Arthur Strong. 2 vols.....net 10/0

Fiction

- Traffic: The Story of a Faithful Woman. By E. Temple Thurston ..... 6/0
- The Ambush of Young Days. By Rosamond Langbridge Lads of the Fancy. By George Bartram ..... 6/0

Natural History

- The British Woodlice: A Monograph of the Terrestrial Isopod Crustacea occurring in the British Islands. By W. M. Webb, F.L.S., and Charles Sillem.....net 6/0

Poetry

- Poems by T. Sturge Moore .....net 6/0
- The Dawn in Britain. By Charles Dougherty. 2 vols. each net 3/6

Theology

- Saint Mary the Virgin. By René Marie de la Broise ("The Saints" Series) ..... 3/0

Travel and Topography

- Esto Perpetua: Algerian Studies and Impressions. By H. Belloc, M.P. Illustrated.....net 3/6
- Rambles in Normandy. By Francis Miltoun. Illustrated. Maps, etc. ....net 6/0
- Rambles in Brittany. By Francis Miltoun. Illus.....net 6/0

MESSRS. HODDER &amp; STOUGHTON

Art

- How to Study Pictures. By Charles H. Caffin. Illus. net 10/6

Biography

- Sir Walter Scott. By Andrew Lang. (Literary Lives).. 3/6
- Joseph Chamberlain. By Alexander Mackintosh.....net 10/6

Education

- The Imperial Reader. Edited by the Hon. W. Pember Reeves. Illustrated .....net 2/6
- A Nature-Reader for Senior Students: An anthology of the poetry of Nature. Edited by the Hon. Sir John Cockburn. Illustrated .....net 2/0
- Britain's Sea-Story: B.C. 55-A.D. 1805. Edited by E. E. Speight and R. Morton Nance. Illustrated .....net 2/6

Fiction

- My Sword for Lafayette. By Max Pemberton ..... 6/0
- Giant Circumstance. By John Oxenham ..... 6/0
- Karl Grier. By Louis Tracy ..... 6/0
- Lady Elizabeth and the Juggernaut. By E. Everett Green ..... 6/0
- Dearlove. By Frances Campbell ..... 6/0
- Sea Spray. By F. T. Batten ..... 6/0
- Fisherman's Luck. By H. van Dyke..... 6/0
- Blazed Trail Stories. By S. E. White..... 6/0
- All for the Love of a Lady. By E. Macartney Lane..... 5/0
- The Sign of the Golden Fleece. By David Lyall ..... 6/0
- A Mask of Gold. By Annie S. Swan ..... 3/6
- The Mystery of a Motor Car. By W. Le Queux ..... 6/0
- The Lady of the Decoration. By Annie H. Donnell..... 6/0
- Old Lim Jucklin. By Opie Read ..... 6/0
- Out of Gloucester. By James Connolly..... 6/0

History

- The Battle of the Sea of Japan. By Captain Klado. Ill. net 30/0
- A History of Egypt from the Earliest Times to the Persian Conquest. By Prof. J. E. Breasted. Illustrated.....net 20/0
- The Enemy at Trafalgar: As Told from French and Spanish Records. By Edward Fraser. Illustrated..net 16/0

Literature

- A History of Comparative Literature. By Frédéric Loliée. Translated by M. D. Power .....net 6/0

Miscellaneous

- The Modern Home: A Book of Domestic Architecture for Modern Incomes. Illustrated.....net 5/0, 7/6, and 21 /

Theology

- Expositions of Holy Scripture. By the Rev. Alexander Maclaren. In 30 vols.....per vol. 7/6
- The Christian Faith. By Olin A. Curtis.....net 10/6
- The Scientific Creed of a Theologian. By Prof. Rudolf Schmid. Trans. from the German by J. W. Stoughton net 6/0
- Manhood, Faith, and Courage. By H. Van Dyke..... 5/0
- The Apostolic Age in the Light of Modern Criticism. By J. H. Ropes.....net 6/0

Travel and Topography

- Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer: A Record of Excavation and Discovery in Palestine. By R. A. Stewart Macalister. Illustrated .....net 5/0
- The Development of Palestine Exploration. By F. Jones Bliss .....net 6/0

MR. JOHN LANE

Architecture, etc.

- Impressions of Japanese Architecture and the Allied Arts. By Ralph Adams Cram. Illustrated .....net 10/6
- Moorish Remains in Spain. By A. F. Calvert. Illus...net 42/0

Biography

- The Life and Letters of R. S. Hawker, sometime Vicar of Morwenstow. By his son-in-law, C. E. Byles. Popular edition. Illustrated .....net 7/6
- The House in St. Martin's Street: Being Chronicles of the Burney Family. By Constance Hill. Illustrated ..net 21/0
- A Queen of Indiscretions: The Tragedy of Caroline of Brunswick, Queen of England. By G. P. Clerci. Illustrated .....net 21/0
- Memoirs of the Count de Cartrie: Being a Record of the Extraordinary Events in the Life of Ambroise Toussaint de Cartrie, Count of Villenièr, as written by Himself. Introduction by Frédéric Masson. Illustrated.....net 12/6

Fiction

- The Young O'Briens. By the Author of "Elizabeth's Children" ..... 6/0
- The Love of Gold. By Mansfield Brooks ..... 6/0
- At the Gate of Samaria. By W. J. Locke ..... 6/0
- The Bride of an Hour. By Elizabeth Godfrey ..... 6/0
- Cornish Saints and Sinners. By J. Henry Harris..... 6/0
- The House by the Bridge. By M. G. Easton..... 6/0
- The Mountain Lovers. By Fiona Macleod ..... 6/0
- Hauntings: Fantastic Stories. By Vernon Lee.....net 3/6

Literature

- Poetry and Progress in Russia. By Rosa Newmarch ..net 7/6

Miscellaneous

- The Champagne Standard. By Mrs. John Lane ..... 6/0
- The Mirror of the Century. By W. Frewen Lord. Ill. net 5/0
- Points of View. By L. F. Austin .....net 5/0

Music

- Music and Musicians. By E. A. Baughan .....net 5/0
Living Masters of Music: Richard Strauss, by A. Kalisch.
Ignaz Paderewski, by E. A. Baughan. Alfred Brunnau, by Arthur Hervey. Theodor Leschetizky, by A. Hullah
each net 2/6

Natural History

- Bombay Ducks: An Account of some of the Everyday Birds and Beasts found in a Naturalist's El Dorado. By Douglas Dewar, B.A., F.Z.S., I.M.S. Ill. ....net 16/0
The Wild Flowers of Selborne, and other papers. By the Rev. Canon Vaughan. Ill. ....net 5/0

Poetry

- The Coming of Love: Rhona Boswell's Story (a Sequel to "Aylwin") and other Poems. Seventh and Revised Edition. By Theodore Watts-Dunton .....net 5/0
Augustine the Man: A Play. By Amelie Rives (Princess Troubetzsky) .....net 5/0
Songs to a Singer, and other Poems. By Rosa Newmarch net 5/0
Love's Testament: a Sonnet Sequence. By G. Constant Lounsbury, uniform with "An Iseult Idyll and other Poems." .....net 3/6

MESSRS. LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.

Art

- Early Engravings and Engravers in England: 1545-1695.
By Sidney Colvin. Ill. ....105/0
The Art of Garden Design in Italy. By H. Inigo Triggs.
Ill. ....To subscribers, net 63/0, after publication, net 73/6

Biography

- A Great Archbishop of Dublin: William King, D.D.
Edited by Sir Charles S. King, Bart. Ill.

Fiction

- Out of Due Time. By Mrs. Wilfrid Ward ..... 6/0
Lay Down Your Arms. By the Baroness von Suttner.
Translated by T. Holmes. Second edition.....net 2/0

History

- The Political History of England. Edited by W. Hunt and
R. Lane Poole. Vol. I. To 1066. By T. Hodgkin .....net 7/6
Lectures on Early English History. By W. Stubbs.
Edited by A. Hassall .....net 12/6
A History of Modern Liberty. By James Mackinnon.
2 vols. ....net 30/0
History of the Society of Jesus in North America. By Thomas Hughes. Vol. I. 1580-1645, Documents.

Law

- International Law. By L. Oppenheim. Vol. II., War and Neutrality .....net 18/0

Mathematics

- The Mathematical Papers of Josiah Willard Gibbs. 2 vols.
A Preliminary Course in Differential and Integral Calculus.
By A. H. Angus ..... 2/6
The Elements of Geometry in Theory and Practice. By
A. E. Pierpoint ..... 2/0

Mechanics

- Steam Turbines. By W. Gentsch. Trans. by Arthur
R. Liddell. Ill. ....net 21/0
The Design of Lathes for High Speed and Heavy Cutting.
By J. T. Nicolson and Dempster Smith.
Modern Steam Road-Wagons. By W. Norris. Ill.

Miscellaneous

- Land Reform. By Rt. Hon. Jesse Collings
Industrial Efficiency. By Arthur Shadwell. 2 vols.....net 26/0
British Imperialism and Commercial Supremacy. By V.
Bérard. Trans. by H. W. Fokett ..... 7/6
The Health of our Children in the Colonies. By Lilian A.
Robinson, M.D. ....net 2/6
The Ventilation, Heating, and Lighting of Dwellings. By J. W. Thomas ..... 6/0

Natural History

- Plants and Their Ways in South Africa. By Bertha Stoneman .....net 3/6

Philosophy

- History of English Rationalism in the Nineteenth Century.
By A. W. Benn
History of Intellectual Development. By J. B. Crozier.
Vol. 4, A Reconstruction of the Science and Art of Political Economy .....net 12/6
The Key to the World's Progress. By Charles Stanton
Devas .....net 5/0
Synthetica: Being Meditations Epistemological and Ontological. By S. S. Laurie. 2 vols.
Symbolic Logic and its Applications. By Hugh Maccoll net 4/6
The Philosophy of Religion. By G. Trumbull Ladd. 2
vols .....net 28/0

Science

- A Practical Manual of Tides and Waves. By W. H.
Wheeler. Ill. ....net 7/6
The Scientific Principles of Wireless Telegraphy. By J. A.
Fleming

- Plant Response. By Jagadis Chunder Bose. Ill.
A Manual of Diseases of the Nose and Its Accessory
Cavities. By H. Lambert Lack. Ill. .... 25/0
The Dissociation of a Personality: A Biographical Study in Abnormal Psychology. By Morton Prince .....net 10/6

Theology

- Nunc Dimittis. By Thomas A. Gurney.....net 3/0
Humility: a Devotional Treatise. By Jesse Brett .....net 2/0
Adventure for God. By the Rt. Rev. Charles H. Brent.
Bishop of the Philippine Islands .....net 3/0
The Principles of Religious Ceremonial. By W. H. Frere .. 5/0
The Book of Angels. By L. P. ....net 6/0
Pastoral Work in Country Districts. By V. S. S. Coles .....net 3/6
The Relations of Faith and Life. By the Rt. Rev. C. A.
Hall, Bishop of Vermont .....net 2/6
Clerical Life: Characters and Colloquies. ....net 5/6
Psalms for the Christian Festivals. By Elizabeth Wordsworth .....net 3/0
The Tradition of Scripture. By William Barry .....net 3/6
Aspects of Anglicanism: A Comment on Certain Incidents in the 'Nineties. By Mgr. Canon Moyes.....net 6/6
The Mission of Help to the Church in South Africa. By Arthur W. Robinson ..... 1/0
The Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah. By A. Edersheim.
Special ed. in one vol. ....net 8/0
Two Services of Public Prayer. By James Martineau.... 1/0

MESSRS. MACMILLAN & Co.

Biography

- Walter Pater. By Arthur C. Benson. (English Men of Letters) .....net 2/0
Henry Sidgwick: A Memoir. Ill. ....net 12/6
Memoirs of Archbishop Temple. By Seven Friends. Ill.
2 vols. ....net 36/0

Drama

- Nero. By Stephen Phillips .....net 4/6
The Climbers. By Clyde Fitch .....net 3/6
The Dynasts. By Thomas Hardy. Part Second .....net 4/6

Education

- Practical Exercises in Chemistry. By G. C. Donington
A Manual of Geometry. By W. D. Eggar
Lessons in Science: A Preliminary Course of Physics and Chemistry. By R. A. Gregory and A. T. Simmons .

History

- A People at School. By H. Fielding Hall .....net 10/0
A History of the Inquisition of Spain. By H. C. Lea.
Vol. I. ....net 10/6

Law

- Roman Private Law. By R. W. Leage

Miscellaneous

- The Modern Trust Company. By F. B. Kirkbride and J.
E. Sterrett .....net 10/6
Dairy Chemistry. By H. Snyder .....net 4/6

Music

- Grove's Dictionary of Music. Ed. by J. A. Fuller Maitland.
In 5 vols. Vol. II.....net 21/0

Philosophy

- The Philosophy of Religion. By Harald Höffding. Trans.
by B. E. Meyer .....net 12/0
The Origin and Development of Moral Ideas. By E. Westermarck. Vol. I. ....net 14/0

Politics

- Lord Curzon in India: a Selection of Speeches Delivered during his Viceroyalty
The Arbiter in Council .....net 10/0
The Taxation of the Liquor Trade. By J. Rowntree and
A. Sherwell
The Sociological Theory of Capital. By J. Rae. Ed. by
C. W. Mixter

Poetry

- Ronsard and La Pléiade. By the Rt. Hon. G. Wyndham
Door of Humility. By Alfred Austin, P.L.

Reprints

- Evelyn's Diary. Ed. by Austin Dobson. Ill. In 3 vols.
each net 10/6
The Eversley Series: A Memoir of Jane Austen, by her nephew J. E. Austen Leigh, with fragments of unfinished tales. Brief Literary Criticisms, by R. H. Hutton.
Calderon's Plays, trans. by E. FitzGerald .....each 4/6
Tennyson's Complete Works. 5 vols.....each net 2/0 and 3/0
Charles Lever: Tom Burke of Ours. Ill. by Phiz. Lord
Kilgobbin. Ill. by L. Fildes .....each 3/6
The Wrong Envelope. By Mrs. Molesworth ..... 6/0
The Writings of Benjamin Franklin. Ed. with Life by
A. H. Smyth. In 10 vols. Vol. III.....net 12/6

Science

- Electrical Engineering in Theory and Practice. By G. D.
Aspinall Parr. Ill.
Physical Optics. By R. W. Wood. Ill.
On Professional Education, with special reference to Medicine. By T. Clifford Allbutt .....net 2/0

- Observations of a Naturalist in the Pacific, 1896-1899. By H. B. Guppy. Vol. II., Plant-Dispersal. Ill. ....net 21/0
Chemistry of the Proteids. By G. Mann .....net 15/0
- Sport
Great Bowlers and Fielders. By G. W. Beldam and C. B. Fry. Ill. ....
- Theology
An Enquiry into the Evidential Value of Prophecy: Hulsean Prize Essay, 1904. By Rev. E. A. Edghill .... 6/0
Christian Thought on Present-Day Questions. By W. E. Whitworth
Christianity and the Working Classes. Ed. by George Haw .....net 3/6
The Prophet of Nazareth. By N. Schmidt .....net 10/6
The Religious Influences of London. In 7 vols. ....each net 2/6 the set ..... 15/0
- Topography and Travel
Highways and Byways in Dorset. By Sir F. Treves. Ill. by J. Pennell ..... 6/0
Mediæval Rhodesia. By D. Randall-MacIver. Ill. ....net 20/0
- MESSRS. MASTERS
Day Book of Short Readings. By the Author of "Preparatio." With Preface by Father Congreve .....net 6/0
The Servant of the Lord. By Richenda Buxton. With Preface by Canon Scott Holland. ....net 2/6
The Position of the Eucharist in Sunday Worship. By the Rev. W. H. Abraham .....net 6/0
The Problems of Faith. By H. T. Nicholson. .... 2/6
The Communion: An Altar Manual. By the Rev. J. Wattson Payton ..... 2/0
Addresses to Women. By the Rev. A. E. Tugman ..... 2/6
O Sapientia: Seven Sermons on the Ancient Antiphons for Advent. By the Rev. Cornelius Witherby ..... 2/6
Stories for the Christian Year: A Series of Stories for every Sunday and Holy Day of the Year. By C. A. Jones. 8 vols. (New edition.) .....each 2/0
Stories on the Church Catechism. By C. A. Jones. Edited by the Rev. Canon Knox Little. 4 vols. (New edition.) each 2/0
- MR. ELKIN MATHEWS
Miscellaneous
Reason as a Basis of Art. By C. F. A. Voysey .....net 1/0
Summer in San Sebastian. By A. F. Calvert. Ill. .... 2/6
De Flagello Myrteo. New edition, revised and enlarged net 2/6
- Poetry and the Drama
The Maid of Artemis: A Comedy. By Arthur Dillon. ....net 2/6
Songs from the Classics. By Charles F. Grindrod. ....net 3/6
Dramatic Lyrics. By John Gurdon .....net 3/6
Poems. By Aurelian .....net 1/0
A Selection from the Poetry of the late Lionel Johnson. ....net 1/0
Whisper! By Frances Wynne .....net 1/0
- MESSRS. MAUNSEL & Co.
Life in the Arran Islands. By J. M. Synge. Large paper edition with hand-coloured ill. by Jack B. Yeats (150 copies); ordinary edition without the drawings
The Shanachy. Ill. Literature by Lady Gregory, Lord Dunsany, the Author of "The Seething Pot," A. P. Graves, Stephen Gwynn, Rev. Peter O'Leary, Mrs. Rhys, George Bernard Shaw, W. B. Yeats, and others. Art by Miss Monsell, George A. Morrow, Seaghan MacCathmhavil, Hugh Thompson, and Jack B. Yeats.
The Rushlight: A Volume of Folk-Poetry. By S. MacCathmhavil. Ill.
The Memoirs of Miles Byrne. Edited by Stephen Gwynn. In six monthly parts
The Ulster Leaders of '98—viz., William Orr, Henry Monro, Henry Joy MacCracken, James Hope, Samuel Neilson, and Thomas Russell. By Francis J. Bigger. In six monthly parts
The Tower Press. No. II., Songs of a Devotee, by Thomas Keohler. No. III., Reminiscences of Impressionist Painters, by George Moore. No. IV., Essays, by John Eglinton.
- MESSRS. METHUEN & Co.
Archæology
Seals. By J. Harvey Bloom. Ill. ....net 7/6
- Art
European Enamels. By H. Cunynghame. (Connoisseur Library.) Plates .....net 25/0
The English Spy. By Bernard Blackmantle. 72 Coloured Plates by R. Cruikshank, and many Illustrations on Wood. 2 vols. ....net 7/0
- Biography
Marie Antoinette. By Hilaire Belloc. Ill. ....net 12/6
Beauties of the Seventeenth Century. By Allan Fea. Ill. ....net 12/6
Sir Walter Scott. By G. le G. Norgate. Ill. ....net 7/6
Fénelon. By Viscount St. Cyres. (Oxford Biographies.) Ill. ....net 3/6
- Letters from Samoa. By Mrs. M. I. Stevenson. Arranged by M. C. Balfour. Ill. .... 5/0
- Education
Manual Training Drawing (Woodwork): Its Principles and Application, with Solutions to Examination Questions, 1892-1905. Orthographic, Isometric, and Oblique Projection. By F. Sturch. Plates .....net 5/0
Elementary Organic Chemistry. By A. E. Dunstan. (Textbooks of Science) Ill. .... 2/6
A Primer of Religion. By Canon J. W. Oldfield ..... 2/6
A Junior Magnetism and Electricity. By W. T. Clough. (Methuen's Junior School Books) Ill. .... 2/6
A New Trigonometry for Beginners. By R. F. D'Arcy. .... 2/6
Examples in Physics. By C. E. Jackson ..... 2/6
A New Junior Arithmetic. By H. Bompas Smith. .... 2/6
The Gospel According to St. Luke. Introduction and Notes by William Williamson. (Methuen's Junior School Books) Maps ..... 2/0
A School History of Warwickshire. By B. C. A. Windle. Ill. 1/6
A School History of Somerset. By Walter Raymond. Ill. 1/6
Small Lessons on Great Truths. By A. K. Parkes ..... 1/6
- Fiction
The Portreeve. By Eden Phillpotts. With a Frontispiece by A. B. Collier ..... 6/0
The Scholar's Daughter. By Beatrice Harraden ..... 6/0
Lady Betty Across the Water. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. Ill. .... 6/0
Rose at Honeypt. By Mary E. Mann ..... 6/0
Blanche Esmead: A Story of Diverse Temperaments. By Mrs. Fuller Maitland ..... 6/0
Loaves and Fishes. By Bernard Capes ..... 6/0
The Sea Maid. By Ronald Macdonald. With a Frontispiece by E. R. Hughes ..... 6/0
The Scar. By Francis Warrington Dawson ..... 6/0
The Ancient Landmark: A Kentucky Romance. By Elizabeth C. Waltz ..... 6/0
The Mayor of Troy. By "Q" (A. T. Quiller-Couch). .... 6/0
The High Toby. By H. B. Marriott Watson ..... 6/0
The Shadow of the Lord. By Mrs. Hugh Fraser ..... 6/0
The Pathway of the Pioneer. By Dolf Wyllarde ..... 6/0
Durham's Farm. By C. C. Yeldham ..... 6/0
The Coming of the Randolphs. By Adeline Sergeant. .... 6/0
- History
The Great Siege: The Investment and Fall of Port Arthur. By B. W. Nörregaard. Maps and Ill. ....net 10/6
On the Spanish Main. By John Masefield. Ill. ....net 10/6
The Makers of Japan. By J. Morris. Ill. ....net 12/6
The Guilds of Florence. By Edgumbe Staley. Ill. ....net 5/0
The Manor and Manorial Records. By N. T. Hone. (Antiquary's Books.) Ill. ....net 7/6
- Literature
The Poems of William Wordsworth. Introduction and Notes by Nowell C. Smith. 4 vols. ....each net 5/0
Dante in English Literature. By Paget Toynbee. ....net 12/6
A Day-Book of Keats. Arranged by Ernest de Sélincourt net 3/6
- Miscellaneous
Commerce in War. By L. A. Atherley Jones and H. H. L. Bellot .....net 21/0
The Complete Cricketer. By Albert E. Knight. Ill. ....net 7/6
The Complete Rugby Footballer. By D. Gallaher. Ill. ....net 10/6
- Natural History, etc.
A Book of English Gardens. By Kate Wyatt and M. R. Gloag. Ill. ....net 10/6
A Handbook of Climbers, Twiners, and Wall Shrubs. By H. Purefoy FitzGerald. Ill. ....net 3/6
Pictorial Gardening. By G. F. Millin. Ill. ....net 3/6
- Theology
Development and Divine Purpose. By Vernon F. Storr net 5/0
- Travel and Topography
Lhasa and Its Mysteries. By L. Austine Waddell. Ill. and Maps .....net 25/0
Macedonia. By H. N. Brailsford. Ill. and Maps .....net 12/6
Spain and the Spaniards. By Edward Hutton. Ill. ....net 7/6
The Pageant of London. By Richard Davey. 2 vols. Ill. ....each net 7/6
The Rhine. By S. Baring-Gould. Ill. ....net 6/0
Edinburgh. By M. G. Williamson. (Ancient Cities series) Ill. ....net 4/6
Lincoln. By E. Mansel Simpson. (Ancient Cities series) Ill. ....net 4/6
The Lake of Como. By Richard Bagot .....net 3/6
- MR. ALEXANDER MORING
Art and Archæology
A Manual of Costume as illustrated by Monumental Brasses. By Herbert Druitt. Ill. ....net 10/6
- Biography and Memoirs
"Buck" Whaley's Memoirs. Ed. by Sir Edward Sullivan, Bart. Ill. ....net 10/6
- Fiction
The Story and Song of Black Roderick. By Dora Sigerson Shorter .....net 3/6

Miscellaneous

- The Children of Shakespeare: An Account of the child-characters in Shakespeare's plays. By Amy Payton Wright .....net 1/0
Little Flowers of a Childhood: the story of a young child's life. Ed. by Grace Warrack .....net 3/6
Notes on Ship-building and Nautical Terms of old in the north. By Eiríkr Magnússon ..... 1/0
The Heart of a Garden. By Rosamund Marriott Watson. Ill. ....net 7/6

Poetry

- The Viking. By Hugh McNab .....net 5/0

Reprints

- The De la More Booklets: The Ancient Mariner; Shelley's Cloud, Skylark, and West Wind; Keats's Odes; each 6d. In boxes of three and six, net 1/6 and 3/0
Bound, net 1/6 and 2/6

Reprints and New Editions

- The Young Duke. By Lord Beaconsfield. Introduction by Lucien Wolf ..... 3/6
The King's Classics: Cicero's Friendship, Old Age, and Scipio's Dream, from early translations, net 2/6 and 3/6.
The Early Lives of Charlemagne, trans. by A. J. Grant, net 1/6 and 2/6. The Vicar of Wakefield, net 1/6 and 2/6. Peg Woffington, by Charles Reade, net 1/6 and 2/6.
The De la More Press Quartos: The Beggar's Opera .....net 7/6 and 21/0

Science

- A First German Course for Science Students. By H. G. Fielder and F. E. Sandbach. Ill. ....net 2/6
Ecclesiological Essays. By J. Wickham Legg. Ill. ....net 7/6

MR. JOHN MURRAY

Art and Archaeology

- Reason in Architecture: Being the Forthcoming Course of Lectures on Architecture in the Royal Academy. By Thomas Graham Jackson, R.A. Ill. ....
Researches in Sinai. By Prof. Wm. Flinders Petrie. Ill. ....
The Arts in Early England. By G. Baldwin Brown. Vol. III., The Decorative Arts of the Anglo-Saxon Period. Crowe and Cavalcaselle's History of Painting. New edition, with Notes by Langton Douglas. Ill. 6 vols. each net 21/0

Biography

- The Early Life of Elizabeth Montagu, sometimes called "The Queen of the Blue Stockings." By her great-niece, Emily J. Climençon. Ill. 2 vols. ....net 36/0
Monographs: Biographical Sketches of Garrick, Macready, Rachel, and Baron Stockmar. By Sir Theodore Martin. Ill. ....net 12/0
The Three Dorset Captains at Trafalgar: Thomas Masterman Hardy; Charles Bullen; Henry Digby. By A. M. Broadley and R. G. Bartelot. Ill. ....net 15/0
The Duke of Argyll, 1823-1900. Edited by the Dowager Duchess of Argyll. 2 vols. Ill. ....
The Life of Sir James Graham, 1792-1861. Edited by C. S. Parker. 2 vols. Ill. ....
A Week at Waterloo, 1815. By Lady de Lancey Sidney Herbert: Lord Herbert of Lea. By Lord Stanmore. 2 vols. Ill. ....net 24/0
The Memoirs of the Lord of Joinville. By Mrs. Ethel Wedgwood. Ill. ....net 10/6
Jottings of an Old Solicitor. By Sir John Hollams George Crabbe and His Times. By René Huchon. Translated by Frederick Clarke
The Life and Works of Giovanni Antonio Bazzi. By R. H. Hobart Cust. Ill. ....net 21/0
The Life of Isabella Bird (Mrs. Bishop). By Anna M. Stoddart. Ill. ....

Education

- Grammaire française élémentaire. By W. Mansfield Poole
The Andromache of Euripides. Edited by G. Norwood
Selections from Thucydides, Book VI. Edited by P. N. Ure

Fiction

- The Hâtanee. By Arthur Eggar ..... 6/0
Jack Derringer. By Basil Lubbock ..... 6/0
The Face of Clay. By H. A. Vachell ..... 6/0

History

- The History of the Papacy in the XIXth Century. By Dr. F. Nielsen. Trans. by Arthur James Mason and others. 2 vols. ....

Law

- An Essay on the matter of State in Relation to English Law. By W. Harrison Moore
Maine's Ancient Law. Edited by Sir Frederick Pollock, Bart. ....net 5/0

Military

- The German Official Account of the War in South Africa. Part II. Ill. ....net 15/0
Abridged Official Account of the Second Afghan War, 1878-1880. Ill. ....
Artillery and Explosives. By Sir Andrew Noble. Ill. ....

Miscellaneous

- Our Waterways. By Urquhart A. Forbes and W. H. R. Ashford
The Transition in Agriculture. By Edwin A. Pratt .....net
Causeries Rimées. By Mrs. S. C. Boyd. Ill. ....
The Principles of Taxation. By G. Armitage Smith
Growth and Spread of Culture. By Edward B. Tylor. Ill. ....
Wisdom of the East Series. The Instructions of Ptah-Hotep; The Wisdom of Israel; The Classics of Confucius, 2 vols. ....each net 1/0
Elocution and Expression. By the Rev. Albert F. Tenney .....net 5/0

Philosophy

- The Essential of the Æsthetics. By Professor G. L. Raymond. Ill. ....

Poetry

- The Triumphs of Petrarch. Translated into English by Henry Boyd. Ill. ....

Political

- Western Culture in Eastern Lands. By Arminius Vambéry

Reprints

- Dissertations on Subjects connected with the Incarnation. By the Rt. Rev. C. Gore, Bishop of Birmingham. Cheap edition .....net 2/6
Dictionary of Hymnology. Cheap edition .....net 16/0

Science

- Heredity. By J. Arthur Thomson. (Progressive Science Series) .....net 6/0
Noteworthy Families (Science). By Francis Galton and Edgar Schuster .....net 6/0
Human Blood. By G. A. Buckmaster. Ill. ....net 10/6
Recent Development in Biological Science. By W. B. Hardy
Chemistry of the Albumens. By S. B. Schryver .....net 7/6

Theology

- The Making of the Gospels. By the Rev. J. J. Scott .....net 1/0
The Holy Eucharist. By the Rev. P. N. Waggett
Studies of English Mystics. By the Rev. W. R. Inge .....net 6/0

Topography and Travel

- The Africander Land. By Archibald R. Colquhoun .....net 16/0
Mast and Sail in Europe and Asia. By H. Warington Smyth. Ill. ....net 21/0
Peasant Life in the Holy Land. By the Rev. C. T. Wilson. Ill. ....net 12/0
Things Indian. By William Crooke
The Eleven Eaglets of the West. By Paul Fountain .....net 10/6
The Dead Heart of Australia. By J. W. Gregory. Ill. ....

MR. EVELEIGH NASH

Biography

- Famous Beauties of Two Reigns—Charles II.—George III. By Mary Craven. Ill. ....
Ten Tudor Statesmen. By Arthur D. Innes
With the Empress Dowager of China. By Katharine Carl .....net 10/6

Fiction

- The Blue Peter. By Morley Roberts ..... 6/0
The Lapse of Vivien Eady. By Charles Marriott ..... 6/0
The Paradise of the Wild Apple. By Richard le Gallienne
Bardelys the Magnificent. By R. Sabatini ..... 6/0

History

- Versailles and the Court under Louis XIV. By James E. Farmer. Ill. ....net 15/0
With the Cossacks. By Francis M'Cullagh. Ill. ....net 7/6

Miscellaneous

- Milton's England. By L. A. Mead. Ill. ....net 6/0
Dickens's London. By Francis Miltoun. Ill. ....net 6/0
A Woman's Walks. By Lady Colin Campbell. Ill. ....net 6/0
The Fiscal Dispute made Easy. By W. H. Mallock ..... 1/0

SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SON

Art

- Whistler and Others. By Frederick Wedmore ..... 6/0

Ethics

- The New Idolatry. By Washington Gladden. With a Preface by Rev. Griffith Jones, B.A. .... 3/6

Fiction

- The History of Richard Raynal: Solitary. By Robert Hugh Benson ..... 3/6
The Separatist. By a New Writer ..... 6/0

Miscellaneous

- How to Choose a House: How to Take and Keep it. By Charles Emanuel and Ernest M. Joseph. Ill. ....net 3/6
The Law of Heavy and Light Mechanical Traction on

- Highways in the United Kingdom. By C. A. Montague Barlow and W. Joynson Hicks .....net 8/6
 Money, Exchange, and Banking in their Practical, Theoretical, and Legal Aspects: A Complete Manual for Bank Officials, Business Men, and Students of Commerce. By H. T. Easton .....net 5/0
Theology
 The Life Superlative. By Stopford A. Brooke ..... 6/0
Travel
 On the Queen's Errands. By Captain Philip Wynter. Photogravures .....net 10/6

MESSRS. SMITH, ELDER &amp; Co.

- Biography
 Wesley and His Century: A Study in Spiritual Forces. By W. H. Fitchett, B.A., LL.D. Ill. ....net 6/0
 A Memoir of William Johnson Fox. By Richard Garnett The Victorian Chancellors. By J. B. Atlay, Barrister-at-Law. In 2 vols. Vol. I. Ill. ....net 14/0
 Augustus Austen Leigh, Provost of King's College, Cambridge: A Record of College Reform. By William Austen Leigh, Fellow of King's. Portraits .....(?) net 9/0
 Elizabeth Barrett Browning in Her Letters. By Percy Lubbock. Ill. ....net 7/6
 Robert Browning and Alfred Domett. Edited by Frederic G. Kenyon. Ill. ....net 5/0
 Voltaire's Fellow-Workers. By S. G. Tallentyre. Ill. ....net 9/0
 A Woman of Wit and Wisdom: Mrs. Elizabeth Carter, 1717-1806. By Alice C. C. Gaussen. Ill. ....net 7/6
Fiction
 Fenwick's Career. By Mrs. Humphry Ward. Ill. .... 6/0
 Mr. Baxter, Sportsman. By Charles Fielding Marsh .... 6/0
 Brownjohn's. By Mrs. Percy Dearmer ..... 6/0
 The Poison of Tongues. By M. E. Carr ..... 6/0
 Old Mr. Lovelace. By Christian Tearle ..... 6/0
 By the World Forgot: Being Certain Rescued Fragments of Submerged Romance. By Hugh Clifford, C.M.G. .... 6/0
 Clemency Shafto. By Frances G. Burmester ..... 6/0
 We and the Doctor. By Horace G. Hutchinson ..... 6/0
 Salted Almonds. By F. Anstey ..... 6/0
 Dick: A Story without a Plot. By G. F. Bradby ..... 3/6
 If Youth But Knew! By Agnes and Egerton Castle .... 6/0
Military
 With Mounted Infantry in Tibet. By Major W. J. Ottley. Ill. ....net 10/6
Miscellaneous
 Social Types. By the Hon. G. W. E. Russell ..... 5/0
 At the Gate of Death .....net 6/0
 From a College Window. By Arthur C. Benson .....net 7/6
 Provincial Letters ..... 6/0
 The Small Garden Beautiful, and How to Make It so. By A. C. Curtis. Ill. .... 7/6
Natural History
 Animal Life. By F. W. Gamble, M.Sc. Ill. ....
Sport
 Seventy Years' Fishing. By Charles G. Barrington...net 10/6
Travel
 The Romance of an Eastern Capital. By F. B. Bradley-Birt. Ill. ....net 12/6
 A Summer Ride through Ladakh and Baltistan. By Miss J. E. Duncan. Ill. ....net 12/6
 A Vision of India. By Sidney Low. Ill. ....net 10/6
 The Balkan Trail. By Frederick Moore. Ill. ....net 10/6

MESSRS. SWAN SONNENSCHN &amp; Co.

- Education
 A New Classical Library (edited by Dr. Emil Reich):
 The Theætetus and Philebus of Plato, translated by H. F. Carlill, M.A. Plutarch's Lives of Alexander, Pericles, Caius Cæsar, and Æmilius Paulus, translated by W. R. Frazer. The Annals of Tacitus (Books I. to VI.), translated by A. V. Symonds, B.A.
 The Greek War of Independence: Being a Greek Story for Beginners, with Notes and Exercises, covering the regular Accidence. By C. D. Chambers, M.A.
History
 Studies in Roman History. By E. G. Hardy .....
 The Fredericksburg Campaign (1862): A Strategical Sketch. By Major G. W. Redway. Maps and Plans.
Literature
 Browning's Sordello: A Commentary. By K. M. Loudon. (Bijou Series) .....
 An Anthology of French Poetry from the Time of Froissart to the Beginning of the Present Century. Selected and arranged by Frederick Lawton, M.A. (Bijou Series)....
 Diary and Correspondence of Samuel Pepys, with Life and Notes. By Lord Braybrooke. Verbatim reprint of the copyright edition of 1848-49 with copious Index. 4 vols.
Philosophy, Theology, etc.
 Physiological Psychology. By Prof. W. Wundt. A translation of the Fifth and wholly re-written German - edition (1902-03) by Professor E. B. Titchener. In 3 vols. Vol. II. Ill. ....

 The History of Philosophy. By Dr. J. E. Erdmann. (Fifth German edition by W. Bruno Erdmann.) An English abridgment trans. and ed. by W. S. Hough ..
 The Workshop of Religions. By A. Lillie .....
 Genesis and Exodus as History. By James Thomas ....
 Apollonius of Tyana, and other Essays. By Thomas Whittaker, Author of "The Neo-Platonists," etc. ....
Science
 The Student's Text-Book of Zoology. By Adam Sedgwick, M.A. Vol. III., completing the work. Ill. ....
 The Student's Hygiene. By Ernest Evans. Ill. ....
 The Chemistry of Common Life. By John B. Coppock. Ill. ....
 Insect Pests of the Farm and Garden. By F. Martin Duncan. Ill. ....
Social Economics
 A Practical Programme for Working Men—showing the tendency of the "Labour" movement in the United States (Social Science Series) .....
 John Thelwall. By C. Cestre (Social Science Series) ..
 The Restoration of the Gild System. By Arthur James Penty .....
Travel and Topography
 Topographical and Historic Links. By D. L. Maguire. Ill. ....

MR. T. FISHER UNWIN

- Art
 On Art and Artists. By Max Nordau .....net 7/6
Biography
 Links in My Life on Land and Sea. By Captain J. W. Gambier, R.N. Ill. .... 21/0
 Haeckel: His Life and Work. By Wilhelm Bölsche. Translated by Joseph McCabe. Ill. ....net 15/0
 Sir Henry Irving. By Percy Fitzgerald. Ill. ....net 10/6
 The "Pope" of Holland House (John Whishaw). By Lady Seymour. Ill. ....net 10/6
Fiction
 A Supreme Moment. By Mrs. Hamilton Synge ..... 6/0
 A Dazzling Reprobate. By W. R. H. Trowbridge ..... 6/0
 The Dream and the Business. By John Oliver Hobbes.... 6/0
 Mister Bill: A Man. By Albert E. Lyons ..... 6/0
 A Son of Arron. By Gwendolen Pryce ..... 6/0
 Cecilia's Lovers. By Amelia E. Barr ..... 6/0
 A Double Marriage. By Lucas Cleeve ..... 6/0
 Adventures of a Supercargo. By Louis Becke ..... 6/0
 The Threshing Floor. By J. S. Fletcher ..... 6/0
 The Further Chronicles of Don Q. By K. and Hesketh Pritchard ..... 6/0
 Counsels of the Night. By Lucas Cleeve ..... 6/0
 A Millionaire's Courtship. By Mrs. Archibald Little ..... 6/0
 The London Lovers. By Margaret Baillie-Saunders ..... 6/0
History
 A Literary History of the English People. Vol. II. From the Renaissance to the Civil War. By J. J. Jusserand net 12/6
 Society in the Country House: Anecdotal Records of Six Centuries. By T. H. S. Escott ..... 16/0
 Historical and Critical Essays. By Pasquale Villari ..net 21/0
 Cobden as a Citizen: A Chapter in Manchester History. Being a facsimile of Cobden's pamphlet "Incorporate your Borough!" with an introduction and Cobden bibliography. By W. E. A. Axon .....net 21/0
 The First Annexation of the Transvaal. By W. J. Leyds net 21/0
 The Manors of Suffolk: Notes on their History and Devolution and their Several Lords. The Hundreds of Babergh and Blackbourn. By W. A. Copinger. Ill. net 21/0
Miscellaneous
 The Religious Songs of Connacht. By Douglas Hyde. 2 vols. ....net 10/0
 The Motorist's A.B.C. By L. Elliott Brookes. Ill. ....net 5/0
Natural History
 The Birds of Middlesex. By J. E. Harting. Ill. ....net 15/0
Politics and Sociology
 Bossism and Monopoly. By T. C. Spelling .....net 7/6
 The City: The Hope of Democracy. By F. Howe .....net 7/6
 The Labour Party: What It is and What It Wants. By the Rev. Conrad R. Noel .....net 2/0
Theology
 Disestablishment in France. By Paul Sabatier. Translated by Robert Dell .....net 2/6
Travel
 Rambles on the Riviera. By Edward Strasburger. Translated by O. and B. Comerford-Casey. Ill. ....net 21/0
 Sport and Travel: Abyssinia and British East Africa. By Lord Hindlip. Ill. ....net 21/0
 From Pump Court to Delhi. By S. Parnell Kerr. Ill. ....net 15/0
 With Fire and Sword in the Caucasus. By Luigi Villari. ....net 10/6

“There’s for you,
4/6
and there,
4/6
and there!”
4/6

THE HENRY IRVING SHAKESPEARE

NEW EDITION

Edited by SIR HENRY IRVING & FRANK A. MARSHALL

Is the ideal Edition, dealing not only with the famous Dramatist's Works, but also with his Life, Surroundings, and Associations. It is at once a complete Literary and Stage History, and a Critical Analysis of each Play dealt with.

The ATHENÆUM says:

“On the care with which the text itself of the plays has been prepared we have nothing but praise to bestow. . . . The general result of this care and labour is . . . so good that we must congratulate all concerned in it. . . . It is profusely illustrated by Mr. Gordon Browne, whose charming designs, executed in facsimile, give it an artistic value superior, in our judgment, to any illustrated edition of Shakespeare with which we are acquainted.”

The greatest interpreter of “Shakespeare” in recent times, the late Sir Henry Irving, took an important part in the compilation of this important Work.

The publishers believe, with no undue exaggeration but in the spirit of honest satisfaction, that they have not come short of their own ideal: and that they have produced for all—the scholar, the general reader, and the judicious book buyer—a Work that cannot be swept away in the advancing tide of successive books, but will justly take its place as the Edition which the widest class of readers will desire to possess for reading, use, and reference.

The illustrations are of the highest order, and have been specially drawn for this Work: they comprise 550 designs embodied in the text, together with a large number of full-page etchings. In addition there is a series of fine reproductions in colour from Shakespeare's Works, after pictures by Daniel Maclise, R.A., Sir J. E. Millais, Bart., P.R.A., Ford Madox Brown, Charles R. Leslie, R.A., J. Northcote, R.A., Sir E. J. Poynter, P.R.A., W. Holman Hunt, Sir John Gilbert, R.A., &c.

Where so many have combined, it is confidently maintained that departmental excellence has been reached.

By special arrangements with the Publishers we are able to offer this unique Work at a price well within the reach of all. We are not offering this Work on the Instalment Plan, but by a simple arrangement it has been decided to send each subscriber one volume per month as issued from the Press. The first volume is now ready.

The SPECTATOR says:

“This handsomely printed edition aims at being popular and practical. Add to these advantages Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations, and enough has been said to recommend an edition which will win public recognition by its unique and serviceable qualities.”

There will be fourteen volumes in all, and the price of each volume is only 4s. 6d., which works out at practically only 1s. per week. All we ask is that a Postal Order for 4s. 6d. should be sent us, together with instructions to send the remaining thirteen volumes as published, one each month, and the volume can be paid for on delivery. All carriage is paid, but no order can be accepted except for the complete set. The Work is printed on a paper of fine surface, especially made to give the best results with the hundreds of pen and ink and half tone illustrations scattered throughout its pages. It is beautifully bound in artistically decorated cloth boards, with an ornamental coloured design in gold by Mr. Talwin Morris. The size of each volume is 9 inches by 7 inches.

On completion of the Work, a Handsome Souvenir in the shape of an impression of the admirable Portrait of Sir Henry Irving as Hamlet, from the painting by Edwin Long, R.A., executed in Photogravure, will be presented to each subscriber.

The size of the engraved surface is 18½ by 13½ inches, with margin suitable for framing. This Portrait has been sold regularly for One Guinea net.

The ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE says:

“Mr. Gordon Browne's illustrations are amongst the most perfect things of the kind we have ever seen.”

We respectfully intimate to subscribers that all orders will be executed in rotation.

It can truly be said that it is
AN EDITION FOR ALL TIME.

TO MANAGER OF
THE ACADEMY
20 Tavistock Street,
London, W.C.

Please send me, carriage paid, the first volume of the New “Henry Irving Shakespeare,” for which I enclose 4s. 6d., I agree to accept the remaining 13 volumes at (4/6 each net) the rate of one each month.

Name.....
Address.....

BLACKIE'S LIST

JUST PUBLISHED

BENARES: THE SACRED CITY

Sketches of Hindoo Life and Religion

By E. B. HAVELL, A.R.C.A., Principal of the Government School of Art, Calcutta.
With many Illustrations. Large demy 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 12s. 6d. net.

"The volume will be a revelation of wonders to many students. It should interest the duller. To the apprehensive it will bring food and stimulant to the thought and imagination."—SCOTSMAN.

"Mr. Havell's book is a most interesting record of the art and religions of Benares, useful to the traveler as well as to the student, and is full of appropriate illustrations."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Mr. Havell combines the vividness of the descriptive writer with the knowledge of an art student and archaeologist, and it is this combination that gives the book its special merit."—GLASGOW HERALD.

"A handsome and artistic volume. One of the most striking features of the book is to be found in its illustrations. They are about seventy in number, a great many being full-page plates clear and admirably executed."—MORNING POST.

THE CELTIC REVIVAL*THE MYTHOLOGY OF THE BRITISH ISLANDS

An Introduction to the Celtic Myth, Legend, Poetry, and Romance

By CHARLES SQUIRE. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 12s. 6d. net.

"Well written and lucid, and leaves us with a clear idea of the scope of Celtic mythology. We have no hesitation in recommending it."—ATHENÆUM.

"Mr. Squire's exposition is very clear, judicious, and interesting. . . . The book is replete with curious information."—PAUL MALL GAZETTE.

THE LITERATURE OF THE CELTS

Its History and Romance

By MAGNUS MACLEAN, M.A., D.Sc. Demy 8vo, 416 pp., cloth boards, 7s. 6d. net.

"Mr. Maclean is an enthusiastic Celt. . . . He has a wide acquaintance with the critical and other literatures which that has called forth. We cannot overpraise his account of the MSS., their writers, their discoverers, and their editors."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

THE LITERATURE OF THE HIGHLANDSBy MAGNUS MACLEAN, M.A., D.Sc., Author of "The Literature of the Celts."
Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d. net.CONTENTS: Highland Literature—Alexander Macdonald and the Jacobite Bards—Duncan Ban Macintyre and the Poets of Nature—Macpherson and his Ossian—Robb Donn and the Elegiac, Amatory, and Satiric Poets—Dugald Buchanan and the Religious Poets and Hymn Writers—Gaelic Proverbs—English Renderings of Gaelic Poetry and their Authors—The Gaelic Bards of the Nineteenth Century—The Literature of Travel and of History—Index of Names.
"All things considered, this work, which is bright, well-written, and well-arranged, is an admirable and trustworthy text-book of its subject."—SPECTATOR.THE RED-LETTER LIBRARY

A SERIES OF SELECTIONS FROM THE

GREAT MASTERS OF ENGLISH LITERATUREMessrs. BLACKIE & SON, LTD., have much pleasure in announcing that they have made a number of important additions to the Red-Letter Library.Calverley's Verses and Translations. Introduction by OWEN SEAMAN.Kibble's Psalter in English Verse. Introduction by his Grace the ARCH-BISHOP OF ARMAGH.Hazlitt's Select Essays. Introduction by CHARLES WHIBLEY.Brown's Religio Medici. Introduction by CHARLES WHIBLEY.Lamb's Last Essays of Elia. Introduction by AUGUSTINE BIRRELL.

1s. 6d. net, cloth, gilt top; 2s. 6d. net, leather, gilt top.

OTHER VOLUMES IN PREPARATION

THE RED-LETTER SHAKESPEARE

Edited by EDMUND K. CHAMBERS.

A NEW EDITION OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS, in Single Volumes, for the General Reader. Text printed in Red and Black.

The following Volumes are now ready

The Merchant of Venice
The Tempest
A Midsummer Night's Dream
Much Ado About Nothing
King Henry the Fifth
King Richard the Second
Love's Labour's LostTwo Gentlemen of Verona
As You Like It
Macbeth
Romeo and Juliet
King Richard the Third
The Taming of the Shrew
Poems (2 vols.)

Cloth, 1s. net; limp leather, 1s. 6d. net.

OTHER VOLUMES TO BE ISSUED IMMEDIATELY

Messrs. Blackie &amp; Son, Ltd., will be pleased to send Catalogue and Prospectuses post free on application

Blackie and Son, Limited
50 Old Bailey, E.C.Mr. JOHN LANE has just published a New Volume by A. F. CALVERT, entitledMOORISH REMAINS IN SPAINBeing a Brief Record of the Arabian Conquest and Occupation of the Peninsula, with a Particular Account of the Mahomedan Architecture and Decoration in the Cities of Cordova, Seville, and Toledo. With 84 Coloured Plates and over 400 Illustrations, Diagrams, etc. Crown 4to (7 $\frac{1}{2}$  in. by 10 in.), 42s. net.

The author gives a brief account of the conquest of Spain by the Moors and a detailed account of the architecture and decoration of Cordova, Seville, and Toledo. The distinctive beauties of Moorish art are emphasised by the 80 coloured plates reproduced in this volume, which give characteristic examples of the beauties of Moorish work, including Mosaic—Architectural Detail—Painted Ceilings—Ornament. In addition, exclusive of 200 Diagrams, there are over 200 Black-and-White Illustrations.

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPANESE ARCHITECTURE AND THE ALLIED ARTS

By RALPH ADAMS CRAM, Fellow of the American Institute of Architects, Member of the Society of Arts, London, and Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society. With 60 Illustrations reproduced from Photographs. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE CHAMPAGNE STANDARD

By Mrs. JOHN LANE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Second Edition.]

"The author's champagne overflows with witty sayings too numerous to cite."—MORNING POST.

"Mrs. Lane may congratulate herself on having that blessed sense of humour which is one of the most valuable possessions in life."—ACADEMY.

HAUNTINGS

Fantastic Stories. By VERNON LEE, Author of "The Enchanted Woods," "Hortus Vitæ," "The Spirit of Rome." Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A New Novel by a New Writer.

THE HOUSE BY THE BRIDGE

By M. G. EASTON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Now ready.]

MOUNTAIN LOVERS

By FIONA MACLEOD. Crown 8vo, 6s.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, VIGO STREET, LONDON, W.

SEELEY & Co.'s NEW BOOKS

First Edition almost exhausted, Second in Preparation.

THE MAKING OF MODERN EGYPT

By Sir AUCLAND COLVIN, K.C.S.I., Late Lieutenant-Governor of the N.W. Provinces (and Oude) and Comptroller-General in Egypt. With Portraits and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 18s. net.

"A book to be warmly commended, and of which the public stood in considerable need."—MORNING POST.

"A masterly summary of the benefits conferred on Egypt by British enterprise and influences."—STANDARD.

NOW READY

TWO YEARS AMONG NEW GUINEA CANNIBALS

By A. E. PRATT. With 54 Illustrations and a Map. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

"A book of vivid enterprise from beginning to end."—OUTLOOK.

"A travel record which, in its lucid description of new scenes, strange people, and rich naturalist rewards, is attractive throughout."

MANCHESTER COURIER.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS'S DISCLOSURES

Edited, with Introductions and Notes on Text and Illustrations, by ROGER FRY. With 32 Full-page Illustrations, extra crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"Most interesting edition."—SPECTATOR.

"Of real value and importance."—WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

THE CATHEDRAL BUILDERS IN ENGLAND

By E. S. PRIOR, F.S.A., Author of "A History of Gothic Art in England." With 4 Plates printed in Colour and many other Illustrations, super-royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; or in cloth, gilt top, 7s. net.

"Most interesting as well as learned and thoughtful."—MORNING POST

LONDON: SEELEY &amp; CO., Limited, 38 Great Russell Street.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE, SCIENCE & ART

No. 1767

MARCH 17, 1906

PRICE THREEPENCE

Education

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Albemarle Street, Piccadilly, W.

Tuesday next, March 20, at five o'clock, JOHN EDWARD MARR, Esq., M.A., Sc.D., F.R.S., First of Three Lectures on "The Influence of Geology on Scenery." (The Tyndall Lectures.) Half a Guinea the Course.

Thursday, March 22, at five o'clock, Professor BERTRAM HOPKINSON, M.A., B.Sc., M.Inst. C.E., First of Three Lectures on "Internal Combustion Engines." (With Experimental Illustrations.) Half a Guinea.

Subscription to all the Courses in the Season Two Guineas.

ST. PAUL'S GIRLS' SCHOOL, BROOK GREEN, W.

AN EXAMINATION for Foundation Scholarships, open to Girls under sixteen years of age, will be held at the School on April 3, 4, and 5. These Scholarships exempt the holders from the payment of Tuition Fees.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Headmistress at the School.

EDUCATION SCHOOLS FOR BOYS AND GIRLS. Prospectuses and every information supplied to Parents FREE OF CHARGE. State Requirements.—UNIVERSITY SCHOOLS BUREAU, 122 Regent Street, W. Established 1858.

IN ENGLAND
AND ABROAD.

REV. JOHN F. RICHARDS, M.A. (Balliol), First-Class Classical Mods. and Greats, prepares Pupils for the Universities, etc. Seaside.—The Manor, Bishopstone, Lewes.

Typewriting

TO AUTHORS.—Lady (experienced) undertakes TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. 10d. after 40,000; INDEXING and PROOF REVISING; accuracy; promptitude; highest testimonials.—Miss Foot, 48 Digby Mansions, Hammersmith.

AUTHORS' MSS., 9d. per 1000 words, Sermons, Plays, Envelopes, and all kinds carefully typed at home (Remington). Good paper. Orders promptly executed.—M. L., 7 Vernon Road, now known as 18 Edgeley Road, Clapham.

TYPEWRITING WANTED.—MSS. and all Literary work executed accurately and promptly. 10d. per 1000 words. Carbon copies.—Mrs. BRAMBLES, 26 Clarence Road, Windsor.

AUTHORS' MSS., NOVELS, STORIES, PLAYS, ESSAYS TYPE-WRITTEN with complete accuracy, 9d. per 1000 words. References to well-known writers. Carbon copies a speciality.—M. STUART, Thirlbank, Roxborough Road, Harrow.

FLOWER & VEGETABLE GROWING. Two Public School Men would take a Pupil. Well-established business which showed nearly 20 per cent. profit last year. Satisfactory references given. Premium £50 for twelve months course. WELLS & BEWLEY, Les Clos Vineries, St. Martins, Guernsey.

AN OPENING OCCURS FOR INTELLIGENT YOUTH to train to fill an important position in London editor's office. Excellent future, premium £150.—Address, Box 840, Judd's, 5 Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.

Books for Sale, etc.

THOMAS THORP,
Secondhand Bookseller,
100 ST. MARTIN'S LANE, LONDON, W.C., AND
4 BROAD STREET, READING.

MONTHLY CATALOGUES from both Addresses. Libraries Purchased. Sale Commissions executed.

THE MOSHER BOOKS.

THE NEW CATALOGUE for 1905, large octavo, choicely printed in red and black, in old style grey wrapper, uncut edges, mailed free on request.

THOMAS B. MOSHER,
Portland, Maine, U.S.A.

BOOKS

Largest Stock in London of
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDER STOCKS,
All in perfectly new condition
as originally published,
but at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES,
February Supplementary Catalogue Just Ready.

WILLIAM GLAISHER
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265 High Holborn, London.

BERTRAM DOBELL, SECOND-HAND BOOKSELLER, AND PUBLISHER,

77 CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.
A large Stock of Old and Rare Books in English Literature, including Poetry and the Drama—Shakespeareana—First Editions of Famous Authors—Manuscripts—Illustrated Books, etc. CATALOGUES free on application.

THE PRADO and its MASTERPIECES
by Charles Ricketts, 54 fine plates in photogravure, imperial 4to, cloth, only 350 published by Constable at £5 5s. net. Offered for £2 2s. net. New.—Walker, 37 Briggate, Leeds.

THE ANCESTOR, complete set as published, in 12 vols. and 3 indices; 250 full-page plates and many illustrations in the text; published at £3 7s. 6d. net for 35s., 1902-5.—W. E. Goulden, 5 St. Paul's, Canterbury.

Art

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTER-ETCHERS and ENGRAVERS, 5a, Pall-mall East, S.W.

24th ANNUAL EXHIBITION NOW OPEN DAILY, 10 to 6. Admission 1s.

W. P. D. STEBBING, Secretary.

THE BAILLIE GALLERY, 54 Baker Street, W.—Exhibition of Paintings by THE LIVERPOOL SCHOOL OF PAINTERS (1810-1867) and Water-colours by OLIVER HALL. Now open, 10-6. Admission (including catalogue), 1s.

PERMANENT REPRODUCTIONS OF THE WORKS OF

G. F. Watts, E. Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, Windsor Castle Holbein Drawings,

Also Pictures from the Uffizi and Louvre Galleries, may be obtained from FREDK. HOLLVER, 8 PEMBROKE SQUARE, LONDON, W.

Illustrated Catalogues 12 penny stamps. Foreign stamps accepted from abroad.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LTD.

Every month MUDIE's publish a fresh list (classified and annotated) of their English and Foreign Surplus Books and New Remainders. The list contains popular works on Travel, Sport, Army and Navy, Biography, Theology, Arts, Philosophy, Economics, and Fiction.

List sent post free on application.

30-34 NEW OXFORD ST.; 48 QUEEN VICTORIA ST.
241 BROMPTON ROAD, LONDON.

Books Wanted

CURRENT Literature and Surplus Books of every kind bought at fair prices for cash by HOLMES BROS., 4 Manette Street, Charing Cross Road (many years with Mrs. C. Hindley, of Booksellers' Row).

RHYS LEWIS, English Edition; Swansea Guide, 1802; Mathew's Directory of Swansea.—Write Lloyd & Townsend, 13 Dillwyn Street, Swansea.

ABSURDITIES in Prose and Verse, 1827
Account of New South Wales, 1804
Ackermann, Repository of Arts, A series
Any Books published by him, with coloured plates
Ackermann's Public Schools, 1816
Views of Country Seats, 2 vols, 8vo, 1830
History of Oxford, 2 vols
History of Cambridge, 2 vols
Westminster, 2 vols
Actors by Daylight, 1839-9, 55 Nos.
Actors by Gaslight, 1838, 37 Nos.
Adair (J.) History of American Indians, 1775
Adams (R. and J.) Works in Architecture, 3 vols, folio, 1778, etc.
Adanson (J.) Damascus and Palmyra, 2 vols, 1838
A Day's Ride, second edition, 2 vols, 1863
A Declaration of the State of Virginia, 1620
A Dialogue in the Shades, 1766
Adonais, an Elegy on the Death of John Keats, by P. B. S., Pisa, 1821
Adventures of a Post Captain, with coloured plates, N D (1821)
Adventures of Count Fathom, 2 vols, 1753
Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves, 2 vols, 1762
Adventures of Ulysses, 1808
Adventures of Johnny Newcombe in the Navy, 1818
Adventures of Mr. Ledbury, 3 vols, 1844 or 1846
Advice, A Satire, 4to, 1746
Æsop's Fables, any editions before 1600
Africa (South), Bound Volumes of Tracts relating to
Walter T. Spencer, 27 New Oxford Street, W.C.

Sale by Auction

IN THE ROYAL EXCHANGE SALE-ROOMS, GLASGOW.

On Tuesday, April 3, at Twelve o'clock,
VERY IMPORTANT PUBLIC SALE OF RARE EDITIONS OF BURNSIANA

being the Collection of Dr. ALEXANDER PATTERSON, 22 India Street, Glasgow.

ROBERT McTEAR & CO., Auctioneers,
Catalogues can now be had on application.

ROYAL EXCHANGE SALEROOMS.
St. Vincent Place, Glasgow.

Hotels.

ABERYSTWYTH.—THE QUEEN'S HOTEL.—First class, facing the sea and sheltered from the North-East Winds. Terms moderate. Tariff on application.—W. H. PALMER, Proprietor.

A Selection of Art Books Published by GEORGE NEWNES, LTD.

Newnes' Art Library

Each volume contains about sixty-four full pages in monochrome, and a Frontispiece in photogravure. These are in many cases made from works which have not previously been reproduced. Each volume also contains a list of the principal works of the artist. 3s. 6d. net.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD. By J. E.

Phythian.

GIOVANNI BELLINI. By Everard Meynell.

BOTTICELLI. By Richard Davey.

SIR JOSHUA REYNOLDS. By A. L. Baldry.

CONSTABLE'S SKETCHES. By Sir James D. Linton, R.I.

VELASQUEZ. By A. L. Baldry.

GOZZOLI. By Hugh Stokes.

RAPHAEL. By Edgcumbe Staley.

VAN DYCK. By Hugh Stokes.

G. F. WATTS. By Dr. R. Pantini.

TINTORETTO. By Mrs. Arthur Bell.

PAOLO VERONESE. By Mrs. Arthur Bell.

EARLY WORK OF TITIAN. By Malcolm Bell.

FILIPPINO LIPPI. By P. J. Konody.

BURNE-JONES. By Malcolm Bell.

PUVIS DE CHAVANNES. By Arsène Alexandre.

ROSSETTI. By Ernest Radford.

FRA ANGELICO. By Edgcumbe Staley.

LATER WORK OF TITIAN. By Henry Miles.

"Messrs. Newnes' now celebrated series devoted to the great masters . . . excellently reproduced, and apparently considerable trouble has been taken to secure reproductions of some of the less known and least accessible of the painters' chief works."—STUDIO.

Newnes' Library of the Applied Arts

A series of volumes for those interested in the Applied Arts of the past, providing information of a really practical value to Collectors and Students. Particular attention has been paid to the Illustrations, which are both numerous and of the highest quality, and include both monochromes and subjects in colour. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net each.

DUTCH POTTERY AND PORCELAIN. By W. Pitcairn

Knowles.

OLD ENGLISH FURNITURE. By Frederick Fenn.

ENGLISH EMBROIDERY. By A. F. Kendrick.

ENGLISH TABLE GLASS. By Percy Bate.

OLD PEWTER. By Malcolm Bell.

"Will appeal strongly to collectors."—STANDARD.

"(English Embroidery.)" "The illustrations are numerous and beautiful."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

"From beginning to end always companionable, sincere, and instructive; we can imagine no more useful and agreeable volume."—BYSTANDER.

Drawings by Great Masters

The Drawings in this new series are reproduced on a large scale on a page 11½ in. by 8½ in. The volumes each contain 48 Reproductions, many of them printed in colour, and several of these are mounted on coloured papers in harmony with the tints in which the Illustrations are printed. The volumes are bound in delicately toned paper boards with vellum backs, and a beautiful design printed in three colours. 4to, 7s. 6d. each net.

HOLBEIN. By A. Lys Baldry.

ALBRECHT DÜRER. By Dr. Hans Singer.

LEONARDO DA VINCI. By C. Lewis Hind.

"It is sure of a welcome. The reproductions are printed with unusual care."—MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

Modern Master Draughtsmen

Uniform with "Drawings by Great Masters"

7s. 6d. net each.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. BURNE-JONES. By T. Martin

Wood.

DRAWINGS OF DAVID COX. By A. J. Finberg.

DRAWINGS OF ROSSETTI. By T. Martin Wood.

DRAWINGS OF SIR E. J. POYNTER, P.R.A. By Malcolm

Bell.

DRAWINGS OF J. M. SWAN, R.A. By A. L. Baldry.

DRAWINGS OF MENZEL. By Dr. Hans Singer.

Master Etchers

MERYON. By Hugh Stokes.

7s. 6d. net.

Impressionist Painting: its Genesis and Development

By WYNFORD DEWHURST

With 84 Illustrations in monochrome, and five in colours, being reproductions of the finest examples of Impressionist work from Turner and Constable to the present day. Small folio, cloth extra, 25s. net.

"An elaborate and beautifully illustrated history of the movement, marked at once by an unqualified enthusiasm for the school and a profound knowledge of the work of its exponents."—DAILY NEWS.

"It is a fascinating story written in a convincing style by a man who knows his subject."—COLLECTORS' CIRCULAR.

Liber Studiorum of J. W. M. Turner

With an Introduction by C. F. BELL

Oblong medium 4to, quarter vellum, cloth sides, with a binding of special design. 10s. 6d. net. Contains reproductions of the entire series of seventy-one plates.

"The general effect of Turner's beautiful compositions is retained with surprising success; their breadth and simplicity are as obvious in these copies as in the engravings."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

"Another excellent piece of work in the matter of reproduction. . . . An entirely fascinating collection of plates."—ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

GEORGE NEWNES, LIMITED, 3 to 12 SOUTHAMPTON ST., STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

LITERARY COMPETITIONS

£300 offered by
"The Bookman" in Prizes for the Best Books for Boys and Girls, viz., £100 for the Best Story for Boys,

£100 for the Best Story for Girls, £100 for the Best Story for Little Children.

Full particulars may be obtained from "THE BOOKMAN," 27 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

NEW SERIES.

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE.

(FOUNDED 1721.)

Price ONE SHILLING. March Number Now Ready

CONTENTS.

CAPTAIN JOHN WARD, PIRATE
MY SCHOOLGIRL FIFTY YEARS AGO
THE DESMOND REBELLION OF 1580
THE NEW IRISH PEASANT
